The Census and the Ensuing Pestilence; David Purchases Araunah's Threshing-floor. Incited by Jehovah, David orders a census. Though it is divinely ordered, Jehovah is reported as angry (cf. 1 Chr. 21^{1f.}). He sends a pestilence. The angel of Jehovah stops short of the destruction of Jerusalem. David is commanded to build an altar on the spot where the angel stood when the plague was stayed. This became the site of Solomon's Temple. Araunah seems to be a Hittite name, perhaps a title; for "Araunah" means "nobleman" in Hittite. This perhaps explains Araunah the king in v. 23 (mg.).

We have here a saga. The theology of the story is primitive and some elements in it at least are legendary, as, for instance, that David saw the avenging angel (v. 17). The story gave offense to later thought, so that we read in 1 Chr. 21¹ that Satan, not the Lord, moved David to the census. It is not clear to us why the census was a sin; probably because the growth and multiplication of a people is a sacred mystery into which one should not peer. The census may have been planned by David for the better organization of the militia or for purposes of taxation; in either case it might arouse much popular resentment. The conception that God being angry with his people should provoke the king to sin that he might be punished is primitive. Such stories have parallels from all over the world; it is not in such that the distinction and glory of Israel are seen. Indeed, such ideas we may regard even in David's time as superstitions, i.e., survivals from earlier thought not yet sloughed off.

FIRST AND SECOND KINGS

BY PROFESSOR D. C. SIMPSON

INTRODUCTION

Title and Place in the Canon. In the Hebrew, Greek, and Latin Bibles First and Second Kings follows First and Second Samuel. In the Greek and Latin Bibles, it is known as Third and Fourth Kingdoms (see intro. to First and Second Samuel, p. 381).

Contents. First Kings opens with a dazzling picture of the glories of King Solomon's reign and Second Kings closes with the restoration to honor of Jehoiachin, a prisoner of war in Babylon. Though this period is covered also by Second Chronicles, this latter work must be used as a supplement to, not as a substitute for, Kings. As a historical source, Kings is superior to Chronicles in many important respects (see intro. and notes to First and Second Chronicles). It is in the books of Kings that we can see the Northern Kingdom rise to power and influence, sink into moral corruption, and vanish from the stage of history; we watch the fierce conflict between wealthy Samaria and its weak little southern neighbor; we see the gallant resistance of Jerusalem to the fierce attacks of Sennacherib, and finally witness its fall before the onslaught of the king of Babylon. Again, it is in the books of Kings that we watch the historical struggles of real individuals for the higher and nobler ideal, alike in religion and in politics—Elijah against the prophets of the Tyrian Baal supported by the Tyrian princess Jezebel, Ahab against the Syrian forces, Jehoram and Jehoshaphat against the Moabites. It is from the books of Kings that we obtain a truer understanding of the evil practices of kings like Ahaz, and the earnest endeavor of Josiah to remedy a state of things which had become intolerable. Incidents such as these, together with many others, are put before us with such vividness and such dramatic power that they are indeed masterpieces of literary art. While they enthrall us as literature, they go far toward providing us with the knowledge of the historical and political background which is necessary for a true appreciation of the development of religion, ethics, and society during this formative period of the life-history of the chosen race.

But not even when they are supplemented from Chronicles do we find in the books of Kings a complete picture of those great movements, social, political and religious, which determined the lines upon which the national life progressed during this period. Hence, the student who wishes to reconstruct the true religious and social development of the period has to supplement the record found in these documents by the writings of the great prophets of the eighth century, together with those of Jeremiah and other famous prophetic leaders. Again, one who wishes to make a scientific reconstruction of the history of the period must read First and Second Kings in the light of, among others, such inscriptions as those found at Karnak, Nimrud, or Diban, if he would estimate the relation in which the Hebrews stood to neighboring nations. And yet, important as it is to supplement the records contained in these historical books both from the prophetic writings and from the inscriptions, it is equally important for the purpose both of the theologian and of the historian to examine carefully the literary structure and the successive redactions through which the books of Kings passed.

Authorship and Date. We owe the major portion of these books to the "compiler" (see below) who probably completed his work before the destruction of Jerusalem in 586 B.C., of which he betrays no knowledge. He probably lived in the reign of Jehoiachin, since it is here that the usual characteristics of his "framework" (see next paragraph) cease. His work was completed by a subsequent "editor" who belonged to the same school of thought but could tell of events as late as those of the reign of Evilmerodach (2 Kings 25²⁷⁻³⁰). A few additions were made to the text in the post-exilic period (see below under "Later Voices").

The Structure of First and Second Kings. The "compilatory" methods used by the Compiler of First and Second Kings are practically identical with those of many other historical writers of bygone days. They were used by the compilers of the Lives of Saint Francis of Assisi, by mediæval Chroniclers in Western Europe, by Justinian, using the Institutes of Gaius, by the Hindu Compiler of the great Law Book of Manu, by Arabic historians, by the Syrian Tatian in his Harmony of the Gospels, by the authors of the first and third Gospels, and, in the O.T., by the Compiler of the Pentateuch and Joshua, by the Compiler of Judges, by the Compiler of First and Second Samuel, and by the Compiler of First and Second Chronicles. Our Compiler, just as they did, utilized such records as were accessible at the time, choosing this account in accordance with his own earnest convictions, omitting that because he regarded it as irrelevant, and adding what he himself held to be essential. His record of Solomon's reign is in itself a small compilation, various sources being utilized, and the whole worked into a unity designed to drive home certain great religious truths. After the transition to the history of the Divided Kingdom (1 Kings 12) the story of each reign is (with a few exceptions) fitted into a definite and rigid "framework." First of all we have an opening formula (in which are given the date of the beginning of the reign, its length, the synchronism with the king of the other kingdom, and, in the case of Judah, the name of the king's mother); next comes the Compiler's "judgment" on the king in question (rarely containing historical items), and this precedes any extracts from his sources which the Compiler wished to insert; and finally appears the Compiler's "closing formula" (indicating where the curious reader may find further information, and recording the king's death, place of burial, and the successor's name).

The Sources. (1) Sources for the Reign of Solomon. The Compiler lived some three hundred years after Solomon's day, and set out to express his own religious philosophy of history. But it must not be thought that he was drawing on mere hearsay, still less on his own imagination, and that, therefore, his book is comparatively useless as a sober work of historical information. Sudden changes of style, coincident with differences in representation and varying emphasis in mental outlook and religious and moral presuppositions, are revealed in the various sections. They prove beyond question that the Compiler drew on written sources. Some of these sources were contemporary or nearly contemporary with Solomon; others were written some little time before the Compiler's day, although quite likely at some considerable distance from Solomon's reign. Thus the Compiler made use of (a) an intimate court history, (b) the official annals of the reign, (c) a biography of Solomon, (d) one document or more written in praise of Solomon's wisdom, and (e) a document concerned with his building operations. In the light of these various documents—even though they be of various dates and varying degrees of trustworthiness—the Compiler had every justification for seeing in Solomon, at least from some points of view, one of the greatest of Israel's heroes of old time.

(2) In the rest of his book the Compiler continued to quote from (a) the official Judean Annals in connection with the reign of practically every Judean king. For the history of the Northern, or Israelite, Kingdom he used similarly (b) the official annals of that kingdom. In addition he enriched his narrative by long extracts from works of which the chief were probably: (c) the "Acts of Elijah" (1 K. 17-19, 21; 2 K. 12-17a, see notes there); (d) the "Acts of Elisha" (2 K. 2, 34-815 1314-21); (e) a history of the Syrian wars (1 K. 20, 22); (f) a history of Judah (e.g., 2 K. 11); (g) a history of the Temple (2 K. 124-16 1610-18 233-24); and (h) a composite biography of Isaiah (2 K. 1817-2019).

The Compiler's Date, Purpose and Message. His aim was not that of the merely scientific historian of a nation's internal and international political life: he lived long before the era of scientific history. His aim was primarily religious and didactic. He sought to chronicle such events of the past (beginning with the reign of Solomon) as had a message for the nation and the individual in his own day.

(1) The Compiler's aim in the history of Solomon's reign, as elsewhere in his book, was primarily didactic. He sought from the incidents in it to illustrate certain principles of religion, of religious policy and of conduct which were of importance for the nation and the individual in his own day. His three chief didactic themes, though interwoven and at times obscuring each other, stand out fairly clearly throughout his narrative.

His first theme is that true "Wisdom" (34-9) is from God, and that he who possesses it is endowed, potentially at least, with the requisite education and ability for dealing with the problems of any one of the various departments of human activity he pursues. Such activities include those of the law courts, of scholarship and general or specific culture, of the rich man with expensive tastes—a luxurious palace, a numerous household and an insatiable love of luxury—of the diplomatist anxious for the good name of his nation in the estimation of foreign powers, of the organizer of the naval and military forces of his nation, and even of the civilian population in regard to its personal duties and its financial obligations to the state, or of the promoter of commercial undertakings and the pioneer in the creation of new phases of a nation's material development.

The Compiler's second theme, to some extent logically included in the first, and yet having a certain emphasis of its own, was the description of the buildings, especially the Temple, which, under the influence of the Divine Wisdom, assumed an increasingly larger place in the religious life of the nation for centuries after Solomon's day. It was to Solomon's Temple that the Compiler sought above all to attract his readers' attention and to cement their loyalty to it as the one legitimate place of sacrifice in their own day. We find expressed in First and Second Chronicles (especially in 1 Chr. 17, 22 and 2 Chr. 1-9, see notes there) a still more passionate devotion to the Temple, and that at a later stage of its evolution.

His third theme, necessitating considerable chronological displacement of the events of the reign, was distinctly less constructively optimistic than the others. It concerned a fundamental religious problem which is still discussed to-day. "Wisdom" inspires a man to high endeavor, so long as he consistently follows it. What, however, happens to a man who fails to follow Wisdom consistently? Insofar as he deserts her, what kind of reward may he expect? What kind of goal will he reach at his life's end? The Compiler, having no conception of a future life or of rewards and punishments beyond the grave (see discussion below), found, so far as Solomon was concerned, the answer to the riddle by creating a connection between, on the one hand, Solomon's love of foreign wives and their cults and, on the other hand, internal revolt and external military reverses. Consequently, he arranged his material to serve the purpose of showing (a) Solomon's predisposition at the very outset to make shipwreck of his life's ideals (1 Kings 31); (b) throughout the greater part of his reign his whole-hearted pursuit of the "wisdom" granted to him as a result of his vision (34-10²⁹); and (c) his later reaction from this pursuit of wisdom (111-13); resulting (d) in the punishment ultimately inflicted upon him through the instrumentality of his three "adversaries" (114-40).

(2) In conformity with his fundamental aim, the Compiler shows himself in the remainder of this history a whole-hearted follower of the prophetic and priestly supporters of Josiah's suppression of local sanctuaries and image-worship and of the consequent centralization of sacrificial worship at Jerusalem. Ever since Solomon's Temple had been built such centralized worship, it seemed to these reformers, had been possible: it was the only worship really acceptable to Him to whom it was offered and should therefore have been the only one practiced. Hence, in the Compiler's estimation, while Solomon's reign was an all-important step forward, the establishment by Jeroboam I of the Northern Monarchy, with its royal sanctuaries and bull-worship, was correspondingly retrograde and even fatal in its effects, in that henceforth all this cut off the Northern Kingdom from participation in that centralized worship and delivered it over almost entirely, and forever, to the hated bull-worship and other idolatrous practices connected in the Compiler's day with the worship at the local sanctuaries. A few only of the Judæan kings escaped a more or less complete condemnation when judged by this criterion; not one of the Northern kings was immune from it.

(3) The Compiler, moreover, sought to warn his readers that sin inevitably brings punishment, a warning still more emphatically and dogmatically stated in Chronicles. "Be sure your sins will find you out" is a motto of the book. He demonstrated that this was true not only when the sinner was otherwise a benefactor of religion like Solomon, but also when the nation was the sinner, e.g., the Northern Kingdom, and even the Judæan (see e.g., 2 Kings 17-23 23²⁶, 27 24³). Since the conception of rewards and punishments beyond the grave had not yet arisen, all such correction of the sinner had to take place in this life. (See art., The Religion of Israel, p. 173.)

(4) The Compiler teaches, on the other hand, that rectitude on the nation's and on the individual's part, courageous faith, and, above all, prayer, have their reward and ultimately gain the victory—one of many lessons to be learned from the biographies of Elijah and Elisha, but more especially from that of Isaiah in connection with the great crisis of 701 B.C. (2 Kings 18, 19).

(5) The Compiler sought, too, to clarify, develop and deepen his readers' ideas of God, his attributes and providence in nature and in human history. These are the fundamental issues emphasized in the "Acts of Elijah and Elisha." It was probably with this end in view that he, unlike the Chronicler, included extracts from these "Acts" even though their heroes belonged to the Northern Kingdom. That kingdom in his estimation was otherwise spiritually dead and had been moribund from the outset, i.e., from the moment of its rejection of the Davidic dynasty, apostasy from the Temple, and establishment of the bull-worship as the state religion.

(6) In the political sphere the Compiler was a patriotic member of the Judæan kingdom. He saw, it is true, in his country's foes Jehovah's instruments of chastisement. He did not, however, adopt the passivist rôle; he gloried in the defense of Ahab (in spite of his hostility to that monarch's religious policy) against the Syrian invader (1 Kings 20). He was a loyal subject of the Davidic dynasty, denouncing only individual kings, especially Manasseh, who failed in their duty to Jehovah and to the state, but he never proposed the abolition of that dynasty. Hence his message to the reigning monarch of Judah was that he should live up to the highest ideals of Solomon, and to his fellow subjects that they should, as Paul long afterward counseled, "Fear God and honor the king."

(7) In the social sphere he appreciated the need for social reform, his sympathies being evidently with the Northerners in their protest against oppression (1 Kings 12), and with Elijah and Elisha.

Later Voices in First and Second Kings.

(a) Exilic additions. After the Compiler had written his book, later members of his school of thought added 2 Kings 24⁸-25³⁰, which tell of the nation's final downfall and experience in exile. It is, moreover, to these later editors that at least the concluding and finest part of Solomon's prayer must be attributed, with its universalistic outlook and its stress on intercessory prayer. (b) Post-exilic additions. It is necessary at this point, only to call attention to the insertions made in the otherwise very ancient record of the building of the Temple, 1 Kings 6¹⁸, 20^b, 21, 22^b 722, 42^b, 48-50 81, 2, 3a, 4b, 5, and to a certain number of small, but very significant emendations and additions scattered throughout the two books, e.g., 1 Kings 10^{1b}, 21-25, 27 115 1217, 32-1334 1829(?), 31 2035-43 2123; 2 Kings 237^b, 12c, 14, 16-18(?), 19, 20.

Permanent Significance. The books of Kings, as already suggested, do not offer history in the modern sense of that term. The aim of the Compiler was not so much to write history as to show that the hand of Jehovah, the God of Israel, may be seen in the history of the chosen people. The selection or omission of material found in earlier sources was determined by this aim. Readers interested in affairs which in the opinion of the Compiler were of little or no religious significance are directed to sources in which such information may be found. The didactic tendency reveals itself especially in the framework, whose principal value consists in throwing light on the religious ideas and ideals of the Compiler.

Of very great historical value is the material which the Compiler took from the earlier sources, especially when he used it without serious modification. In many instances the brief and concise statements have every appearance of trustworthiness, and there are numerous indications of the fidelity with which the sources were preserved in their original form.

Perhaps the least satisfactory feature of the book is its chronology. No doubt the Compiler took some of the chronological data from earlier sources, but in the arrangement of this material and in the construction of the synchronisms he appears to have been under the influence of a more or less stereotyped and artificial scheme of generations. Fortunately the Assyrian chronology, which is fairly well established for the greater part of the period covered in Kings, makes it possible to place the biblical chronology on a more scientific basis. (See art., Chronology of O.T., p. 108.) But in spite of some minor shortcomings the books of Kings are of the greatest interest and value to students of Israel's political and religious history. Indeed, they are far superior to any other historical records of the same age.

FIRST KINGS

CHAPTERS 1 TO 11: THE ACCESSION AND REIGN OF SOLOMON (977-937 B.C.)

Chs. 1 and 2 serve as an introduction to Solomon's reign. They describe David's choice, made virtually on his death-bed, of Solomon as his successor and the steps taken to secure the latter's accession and subsequent security from the plottings of rivals. The whole of ch. 1 and much of ch. 2 are a transcript from an ancient source, written by a contemporary of the events narrated. The vivid description, the intimate knowledge of court life, and the keen partisanship, reflect the work of a supporter of Solomon, possibly one of the chief actors in the drama here recorded. For a note on the importance of Solomon's reign, see p. 422.

CHAPTER I

David's Last Days. (Continued in 21-12.) The author rises to superb heights of artistic skill in depicting the last moments of the aged king (vv. 1-4; David must now have been about seventy years old); the dangers of confusion in the leadership of the nation caused by the uncertainty as to David's rightful successor; the plots and counterplots within the court—Adonijah's hastily conceived plot and furtive banquet (vv. 5-10); the cunning subtlety, rather than statesmanship, of the aged Nathan, who had once been the bold exponent of the moral law of a God of justice and forgiveness (see notes to 2 Sam. 11²-12³¹) but now appears to be little more than a common wire-puller in a court torn by the claims of conflicting worldly interests (vv. 11-31); and the once beautiful, but now ageing, Bathsheba's equally guileful intervention on behalf of her beloved son (cf. note to 2 Sam. 12³¹). The dramatic outcome of it all is seen in Solomon's immediate triumph (vv. 32-40; cf. 210-12), and in the crushing effects of the news of this on Adonijah's fellow banqueters and plotters (vv. 41-53).

CHAPTER II

The Accession of Solomon. (See also notes on ch. 1.) The hand of the same consummate artist is to be seen in the descriptions of the further march of events—the aged king's charge to Solomon (vv. 1-4); the tragic fall from royal favor experienced by David's oldest and well-tried ministers (vv. 5-7), involving, as it did, Joab's disgrace and death (vv. 28-35; for Joab cf. notes to 2 Sam. 19^{8b}-20²⁶); Abiathar's eclipse by Zadok and banishment to a despised village (vv. 26, 27); Shimei's thoughtless throwing away of his life through his over-zealous greed in pursuing his runaway slaves (vv. 36-46); and, not least, Adonijah's speedy punishment for his sinister attempt to secure, through Bathsheba, that which he dared not request directly from Solomon, whether the request was born of lust or of ambition to further his claims to the kingship (vv. 8, 9, 13-25).

The picture is not that of a number of stage villains pursuing each his own devious and disgraceful line of crime. All the dramatis personæ are necessary to the theme; and all act from motives which are never either wholly bad or wholly unselfish. All except Adonijah are men of courage and tact. Their self-confidence is born of a consciousness of the seeming justice of their respective causes and of their desire to secure the continuance of David's dynasty. That they differed in their conception of how best to attain this end was not their fault: that was directly due to the novelty of the monarchy as an institution. The uncertainty as to the succession resulted simply from the fact that the monarchy was a comparatively recent innovation. The first king, Saul, had been chosen as a military dictator, a last hope, to save his people from the Philistines. But his dynasty after Ishbosheth's (Ishbaal's) unhappy and ineffective reign, came to an abrupt end. The Northern tribes of their own free will chose David on his merits when he was already king of Judah. Was the next king to be called to the throne by popular vote, or was David to be allowed to found a dynasty? Both parties at this point in the reign of the dying David presupposed the latter alternative. But if it was to be adopted, was a strict system of primogeniture to be followed, or was the present sovereign to choose his successor?

On grounds of primogeniture Adonijah's claims were beyond dispute. We cannot tell how he would have dealt with the political and religious situation of his day had he become king. But it is evident that Solomon's selection by the dying monarch and the rôle which he subsequently played were fraught with vital consequences not only for the Hebrew people but also for the whole world. It was not Solomon's enthusiastic adherents at David's court, nor a mother's overweening ambition for her son's dynastic claims, nor Solomon's own greed of riches and power, but the Divine Providence, which was ultimately responsible for bringing Solomon to the throne and for the course which history followed during and as a result of his reign. Without Solomon's policy (in certain at least of its fundamental issues) the history of the pre-exilic Hebrew State could scarcely have developed on the lines which eventuated ultimately in the rise of the Judaism of post-exilic days. The latter, in turn, without the ideal of Temple worship which had its beginnings in Solomon's passion for building, could scarcely have endured long enough to become the earliest, and therefore the vitally important, environment of Christianity. Equally impossible without the discipline of the Temple rites would have been Judaism's continued survival after Herod's Temple had disappeared, to be one of the primary spiritual forces from which Mohammed drew his inspiration, and, by no means a negligible result, to be itself thirty centuries after Solomon's death still a living religion treated by its rivals with greater respect to-day than ever before, alike in the New World and in the Old.

CHAPTERS 3 TO 11: THE EVENTS OF SOLOMON'S REIGN (cf. 2 Chr. 1-9)

CHAPTER III

1-3. Solomon's Marriage to the Egyptian Princess. The notice of Solomon's marriage to the Egyptian princess is placed at the beginning of Solomon's reign not as being the most important or the earliest of his adventures, but because, disapproving of it, the Compiler did not wish to include it among the adventures upon which Solomon embarked as a result of the gift of "Wisdom" (see intro., p. 413b).

4-28. Solomon's Choice of Wisdom: the Two Mothers. Solomon's sacrifice, vision, and the gift of wisdom to him at Gibeon (see Josh. 93-27 2 Sam. 208 211-9), whence he returns to the sanctuary of Jerusalem, symbolizing the importance which was in future to be attached to the latter as compared with all other sanctuaries. His use of this divine gift of "Wisdom" is immediately illustrated (vv. 16-28) by his decision in the case of the two mothers.

CHAPTER IV

1-34. Description of Solomon's Home Policy. In vv. 1-19 (continued in vv. 27, 28, after which vv. 22, 23 should be placed) this policy is illustrated by a list of his officials, who are more numerous and have more clearly defined duties than David's (2 Sam. 817f. 1537 1616 2023f. 1 Chr. 2733). This list belongs to the latter part of Solomon's reign, since his sons-in-law are mentioned. For recorder and scribe (v. 3) see notes to 2 Sam. 816, 17. 7. The twelvefold division of the country had as its object the maintenance of the royal household by the tribute in kind dispatched monthly by each officer in turn. 19. Gilead is probably a corruption of "Gad" (otherwise unmentioned), which may have now occupied Sihon's territory, but Og . . . Bashan is probably a gloss (Bashan having been dealt with in v. 13). 20, 21, 24-26 are of later origin than their context (especially the phrase on this side of the river; cf. Ezra 417 etc.; Neh. 29). They were inserted to enhance the width and extent of his kingdom and to exaggerate the value of his stables. 29-34. The trend of Solomon's "Home Policy" is further emphasized by a description of his learning and especially his genius for creating "proverbs"—hence the ascription to him of collections of Proverbs (e.g., Prov. 101 251 Eccles. 11 and the apocryphal Book of Wisdom), some of them (see v. 33b) being similar in form to the "Wisdom of Ahiqar" which was the parent of Æsop's Fables.

CHAPTERS 5 TO 7: SOLOMON'S BUILDINGS— THE TEMPLE

This section is mostly from a special "Temple Source." It was written by a priest rather than by a courtier, since very much more interest is exhibited in the details of the Temple than in those of the secular buildings. The author of this source gives no hint that either Solomon or he himself regarded the Temple as designed to be the central and only sanctuary for the whole kingdom. That was an idea which only grew up shortly before Josiah's reformation, and of which the Compiler was an ardent exponent—hence the space given by him to the present extract from the "Temple Source." The description is mostly that of Solomon's Temple as distinct from (a) Ezekiel's proposals for its rebuilding after the Exile (Ezek. 40-48); (b) the Traveling Tabernacle of the Wilderness (Ex. 25-31, 35-40) which represents the attempt made in the Priestly Code to throw back the conception of one central sanctuary into the period of Moses; (c) the Temple as rebuilt by Zerubbabel 520-516 B.C., and (d) as again rebuilt and enlarged by Herod the Great.

CHAPTER V

1-12. The Preparations for Building. The congratulatory embassy evidently at the outset of Solomon's reign sent by Hiram (better "Hirom," Assyrian Hirummu, son of Abi-baal), king (969-936 B.C.) of Tyre, the paramount city of Phœnicia, which he improved architecturally, opened the way to definite negotiations for the supply of timber for building and to the completion of a treaty (see further 2 Chr. 23f.).

13-18. Forced Labor. These verses, taken from an ancient source except perhaps vv. 16, 17, tell of the forced labor extorted by Solomon from his own Israelite (i.e., non-Judæan Hebrew) subjects, a fact afterward in part responsible for their determination to throw off the yoke of the Davidic dynasty. See note to 920-23. 18. The Gebalites: the inhabitants, skillful stone-masons, of the Phœnician city of Byblus (modern Gebeil, N. of Beirut), where recent excavations have revealed important survivals of Egyptian and other cultures and religions.

CHAPTER VI

1. Date. The traditional date (cf. vv. 37, 38 and 71) of the foundation laying seems to have been evolved in an artificial manner, 480 years being equal to 12 generations of 40 years each.

2-13. The Main Features of the Building. Its archetype cannot be determined, but the non-Israelite origin of its chief workman is consistent with the view of its being a copy of a foreign and therefore heathen sanctuary. Some compare its general outline with that of the temple of Amon-Re at Karnak, others with that of Syrian temples (but these are of later date). Lucian's description of the temple at Hierapolis bears a striking resemblance to it. The division into three sections is also found in temples in Sicily.

2. The Temple, situated east and west, was rectangular in shape, approximately (on the basis of a—royal—cubit being 20.7 inches) 104 feet long, 35 feet broad, and more than 52 feet high. It was "the house of habitation" of Jehovah himself conceived of as dwelling in the darkness of the inner shrine; it was not intended itself to hold the worshippers. The latter thronged the "Court" which lay to the west of the building. 3. House has the wider, and Temple (or better "palace," i.e., of the Deity) the narrower connotation, the latter being here used for the larger (later known as "the Holy Place") of the two divisions of the interior of "the house." 5, 6, 8, 10. The additional chambers or cells round the building were probably intended as depositories for the Temple appurtenances and treasures; the upper chambers were more roomy than the lower. The cross-beams of the floors were supported on the side of the Temple wall, not by being driven into the wall but by special supports attached to the wall for the purpose. 7, 9, 11–13. These are probably a late editor's insertion.

14–35. Internal Arrangements of the Temple. Of the internal arrangements of the Temple described in these verses attention need be called here only to the following: 16. The oracle, which was a cube with sides measuring $34\frac{1}{2}$ feet, absolutely dark, later known as the "Holy of Holies." 19. An additional oracle, the product probably of confusion on the Compiler's part, since there was only one oracle. 20b. The altar of cedar wood, i.e., the table of shewbread, and, as LXX rightly states, he made the altar of instead of covered the altar with it. 21, 22. The gilding of the house (cf. v. 30 end), probably the product of the post-exilic tendency to exaggerate the magnificence of Solomon's Temple. Hiram-abi, though called an artist in gold in 2 Chr. 214, probably had no technical knowledge of the use of sheet-gold. 25–28. The two Cherubim in the oracle. Here as in 2 Chr. 313 they stand on the floor of the oracle, whereas in Ex. 2519 (P) they branch out of either end of the mercy-seat. On Cherubim in general see note to Gen. 324. 31–35. The doors. The phrase in v. 31b meant either that the door with its framework occupied a fifth of the space or that each was pentagonal (cf. 633 75), whereas the doors of Ezekiel's Temple were six cubits wide (cf. Ezek. 413).

36–38. Final Details. The Temple Court (v. 36) in which stood the altar of burnt sacrifices (not mentioned in Kings; note to 2 Chr. 41) was the only "court of the Temple" in pre-exilic days. The first proposal to construct two "courts of the Temple" came from Ezekiel (Ezek. 40f.); and the multiplication into those "of the Gentiles," "of the women," "of Israel" and "of the priests," to which reference is made in N.T. times, was one of the novelties of the Temple of Herod the Great. The Temple Court in our verse is defined as inner to differentiate it, not from any other Court of the Temple, but from the "Great Court" (712) which surrounded not merely (a) the Temple in this inner court but also (b) the "middle court" which contained the royal palace and harem (78) and (c) contained at its south end the buildings of 72-7. These were never rebuilt in post-exilic days.

CHAPTER VII

1–12. Solomon's Buildings on Mount Zion. These were (a) his own palace buildings in their own court, which lay immediately south of the Temple Court, and (b) the rest of his buildings immediately south of this in the Great Court (cf. 636). 1. States the duration of the building operations; but whether the thirteen years should include the seven of building the Temple (61. 37) or whether the sum total is twenty is uncertain. 2–5. The house of the forest of Lebanon was so styled because of the numerous cedars from Lebanon used in its construction. It was the largest of the various buildings and situated farthest from the Temple. The upper story probably served as an armory (cf. 1017 Isa. 228) and the lower for popular gatherings, convened to discuss important affairs of state (Josephus, Antiquities, bk. viii, ch. 5: 2). 6, 7. The porch of pillars was possibly intended to serve as the entrance or vestibule to the Hall of Justice. 8. Cf. 636. 12. See note to 636.

13–51. The Furniture of the Temple and the Palace. The Temple was constructed by, or at least the work was done under the supervision of Hiram = Hiram-abi (= "Hiram my father"), as he is called in 2 Chr. 213 (his name in Kings having been assimilated to that of the well-known king of Tyre). The mention in v. 14 of his connections with Naphtali (but in 2 Chr. 214 with Dan) through his mother is due to a desire to make the chief workman of Jehovah's Temple as much an Israelite and believer in Jehovah as possible. Oholiab, mentioned in Ex. 316 as working on the Traveling Tabernacle of Moses' day, was also of Northern extraction, a Danite.

15–22. The Two Pillars. In the Temple Court, immediately in front of the entry to the Temple, were placed two tall pillars. It is difficult to obtain a clear idea of their appearance. But, by comparing the present account with 2 Chr. 315–17 and Jer. 5217–23, we gather that each of the two pillars was surmounted by a sphere, or chapter, rising out of lily work and covered by a network of metal, to which two rows of loosely festooned chains were attached at four points. They stood beside (see 2 Chr. 315-17), not within or supporting, the entrance. The fact that each had a particular name further suggests that they were not simply part of the architectural adornment, but originally bore some analogy to the pillars which, singly or in pairs, formed an important feature of Semitic sanctuaries. At Melkart's shrine at Tyre there were, according to Herodotus, two costly obelisks at which Melkart (and probably his wife-consort) was worshiped. Two pillars also stood before the temples in Paphos and in Hierapolis. Ashurbanipal on the occasion of his expedition to Egypt and Ethiopia recounts that part of his spoil included "two obelisks high with resplendent plating of fine workmanship . . . from the threshold of the gate of the Temple." Therefore these pillars at Jerusalem, built, like the Temple itself, by Phœnician workmen, were probably intended to be symbols of the Deity: they were an artistic refinement of the Mazzebah, or stone obelisk which, at many Israelite sanctuaries, still stood beside the altar in much later days. But it does not necessarily follow that Solomon and his subjects so interpreted the significance of these novel and foreign brass objects: for them the Ark in the "oracle" seems to have symbolized Jehovah. But it is possible that instead of Jakin (or Jakin, v. 21, i.e., "he [Jehovah] establisheth") the name "Jehovah" was carved on one pillar by Hiram-abi and subsequently altered into this name; and Boaz (i.e., "in him is strength") may be a later substitution for "Tammuz," whose cult was very prevalent in the Semitic world (cf. Ezek. 814).

23-26. The Bronze Sea. This stood in the Temple Court to the southeast of the Temple building, between the latter and the altar of burnt-offering (cf. 2 Chr. 42-6). The present narrative offers no explanation of its purpose and use. The Chronicler does so, but his explanation is not very feasible. The priestly reconstruction of the Mosaic Tabernacle substituted an ordinary laver (Ex. 3018f. 407. 30); Ezekiel had no need for it, as he introduced a Temple stream (Ezek. 471-12). The primary meaning originally attached to this vessel seems to have been symbolical. An Apsu, or deep, had a place in Babylonian temples and served for purificatory purposes. Moreover, Marduk, whose symbols are oxen, in Babylonian mythology represents the sun who, in spring, strives with the surging deep—the monster Tiamat—which he overcomes. These symbols may have been taken over by the Hebrews to represent the Israelite Deity (cf. the calf in Ex. 3211; and see 1 Kings 1228f.). For Jehovah as God of rain cf. Ps. 2910, and as subduer of the primæval flood and chaos cf. Gen. 12. 6, 9 Ps. 242 933.

27-39. The Ten Movable Lavers. If the large bronze bowl signified the sea (see note above), the smaller ones probably denoted the clouds, the sources of the heavenly or upper waters. In any case, the height of the lavers—about twelve feet—seems too great to allow of their proving of actual use in the practical affairs of the Temple. A laver of the kind which is here meant has been found in Cyprus; it differs from the Temple one chiefly in size.

40-47. A summary of "Hiram's" accomplishments.

48-51. A List of the Golden Implements of the Temple. For the existence of much of what is here mentioned (e.g., the golden altar) there is no pre-exilic evidence; the bare enumeration of golden articles is astounding after the careful mention of the bronze furniture, and may well be a post-exilic interpretation. The golden altar is the altar of incense which otherwise makes its first appearance only in the latest portion of the post-exilic priestly legislation (P). It was unknown in Ezekiel's Temple and therefore, in all probability, entirely foreign to that of Solomon. With reference to the table cf. 620-22 with 748-50; the former mentions an altar, here appears a table; there it is of cedar, here it is of gold. Shewbread: literally "bread of the face, or presence," was so styled because it was placed before Jehovah (Ex. 2530 Lev. 246 1 Sam. 216). In 1 Sam. 216 it is called "holy bread." In the post-exilic "Priestly Code" seven-armed candlesticks are mentioned (Ex. 2531f. Lev. 241f.). Such a candelabrum is depicted on the triumphal arch of Titus at Rome. The absence of any such ornament from the earliest list of Temple furniture (see ch. 6) makes the existence of this candelabrum as early as Solomon's time extremely doubtful. But some system of lighting, if only that of single bronze candlesticks, must have been in use from the first.

CHAPTER VIII

The Dedication of the Temple. (Cf. 2 Chr. 61-710.) Based undoubtedly on an ancient source, the account has been supplemented and revised by the Compiler and later editors. The insertions and revision in part betray themselves by their subject matter and in part are emphasized by their absence from LXX. But the substantial trustworthiness of the main facts is beyond question and it is enhanced when compared with the Chronicler's version.

1-11. The Removal of the Ark. Here is described the removal of the ark from Ophel, the southern end of the Eastern Hill, northwards to the oracle of the Temple, its last resting-place. The term Zion (v. 1), though often restricted to the site of the latter, is here used to denote the southern spur and is equated with the City of David. LXX retains of v. 2 only the words in the month of Ethanim; this verse creates a chronological difficulty since in 638 the eighth month, not the seventh, is specified. Either two distinct traditions have thus been preserved, or the dedication took place in the seventh month of the year following the completion of the Temple. Hiram-abi's work may have caused this delay. 4. Here are two traces of revision subsequent to the Compiler's work: the reference to the tent of meeting and the distinction drawn between priests and Levites are both, like all of the congregation of v. 5, characteristic of the Priestly School and of post-exilic usage (cf. note to 1 Chr. 131-5). But the reference to the priests (not the priests and Levites as distinct from each other) in v. 6 doubtless belongs to the old narrative and illustrates the growing importance of this professional class; for a little earlier David, in bringing the ark from its earlier home, had not troubled about them (2 Sam. 613). For the ark (v. 9) see notes to 1 Sam. 44 51-71.

12, 13. An early tradition (to be found in a still purer form in LXX) of Solomon's acts and words of dedication.

14-21. Preliminaries of the Dedication. This version was current in the Compiler's—the Deuteronomic—School. It is of considerable importance as reflecting the gradual liturgical growth of intercessory prayer not merely in his day but in that of subsequent editors of his work down to a late period in the Exile. In vv. 14-21 Solomon is made to address the people in terminology which at every turn, like that of the prayer which follows, recalls that of the hortatory sections of the book of Deuteronomy. The king, by virtue of his kingship, was head priest of his own sanctuary; thus Solomon was quite justified in assuming the rôle of a priest; the professional priests exercised their office only as the king's deputies (cf. 226 and 2 Kings 127 1610-16).

23-53. Solomon's Dedicatory and Intercessory Prayer. This is one of the finest examples extant alike of an ideal dedicatory prayer and of intercessory supplication, and that too on behalf not merely of the petitioner's own nation and co-religionists, but of all the families of the earth, to the end that all may find and worship the true God. Solomon is made to pray first of all that the promise made to David may be honored (vv. 23-26); that prayers made in this Temple may be answered by Jehovah (vv. 27-30), whom he is made to recognize throughout the prayer as a God who so far from being confined in and limited to this Temple (as in the original prayer in vv. 12, 13), is not merely supramundane but also transcendent; that the oath of ordeal (cf. Ex. 227-11 Num. 30) may be duly effective (vv. 31, 32); that confessions of sin in national defeat may be accepted (vv. 33, 34); that prayer in drought (vv. 35, 36) and in various calamities (vv. 37-40) may be rewarded; most important of all, and reflecting the universalistic missionary ideals of the Deutero-Isaiah and the Songs of the Suffering Servant, that even the foreigner's cry in this Temple to Jewry's God may be received by that transcendent Deity (vv. 41-43); that prayers in war, captivity and exile may also find a favorable hearing (vv. 44-53).

54-66. Benediction; The Final Festival. Faithfully transcribing his ancient source, the Compiler relates Solomon's blessing of the people in his priestly capacity (vv. 54-61; naturally omitted in Chronicles, where a story of the descent of heavenly fire is substituted). Vv. 62-64 enumerate the sacrifices of king and people; vv. 65, 66 the celebration of the Feast of Tabernacles. This is represented as kept in accordance with Deut. 1613-15 and as attended by all Solomon's subjects from the extreme north to the extreme south of his dominion, the southern boundary being the Wady-el-Arish, or brook of Egypt.

CHAPTER IX

1-9. A Theophany. This answer to Solomon's prayer is a further insertion made by a Deuteronomic writer of later date than the Compiler. Vv. 6-9 in particular presuppose the destruction of Jerusalem and the Temple and are designed to answer the question: Why was this catastrophe a justifiable and necessary act of divine providence?

10-28. Solomon's Public Works and Political Policy. This series of notices relating to the public works and political policy of Solomon are but imperfectly connected. Josephus states that Cabal (v. 13) meant in Phœnicia "not pleasing." Altered to Kabal it would mean "as (i.e., equal to) nothing." Galilee here has a much smaller application than in N.T. times, chiefly referring to the territory of Naphtali. But, though small, this cession of Hebrew territory must have hurt national pride and so contributed to the growing disaffection of Solomon's northern subjects, which flared up at his death chiefly in reaction against his system of corvée (v. 15), imposed on them in the interests of his buildings and fortresses. Megiddo secured him against Phœnicia and commanded the highways of communication between Syria and the Nile. The acquisition of Gezer (v. 16), which had in the past resisted absorption by the Hebrews (cf. Judg. 12⁹), even now fell not to Hebrew attack but to the military prowess of Egypt. It was a gift to Solomon calculated to impress him not only as to the friendship, but also, and more especially, as to the overwhelming military resources of his Egyptian father-in-law. Square towers, inserted at intervals along the wall, still survive, and are said to be probably the work of Solomon. (See Palestine Exploration Fund Quarterly Statement, Jan., 1905, pp. 30f.)

17-19. Solomon was a great builder. Beth-horon commanded the road from the sea-coast to Jerusalem; Baalath, probably the modern Bel'ain, was about two and one half miles north of Beth-horon. Tamar—the Roman Thamara, in the Judæan Steppe (see Ezek. 47¹⁹), probably the modern (ruined) el-Kurnub, guarding against attack from the south. For the variant reading Tadmor see 2 Chr. 84. Chariots had not formerly been used by the Hebrews but by the Canaanites: they were useful for fighting in the less hilly districts (see Josh. 17¹⁶).

20-23. Solomon had numerous bondslaves. These consisted of the five nations usually enumerated in Deuteronomic passages. The purpose of the passage (see also 2 Chr. 21⁷ 920-22) was to clear Solomon of the charge, made in the ancient sources included in this book, of enslaving his non-Judean subjects, e.g., 513-15 1128, the levy of Joseph 124.

24, 25. On v. 24, see note to 78. Solomon functioned as priest (see note to 822) at the three annual feasts inculcated in the "Code of the Covenant" (Ex. 23¹⁴, 16; cf. the little Code of the Covenant, Ex. 34²², 23). For the Chronicler's changes see note to 2 Chr. 6¹², 13.

26-28. Solomon's navy and expeditions to Ophir are referred to again in 10¹¹, 22. Eloth lay a little north of the modern Kal'al el' Akaba, at the north end of the Gulf of Akaba. The expedition must have taken place before the loss of Edom (see 11¹⁴⁻²²), unless Solomon succeeded in keeping the harbor and sea approaches (cf. 1 Kings 22⁴⁸ 2 Kings 8²⁰ 14²² 16⁶).

CHAPTER X

1-13. Solomon Visited by the Queen of Sheba. Situated in southwestern Arabia with Mariaba as its capital, the fame of Sheba as a center of culture and political power is attested by Strabo, Pliny, and the Himyaritic inscriptions. It is often mentioned elsewhere in O.T. (e.g., Ps. 72¹⁰, 15 Isa. 60⁶ Jer. 62⁰), with its caravans conveying Indian and Arabian produce to Tyre and elsewhere (Job 61⁹ Ezek. 27^{22f.} 38¹³). It is not Solomon's juridical wisdom (as in 31^{6f.}) but his general knowledge of life and its more abstract problems which is here held up for approbation. The hard questions were not concerned, as Jewish tradition suggests (cf. Mt. 12⁴²), with religious matters, but were perplexing questions like Samson's riddle (Judg. 14¹²) and the riddle guessing in which Josephus asserts that Solomon and Hiram indulged (Antiquities, bk. viii, ch. 5: 3).

14-29. Solomon's Prosperity and Wealth.

This section contains a number of disconnected notices relating to Solomon's prosperity and wealth, not dissimilar to 9¹⁰⁻²³. But though, like the latter, mostly based on the ancient Annals, parts of this section reflect traditions of the Compiler's own day, especially vv. 14, 15 (and even more so vv. 21-25, 27), and illustrate the tendency, increasing as time went on, to emphasize his wealth and personal gifts. The description of his golden age in vv. 23-25 rivals in its terms the Messianic forecasts of the future (Isa. 23¹⁸ 60^{2f.}). It was probably Solomon who initiated the use of horses in war. They had previously been ridden only in times of peace as a mark of wealth (15 2 Sam. 15¹): most commonly the Hebrew of pre-Davidic days rode on asses or mules (Judg. 10⁴ 12¹⁴ 2 Sam. 13²⁹ 18⁹). For the later condemnation of horses see Hos. 17 14³ Amos 2¹⁵ Mic. 5¹⁰ Isa. 31¹; cf. also Deut. 17¹⁶. The caravaneering of v. 29 was probably directed not to Egypt (Hebrew Misraim) but to Musri (cf. 2 Kings 7⁶), a North Syrian land, situated, as Assyrian inscriptions attest, south of the Taurus, a direction in which Togarmah, also renowned for its horses, must be looked for (Ezek. 27¹⁴). Instead of in droves (v. 28) read and from Koa (a district of Cilicia, north of the Taurus range), an emendation supported by many authorities.

CHAPTER XI

1-13. Solomon's Marriage of Foreign Princesses and Worship of Foreign Gods. For the place of this section in the Compiler's third theme see introduction, p. 414. The historical kernel of these verses is extremely important for the reconstruction of the history of Solomon's dominions and the causes of discontent at the close of his reign. Among the deities whom he worshiped (not instead of, but doubtless in addition to, Jehovah) was Ashtoreth, the chief female goddess as the consort of the male Baal. In Mesopotamia she revealed herself as Ishtar, goddess, among other things, of war; among the Canaanites and Phœnicians as Ashtart, the goddess of love and fecundity; she even penetrated at a very early time into Egypt. Among some nations (e.g., the Sabæans) we find a masculine form of the word indicating a male deity. The worship of this deity, therefore, in one form or another was well-nigh universal. Milcom was the national god of the Ammonites. Solomon probably built his altars (vv. 7, 8) on soil brought from the native land of each several god, just as Naaman desired to worship Jehovah on Palestinian soil taken from Israel to Syria (see notes to 1 Sam. 26¹⁹ 2 Kings 5¹⁷). Chemosh was the national god of Moab (cf. Num. 21²⁹ and the Moabite Stone).

14-22. Solomon's First Adversary. This first adversary is the Edomite Hadad (the name of a god among the Assyrians). The incident probably took place comparatively early in Solomon's reign and was seemingly relegated to the end by the Compiler to drive home his moralizing lesson. Two distinct stories seem to have been welded together in this narrative. According to the one, Hadad was an Edomite prince who in his childhood escaped David's massacre of the Edomites and was taken to Egypt: he was brought up by Pharaoh's wife, Tahpenes, and on the death of David returned as king of Edom. According to the other, Adad, a leader of Edomite troops, escaped from Joab, fled to Midian and from thence to Paran, and finally to Egypt, where he became the Pharaoh's brother-in-law. Hadad himself may have been a Midianite: vv. 17, 18a at least suggest that his connection was originally with Midian. Granted this, Midian may have given place to Edom, which in turn, when the close of the story was misplaced to the point which it now occupies (namely, v. 25b), was corrupted into Aram (=Syria).

23-25. Solomon's Second Adversary. This was Rezon of Damascus. The author of this story seems all unconscious of the terrible significance which this new power was destined to have for the Northern Kingdom: for two centuries Israel and Syria were deadly enemies until both succumbed before the onslaught of Assyria. V. 25a suggests that the revolt took place early ("all the days") in Solomon's reign. The close of the story and of this verse, which in the Hebrew has been misplaced (v. 25b belonging to v. 22), has been preserved by the LXX, which reads: "And Hadad returned to his own land. This is the evil which Hadad did, and he oppressed Israel and reigned in Edom."

26-43. Solomon's Third Adversary. This was not a foreigner but an Israelite tribesman, an Ephraimite. Whereas the other adversaries' efforts resulted in the loss to Solomon of some of the foreign vassal-states dating from David's time, this one stood forward as the champion of the rights of the enslaved Northerners (cf. 920-23) and became their king at the death of Solomon. The Compiler's animosity toward this leader of revolt against the Davidic dynasty was due to the fact that his success made the religious unity of all the tribes in the worship of the Temple an impossible ideal. A somewhat different version of this rebellion appears in the LXX after 1224. It tells how Jeroboam, an Ephraimite, son of a harlot named Sareisa (or Sareira) and a servant of Solomon, was appointed overseer of the corvee of the tribe of Joseph. With a force of three hundred chariots he raised a revolt and, being compelled to flee to Shishak, king of Egypt, married Anoth, the sister of the Pharaoh's wife (this detail belongs to the story of Adad; see note on v. 19), who bore him a son Abijah (cf. v. 20). Upon Solomon's death Shishak unwillingly allowed him to return to his own country, where he collected the tribe of Ephraim and built a fort. The name of his mother Zeruah (i.e. "leprous woman") would appeal to the Compiler as being (like "harlot" in the duplicate narrative) a sign of the inherent badness of her son. But he lacked neither courage nor a sense of justice, as is shown by his action in vv. 27, 28. The support given him by the prophet in vv. 29, 30 is similar to that accorded to David and later to Jehu: it suggests that he was by no means the irreligious and self-seeking usurper whom the Compiler paints for us.

The Importance of Solomon's Reign. We are now in a position to estimate the importance of Solomon's reign, to which the Compiler has devoted so large a portion of his work. In what respects is it noteworthy? What were its results—good and bad—upon the character and subsequent history of the Hebrew people?

It should be clear that the whole effect of Solomon's reign was in the direction of revolutionizing Hebrew life; his influence is by no means to be judged only by the importance subsequently assumed by his Temple. It was he who hastened the inevitable transition of an originally nomadic people from a pastoral and agricultural stage of its evolution in the direction of its ultimate destiny as the nation noted for commercial instincts and trading acumen. Moreover, he gave to the Hebrews, for the first time in their existence, the status of a nation, and made them for the time being a closely united whole. Kingdoms and empires such as those of Egypt and Tyre had previously had little or no cognizance of the Hebrews as a nation: it was his aim to make them capable of negotiating on equal terms with such neighboring peoples, and of entering into treaty alliances with them. He, by his personal example, set forth, in the juridical sphere, an ideal of equity and insight into motives which allowed Hebrews of subsequent days to appreciate the teaching of Amos when he demanded "righteousness" in the law courts and in every other department of life, and of Jeremiah when he failed to find it anywhere in Jerusalem. Similarly, Solomon organized an efficient system of taxation and methods for its collection in a part of the world which to this day, except when under the direct authority of a Western power, suffers from the absence of such organization and from the speculations of minor officials thereby made possible. Lastly he gave an impetus to gnomic "wisdom," to the tendency, that is, to bring common sense to bear on life and conduct and to look below the surface to the heart of things. He did this so thoroughly that much literature, though written by others than Solomon, bears his name, e.g., the book of Proverbs (see Prov. 10¹ 25¹), Ecclesiastes, and the apocryphal Book of Wisdom.

But neither a nation nor an individual can suddenly move forward in any of these directions without laying itself open to the dangers which always beset the path of progress. Thus Solomon, to insure the success of the beginnings of these changes in his people's life and outlook, was tempted to employ methods some of which are justifiable in no age whether for a nation or for an individual. In particular his efforts to raise the status of his kingdom in the estimation of its neighbors led him to establish an extravagant standard of luxury at his court. This in its turn led to excessive taxation of his subjects. His efforts to give dignity to his palace and public buildings tempted him to yield territory to Phœnicia and to enslave all his subjects other than the men of Judah, and this in turn led to the disruption of his kingdom at his death. Even during his lifetime, probably early in his reign, his concentration on these and other aspects of public policy, to the exclusion of any real interest in military preparedness, resulted in the loss of his father's foreign dominions.

Thus the results—good and bad—of Solomon's activities were remarkable and fully warrant the considerable amount of space allotted to them by the Compiler in his history. But the fact that the good effects were well-nigh counterbalanced by the bad in his lifetime and afterward, should warn us against an uncritical appreciation of his personal character. He desired "Wisdom" and was granted it in a measure far in excess of the amount and quality of it potentially present in other men of his generation. But he failed in his personal conduct and in some aspects of his official policy—more particularly in the social sphere—to rise far above the standards of other men of his day less brilliantly endowed. Solomon in all of his glory, said our Lord, was not arrayed like one of these lilies of the field, calling us away from the artificialities alike of luxurious and smart society and of ornate ritual and ceremonial to the simple beauties of nature and the worship of the heavenly Father "in spirit and in truth" (Jn. 424).

1 KINGS 12 TO 2 KINGS 17: THE DIVIDED KINGDOM

The restlessness of Solomon's subjects became more manifest after his death. His son Rehoboam had a splendid opportunity to allay the dissatisfaction, but he refused to accept the better part. His policy led to a division of the kingdom—a division which was never healed.

CHAPTERS 12¹ TO 1420: THE REVOLT OF THE NORTHERN TRIBES

Solomon's reign of profligate luxury, diplomatic successes in the international sphere, and remarkable organization of the human and material resources of his realm was at an end. The Northerners, his oppression of whom had rendered this possible, were determined that his death should mark the end of that oppression. They chose for their first king Jeroboam the Ephraimite (937-915 B.C.).

CHAPTER XII

1-24. Rehoboam's Loss of His Northern Subjects. Rehoboam's failure to realize the gravity of the situation lost him his Northern subjects, and his attempt to continue the system of indentured labor cost him a general, and it drove the Northerners to the immediate choice of Jeroboam, whose efforts to alleviate their lot in Solomon's reign (1126-40) they remembered. In Judah, Rehoboam's determination to stamp out the rebellion by force of arms called forth a public and effective protest from the prophets, who were the religious leaders of Judah, which alone remained faithful to the Davidic dynasty. Thus propheticism, formerly the champion of resistance to foreign domination (see notes to 1 Sam. 91-115), ranged itself definitely on the side of the oppressed against the oppressor, and so laid at this time the foundations on which first Elijah, and later, on a very much higher plane, the prophets of a new type, Amos, Hosea, Micah, and Isaiah, were able to build their doctrines of a God whose own nature was essentially moral, and whose demands on his people and their rulers were also ethical rather than cultic, moral rather than blindly nationalistic. Whether the prophets in point of fact caused Rehoboam at once to acquiesce in the revolt is doubtful (see 14³⁰). In any case, the Northern tribes retained the monarchical form of government, though with many dynastic changes, which maintained its distinctness from Judah and its Davidic dynasty right up to its subjugation by Assyria (2 Kings 17⁶). Later thought saw in this last event abundant evidence of the North's wickedness in rejecting the Davidic dynasty (cf. 2 Kings 177-23).

25-33. Jeroboam Builds Shrines for His People. The Compiler of Kings interpreted Jeroboam's most innocent acts and what was really an attempt to humor the old-fashioned and reactionary religious ideals of his Northern subjects as clear evidence of his determination to alienate his Northern subjects' affections from the Southern Kingdom and, in the Compiler's thought, the only legitimate sanctuary. To the Northerners, however, the Temple was only a reminder of their own indentured and unwilling labor, its symbolism the evidence of Solomon's foreign and therefore unpatriotic proclivities, while the idea of the central sanctuary did not arise till much nearer the reign of Josiah and the Compiler's own times. But a historical kernel underlies the statements contained in these verses. Jeroboam gave his subjects exactly what their conservative presuppositions demanded—sanctuaries of their own—two maintained at the royal expense—an ancient method of representing Jehovah as the God of physical force, a bull (cf. Ex. 321-6), a professional priesthood augmented from among the laity as need arose—its restriction to the tribe of Levi being as yet unknown—and a harvest festival at the time when crops were actually garnered in (i.e., roughly fourteen days later in the North than in the South). Because he was king he exercised his office as the national priest just as Solomon had done and as Uzziah long afterward did (see 2 Chr. 2616-19), in the Temple.

CHAPTER XIII

Divine Punishment for the Alleged Apostasy: the Disobedient Prophet. Later generations asked: Could apostasy from Jehovah, such as the religious innovations of Jeroboam appeared to involve, have gone uncondemned and even unpunished? The present chapter contains their answer to this question. It seems to be an adaptation to Jeroboam I's reign of the incident related of the reign of Jeroboam II in Amos 710-17. It serves, too, to explain Josiah's strange omission to desecrate a certain tomb (2 Kings 2317, 18). It reflects, moreover, the post-exilic distrust of the "prophet" as distinct from the man of God at a time when the former were well-nigh extinct and were wholly despised. It contains the beginnings of that significant process which culminated in the personification of "the word" (cf. 1 Kings 2035), which played so large a part in Johannine and later Christian terminology. It is not history but a didactic story. It carries with it a warning to every religious denomination to-day not to cast aspersions on the leaders of its rival schools of thought: it is a warning too to each individual to put first the voice of conscience as being the most sure means whereby the individual can apprehend God's will as to his place and purpose in the divine economy.

CHAPTER XIV

1-20. Additional Punishment for Jeroboam: His Death. The original story, which is still, however, replete with the thought of the parents' devotion for their child and their appeal to God through his human representative to save it, was gradually modified in course of transmission. The story was utilized to explain how the prophetism which had put Jeroboam on the throne expressed, even in his lifetime, its abhorrence of his religious program and predicted the ultimate overthrow of his dynasty. Thus did posterity, under the influence of changed ideals, pass an adverse judgment upon the policy of Israel's first king—that courageous soul who, even in Solomon's reign, had dared to withstand the tyrant's iron hand, and who appears, in point of fact, to have devoted himself throughout his reign to what at the time seemed to be the best interests of his subjects. Thus too in Christian times have good and courageous leaders of past generations been too hardly criticized and too hastily condemned by a subsequent generation which, because of its own changed ideals, has failed to see the past in its true proportions.

CHAPTERS 1421 TO 1524: THE HISTORY OF THE JUDEAN KINGDOM

21-31. Rehoboam, the First King (937-920 B.C.). See 2 Chr. 10-12. The purpose of Shishak (960-950 B.C., first king of the Bubastide, the 22d Egyptian dynasty) in invading Judah is obscure. It may have been either (1) an attempt to reimpose the old Egyptian yoke upon Palestine and in particular upon the Hebrews, in which case the brevity of the Judæan historian's reference to the campaign is perfectly natural, since the invasion seems to have been for the moment quite successful; or (2) an attempt to assist Jeroboam, as a protégé of Egypt (1140), by attacking the Davidic kingdom. The inclusion, however, of Israelite, in addition to Judæan towns, in the Pharaoh's own list of cities taken by him seems to militate against this latter hypothesis. The list is to be found on the southern wall of the great temple at Karnak.

CHAPTER XV

1-8. Abijam, the Second King (920-917 B.C.). See 2 Chr. 13.

9-24. Asa, the Third King (917-876 B.C.). See 2 Chr. 14-16. The Compiler found in Asa a man after his own heart—an iconoclastic reformer. Of his activities in this and other matters and of their religious significance for later generations we read still more in Second Chronicles. Asherah (v. 13), if used here to denote a goddess, means an image of Astarte (cf. note to 11¹⁻⁴³ 1632). Against its use here in its ordinary sense of sacred tree or pole is the fact that prior to the Deuteronomic reformation (2 Kings 23) such trees or poles were more or less legitimate at the sanctuaries of Jehovah. Asa's diplomacy met the need of the moment (vv. 16-21), but had bad consequences: (1) His gift would be interpreted by Syria as an acknowledgment of Syria's overlordship of Judah; (2) an immediate loss of Northern territory ensued; and (3) the energetic Benhadad I, strong enough to defy the Assyrian king, Shalmaneser III, was encouraged to pursue his policy of interference in Palestinian politics to the future detriment of both kingdoms.

CHAPTERS 15²⁵ TO 22⁴⁰: THE HISTORY OF THE NORTHERN KINGDOM (see 14²⁰)

The Compiler here interrupts the account of the history of Judah, and resumes from 14²⁰ the history of Israel, or the Northern Kingdom. He resumes the history of Judah at 22⁴¹. This alternation of the two histories continues to 2 Kings 17.

25-32. Nadab, the Second King (915-914 B.C.). Note (1) the recurrence of Israelite-Philistine hostilities, and (2) the description of the first dynastic change in the Northern Kingdom.

33, 34. Baasha, the Third King (914-900 B.C.). See also 16¹⁻⁷. It would appear that just as Jeroboam owed his rise to the intervention of the prophets, and just as his dynasty was abruptly cut off through their activities, so Baasha owed his throne to them, but his policy was regarded by them as equally unsatisfactory and they determined as soon as possible to terminate his dynasty. The speech put into Jehu's mouth was, however, a free composition of the Compiler's, and 16⁷ was a reflection of later days upon the fulfillment of the predictive element in prophecy.

CHAPTER XVI

1-7. See note on 1533, 34.

8-14. Elah, the Fourth King (900-899 B.C.). With his death the dynasty of Baasha became extinct. The king would more profitably have been with the army, not at his capital; perhaps this was the cause of the army's discontent, which reached its climax in his assassination. Arza need not necessarily have been cognizant of the plot.

15-22. Zimri, the Fifth King (899 B.C.). Zimri's seven days' reign was ended by his suicide, but this by no means meant peace for the Northern Kingdom. Tibni held his own against Omri for four years (see vv. 15 and 23); it was not until Tibni and his brother Joram (so LXX in v. 22) were dead that Omri could feel secure on his throne.

23-28. Omri, the Sixth King (899-875). The Compiler rightly appreciated the importance of, and therefore recorded, Omri's founding of Samaria (on the west side of Mount Ephraim and at the head of the chief pass to the Mediterranean) and its use henceforth as the capital. Had he set out to write an ordinary instead of a religious history of his nation's past, he should have detailed the following important features of Omri's rôle in Israel's history: (1) The fame of Omri became widespread. From the reign of Shalmaneser III (854 B.C.) to that of Sargon (720 B.C.) the Northern Kingdom was alluded to on Assyrian inscriptions as "the land of Omri," or "the land of the house of Omri," and Jehu, although the founder of a new dynasty, was styled by the Assyrians, "son of Omri." (2) The only weakness of Omri's new dynasty, which endured for a half a century, was its blindness to the religious and conservative instincts of its subjects. (3) In addition to the partially successful wars against Syria referred to by the Compiler (201-34 221-36), Israelite overlordship of Moab was capably asserted, a fact recorded by Mesha, king of Moab, on the Moabite Stone. (4) The statesmanship of Omri and his dynasty is well illustrated by the treaty with Tyre (aimed at the hegemony of Syria) cemented by the marriage of his son Ahab with the Tyrian princess Jezebel, the alliance with Judah cemented by the marriage of Athaliah with Jehoram (see 2 Kings 8¹⁸), and the defensive alliance with Syria against Assyria (see 20³⁴).

CHAPTERS 16²⁹ TO 22⁴⁰: AHAB AND ELIJAH

29-34. Ahab, the Seventh King (875-853 B.C.). The policy of alliance with Tyre now began to bear its natural fruit. Doubtless it assisted Israel in maintaining something of its political independence of Syria. But it threatened Israel's religious independence and provoked a religious situation of which Omri had not dreamed and which was destined ultimately to lead to the extinction of his dynasty. Marriage alliance with the king of powerful Phœnicia could not be easily bought or lightly treated. Moreover, the Tyrian princess was a woman of character and determination, and, judged by the standards of her own nation, deeply religious. Jezebel was the daughter of Itobaal ("Baal is with him"), king of Tyre (887–876 B.C.), who was therefore interested in Melkart, the chief male deity of Phœnicia, but had been (before he succeeded, according to Josephus, the usurper Phœles) a priest of Astarte. Ahab consequently established not only a temple of Melkart at Samaria but also one of Astarte (Asherah in v. 33, probably here used in this sense; see note to 15¹³ and cf. note to 11¹⁻⁴³). These indications of royal favor for cults other than those of the purer forms of the worship of Jehovah naturally influenced popular feeling. The continuance of old superstitions, the recrudescence of Canaanitish Baalism, and, worst of all, the still more rapid fusion than heretofore of Canaanitish Baalism and popular forms of Jehovah religion, were all encouraged. For instance, the refounding of Jericho was marked by the old Canaanite custom (revealed by excavations at Gezer, Taanach, etc.) of immolating children at the foundation of a new city (v. 34). Unfortunately, the Compiler is silent as to what were the exact relative proportions of Canaanite Baalism, popular Jehovah religion, and new Tyrian elements which contributed to the composition of the religious party or parties now opposing themselves to the higher and purer forms of Jehovah worship. Whether or not the policy of the court and popular feeling favored Canaanite Baalism or a fused Jehovah-Baal religion or the Tyrian religion, they were moving definitely toward the position that, though, on the one hand, Jehovah was war God, the control of nature, on the other hand, including the bestowal of her gifts, and the increase of human, animal, and vegetable life, was vested in gods other than Jehovah. The ethical and moral claims of Jehovah were put on one side and forgotten.

CHAPTER XVII

Elijah Opposes Ahab's Innovations in Religion. In striking contrast to all this are Elijah's own religious position and message as revealed in the "Acts of Elijah" (i.e., chs. 17–19, 21), which undoubtedly contain a general substratum of historical facts though written to glorify the life-work of that hero and to incorporate the outstanding points of his teaching as this was understood by his disciples during the next two or three generations. Elijah proclaims that Jehovah, not Canaanite or Tyrian Baals, is the sole director of nature, the sole bestower and withholder of nature's gifts in Palestine (v. 1), a truth demonstrated by the story of Elijah's own experience in being fed by the ravens (vv. 2–7). Moreover, Jehovah is shown to be also the bestower of nature's gifts to non-Israelite dwellers in Palestine (vv. 8–16), and the sole and effective renewer of human life (vv. 17–24).

CHAPTER XVIII

The Trial of Creeds on Mount Carmel. Jehovah, for his part, proves himself a God able to nerve his prophet to defy the human king and call for a trial of creeds (vv. 1–19). This trial takes place on Mount Carmel (vv. 20–40). On an ancient altar of Jehovah (an apt symbol of Jehovah's ancient worship and former recognition as sole God in Palestine) descends the fire from heaven. It vindicated Elijah's mockery of the ineffective ritual, ceremonial, and gods of his opponents, and also his own faith in Jehovah as nature's God, alike as an earth deity and as a sky-god (the fire from heaven)—but it did not demonstrate either the absolute transcendence of Jehovah or his sole creatorship and direction of the universe. These latter issues were not in dispute, being beyond the ken both of his opponents and of Elijah himself. In vv. 41–45a Elijah is the herald of Jehovah in his capacity as the rain-giver, the function of a sky deity. But he is still an ecstatic prophet, not without external affinities with the "sons of the prophets" of Saul's day (vv. 45b, 46). See note to 1 Sam. 9¹⁻¹¹¹⁵.

CHAPTER XIX

1–21. Elijah's Flight: His Encouragement by Jehovah. Elijah is also a true prophet, and therefore hated by the arch-enemy of Jehovah (vv. 1, 2). In his flight he goes first to the ancient sanctuary of Beersheba (vv. 3–7), which was beloved of Northern tradition (see Gen. 21^{31f.} 26²³), and a favorite sanctuary of Northerners even in later times (see Amos 5⁵ 8¹⁴). Finding no spiritual comfort here, he wanders into the adjacent "wilderness," where he receives physical succor from "an angel" from Jehovah. In search of Jehovah he visits Horeb (vv. 8–18), the scene of Jehovah's self-revelation to Moses and of his first covenant with the Hebrews.

In what did the revelation here made to Elijah consist? Many answers have been given to this question. No one by itself seems to exhaust the full potential significance of the passage as a whole. Jehovah's absence from the most potent forces of nature may have been meant as a warning to Elijah not to identify Jehovah too exclusively with these natural phenomena, as being only transient vehicles, not the essentials, of his self-revelation to Moses of old or to Elijah himself on Mount Carmel and at this moment. The still small voice (or, better, the sound of a light whisper) may have been intended to guide Elijah to higher and purer planes of prophetic intuition than those to which he had so far risen through his previous observation of the external phenomena of nature and its message. It may be, on the other hand, that the "whisper" was that of the desert waste. In this case its message was to communicate to Elijah that only after Israel's present social structure had crashed like the thunder and Canaanite civilization had passed away like the lightning, would Israel find Jehovah in a return to the silence and the simplicity of the desert. In this latter interpretation the "whisper" is itself the message. Elijah has received the call to be a revolutionary, an enemy of ordered society to an extent to which even he had not hitherto condemned it. No truth as to God himself, no comfort for Elijah's own soul, no constructive spiritual message was thus revealed to him: he was to become merely an exponent of "the eschatology of woe" and to preach that only after it and through it, if at all, was "a good time coming." If this interpretation is adopted, the narrative must be regarded as composite.

19-21. This seems to be a fragment of another tradition in which Elijah's revolutionary program was aimed only at the dynasty of Omri and not at civilization in general. It was to be worked out by political means (the Syrian wars and the new dynasty of Jehu) and by the commissioning of a successor, not by a catastrophic upheaval of society, nor by Elijah's own "whirlwind" methods. (See N. Micklem, Prophecy and Eschatology, pp. 83-104.)

CHAPTER XX

This chapter (see also 22^{1f.}) interrupts the story of Elijah. Telling of certain aspects of Ahab's reign from an entirely different angle from that adopted in the preceding chapters, it is a valuable corrective of them. In chs. 17-19 Elijah was the hero, Jezebel the arch enemy and Ahab her weak tool, and the theme was Elijah's stand for the higher religion of Jehovah against those who, including Ahab and Jezebel, sought its eclipse or abolition. In ch. 20 (and again in ch. 22) Jezebel recedes entirely into the background, Ahab is the hero, courageous and capable.

1-12. Ahab's Courageous Resistance to Benhadad. Ahab, with much courage, resists Benhadad's demands for an increased tribute of money and a human freight of Israelites to serve as his soldiers and slaves. The cause of Syria's hostility to Israel at this moment is not clear. If, as we gather from v. 34, Omri's wars with Benhadad I had turned out disastrous for Israel, and if territory had therefore been ceded to Syria, the present campaign may have been intended to drive home on Ahab a full consciousness of those unfortunate facts. Possibly Benhadad's purpose was only to extort auxiliary troops from Ahab for his campaign against Assyria which culminated disastrously for Syria in the battle of Karkar (854 B.C.), though the triumph of Assyria was by no means decisive. The Assyrian account of the battle asserts that contingents were furnished by Ahab of Israel, Benhadad of Syria, the kings of Hamath, etc. It has, however, been supposed that at the time of this siege of Samaria, Benhadad had already been defeated at Karkar, and was now calling on Ahab for fresh assistance; Ahab, grasping the opportunity afforded him by Syria's weakness consequent on its defeat at Karkar, decided to refuse Benhadad's demand and to throw off the Syrian yoke—hence Benhadad's present campaign.

13-34. Benhadad's Defeat; Ahab's Magnanimity. It is because Ahab, though insolent in his attitude toward Elijah, implicitly obeys the message of a "prophet" that he succeeds in warding off the Syrian attack. In the estimation of the Syrians, Jehovah was so closely connected with Ahab's success that they, knowing him to be a God of mountain heights, decided to open the following year's campaign in the plains, over which, they thought, he had no control, and fixed on Aphek (see 1 Sam. 29¹). On the other hand, in the thought of the writer, Ahab was so closely identified with the cause of Jehovah and Jehovah's people that "a man of God" revealed the Syrian plan to Ahab; as a result he was again successful. On Benhadad's abject surrender Ahab, in striking contrast to his treatment of Elijah, is represented as magnanimous in his sparing of the Syrian's life, contenting himself with the return to Israel of its lost trans-Jordanic territory, and the right to trading facilities in Damascus equal to those previously enjoyed in Samaria by Syria, terms which, though seemingly magnanimous, represent a victory of which Israel had every reason to be proud.

35-43. Ahab Rebuked. Note here, as in ch. 13, (a) the same blind obedience to a divine behest is demanded (v. 35), (b) disobedience is summarily punished by death (v. 36), (c) a lion is again the agent. In it an exilic redactor urges that the terms were scandalously mild, and appears to argue that this was the parting of the ways for Ahab: henceforth the sons of the prophets and Ahab took opposite paths (cf. however, ch. 22).

CHAPTER XXI

The Story of Elijah Resumed; Naboth's Vineyard. The Compiler, by making further extracts from "The Acts of Elijah," withdraws our attention momentarily from Ahab's military achievements and fixes it on the social and economic conditions of Israel. We have here the beginnings of the transition from small peasant ownership to that of large estates, from the privileges of the status of freemen achieved for the Israelites by Jeroboam I to the ills of a practical serfdom under large and wealthy landowners careless of the conditions of the newly made poor. All this came to a head in the prosperous reign of Jeroboam II (see Amos' denunciations of it) just as a similar economic crisis occurred in Judah in the prosperous years which preceded the Assyrian domination (see Micah's and Isaiah's descriptions).

The present narrative, however, shows very clearly that the economic revolution in the North was really a slow process, beginning in the prosperity which followed Ahab's alliance with Tyre and defeat of Syria. At the outset it was made possible, just as its climax was afterward assisted, by Assyrian pressure on Syria's other frontier. But more important even than the light thus thrown on the economic and social changes in Ahab's reign, is that thrown on the evolution of Elijah's gospel. The scene on Mount Carmel had demonstrated that Jehovah was the God in Israel; that on Horeb (if taken as a whole) that Jehovah speaks to the individual conscience if only in the whispers of the desert; the story of Naboth presupposes a God who is ethical and moral in his own attributes, demanding ethical and moral ideals and conduct in his worshipers, and yet extending his loving compassion even to Ahab when at last repentant (vv. 27-29). It thus reveals yet one more way in which Elijah did his part to keep alive and hand on to posterity that spark of the ethical and moral revealed to Moses centuries before on Mount Horeb, destined to shine more brightly and clearly in the writings of the eighth century prophets, and reflected in the Deuteronomic Law book of Josiah's reign (of the ideals of which the Compiler of Kings was an exponent) till at last when "Elijah redivivus" had come, in the person of John the Baptist, the Deity in all the fullness of his moral qualities, and not least that of Love, became himself incarnate.

CHAPTER XXII

1-40. Ahab and Judah; His Death at Ramoth-gilead. In ch. 22 the scene again changes. We are back in the general atmosphere of ch. 20, but important developments have come about during the three intervening years. Ahab's influence extends to Judah, whose king is now his subservient ally. So subservient indeed is he, that, though shocked at Ahab's thoughtless omission to consult the prophets and doubtful as to their credibility when they are consulted, he accompanies Ahab on this new and, for Ahab, fatal campaign. He even endangered his own life to carry out his share in Ahab's counter-plans to the Syrian plot to assassinate him. But the religious interest of the story is centered in Micaiah the son of Imlah. He gives hints of great value as to (a) the inspiration of false prophecy and true prophecy, both of which he attributes to the direct action of God; vv. 19-23 show how inadequate was the conception of the character of Jehovah during the pre-prophetic period, and how much we owe to the prophets of the eighth century for placing the ethical quality at the heart of the God concept; (b) the employment of symbolic actions by prophets of this period, a usage not indulged in by Micaiah himself but reappearing in Isaiah (Isa. 20) and especially in Ezekiel (e.g., Ezek. 4, 5, etc.; cf. also Jer. 28¹⁰); (c) the nature of God and of his heavenly court; his attendants are "spirits," a conception in its origins dating back to animistic times but in its results leading to the doctrine that God himself is Spirit (cf. Isa. 313 Jn. 4²³).

CHAPTER 22⁴¹⁻⁵⁰: THE HISTORY OF THE JUDEAN KINGDOM (see 15²⁴)

41-50. Jehoshaphat, the Fourth King (876-851 B.C.). See 2 Chr. 17-20, in which are imbedded a considerable number of historical facts supplementary to this brief account of Jehoshaphat's suppression of vice, relations with Edom, and abortive mercantile expedition to Ophir. For vv. 47, 48 read Now there was no king in Edom; and the deputy of king Jehoshaphat (i.e., in Edom) made a ship, etc.

1 KINGS 22⁵¹ TO 2 KINGS 8¹⁵: THE HISTORY OF THE NORTHERN KINGDOM (see 22⁴⁰)

51-53. See 2 Kings 11-18. There is no good reason for the chapter break after 22⁵³ or the break between 1 Kings and 2 Kings at the same point.

SECOND KINGS

CHAPTER I

1-18. Ahaziah, the Eighth King (853-852 B.C.). See 1 Kings 22⁵¹⁻⁵³. In vv. 2-17a Elijah makes his reappearance. The picture in vv. 2-4 resembles that of Elijah in 1 Kings 17-19, 21. As there, so here, he appears suddenly; and as quickly he vanishes. He is here, as there, alike the prophet of doom to the royal house and the zealous proclaimer of Jehovah as the only true God in Israel, the only effective bestower of human life, and therefore the only one who may at will deprive a human being of his life. Vv. 5-18, however, seem to portray an Elijah of a very different type from the hero of vv. 2-4; moreover, the restraint in the use of miraculous power which is so marked a feature in the latter is conspicuously lacking here. The story—which has marked affinities with 1 Sam. 19^{18f}. and 1 Kings 13—was clearly intended to inculcate respect for the prophet and his office (see especially v. 13 and cf. 22^{3f}.). It may have been inserted by the second redactor.

16. Baalzebub may mean either baal (i.e., lord) of flies, or Zebub is Baal. If such a place-name is rightly read on one of the Tel-el-Amarna tablets, the latter interpretation is correct and the reference is to the deity of a popular local shrine.

CHAPTER II

1-14. Elisha's Preparation for His Ministry. This chapter— unquestionably a unity—forms the introduction to the ministry of Elisha rather than the conclusion to the biography of Elijah. (1) The situation is quite different from that found in the Elijah narrative (1 Kings 17-19, 21). In the latter Elijah has no definite abode; he appears and disappears with lightninglike rapidity; here Elijah and Elisha live together at Gilgal. There Elijah is a "man of God" standing absolutely alone; here he is a teacher surrounded by numerous disciples. In 1 Kings 19¹⁹⁻²¹ Elisha is already invested with Elijah's mantle and is recognized as his successor; here even Elijah does not know who will carry on his work. (2) The situation is entirely in harmony with that found in the stories concerning Elisha and with the representation of life within the prophetic guilds as it is there described. (3) The contents of vv. 19-25 form a correct sequel to vv. 1-18—an impossibility if the latter belonged to the Elijah, rather than to the Elisha, biography. The story is rich in the ideas of early times and in the way of expressing those ideas then current—the prophetic mantle with its magic powers, the whirlwind as the symbol of Jehovah's presence, the translation of an outstanding saint to heaven. The purpose of this last feature (cf. Tobit 12²⁰, 21 Lk. 24⁵¹ Acts 19-11) is to conduct him from this world to the heavenly one without his going by way of the grave or Sheol, the place of the departed. At the time at which this figure of speech arose death betokened the end, not, as with us, the consummation of communion with God. Then it was supposed that after death a man, instead of enjoying the beatific vision, ceased more or less entirely even to exist. (See art., The Religion of Israel, p. 173.) Unless Elisha beheld the actual translation of Elijah he could not hope to receive his spirit, for only to the pre-eminently spiritual was such a vision possible (cf. 617 and 1 Cor. 214^f.).

15-25. The First Prophetic Acts of Elisha. The fifty members of the prophetic guilds, who were watching intently, did not see it, and consequently they doubted Elisha's word (vv. 16, 17) even though they had themselves seen Elisha's miraculous power exercised by means of the mantle of Elijah. Jehovah's power (vv. 19-22) is demonstrated over inanimate nature, and in vv. 23-25 his care for the well-being and dignity of his prophet is emphasized, though again the God concept reflected in the narrative reflects a rather crude stage in the religious and ethical development. For the reproach attached to baldness see Isa. 317-24. Here, however, the specific reference is to the tonsure of the strict prophets of Jehovah (cf. 1 Kings 20⁴¹); they would be most unpopular in places such as Bethel and Samaria, which depended so much on the royal favor. The extracts from the "Acts of Elisha" are continued in 34-815 1314-21.

CHAPTERS 31 TO 815: THE REIGN OF JEHOAM

CHAPTER III

This Jehoram (called Joram in 816), son of Ahab and king of the northern tribes, must be distinguished from Jehoram, son of Jehoshaphat and king of Judah (see 816-24). The significance of this present section, however, is not so much in anything we are told about Jehoram, as in the fact that it records so many stories about Elisha.

1-3. Jehoram, the Ninth King (852-842 B.C.). If any real reformation was attempted, it must have been on a very small scale, for Jezebel was still alive and Jehu's sweeping reformation took place later (1018^f.). On 32 see 1 Kings 1632.

4-27. The Revolt of Mesha, King of Moab; His Defeat. Mesha had already erected the famous inscription (discovered at Diban in 1868; cf. p. 117b) to commemorate his expulsion of the Israelites from Moabite territory. He had now to withstand a fresh attempt to reimpose the Israelitish overlordship. Mesha, fearing an attack on the north, had thoroughly fortified the border cities (as stated in his inscription), and therefore Jehoram decided to march round the southern extremity of the Dead Sea and begin his campaign from the south. As the ruler of Edom (there was no king of Edom at that time, cf. 1 Kings 22^{47f.} and 2 Kings 8²⁰) was the vassal of Jehoshaphat, he would be compelled to allow the allied armies to pass through his territory. As for Judah, it was still under the suzerainty of the Northern Kingdom (cf. 1 Kings 22⁴), and Jehoshaphat was therefore compelled to furnish auxiliaries.

But important as is this story for the purposes of the historian, it is still more interesting to the student of Israel's religion. In connection, e.g., with prophetism it is noteworthy that Jehoram's relations with Elisha were considerably more strained than were those of Ahab with the true prophets of Jehovah (see 1 Kings 22). Elisha, moreover, seems to have retained the outward characteristics of the earlier ecstatic prophets to a greater extent than the more spiritually minded Elijah (cf. note on 1 Kings 18^{45b, 46}). He was also intimately connected with the prophetic guilds, of which he was the head, but with whom Elijah had no dealings. Further, v. 27, the ideas of God presupposed by the Hebrew historian are important. In the days of Omri and Ahab Chemosh had "been angry with his servants" and had "afflicted Moab many years" (see Mesha's inscription). Mesha now attributes the temporary success of the Hebrews to the same cause and does his utmost to avert the wrath of his god by sacrificing his eldest son. The words and there was great wrath against Israel are important as showing the henotheistic (see p. 166) point of view of the author of this old story. He probably expressed himself in still clearer terms, which a later editor for theological reasons has modified. But even as it now stands, the sentence means that in the estimation of this Hebrew writer Chemosh turned his wrath from Moab, his own people, to Jehovah's people who had dared to enter the territory of the Moabite deity.

CHAPTER IV

Four Stories of Elisha's Power. Vv. 1-7 teach the same lesson as 1 Kings 17⁸⁻¹⁶, and vv. 8-37 the same as 1 Kings 17¹⁷⁻²⁴. Vv. 38-41 are, however, on a lower plane, somewhat crudely relating Elisha's power over the death in the pot. The miracle of the feeding of the multitude, vv. 42-44, on the other hand, is important, being a remarkable anticipation of that recorded in all four Gospels.

CHAPTER V

1-19. The Recovery of Naaman the Leper. This story is the masterpiece, both literary and religious, among these biographical sketches of Elisha. At this time the Northern Kingdom was the vassal of Syria, as the peremptory tone of the Syrian monarch's letter shows (vv. 5f.), and the Israelitish king interpreted the extraordinary message as a pretext to break an existing peace (cf. 1 Kings 20⁷). The only hostilities had been those of freebooters and marauding bands which harassed the borders of Israel; and it must have been during one of these raids that the Hebrew maid was captured. Vv. 17-19 are theologically of great importance, for not only do they show Naaman's religious point of view but also that of Elisha and of the Hebrews generally. Elisha does not dissent from the proposal made by the Syrian general, but at once acquiesces in it. We may infer therefore (1) that it was taken for granted that Jehovah was God of Israel, and of Israel only, and could only be worshiped on the soil of Israel—hence Naaman's request; (2) that other national gods, as real as Jehovah, existed, each of whom was the rightful god of his own nation and had certain territory upon which alone he could be worshiped; (3) that signal acts of deliverance at times brought home to individuals the wonderful powers possessed by some one god, who was therefore particularly extolled. Several other passages show, like this one, that, in the period prior to the reign of Josiah, the Hebrews' ideas of Jehovah were henotheistic, i.e., he was accepted as the God of Israel but not of other nations, e.g., Ex. 15¹⁻¹¹ Judg. 11^{23f.} Ruth 1¹⁶ 2¹² 1 Sam. 26¹⁹ 2 Kings 3^{26f.} Amos 5¹⁴ Hosea 9³.

20-27. Avarice of Gehazi. These verses narrate the avarice of Gehazi, Elisha's servant, and his punishment. The ethical implications of the story should not be overlooked. Gehazi sought to obtain personal profit from a kindly deed done by another. He seems to have convinced himself that this was proper, but Elisha had a deeper insight into right conduct. Sophistry can never endure a close examination.

CHAPTER VI

1-23. The Lost Axe; the Syrians Smitten with Blindness. From the high level of the last story we drop back to the type which immediately preceded it. Elisha is again living in the community life of the prophetic guilds (vv 1-7). The story of Elisha's miraculous knowledge of Syrian military secrets in vv. 8-23 somewhat resembles 1 Kings 20²²⁻²⁴, only here the religious significance of the story appears to be the primary object of the narrative—faith and hope unflinchingly growing the stronger the darker the situation becomes and communicating themselves to others previously possessed by coward fear: "Lord, open his eyes that he may see." In this critical moment Elisha indeed proved himself worthy of having seen Elijah's passing and of succeeding him. The vision of those horses and that chariot had remained vivid in his memory; hence he could pray that it might be revealed to whom he would. It is idle to endeavor to find a definite historical setting for these events. V. 23 shows that Israel is harassed by the inroads of small "bands" of marauders, not by the regular Syrian army. Neither king is mentioned by name, but the Israelite monarch is one with whom Elisha is on friendly terms (v. 21).

24-33. Famine in Samaria; Elisha is Threatened. Here and in 71-20 is recounted Elisha's triumphant emergence from another and more serious siege, this time not at Dothan but in Samaria. The background of famine is similar to that of 1 Kings 17. The mention of Benhadad does not fix a definite date for the siege. If there had been only one and not three kings of this name, the dating of the siege might be simpler. But the fact that history and tradition are inextricably woven together in these accounts makes it well-nigh impossible to say definitely in which reign the siege took place (see note on 55f.). From the words son of a murderer (v. 32) it has been inferred (1) that the king must be Jehoahaz, the son of Jehu; but the prophet who had anointed Jehu for a special purpose would scarcely have branded him as a murderer for accomplishing his appointed task; and (2) that Joram (cf. 31 81⁶) is the king referred to, for Elisha's taunt would well suit a son of Ahab, who had persecuted and slain the prophets. But the expression must be taken in its usual Oriental sense. The person actually addressed is the "murderer," not his father, for the Oriental defames his opponent's parent in order to make the defamation of that opponent's character the more complete (cf. 1 Sam. 20³⁰ Isa. 57³). Therefore no conclusion can be drawn from this phrase as to the monarch referred to.

CHAPTER VII

1-20. Elisha Predicts Plenty; the Syrians Flee. Elisha had doubtless advised the Israelites to offer a stout resistance to the Syrians when they appeared outside Samaria, and so he might be held morally responsible for the non-surrender of the city. But his promise (v. 2) that the windows in heaven should be opened, i.e., rain descend, shows that Elisha was chiefly blamed for the drought which had increased the horrors of the siege (cf. 81⁴). The Syrians could never have supposed (v. 6) that an alliance would be formed between the Hittites on the north and the Egyptians on the south of Palestine. Instead of Egypt (Misraim) should be read Musri (for this see note to 1 Kings 10²⁰) as the ally of the Hittites. A king of Musri was defeated together with Syria and Israel at the battle of Karkar in 854 B.C. A combined attack by two such foes would be sufficient to cause panic among the Syrian forces.

CHAPTER VIII

1-6. Elisha Recovers the Shunammite's Land. This story is intended primarily to illustrate the fame of Elisha and his miracle-working powers. It has no connection with 624-720. Gehazi could not have been admitted to the king's presence (vv. 4, 5) if he was already a leper (527). Hence it seems probable that 81-6 formerly stood between 48-37 (to which there is a reference in v. 1) and 438¹, which presuppose it.

7-15. Benhadad's Death at the Hands of Hazael. Elisha now seems to be well known in Damascus (cf. vv. 2f.). In the original account there was probably a statement that the journey was undertaken at the bidding of Jehovah. Doubtless, too, before the story was curtailed it contained some description of Hazael, who is referred to as a person already well known to the reader. It is remarkable that the command to anoint both Hazael and Jehu was given to Elijah, but that the former is anointed by Elisha and the latter by an unknown prophet.

CHAPTER 816-29: THE HISTORY OF THE JUDÆAN KINGDOM (see 1 Kings 22⁵⁰)

16-24. Jehoram, the Fifth King (851-843 B.C.). Cf. 2 Chr. 21. After v. 21a the narrative must have told how Jehoram was surrounded in Zair by the Edomites, and v. 21b then narrated his defeat which is confirmed by v. 22. The people who fled to their tents were evidently the Judæans, and the captains of the chariots were Jehoram's own officers. A later writer by a scratch of his pen transformed Jehoram's crushing defeat into a victory. Libnah (v. 22) was a fortified and strategically important city (see 198). Its inhabitants were for the most part non-Hebrews and were pro-

Philistine in sympathies. Possibly this revolt was connected with the incursion of Philistines and Arabians narrated in 2 Chr. 21^{16f.}

25-29. Ahaziah, the Sixth King (843-842 B.C.). Cf. 2 Chr. 22¹⁻⁹.

CHAPTERS 9¹ TO 10³⁶: THE HISTORY OF THE NORTHERN KINGDOM (see 8¹⁵)

CHAPTER IX

Revolt and Reign of Jehu, the Tenth King (842-815 B.C.). The dynasty of Omri owed its extinction, and that of Jehu its rise, in the first place, to the army, which was probably discontented with the conduct of the war and ready to receive from the religious leaders the slightest hint that the latter would welcome a revolution. In the second place, Elisha, representing the prophets, intervened once more in political matters. He did so because he was exasperated by the low religious standard of Omri's house and was attracted by the apparent keenness of Jehu for conservative religious reform. In the third place, the Rechabites for once intervened in matters of state (see 10^{15f.}). These ascetics, by their abstention from wine and withdrawal from contact with civilization (see Jer. 35^{6, 8, 14}), represented a protest against the worship of the Baals. The latter were supposed to regulate the processes and gifts of nature, especially the vine and its potent derivative. "Do not drink the wine and you will not have to worship its giver," seems to have been their watchword.

CHAPTER X

Jehu the Oppressor; His Moral Failure.

A kingdom, won by usurpation and itself profoundly debased, cannot be turned from its evil ways to good ones by persecution or the inquisitor's lash. Thus, though Jehu exercised the most utter frightfulness toward Jezebel, the arch enemy of Jehovah (9³⁰⁻³⁷), toward the rest of the royal house (vv. 10-14) and toward the worshipers of Baal (vv. 18-28), such persecution failed to stamp out the rival religion. Civil war and the extermination, rather than the pardoning, of a defeated rival's supporters inevitably weaken a state. Jehu's methods, accordingly, played into the hands of Syria (vv. 32-36). After Jehu's cold-blooded murder of the Tyrian princess no help, diplomatic or military, could be expected from Tyre. Jehu was compelled to become the vassal of Shalmaneser III, king of Assyria, about 842 B.C., as the latter king states in one of his inscriptions. But Shalmaneser was no infallible protection against Syria. He twice failed to seize Damascus, and after 839 B.C. Hazael, having completely routed his formidable foe, found himself free to turn his attention to his weaker neighbor, Israel: to this vv. 32, 33 refer.

CHAPTERS 11¹ TO 12²¹: THE HISTORY OF THE JUDÆAN KINGDOM (see 8²⁹)

CHAPTER XI

Athaliah, the Impious Usurper (842-836 B.C.). Cf. 2 Chr. 23¹⁻²¹. This is the first long narrative of events in the Southern Kingdom incorporated by the Compiler since the close of Solomon's reign. He rightly attached considerable religious importance to Athaliah's attempt to establish her own family, the Omri dynasty, now expelled from the North, upon the Southern throne, and to introduce foreign cults into Jerusalem such as Jezebel, her mother, had succeeded in introducing into the Northern Kingdom. But the Jerusalem priesthood, to its credit, took up Elijah's watchword; the palace guard remained true to the Davidic dynasty; and the populace approved of Athaliah's deposition and murder. The reference in v. 12 to the testimony, i.e., the book of the Law, reflects the practice of a period later than the reign of Josiah, before whose time no written lawbook was used in this connection. Ornaments, or more specifically bracelets (2 Sam. 1¹⁰), were usually handed to the king; hence one or other of these words should be read here instead of "testimony."

CHAPTER XII

1-3. Joash (Jehoash), the Seventh King (836-796 B.C.). Cf. 2 Chr. 24.

4-16. The Temple Repairs. The narrative here is the more trustworthy because of its frank reference to the remissness alike of people and of priests. It sheds a remarkable light on the conditions which prevailed at this time. The king's power was evidently absolute; the Temple was still essentially the Palace Chapel, and the priests were royal nominees (cf. 16^{10f.}).

17-21. Joash Assassinated. Hazael's campaign in southern Palestine followed his attacks on the Northern Kingdom (10³² 13³). The ignominy of Joash's method of meeting military invasion by financial payments probably proved too great an insult to the military party at court and led to his assassination.

CHAPTER XIII

THE HISTORY OF THE NORTHERN KINGDOM (see 10³⁶)

1-9. Jehoahaz, the Eleventh King (815-798 B.C.). Israel was completely under the power of Syria throughout this reign. See 8¹² and

Amos 13-5 for a graphic description of the devastation wrought by Israel's hereditary foe. Saviour (v. 5) does not necessarily refer to any particular person, but picturesquely utilizes language such as that of Judg. 39. 15. The Assyrian kings, who by their attacks drew off the attention of Syria from Israel, and Jeroboam II (cf. 1427), who extended the territory of the Northern Kingdom, each performed the part of a "saviour."

10-25. Jehoash, the Twelfth King (798-782 B.C.). This Jehoash is to be distinguished from the Jehoash (Joash) of 121. The tradition preserved in LXX (L), that Hazael had wrested from Jehoahaz Philistine territory extending from the Mediterranean Sea to Aphek is worthy of attention, for the writer evidently placed the campaign recorded in 1218 in the reign of Jehoahaz. But the tide of Israel's fortune at last began to turn, though not so quickly as the prophets who now supported the king desired. This delay was attributed by Elisha to the king's lack of confidence in God and indecision of character. Arrows (v. 15) were frequently used in determining the future (cf. Ezek. 2121). The success of Jehoahaz, from the human point of view, was due to (1) the confusion in Syria consequent upon the accession of a new king, (2) Benhadad's own feeble rule, and (3) the energy displayed in extending his dominions westward by the Assyrian king, Ramman-Nirari III, who defeated Mari (identified with Benhadad), king of Damascus, between 806 and 803 B.C., and thus relieved Israel from the pressure of Syria.

VERSES 1-22: THE HISTORY OF THE JUDEAN KINGDOM (see 1221)

1-7. Amaziah, the Eighth King (796-789 B.C.). Cf. 2 Chr. 25. V. 6 marks a development toward the recognition of individual responsibility—a teaching which was not fully formulated till Ezekiel's day (Ezek. 18), though, in contradistinction to the barbarous and older practice (see Josh. 724 926) it was enforced in legislation as early as Josiah's Lawbook (Deut. 2416). The Compiler's purpose here is to emphasize this enactment. Effective Judæan suzerainty over Edom (v. 7) was certainly brief, since the Assyrian king of the period, Ramman-Nirari III, mentions it as a state tributary to Assyria.

8-22. It was apparently the populace, as opposed to the court, who, in the hour of defeat, failed to appreciate Amaziah's courage and patriotic intentions in attempting to free them from the suzerainty of the North, and on this account they assassinated him (v. 19).

VERSES 23-29: THE HISTORY OF THE NORTHERN KINGDOM (see 1325)

23-29. Jeroboam II, the Thirteenth King (782-741 B.C.). During Jeroboam's long reign the Northern Kingdom experienced great material and political prosperity. That this prosperity resulted in a most disastrous lowering of the religious and moral tone of society and in economic conditions irksome to the poor is evident from the writings of the contemporary prophets Amos and Hosea. Both prophets throw a most vivid light upon the life, politics, and aspirations of the Northern Kingdom at this time. Jeroboam doubtless deserved praise for grasping the opportunity of enlarging his kingdom, but the conditions were extraordinarily favorable. The Assyrian kings Shalmaneser IV (787-772 B.C.) and Assur-dan III (772-754 B.C.) threatened the very existence of Syria, Israel's hereditary foe. Syria, therefore, had no attention to spare for Jeroboam and his encroachments. Assur-Nirari, the next Assyrian king, failed to press home the attack on the Palestinian states, and Syria, for the time being, constituted merely a buffer-state between Assyria and Israel. Only an Amos could see that soon Assyria would swallow up Syria, and that Israel would be the next victim (Amos 614).

CHAPTER XV

VERSES 1-7: THE HISTORY OF THE JUDEAN KINGDOM (see 1422)

1-7. Uzziah, the Ninth King (789-740 B.C.). Cf. 2 Chr. 26. Though the Compiler thought it necessary to reproduce only one verse (v. 5) of the Annals, this reign actually represented the high-water mark of national and political prosperity in the Southern Kingdom just as that of Jeroboam II did in the Northern one. See further details embedded in the post-exilic estimate of his achievements in 2 Chr. 26.

VERSES 8-31: THE HISTORY OF THE NORTHERN KINGDOM (see 1429)

8-31. Zechariah, the Fourteenth King: His Four Usurping Successors. After the murder of Zechariah, the last of Jehu's dynasty, vv. 8-12, the Northern Kingdom entered upon the last phase of its chequered history, falling into the hands of a series of usurpers: Shallum (741 B.C.), vv. 13-16; Menahem (741-737 B.C.), vv. 17-22; his son Pekahiah (737-736 B.C.), vv. 23-26; Pekah (736-734 B.C.), vv. 27-31, whose successor was Hoshea, Israel's last king (see 171-6). Their rivalries and misgovernment aggravated the moral corruption of the people and the divergent aims of the pro-Assyrian and pro-Egyptian parties in the state.

Hosea in his prophecies paints a vivid picture of these closing years before the final catastrophe, and a study of his book is vital for an appreciation of religious and social conditions during these reigns.

Considerable light is thrown on Israel's international politics by the Assyrian inscriptions. Tiglath-Pileser III states that in 738 B.C. he received tribute from a number of kings, among whom he mentions Rezon of Damascus and Menahem. Like his father, Pekahiah owed his throne to his Assyrian overlord, and remained true to him. Hence he became the victim of the anti-Assyrian patriots led by Pekah. The latter's triumph proved short-lived. He was a patriot with anti-Assyrian leanings and was, accordingly, committed to an anti-Assyrian confederacy with Syria and other Palestinian states. For the causes of the Syro-Ephraimite War, see note on 165-9. The revolution which brought his reign to a close would, therefore, have the approval of Tiglath-Pileser, who, in the record of his campaign of 734 B.C., describes how "Pa-ka-ha (Pekah) their king they slew; A-u-si (Hoshea) to reign over them I appointed." (See p. 118a.)

CHAPTERS 1532 TO 1620: THE HISTORY OF THE JUDÆAN KINGDOM (see 157)

32-38. Jotham, the Tenth King (740-735 B.C.). Cf. 2 Chr. 271-9. His period of coregency in his father's reign (see 155b) is probably included in the total length ascribed here to his own reign. 35b. Probably "the gate of Benjamin" (Jer. 202).

CHAPTER XVI

1-20. Ahaz, the Eleventh King (735-726 B.C.). Cf. 2 Chr. 28. The religious and political significance of the reign can best be appreciated only if full weight is given to Isaiah and his religious and political program. (For details see the introduction to the commentary on Isaiah in this volume, and the comments on the individual passages mentioned.) His "call" (with its emphasis on the holiness and sovereignty of Jehovah, and, in antithesis, the sinfulness of sin) practically coincided with Ahaz's succession to the throne (Isa. 6); he developed a definite policy in connection with the Syro-Ephraimitish struggle (see Isa. 71-97 and cf. Isa. 98-104 525-29 17, 181-4); he enunciated in this connection his doctrine of the "Remnant" (73 Shear-jashub, cf. R.V. mg., "a remnant shall return"), the conception of religious faith (79b), Immanuel (714-16), the esoteric teaching of chosen disciples (816). Moreover, much of his teaching in connection with morality and social reforms belongs to this reign (e.g., Isa. 1 in part, 2-4, 5 in part).

5-9. Pekah, king of Israel, and Rezin, or Rezon, king of Syria, formed a coalition against the impending onslaught of the Assyrians and invited the co-operation of the king of Judah. Ahaz, however, refused to join their confederacy. Therefore they endeavored to depose him and give the crown to a creature of their own, a Syrian, known as the "son of Tabeel" (Isa. 71, 2, 5, 6). Ahaz, in panic, appealed to Assyria for aid, thus attracting the latter's attention to Judah and at once making it Assyria's vassal. Tiglath-Pileser first advanced against Israel (1529), and then after a two years' campaign conquered Damascus in 732 B.C.

10-16. The new altar was probably an Assyrian one upon which Tiglath-Pileser had sacrificed at Damascus; Ahaz may have regarded it as responsible for the Assyrian king's victories. 14. As the text stands it means that the old altar was removed to allow the new one to be set in its place. The LXX, however, gives a better idea of what took place: in order to transfer the sacrificial holiness of the old altar to the new one, the blood of the victim was sprinkled first on the former and then on the latter.

CHAPTER XVII

THE HISTORY OF THE NORTHERN KINGDOM (see 1531)

1-6. Hoshea, the Nineteenth and Last Northern King (734-722 B.C.). The record of this reign has been much condensed, and it is difficult to reconstruct the actual course of events; the Assyrian inscriptions give no real assistance. It is possible here only to refer briefly to the most probable hypothesis: Hoshea had been raised to the throne of Israel as a vassal of Assyria by Tiglath-Pileser III (1530); when, however, the latter was succeeded by Shalmaneser V, Hoshea seized the opportunity to rebel; but no sooner did his suzerain march against him than he hastened to placate him by presenting his customary tribute (173). Somewhat later, tempted by the king of Egypt, he again rebelled (v. 4a); this time he was taken prisoner (v. 4b), and Samaria was besieged (v. 5). The chief difficulties in this reconstruction are: (1) The reign of Shalmaneser V (727-722 B.C.) may seem too short to allow of two campaigns against Israel, especially since the Assyrian records state definitely that there was no foreign campaign in 726 B.C. (2) It looks as if Hoshea were taken prisoner, and presumably dethroned, three years before the fall of Samaria, though it is stated that Samaria fell in the "ninth" year of Hoshea. 4. So is called Shab'i in Assyrian inscriptions and is usually identified with the Pharaoh Sabako or Shabako. Some Assyriologists, however, equate Shab'i either with the king of a small district east of the Delta, or with the commander-in-chief of the North Arabian kingdom of Muzri. 6. Shalmaneser having died during the siege, it was Sargon, a usurper, who finally captured Samaria in 722 B.C. His inscription reads: "Samaria I besieged and conquered: 27,290 of its inhabitants I carried into captivity, fifty chariots I seized from them; the rest of them I allowed to retain their possessions (?); I set my officers over them; the tribute of the former king I laid upon them."

7-41. Causes and Results of Israel's Downfall. These verses contain reflections by the Compiler and by later editors of Kings on the causes and effects—chiefly of a religious nature—of the downfall of the Northern Kingdom. Special attention is given to the settlement of foreigners in Samaria and the resulting mixture in population and religion (vv. 24-41).

CHAPTERS 18¹ TO 25³⁰: THE HISTORY OF THE JUDEAN KINGDOM (see 16²⁰)

The Reign of Hezekiah, the Twelfth King (726-697 B.C.), is the subject of chs. 18-20. Cf. 2 Chr. 29-32. Chs. 18¹³-20¹⁹ are practically identical with Isa. 36-39, though not without certain variations. On the whole, our text is preferable to that of Isaiah, which has a tendency (1) to suffer abbreviation, e.g., Isa. 36², (2) to suffer displacements in order, e.g., in Isa. 38^{21f.}, and (3) to include interpolations, e.g., Hezekiah's Song (Isa. 38¹⁰⁻²⁰). Much of Isaiah's public activity belonged to this reign, and many of his prophecies (see Isa. 10⁵⁻¹¹⁹, 18, 19 in part, 20, 21, 28⁷⁻³²) throw considerable light upon its political and religious problems.

CHAPTER XVIII

1-8. Hezekiah's Reforms and Good Reign. For the serpent (v. 4) cf. Num. 21^{6f.} On Assyrian reliefs there are several representations of serpent worship and here (cf. "the stone of Zoheleth," i.e., of the serpent, in 1 Kings 19) we have an illustration of its persistence among the Hebrews. It is difficult to define the extent and exact purpose of Hezekiah's reformation. It has been held, on the one hand, that it was confined to the Asherah and serpent of this verse, and that any destruction of high-places and altars which took place during Hezekiah's reign was not due to his initiative (see v. 22), but was the result of the ravages of war. The Chronicler, on the other hand, relates at great length a "thorough, godly reformation" carried out at the king's instigation. Josiah's Deuteronomic reformation does not preclude an earlier attempt at reformation; rather, it must have had its origin in part in some slight measure of reform such as that inaugurated by Hezekiah under the influence of the iconoclastic teaching of Isaiah (cf. Buchanan Gray, Numbers, p. 274). V. 8 is probably to be dated in the latter part of the reign.

9-12. Fall of Samaria. See on 17¹⁻⁶.

13-37. Sennacherib's Threat Against Hezekiah. When Sennacherib succeeded Sargon (705 B.C.) many tributaries of Assyria tried to regain their independence. Among them was Hezekiah, who, relying upon the help of Egypt and the support of certain Philistine cities, prepared to throw off the Assyrian yoke. In 701 B.C. a general revolt broke out in Palestine. Sennacherib acted promptly and effectively. He marched against Phœnicia, captured the chief cities and drove Elulai, king of Tyre, into exile in Cyprus. Therefore several princes hastened to make submission and to pay tribute, but the Philistine cities and Judah still defied the invader. A body of allied forces came to their help, but they suffered a decisive defeat at Altaku or Eltekeh (a village east of Ekron). Askalon, Ekron, Timnath, were captured in swift succession; Judah was invaded, one hundred and forty-six cities were taken, a number of persons deported, and Jerusalem itself was besieged. Hezekiah submitted and paid a heavy tribute. The Assyrian forces, however, which were advancing toward Pelusium, met with a sudden disaster, the nature of which can only be surmised, and Sennacherib returned home without having taken Jerusalem (see 19³⁵).

Practically all scholars are agreed that chs. 18¹⁷-19³⁷ are excerpts from a biography or "Acts" of Isaiah. Nearly all moderns also hold that 18¹⁷-19³⁷ may be resolved in two narratives, i.e., 18¹⁷-19⁸ (or v. 9a) and 19⁹⁻³⁷ (or 19^{9b-35}; vv. 36 and 37 being variously assigned to one or the other of these), and that both those narratives are concerned with the operations conducted by Sennacherib after the battle of Eltekeh during his campaign of 701 B.C. which the Compiler has already summarized (from the Judæan Annals) in 18¹³⁻¹⁵. Neither in the extract from the first nor in that from the second narrative do we hear anything of the tribute recorded in 18¹³⁻¹⁶ and also in Sennacherib's inscription (see p. 118).

CHAPTER XIX

1-36. Hezekiah's Prayer and His Deliverance. Sennacherib's own inscription would suggest that the tidings of v. 7 was connected not with the movements of Tirhakah (cf. note to v. 9) but with the revolt of Shuzub, a Chaldaean prince. The Assyrian king certainly returned to the North to begin his "fourth campaign" (701–700 B.C.) against Shuzub in the swamps of the land of Bet-Jakin (Prism Inscription, col. iii, 42f.). The mention (v. 9) of Tirhakah (Assyrian Tarku) is difficult. He did not come to the front until 690 B.C. at the earliest. The Ethiopian tyrant of Egypt in 701 B.C. was Shabako.

35. For the angel of the Lord see note to 2 Sam. 24^{15f}. In Herodotus ii, 141, the Assyrian calamity is ascribed to field mice which gnawed the Assyrians' bow-strings (for mice as symbols of pestilence cf. 1 Sam. 64^f.); at Ptah a stone statue of an Egyptian king holding a mouse in his hand is said to have commemorated this event (see also intro. to Isaiah).

37. Death of Sennacherib. Sennacherib's death did not take place till 681 B.C., twenty years after the deliverance of Jerusalem. Sharezer's share in the murder is not mentioned elsewhere. The Babylonian Chronicle, col. iii, 34, 35, reads: "In the month Tebet, the twentieth day, his son slew Sennacherib, king of Assyria, in an insurrection." Esarhaddon reigned till 668 B.C.

CHAPTER XX

1-19. Hezekiah's Illness; an Embassy from Babylon. The date of both Hezekiah's illness and Merodach-baladan's embassy (vv. 12-19) presents a very baffling problem. Merodach-baladan, once king of Chaldaea, had made himself master of much of Babylonia, but he was expelled by Tiglath-Pileser in 729 B.C. He was able to defy Sargon from 721-710 B.C. and to retain his hold upon Babylon. But, once more expelled, he waited until Sennacherib's accession before making a third attempt to seize the throne. He was finally overthrown after he had been in possession of Babylon for a period of nine months in 702 B.C. It is generally thought that Merodach-baladan's embassy to Hezekiah took place before 710 B.C. at a time when, fearing Sargon's attack, he was endeavoring to make alliances with the neighboring states; more precisely, if Hezekiah's illness took place in 714 B.C., an embassy, under the pretext of polite inquiry as to his health, would arrive in Judah between the end of 714 B.C. and the spring of 712 B.C. Some, however, adopt Schrader's view that the embassy was sent between 704 and 702 B.C., and that it precipitated Sennacherib's invasion of Palestine. The real motive of the embassy, it is clear, was not to congratulate Hezekiah on his recovery, but to persuade him to join in a rebellion against Assyria. Hezekiah exhibited his reserves of gold to demonstrate the extent of the financial burden which he could undertake in the course of the proposed rebellion.

20, 21. Pool of Siloam. By means of the Siloam canal the water of the Virgin's Spring (= Gihon of 1 Kings 13³) was conducted to the Pool of Siloam. In time of siege the city was thus provided with a good water supply.

CHAPTER XXI

1-18. Manasseh, the Thirteenth King (697-641 B.C.). See 2 Chr. 33-20, and notes there. His reign was by no means destitute of positive importance in the political and religious development of the nation. Politically Judah must have been the vassal of Assyria, for the name of Manasseh is found in a list of tributary princes on two cuneiform inscriptions, one dating from the reign of Esarhaddon (681-668 B.C.), and the other from that of Ashurbanipal (668-626 B.C.). The impious religious innovations, and especially the worship of the host of heaven, which formed such a marked feature of this reign, were mainly due to the influence of Babylonian and Assyrian cults; the prophetic party, having protested in vain, suffered severe persecution (vv. 16, 24; cf. Jer. 23⁰) during which, tradition says, Isaiah himself suffered martyrdom. The tragic condition of the kingdom during this period has been admirably depicted by the prophet of whose work a fragment has survived in the book of Micah (61-76). There are, however, scholars who trace some positive good to the influence of these Babylonian cults, for they suppose that it was now Hebrew religious literature was enriched, e.g., in the earlier chapters of Genesis, by material which is essentially Babylonian in its origin. (See Budde, Religion of Israel to the Exile, pp. 161f.) It was during the stormy days of Manasseh's reign that the earliest portions of Deuteronomy were probably drawn up and the cleavage between the popular, national, and non-ethical conception of Jehovah, on the one hand, and the higher and more spiritual teaching of the ninth and eighth century prophets on the other, became for the first time clearly marked.

19-26. Amon, the Fourteenth King (641-639 B.C.). Cf. 2 Chr. 33. The conspiracy which ended the reign of Amon was the work of a court party, and was not necessarily caused by any dissatisfaction with the continuance of Manasseh's religious policy. His avengers were the people of the land, i.e., either the people generally in antithesis to the court, or the provincials as opposed to the inhabitants of Jerusalem.

CHAPTER XXII

1, 2. Josiah, the Fifteenth King (639–608 B.C.). See 2 Chr. 34, 35. The account of Josiah's reign extends from 221 to 2330.

3–20. The Lawbook Discovered in the Temple. The Compiler relates at considerable length the repairing of the Temple in 621 B.C., the finding of the Lawbook, and the far-reaching character of the reformation thus inaugurated. The Lawbook has been long regarded, and, in spite of some recent expressions of dissent, is still generally regarded, as identical with part of Deuteronomy. It comprised, at any rate, practically all the legislative kernel of Deuteronomy, i.e., chs. 6–26; it represented an attempt to embody in legislation the lofty spiritual teaching of the prophets Amos, Hosea, Isaiah, and Micah, and was most probably drawn up by exponents of this purer religion of Jehovah during the bitter persecution of Manasseh's reign (see intro. to Deuteronomy).

CHAPTER XXIII

1–28. Josiah's Attempt to Enforce the Law. The immediate results of its enforcement, of which the centralization of sacrificial worship at Jerusalem and the abolition of images of Jehovah as well as of other deities were the most spectacular, are here stated. (See Simpson, Pentateuchal Criticism, ch. v, pp. 94–122, and McNeile, Deuteronomy: Its Place in Revelation.) Its ultimate results were still more vital to the development of Hebrew religion, forming as it did the basis from which exilic thought proceeded to press forward to new religious and spiritual achievements. The extension of the reformation to Samaria (vv. 16–20) would do much to commend the movement to the patriotic instincts of Josiah's subjects.

29, 30. Josiah's Death at the Battle of Megiddo. Josiah's ill-fated participation in the international struggles of his day, however, shook popular faith in the legitimacy of his reforms. It has been usually supposed that Necho II (Egyptian, Neku, 609–594 B.C., the son of Psammetichus I, and second king of the 26th dynasty) sought to wrest Syria from the Assyrians at a time when they were about to be overcome by the combined forces of Nabopolassar, king of the province of Chaldaea, and of Cyaxeres, the chieftain of the Medes. Necho had taken the road by the seacoast, and had not invaded Judæan territory. It has also been held that Josiah, as an Assyrian vassal, was compelled to march against him in defense of Assyria. 2 Chr. 35^{20f.}, however, lends color to the supposition that Josiah was anxious to secure the independence of his own realm, and on this account risked an encounter with the Egyptian army. But Gadd's recent decipherment of a certain Babylonian inscription fixing the date of the fall of Nineveh (the capital of Assyria) as early as 612 B.C. instead of 606 B.C. makes it clear that, since Assyria had already ceased to exist as an empire, Necho was not attacking Assyria nor was Josiah defending it. It may be that Josiah had already yielded obedience to the new (i.e., the Chaldæan) empire which succeeded the Assyrian and was defending its territories, while Necho was endeavoring either to come to the rescue of (translating "on behalf of" instead of "against") the practically defunct Assyrian empire or to seize as much as he could of its former territories before the Chaldæans had time to consolidate their new possessions (in which case Assyria is used loosely of the Mesopotamian oppressor as elsewhere). If we read the account before us independently of that contained in 2 Chr. 35^{20–25}, it might appear that Josiah, summoned by Necho, went to Megiddo accompanied only by "his servants" and without an army, to an interview with Necho, who, "when he had seen him," assassinated him. (See for Jewish attitude to Nineveh, intro. to Nahum.)

31–35. Jehoahaz, the Sixteenth King (608 B.C.). He was popular with the people because he stood for a strong independent national policy. On that very account he was deposed by the Pharaoh in favor of his elder brother, Eliakim, whose policy was pro-Egyptian. 33. Riblah, of great strategic importance, was on the Orontes near the northern extremity of the Coelo-Syrian valley, about fifty miles south of Hamath. The Pharaoh, as v. 34b shows, was already retiring toward Egypt.

36, 37. Jehoiakim, the Seventeenth King (608–597 B.C.). See also 241-7 and cf. 2 Chr. 36^{5–8}. Jeremiah fills in the picture and shows a despicable monarch, who was covetous (Jer. 22¹⁷), unjust and tyrannical (Jer. 22¹³), and a great builder (Jer. 22¹⁴, 15a Hab. 2¹⁰, 11).

CHAPTER XXIV

1–7. Jehoiakim Revolts Against Babylon. Jehoiakim remained faithful to his Egyptian master till Necho's defeat by Nebuchadrezzar at Carchemish in 605 B.C., then after three years' vassalage to Babylon, he revolted under Egyptian influence but apparently died before Nebuchadrezzar and his army arrived, but not before he had to resist freebooters encouraged by the Babylonians to attack him. His fate is uncertain. According to the Chronicler he was carried as a prisoner to Babylon (2 Chr. 36⁶). Jeremiah evidently regards his death as shameful, for in one place he says that he is to be buried with the burial of an ass outside Jerusalem (Jer. 22¹⁹), in another that his body is to be cast out unburied (Jer. 36³⁰). Whatever his end may have been, it is clear that he did much by his home and foreign policy to hasten the ruin of Judah. Instead of Syria (Aram, v. 2) read Edom: the LXX of 2 Chr. 36⁵ adds "Samaritans."

8-17. Jehoiachin, the Eighteenth King (597 B.C.). Cf. 2 Chr. 36^{9, 10}. The king and country were involved in this disastrous war owing to the suicidal policy of Jehoiachin's father. Vv. 10-17 record the siege and capitulation followed by the exile in Babylon of the royal house and chief officials, lay and priestly: among the latter was Ezekiel (Ezek. 12⁸¹, etc.).

18-20. Zedekiah, the Nineteenth and Last King of Judah. (597-586 B.C.). See also 25¹⁻⁷ and cf. 2 Chr. 36¹¹⁻²¹, but especially Jer. 52¹⁻¹¹ the text of which is better and fuller than Kings.

CHAPTER XXV

1-7. Zedekiah Overpowered by Nebuchadrezzar. Zedekiah appears to have begun his reign as a well-intentioned vassal of Babylon, welcomed by Jeremiah (Jer. 34^{4f}, etc.) and almost to the end a believer, even if afraid to avow his belief, in Jeremiah (e.g., Jer. 37¹⁷, 21^{38, 16}). But his court, an upstart one now that the old aristocracy had been taken into exile, along with the "false prophets" and the false promises of Egypt, drove him and Judah on to the supreme folly of revolt. The siege began in January, 587 B.C., lasting a year and a half all but a day. 3a. Read as in Jer. 52⁶; cf. Jer. 39². 4. Restore the text from Jer. 39⁴. The breach to facilitate the flight was made at a spot on the southeast side of the city where the walls might be described as "two," i.e., double. Either an outer wall had been built to inclose the Pool of Siloam (which was unprotected by the inner wall), or the west wall of the Eastern Hill ran closely parallel to the east wall of the Western Hill at this point. The Arabah is the depression through which the Jordan flowed. 6. Riblah: see 23³³. 7. Jer.

52¹⁰ (cf. 39⁶ and variants there) adds: "He slew also all the princes of Judah in Riblah." In addition to several other details in which Jer. 52 may preserve a superior text, it contains the probably true tradition that Nebuchadrezzar "put him to prison till the day of his death."

8-21. The Beginning of the Exile. Jer. 52²⁹ (supported by v. 27 below) contains the tradition that the destruction of Jerusalem took place in 587 B.C., the eighteenth (cf. v. 8) year of Nebuchadrezzar, a year earlier than the traditional date (586 B.C.). 11. Somewhat hyperbolic. The exilic editor of Kings, unlike the Chronicler (2 Chr. 36²⁰), did not believe that anything like all the people were either deported or made captive (see vv. 22-26). The "artificers" of Jer. 52¹⁵ mg. is preferable to the multitude of our text. 13-17. Jer. 52¹⁷⁻²³ contains a fuller list of the smaller Temple utensils which were carried away to Babylon. 18-21. After this Jer. 52²⁸⁻³⁰ contains a statement of the numbers of Judæans deported on different occasions by Nebuchadrezzar, but such an enumeration is absent not only here, but also in LXX of Jeremiah. Jeremiah, as a proved friend of the Babylonian conqueror, was among those allowed to remain in Palestine (Jer. 39¹¹⁻¹⁴).

22-26. Rule of Gedaliah. A brief outline of the history of Judah under the governorship of Gedaliah; the assassination of Gedaliah and the flight of the people to Egypt; an abridgment of the full and detailed narrative contained in Jer. 39¹¹⁻⁴³.

27-30. Jehoiachin's Release. Jehoiachin is released and favorably treated in Babylon (see Jer. 52³¹⁻³⁴) by Amel-Marduk (weakened into Avul-Marduk, whence Evil-Merodach), who succeeded Nebuchadrezzar in 562 B.C. and reigned till 560. He showed here the signal favor of granting to Jehoiachin precedence over other conquered monarchs similarly pardoned and gave him a fixed allowance from the royal exchequer (cf. 1 Kings 27). Jer. 52³⁴ adds at the end "until the day of his death," but Kings ends on a note of triumph unmarred by this.

FIRST AND SECOND CHRONICLES

BY PROFESSOR D. C. SIMPSON

INTRODUCTION

Title and Place in Canon. First and Second Chronicles, in the Hebrew Bible, are called "the events of days," i.e., daily happenings. In the Greek Bible, they are called "the things omitted concerning the kings of Judah." They are found in the latter, as in R.V., immediately after the books of Kings. In the Hebrew O.T., on the other hand, First and Second Chronicles appear at the very end of the third division of the canonical Scriptures. They owe their position there, in part, to the late date of their composition, and in part to the fact that they are probably the last books to be admitted to the canon. First and Second Chronicles, Ezra, and Nehemiah are a compilation by one and the same writer (see also intro. to Ezra-Nehemiah, p. 455), who will be referred to in the following pages as "the Chronicler."

Date. Since the Chronicler refers to a member of the Davidic dynasty of the sixth generation after Zerubbabel (1 Chr. 319-24), uses Persian terms (1 Chr. 297), seems himself to have lived later than the Persian period, and in Neh. 1210f., 22f. refers to Jaddua, the high priest in the time of Alexander the Great, the compilation as a whole may well be adjudged as belonging to the Greek period, to a date between 300 and 250 B.C. The Compiler's literary style, theological presuppositions, religious interests and ethical outlook all point to this late date.

Contents and Structure. First and Second Chronicles consist of (a) a series of genealogies and other statistics (1 Chr. 1-9) extending from Adam to somewhere near the Compiler's own day; (b) the reign of David (1 Chr. 10-29); (c) that of Solomon (2 Chr. 1-9); (d) the reigns of the kings of Judah but not, as in Kings, of the Northern Kingdom (2 Chr. 10-3621); (e) 2 Chr. 3622, 23 = Ezra 11-3a.

Sources. On the compilatory methods of Hebrew historians, see pp. 91, 381. Among the chief sources utilized by the Chronicler were: (1) Genesis-Joshua for much of 1 Chr. 1-9. (2) First and Second Samuel and First and Second Kings, from which he made numerous extracts which are indicated below and for comments on which the reader should refer to the notes on them in their earlier contexts in Samuel and Kings. The Chronicler utilized the "framework" of these as the framework of his own history of Judah. He also incorporated (3) a number of other narratives which have no counterpart in Samuel and Kings. These last may or may not be, probably are not, identical with the various works to which the Chronicler refers in 1 Chr. 91 2929; 2 Chr. 929 1215 1322 1611 2034 2427 2526 2622 277 2826 3232 3318f. 3527 368.

These passages are, it is true, mostly marked by the style, the phraseology, and, at times, also the mental and theological outlook which are characteristic of the remaining elements in Chronicles, elements which are obviously the Chronicler's own composition and reflect the Chronicler's own contribution to the volume. But from this it is not necessary to infer that their contents are nothing but the Chronicler's own inventions and that, therefore, they are historically untrustworthy. On the contrary, the Chronicler probably incorporated traditions of which many had hitherto been handed down only orally and had been well known to himself from earliest boyhood. To them he had always attached as much importance as to the other narratives which he took from written sources: just because they had become so much a part of himself he related them in his own characteristic style and phraseology. The historical worth of each story must be adjudged on its merits. Even where it is obvious that, in its present form as it appears in Chronicles, a given story has been embroidered by the Chronicler, historical facts, and those sometimes of the greatest value to the historian, will often be found embedded in such story.

Purpose and Teaching. Some of the Chronicler's additions to the history of the past, as told in Samuel and Kings, are of considerable value to the historian for reconstructing the history of that past. But the Chronicler's object was not to collect information for a scientific reconstruction of past history. Like the Compiler of Samuel, and especially like the Compiler of Kings, his purpose was primarily religious. Just as, e.g., First and Second Kings had been compiled to meet the needs of religious men in the closing years of the pre-exilic period, so a new book of meditation on the religious experiences of the past was needed in the third century B.C. and was provided by the Chronicler. Without, for instance, in the least contradicting the religious teaching of First and Second Kings (see intro. to Kings), he put that teaching in a new perspective and added to it very considerably. Moreover, history had long since demonstrated the complete destruction of the old "Northern Kingdom." Men of the Chronicler's age and type were no longer interested in its fortunes: its fate was too obviously that of utter and final eclipse. Hence the Chronicler, unlike the author of Kings, omitted to recount its history reign by reign. It was on this account, not because of any antipathy to prophetism, in which he thoroughly believed (see below), that he omitted even to record the life-work and stormy episodes in the careers of the great Northern prophets, Micaiah ben-Imlah, Elijah, and Elisha. The Jerusalem Temple, on the other hand, had proved its own inherent sanctity and its importance for Judah by rising again in 520 B.C. to new life and activity after its downfall in 586 B.C. Its sacrifices, in the estimation of the Chronicler and his school of thought, constituted a great link between earth and heaven. Its Aaronic priesthood, and more especially its Levitical choir, Davidic Psalter and sacred music, seemed to the Chronicler to be the earthly counterparts to those of the heavenly Temple itself. This may not justify, but it explains, the disproportionate space given more especially to recording the preparations for and the building of the Temple, as well as the apportioning of the duties and privileges of its personnel, and the origin of its musical arrangements (see notes on 1 Chr. 21-29).

Moreover, between the compilation of First and Second Kings and the Chronicler's day, the developments of theological speculation, of religious practice, and of ethical and moral ideals had been very considerable. The Chronicler, therefore, set out to rewrite the history of the past in the light of such of these later developments as appeared to him and to his generation to be vital and necessary. By means of history thus rewritten he hoped to commend these doctrines and points of view to his contemporaries. One or two of his favorite themes have ceased to have even an indirect message for men of to-day, unless, by contrast, they remind us of the tremendous advance made (chiefly through the coming of the world's Redeemer) by religious thought during the years that lie between the Chronicler's day and ours. But others are of direct and permanent value: they will remain true to the end of time. To the first class belong, for instance, the veiled, but none the less bitter, condemnation of the Samaritan contemporaries of the Chronicler, with their schismatic Temple on Mount Gerizim (see notes to 2 Chr. 11¹³⁻¹⁷ 13^f. 149-15 20³⁵, 36 25^f., etc.), the narrow-minded ecclesiasticism, and the stress on the externals of religion, which were often so disastrous in their effects. To the second class belongs the stress on monotheism (1 Chr. 29¹⁰⁻¹⁹), on the wrongfulness of idolatry (1 Chr. 14¹² 2 Chr. 14^{3f}.), on the transcendental elements in the idea of Jehovah, who can still become immanent at least in the Temple (2 Chr. 7¹⁻³), on his omniscience (2 Chr. 16⁹), on his omnipotence as the source of all (1 Chr. 29¹⁰⁻¹⁹) except of evil (1 Chr. 21^{1f}.), on his providence over humanity in general (see note to 1 Chr. 1-9), and over his elect in particular, on his speaking to his people through Spirit-inspired human instruments (1 Chr. 17¹⁻¹⁵ 2 Chr. 15¹⁻⁷, etc.), on the solidarity of the human race (see note to 1 Chr. 1-9), and on faith and confidence in Jehovah (2 Chr. 149-15 16¹⁻¹⁰). Careful attention also should be paid to the Chronicler's teaching on the conditions which make war justifiable, successful or disastrous (2 Chr. 134-20 149-15 20¹⁻³⁰), on the relations between sin and punishment, goodness and reward (see notes to 1 Chr. 10^{13f}. 2 Chr. 149-15 24¹⁵⁻²⁴ 26¹⁶⁻²¹), on the fallacy of worldly wisdom (i.e., Hellenism, see on 2 Chr. 16¹²⁻¹⁴), and on the efficacy, duty, and comfort of prayer (1 Chr. 17¹⁶⁻²⁷ 29¹⁰⁻¹⁹ 2 Chr. 6¹⁻⁴² 7¹⁻³). These are all fundamental issues of permanent importance for the religious and moral life of every nation and every individual in every age. They lose nothing, on the contrary, they gain, by being discussed and taught in the Chronicler's way; i.e., not as abstract philosophical problems, but as practical issues worked out in the history of a nation's destiny and in the life-story of outstanding individuals of old time.

Permanent Value and Significance. In estimating the permanent value of Chronicles, its scope and purpose as outlined in the preceding paragraphs must be kept in mind. The general judgment of modern scholars is that in historical value it is inferior to that of the other canonical books, from which much of its material is drawn. If the Chronicler had access to extra-canonical reliable sources from which he drew material not found elsewhere in the O.T., the book becomes an important supplement to the other historical books. On the whole, the judgment of Professor Sayce with reference to the historical value of Chronicles is well founded: "The consistent exaggeration of numbers on the part of the Chronicler shows us that from a historical point of view his unsupported statements must be received with caution. But they do not justify the accusations of deliberate fraud and 'fiction' which have been brought against him. What they prove is that he did not possess that sense of historical exactitude which we now demand from the historian. He wrote in fact with a didactic and not with a historical purpose."

The religious teaching of Chronicles gives evidence of the limitations of the age in which it was written. There are, indeed, expressions of intense religious fervor, but, on the whole, the book defines religion in terms of ritual and ceremonial. Its attitude toward the moral problems of life is more or less superficial. The author believes in a mechanical correspondence between conduct and destiny. The reward of piety is prosperity; and in turn prosperity is an unfailing proof of piety. In the same way, the punishment of sin is adversity, and adversity is an infallible proof of sin. In its own day the book undoubtedly served an important didactic purpose—of encouragement and warning; but to the modern student of religion its chief value lies in the fact that it enables him to understand more clearly the ideas and ideals of the age from which it sprang.

Literature: W. Harvey-Jellie, First and Second Chronicles (Century Bible); E. L. Curtis, Chronicles (International Critical Commentary); on First Chronicles the works recommended in the present volume on First and Second Samuel; on First and Second Chronicles those recommended on First and Second Kings; The Parallel History of the Jewish Monarchy, Parts 1 and 2 (consisting of the text of First and Second Samuel, First and Second Kings in parallel columns with that of First and Second Chronicles) will be found useful for the comparative study of these books.

FIRST CHRONICLES

CHAPTERS I-IX

The Chronicler's General Introduction. Consisting of genealogical tables interspersed with geographical and historical items, these chapters serve as a rough-and-ready background to the whole book, an anticipation of the tables of dates, contents, and statistics to be found in modern works. It assisted the Chronicler to give a bird's-eye view of the times of which he wrote, but more especially it provided a skeleton history of events earlier than the period to which he wished to devote the greater part of his volume. Though somewhat dreary to the modern reader, these genealogies at times contain matter of considerable historical importance. They made too a peculiar appeal to the Chronicler and to many of his Jewish readers. The latter, especially if they were able to trace their lineage back to any of the families here enumerated, found the utmost satisfaction in perusing them. Genealogies too served as the touchstone of true Jewish lineage, making a definite cleavage between full Jewish, semi-Jewish and completely non-Jewish birth, at a time when such distinctions had become matters of vital importance in the estimation of all orthodox Jews. Moreover, with the help of these genealogies, culminating in the genealogy of Saul, the Chronicler was able to pass quite naturally in ch. 10 to his very full treatment of that monarch's successor, David.

Finally, by means of these seemingly lifeless lists the Chronicler sought to drive home important religious truths which had found little or no place in the works of earlier historians

(e.g., First and Second Samuel, First and Second Kings); but which post-exilic Judaism, in spite of all its self-centered egotism, recognized and which (maybe for different reasons) still need emphasizing to-day: (1) The Divine Providence works out slowly but surely, choosing from among Adam's descendants this outstanding personality in one generation, that in another, to serve, as it were, as milestones on the long road of human endeavor; from the physical and spiritual descendants of these chosen vessels it finally builds up the church-community of the future. In the estimation of the Chronicler, for example, the members of his nation and church had Adam as their first physical father, Abraham as the first spiritual one, Moses as the giver of the eternal Law, David as the organizer of its Temple and of that Temple's personnel, music, and psalmody, Solomon as its builder, and so on up to the Chronicler's own day. (2) In spite of this highly selective theory of human destiny, and in spite of his ultra-ecclesiastical outlook, the Chronicler recognized the truth of the solidarity of the human race, the brotherhood of all Adam's descendants. For him they were all (except the outlaw Cain and his descendants) within the general orbit (as opposed to the special selection) of the Divine Providence. Consequently, he did not shrink from including in his work genealogies of all three sons of Noah (15-27), Abraham's descendants by his concubines (129-33), even the hated descendants of Esau the Edomite (135-54), and all the descendants of all the sons of Jacob, not merely of those three—Judah, Benjamin, Levi—who alone had, in his judgment, remained true to their election to membership in the Jewish Church.

All the genealogies are valuable, but since it is these three patriarchs in which he is chiefly interested, it is in theirs that we find most information over and beyond mere statistics. 23-42³ contains various genealogical lists and items of information concerning Judah, of which those concerning David's ancestry traced back to Ram (21⁰⁻¹⁷) and his descendants right down to post-exilic days (31-23) are the most interesting. 76-12, like 81-40, purports to give the genealogy of Benjamin, but the former is perhaps that of Zebulun. 61-81 sets forth the genealogy of the Levites. It is the fullest and most important of all. Especially noteworthy are its lists of the succession of high priests from Aaron to the Exile (61-15), the singers descended from Gershon, Kohath, and Merari (616-30), and from Heman, Asaph and Ethan (631-47). 648-49 gives further information as to the services of Levites and Aaronites. 654-60 provides a further list of high priests, this time to the period of David. David, we are taught, was the originator of the guilds of singers and of the musical services so characteristic of the Temple worship of post-exilic days. And it was with this thought paramount in his mind that the Chronicler, having given in 91-34 a genealogy of the inhabitants of Jerusalem (i.e., of those who were his readers), proceeded to his account of David.

CHAPTERS 10 TO 29: THE REIGN AND LIFE-WORK OF DAVID

Chronicles and Samuel. Nearly all that is weakly human and much that is fresh and courageous in his character seems to have disappeared from the life story of David as here depicted. The reader will look in vain in these chapters for more than passing references to David's boyhood (see 17¹), his combat with Goliath (18²) and his wild outlaw life (121-23), or his intimate domestic life. His career, moreover, at Saul's court is entirely omitted. In First and Second Samuel, David lives before us not only as the recipient of Messianic promises, but chiefly as the intrepid youngster, the slayer of Goliath, the patient harpist to the king, who is fast losing his reason and secretly seeking David's life, the outlaw chieftain who here refuses to take Saul's life, the composer of at least one secular lyric of outstanding merit, the faithful friend of Jonathan, the passionate lover of Bathsheba, the too indulgent father, at once the victor over the Philistines and Jebusites and the barbaric conqueror of trans-Jordanic lands—and yet a signal failure as the administrator of justice and as a unifying figure in his people's life in times of peace.

Many, on the other hand, of the other traditions of David preserved in First and Second Samuel were incorporated by the Chronicler sometimes verbatim, sometimes with modifications, in these chapters. The Chronicler also had recourse to other sources of information, these being often of no great antiquity and merely reflecting the traditions of his own day, sometimes possibly representing only his own subjective conception of what David ought to have been and ought to have done. But the total effect is striking. Not merely has David become an ideal figure who lacks most of the ordinary vices of his day, he has also become a passionate devotee of the ideal of the Temple which his son was destined to build. His life-work is all made to lead up to, and so to subserve, the interests of this climax of his career, namely, the preparation of the material for the erection of the Temple, the organizing of the personnel, especially the Levites, and, within this body, of those Levites whose lot it was to lead the musical and choral side of worship in the Temple. But the reader had best suspend judgment on the Chronicler's treatment of David till he has once again read both First and Second Samuel and these chapters with the notes which follow below. (See "The Chronicler's Delineation of David," p. 445.)

CHAPTER X

The Death of Saul. Vv. 1-12 almost = 1 Sam. 311-13, but vv. 13, 14 are the product of the Chronicler's own vivid conviction—expressed by him at times in a somewhat mechanical manner—that all things happen providentially. Since his theology contained no doctrine of existence after death or of rewards or punishments in heaven or hell, a man's fate in this life is, in his judgment, the final divine verdict on his character. Consequently, so cruel a fate for Israel's king appeared to him to stand in some relation to his conduct. He felt it to be necessarily connected with (a) that king's recent deviation from full trust in Jehovah and recourse to cults of the dead, and (b) the overruling Providence which had already designated David as the future king.

CHAPTER XI

1-9. David Reigns; He Captures Jerusalem. For vv. 1-3 cf. 2 Sam. 51-3. For Hebron see note to 2 Sam 21. For reference to Samuel see 1 Sam. 1528 161, 2. Vv. 4-9 are an abridgement of 2 Sam. 56-10 (see notes there), with the addition of the notice of Joab's restoration of the city (as distinct from the citadel).

10-47. A List of Fifty-one of David's Heroes. Vv. 9-39=2 Sam. 238-9a, 11b-39 (with vv. 9b-11a inadvertently omitted), where a better text of the earlier part is preserved. For the description of the Egyptian (v. 23) cf. 1 Sam. 177 2 Sam. 2119.

CHAPTER XII

1-22. David's Followers During His Desert Wanderings. They appear as envisaged through the mists of seven hundred years by the Jewish Church of the Chronicler's day. David in 1 Sam. 221f. was followed by a small faithful band of men who like himself were desperate outlaws; in Chronicles he has become the general of the flower of Israel's manhood. Men of the Chronicler's day would boast of their descent from this or that follower of the great David. Hence the interest which attached to the Chronicler's list and to the more or less graphic notes on their peculiarities and achievements.

23-40. David's Military Leaders. A similar interest would be aroused by the list (not based on Samuel) of military men who hailed David king at Hebron. Many of the names and notes in these lists are probably far more genuine and trustworthy than many similar items in the genealogical trees of well-known families of the last few centuries.

CHAPTER XIII

The Solemn Journey of the Ark From Kiriath-jearim. Less arbitrary than the autocratic David of pre-exilic days, and more ecclesiastical in his conception of the requirements of a religious procession, the David here idealized duly consults with the officers of his realm and summons the priests and Levites to take their appropriate part in the solemn progress (vv. 1-5). Thus, and thus only, could post-exilic Judaism conceive that David had acted—David, the ideal king, the benefactor of the priesthood, the originator of the various Levitical choirs. In David's day there was, in point of fact, no distinction between "priests" and "Levites." It was Ezekiel who proposed a distinction (between "sons of Zadok" and the rest of the tribe of Levi; see Ezek. 4410-31), and not till after the Exile was the Aaronic priesthood with the "Levites" as a subsidiary order established. 6-14. Almost verbatim=2 Sam. 62-11 (see notes there), except that (v. 14) the piety of the Chronicler's day, recoiling from the idea of the ark resting in a private and secular dwelling, thought of it as placed "by" the house of Obed-edom, and as having "its own house," as the Hebrew should be translated.

CHAPTER XIV

1-7. David's Exaltation and Family. The Chronicler tells (vv. 1, 2) from an unknown source of the presents sent to David by Hiram king of Phœnicia (see note to 2 Sam. 511), an incident chronicled as being illustrative of David's fame in the estimation of the leading nations of his day. 3-7. Next he mentions David's sons born in Jerusalem (cf. 35-8 and see 2 Sam. 513-16).

8-17. Defeat of the Philistines. Vv. 8-12 relate his victory at Baal-Perazim (=2 Sam. 517-21; see note there to v. 20), which culminated, so post-exilic Judaism instinctively felt, not in David's soldiers treasuring the captured images of the Philistine gods (2 Sam. 521) but in their immediately and appropriately burning them. 13-17. David's further victory over the Philistines in the valley (based on 2 Sam. 522-25, where the valley is that of Rephaim; see notes there to vv. 20, 22) is stated to be the culminating reason for David's international fame.

CHAPTERS XV, XVI

Transfer of the Ark to Jerusalem. As compared with 2 Sam. 612-19 (see note there), these chapters contain a lengthy description of the journey of the ark (see note to 2 Sam. 63, and for its earlier history and significance see notes to 1 Sam. 44 51-71). Again it is the David idealized by post-exilic piety who makes both the general (151-15) and the musical preparations (1516-24) for this most solemn journey. David appoints the Levites to serve before the ark (164-7 and see vv. 37-43) and appoints the "Asaph" division of Levites henceforth to be the chanters of the psalms of thanksgiving. The psalm used on this occasion (163-36) was a combination of Psa. 1051-15 96, 1061-48 (all probably psalms of post-exilic origin).

CHAPTER XVII

Nathan's Message to David Concerning a Temple; David's Prayer. As idealized in post-exilic days David's interest in the personnel of the Temple was extraordinarily great. Was he not the organizer of the priests but above all of the Levites, the inspirer of the Temple music, the author of its psalmody? Why, then, did Providence decree that not David but Solomon should be the founder of the Temple for which these Levites, this psalmody and music, were intended? The only possible answer to the riddle as it seemed to these worshipers in the post-exilic Temple was that contained in Nathan's message to David (vv. 1-15) and David's prayer of thanksgiving (vv. 16-27). (See further notes to 2 Sam. 7:1-7).

CHAPTER XVIII

Practically verbatim=2 Sam. 8:1-18.

CHAPTER XIX

For this and 20:1-3 see 2 Sam. 10:1-12 11:12-26, 30, 31.

CHAPTER XX

Wars Against Ammon and Philistia. For vv. 1-3 see under ch. 19. For vv. 4-8 see 2 Sam. 21:18-22. In v. 5 the Chronicler states that "Elhanan . . . slew Lahmi the brother of Goliath the Gittite" instead of "Elhanan . . . the Bethlehemite (Hebrew, Bethlamhi) slew Goliath" (2 Sam. 21:19). This is an interesting textual emendation by the Chronicler. Though he did not himself record it, he knew full well that it was David, not Elhanan, who slew Goliath. To reconcile the two traditions he turned the lahmi of Bethlahmi in Samuel into the name of a supposed brother of Goliath slain by Elhanan.

CHAPTERS 21 TO 29: PREPARATIONS FOR THE BUILDING AND ADMINISTRATION OF THE TEMPLE

Post-exilic piety, as already indicated (see on ch. 17 above), would have been well content that David rather than Solomon should have been the builder of the Temple, but Providence had decreed otherwise. Post-exilic historians, therefore, contented themselves with treasuring and preserving traditions which told of preparations made by David for the building of the Temple and his arrangement for its personnel.

CHAPTER XXI

The Census; the Plague; the Temple Site. The chief interest of the story of David's census and the plague (probably based on, though deviating in important respects from, 2 Sam. 24, where see notes) consisted for the Chronicler in the fact that it led to the revelation to David of the predestined site for the Temple. To us an important point of interest in this section consists in the Chronicler's attributing the temptation to Satan. Pre-exilic thought had, quite naturally and without an especial reflection or questioning, referred all facts and phenomena, and all kinds of human fortune, good and bad, to Jehovah himself as their immediate cause. But by the Chronicler's time, as a result of the prophetic emphasis on the righteousness and holiness of Jehovah, the cause of moral wrongdoing was attributed to Satan, once a member of the heavenly court, the divinely appointed tester of human motives (Job. 16:12 21:7; cf. Zech. 3:1^{f.}), but finally regarded as the head of the fallen angels, the enemy, by N.T. times, alike of God and man.

CHAPTERS XXII-XXVII

David as Ecclesiastical and Political Organizer. In 22:1-19 we have a selection of traditions also dear to post-exilic piety, reflecting, as they did, exactly what it conceived to be the justification for its own whole-hearted devotion to the Temple, for the regulations in force and for the services carried out by the clergy of its own day. Not only are David's general preparations for the Temple mentioned (vv. 2-5), but also his charge to Solomon (vv. 6-16), and to the princes (vv. 17-19). Ch. 23 contains his provisions for the Levites and their services, and 24:1-19 those for the priests. 24:20-31 contains a supplementary list of Levites: the courses for the singers are given in ch. 25, for the gate-keepers, treasurers, and other Levitical officials in ch. 26. David thus became famous as an organizer in the ecclesiastical sphere. Ch. 27 illustrates the traditions which grew up in praise of his organizing ability in the secular sphere of the army (vv. 1-15), tribal princes (vv. 16-24), royal treasury officials (vv. 25-31), and counselors (vv. 32-34).

CHAPTER XXVIII

David's Final Preparations for the Temple. The Chronicler and his contemporaries had no conception of the vital question of succession with its concomitant factions and animosities in the royal entourage vividly set forth in 1 Kings 1 (see notes). Instead they conceived of the attention of David and his court and subjects as being mainly concentrated on the various projects for the building of the Temple. It was this which was the ultimate purpose of David's communications to the people in a public assembly in connection with Solomon's succession (vv. 1-8). It was to this that David called Solomon's attention (vv. 9, 10). It was the pattern, the "architect's plans," as we should say, of the Temple and its various parts which Solomon received from David (vv. 11-21).

CHAPTER XXIX

1-25. The People Offer Willingly; David's Prayer and Thanksgiving. It only remained for David to make his last final appeal for free-will offerings for the financing of this same project, an appeal meeting with instantaneous success (vv. 1-9), and then (vv. 10-19) to utter his final prayer. The beauty, richness, and spirituality of this prayer bear ample testimony to the piety and religious insight of the Chronicler's co-religionists of the third century B.C., for whose edification the Chronicler included it in his book. It is the prayer of an undoubting monotheist, conscious of the need of a spirit of thankfulness and of a "perfect heart" as conditions of real personal relationship to the omnipotent and only God, the Creator, the Sustainer, and the ultimate goal of all the universe and yet still the God of Israel, the God of the patriarchs, and the God to whom the sacrificial worship is to be offered in this Temple to the end of time—"All things come of thee and of thine own have we given thee." Hence it was after the sacrificial banquet was finished that Solomon became king over a thoroughly satisfied and religiously privileged people with the full approval of his brothers (vv. 20-25).

26-30. David's Reign and Death. The Chronicler closes the reign of David with a chronological note (see 1 Kings 2¹¹) emphasizing the reputation as well as the age of the dying monarch (v. 28), and indicating the independent authorities from whose literary works still more information could be gleaned (vv. 29, 30).

The Chronicler's Delineation of David. Such is the Chronicler's delineation of David, his reign, his acts, and the goal of all his strivings. David has become a model of subordination of self to the highest religious destiny of his subjects, which only a few Christian princes, such as Constantine or Charlemagne, have excelled. The reader may, indeed, prefer the more strictly historical account of David in First and Second Samuel with its stories of David's boyhood at Bethlehem, the spontaneous courage and chivalry of his youth whether matched against a lion, fighting for his father's sheep, or against Goliath on behalf of the armies of Israel, his harpist career at Saul's court, his patient endurance of Saul's jealousy, his love for Jonathan, his outlaw life with its hair-breadth escapes from Saul's pursuit alternating with the twice repeated refusals to seize the opportunity of slaying Saul. The reader too may admire the skill displayed in David's elegy over Saul and Jonathan, his care for the burial of Saul's descendants, the stories of his adulterous love for Bathsheba, of his repentance when confronted by Nathan's "Thou art the man," his grief at his child's death, his failure to control his family, the tragedy of Absalom's rebellion. But let the reader be fair to the Chronicler in thus suppressing and even departing from some of these comparatively trustworthy stories. He may, indeed, have omitted some stories as unedifying. But since omissions were necessary in consequence of the comprehensive character and length of his history, the great bulk of what he omitted he probably chose thus to sacrifice as being that which he could best afford to omit, though much of what he suppressed probably made a real appeal to the Chronicler. He knew, for instance, accepted, and was a zealous believer in the story of David's victory over Goliath (see 18^{1, 2}).

But, in order to appreciate the Chronicler's skill in accomplishing the task which he set himself, we have to keep in mind the fact that he was a stern exponent of contemporary orthodoxy at a time when many of his co-religionists were beginning to be attracted to Hellenism (cf. 2 Chr. 44). He was also a devotee of the Temple, which obviously could never have been built but for David's capture of Jebus. He was a keen exponent of the Temple worship at a time when that shrine was beginning to feel the effects of the (unintentional) rivalry of the synagogues springing up throughout the land. He was, perhaps most of all, a musician and (in spite of his own prosaic and somewhat overloaded style) a lover of poetry, an admirer of that Jewish hymn book, "The Psalter," which still to-day expresses the religious aspirations alike of Protestant and Catholic Christendom as well as of orthodox and modernist Jewry. He was a devoted admirer of the Levitical system rather than a student of the arts of war or learned in the shepherd's lore. As a keen musician he had year by year listened to the Temple music which, more even than the cultus itself, exalted him and put him into touch with the Unseen and the Infinite. Its appeal to his inmost being had stirred a desire within him to tell of its origins and its development. He had, in short, come to regard David not merely as ultimately responsible for, but also as the sole originator of, all the arrangements and liturgy of the Temple. We perceive that, in the form which they had assumed by his day, these were the result of a long process of development and that they were destined at times to obscure rather than to illuminate the essentials of true religion. But this the Chronicler did not realize. He loved all these things dearly—and to him who loves much, much shall be forgiven.

Moreover, in the Chronicler's day the worship of the Temple, external though it essentially was, had not yet become a caricature of true religion, and its priesthood was not yet the open enemy of positive goodness, which it is depicted as being in N.T. times. Had it already become this, it could not a hundred years or more after the Chronicler have called forth the Hasidæans' passion for martyrdom on its behalf when Antiochus profaned its altar in 168 B.C., any more than, just before the Chronicler's day, it could have roused the poetic muse which produced some of the finest of the psalms for use within its courts. Moreover, devotion to the Temple, even to Herod's Temple—in spite of its many abuses—must not be looked on as the mark of one who is merely interested in the external trappings of religion for their own sake and has no vision of the possibilities of immediate and mystical union with the Divine. Respect for the Temple was an element even in Christ's love of his fellow countrymen and their religious institutions. In childhood and in his public life he resorted thither (see Mk. 11¹⁵ 13¹ and parallels in Mt. and Lk.; Lk. 222-50; Jn. 213-22 714-44, etc.). It was the scene of some of his most important sermons and discussions (Mk. 1115-131). Because it was God's "house of prayer" he troubled to turn out the traders from its precincts (Mk. 1115-18; cf. Jn. 213-22). Its impending overthrow was a matter of the deepest grief to him (Lk. 1941-43). After his Ascension the first generation of his disciples constantly resorted thither to pray as well as to preach (Acts 314). Not till the Hellenist Stephen became prominent were the Palestinian Christians charged with "blasphemy" against it (Acts 613). At the end of his third missionary journey Paul not only himself performed a religious obligation there, but at James' suggestion paid the fees to assist others to do so, even if in doing this he was only acting up to his principle of being "all things to all men" (Acts 21174). It would appear that the reader of Chronicles to-day, instead of criticizing the Chronicler for his one-sided view of history, ought rather to include the study of the origins and subsequent development of the Temple, its ministers and its part in Jewish life, among his own studies of the origins of Judaism as the parent of Christianity.

SECOND CHRONICLES

CHAPTERS 1 TO 9: THE REIGN OF SOLOMON

For a parallel account, with differences, of Solomon's reign (977-937 B.C.) see 1 Kings 31-1143.

CHAPTER I

1-13. Jehovah's Revelation to Solomon at Gibeon. See 1 Kings 34-15, from which vv. 6-13 are abridged. The Chronicler seeks in v. 3 to justify the sanctuary at Gibeon as legitimate on the ground that it was (in his estimation) the lineal descendant of the Traveling Tabernacle of the wilderness wanderings described in the Priestly Code (Ex. 25-31; 35-40) and a copy of the heavenly temple shown to Moses in the Mount. 9. See the Messianic promise to David in 2 Sam. 71-17.

14-17. Solomon's Wealth. (Cf. 925-28). Practically = 1 Kings 1026-29.

CHAPTER II

The Building and Dedication of the Temple. 2. Cf. vv. 17f.; 1 Kings 515f. 3-10. Solomon's message to Hiram contains information (not recorded in 1 Kings 51-6) as to David's relations with Hiram (cf. 1 Chr. 141, 2); a workman skilled alike in metals, cloth, and engraving is needed. Various kinds of wood are specified. The provision for the Phœnician workers is defined. 11-16. Hiram's answer is based on 1 Kings 57-9. 17, 18. Men of the Chronicler's age and school of thought, owing to the fact that the enslavement of Hebrew citizens had been forbidden long before their own day (Lev. 25; Neh. 51-13), could not conceive of the corvée as applied to Hebrews and therefore imagined that the impressed workers consisted entirely of aliens. That the idea of alien indentured labor did not offend them is not surprising in view of its being still allowed even in some possessions of European powers and in South America to the present day.

CHAPTER III

Building of the Temple Continued. 1, 2. Cf. 1 Kings 61. The identification of the site of Abraham's attempted sacrifice of Isaac with that of the threshing floor of Araunah (cf. 1 Chr. 2115f.) and of Solomon's Temple is here definitely affirmed. 3-7. Dimensions of the porch and the holy place; cf. 1 Kings 62, 3, 8, 9. The most holy house. Cf. 1 Kings 614-22. Six hundred talents (probably = 27,000 lbs.) would seem an exaggeration. 10-14. Two cherubim. Cf. 1 Kings 623-28. The note as to the veil, not mentioned in Kings or in Ezekiel, is based upon the usage of the Chronicler's own day which was influenced by Ex. 2631. 15-17. Two pillars. Cf. 1 Kings 715-22. Their height is here double that ascribed to them in Kings.

CHAPTER IV

The Furniture of the Temple. 1. The altar is not mentioned in the Temple source of 1 Kings (but see 1 Kings 8⁶⁴), either because it has there inadvertently dropped out of the text or because Solomon, in point of fact, sacrificed on the bare rock, the celebrated es-Sakra, now covered by the Mosque of Omar. The description here is probably based on the Chronicler's knowledge of the altar of his own day. 2-6. Similarly, ignorant of their original use, the Chronicler here states the theories of his own day as to the brazen sea and the lavers; cf. 1 Kings 7²³⁻²⁶. 7, 8. The candlesticks (cf. 1 Kings 7⁴⁹), ten tables (possibly for the candlesticks, unless for shewbread), basins (cf. 1 Kings 7⁴⁰)—all probably described as the Chronicler saw them in the post-exilic Temple. 9. Similarly, the Chronicler mentions not the one court of Solomon's Temple (see note to 1 Kings 6³⁶), but the two of post-exilic days, 10-18. The sea, etc. Cf. 1 Kings 7^{39b-47}. Zeredah = Zareth (1 Kings 7⁴⁶). 19-22 (and 51). The golden furnishings and the completion of the work (=1 Kings 7⁴⁸⁻⁵¹; see notes there).

CHAPTER V

The Ark Installed in the Temple. The ark is brought to the Temple with due solemnity and escorted both by priests and by Levites (except in v. 5) in accordance with the post-exilic presuppositions based on the Priestly Code as to the constitution of the priesthood. 12. A reference is made here to the presence and duties of the Levitical singers and musicians (entirely ignored in Kings), a topic in which the Chronicler was much interested. He made the descent of the cloud coincident with this musical outburst, as if attesting divine acceptance of the latter. Otherwise the amount of deviation from 1 Kings 8¹⁻¹¹ is negligible.

CHAPTER VI

Solomon's Words and Prayer of Dedication. The whole, except vv. 13, 41, 42, simply repeats 1 Kings 8^{12-50a}. To the Chronicler's generation the idea that Solomon should function as a priest was unthinkable—cf. the Chronicler's omission of Solomon's blessing of the people, though recorded in 1 Kings 8⁵⁴⁻⁶¹. Consequently, it was supposed that he must have acted as the preacher on this occasion and have occupied an improvised temporary rostrum. 40-42. These verses also reflect the piety of post-exilic days. The Deuteronomie era which produced 1 Kings 8⁵¹⁻⁵³ (which the Chronicler rejected in favor of these verses) had fixed its gaze, so far as the past was concerned, chiefly on the redemption from Egypt. The post-exilic period, with a richer theology and a wider experience of life gained both during the years of separation from the Temple and in the succeeding centuries of development of its services, evolved finer and fuller liturgical formulæ and terminology. 41. The opening expressions are partly drawn from the post-exilic Psa. 132⁸ and from the ancient address to the ark, Num. 10³⁵, etc., while the contents of v. 42 recall Psa. 132^{10f}. Together they form a harmonious echo of a variety of O.T. passages requisitioned for liturgical expression.

CHAPTER VII

1-3. The Answer to Solomon's Prayer. Here is a remarkable and vigorous description of the divine acceptance of and answer to Solomon's prayer. Fire descends from heaven and consumes the sacrifices; the transcendent God, materialized as smoke, becomes immanent ("the glory of the Lord") in the "house" of the Lord. For this brief divine moment not even the priests, the consecrated human media of communion between the Divine and the human, have any special place in Israel's mystic union with its Divine Head. The people have an immediate vision of their God: they worship him in the most direct possible manner and themselves offer up thanksgivings. It is a descriptive narrative which finds no place in Kings, but is, on that account, not necessarily the less majestic and ancient. Like the similar description of the answer to David's prayer in 1 Chr. 21²⁶ (on the occasion when, after sacrificing on this same spot, according to the Chronicler he selected it for what it had now become), the imagery goes back to more primitive descriptions such as that of Elijah's moment of triumph on Mount Carmel. Probably the present passage in its turn served to supply in part the imagery for the description of an equally dramatic initial moment in the experience of the Christian Church—when at Pentecost the Spirit came down from heaven as cloven tongues of fire. It rested then, however, on and in no material building of human design, but on human beings who were God's spiritual creation. It denoted (though they did not at first realize this) the freeing of the early Christians from the deadening effects of the external sacrifices of the Temple and its ritual, in order to build up a spiritual Temple in each of them, a Temple destined to supersede as well as outlive Herod's reconstruction of Solomon's Temple on Mount Zion. No longer did "the children of" the new "Israel" need to "look on": they were themselves afire with the Divine Spirit: their task was to hand on to others the sacred fire of the good news of immediate access to God, and to hand it on burning more brightly, if possible, than when they received it.

4-7. The Dedictory Sacrifices. The Chronicler utilized 1 Kings 8⁶²⁻⁶⁴, introducing, as was his wont, a reference to the choral and musical accompaniments of the sacrifice. Merely because he himself was interested in the Temple music, and referred to that of David and Solomon, in the terminology of his own day, it is wrong to assume either that he invented such references or that they cannot be historical. The assumption that religious music and psalmody among the Hebrews were exclusively of post-exilic origin is entirely false. (See The Psalmists, edited by D. C. Simpson, Essay I.) On the post-exilic distinction between Aaronic "priests" and the rest of the "Levites" see note to 1 Chr. 13.

8-10. The Feast of Dedication. Utilizing 1 Kings 8^{65, 66}, the Chronicler interpreted the somewhat curious "seven days, even fourteen days" of Kings as referring to two separate festivals, first that of the Dedication of the Altar, and secondly that referred to in Kings, the Feast of Tabernacles. The latter he held to have been observed by Solomon, as it was observed in his own day, according to the provisions of the Priestly Code: he therefore naturally added a reference to the eighth day of a solemn assembly (Lev. 23³⁶).

11-22. Solomon's Vision. This appears to be a combination of 1 Kings 9¹⁻⁹ with (in parts of v. 12, and vv. 13-15) matter from some other source.

CHAPTER VIII

Various Political and Administrative Notices.

The divergences from 1 Kings 9¹⁰⁻²⁶ are few, but, on that account, none the less interesting and instructive as reflecting the new light in which the matters in question were viewed by men of religious and political ideas in the Chronicler's day. Thus, vv. 1, 2, the incident described in Kings as a session of cities by Solomon to Hiram was now regarded as a gift made by the latter to the former. Vv. 3-6 describe Solomon's fortifications and store cities. See 1 Kings 9¹⁷⁻¹⁹. While the fall of Gezer was no longer of interest, the seemingly insignificant Tamar (in South Judah) of 1 Kings was interpreted as a mistake for Tadmor, i.e., Palmyra, northeast of Damascus, well known in later days, and of which in later times Zenobia, the powerful patron of the heretic Paul, Bishop of Samosata, was queen. It was a victory which, if achieved by Solomon, must have made his dominions far more extensive than is usually claimed for them.

CHAPTER IX

1-28. See 1 Kings 10.

29-31. See 1 Kings 11⁴¹⁻⁴³.

CHAPTERS 10 TO 26: THE HISTORY OF JUDAH FROM REHOBAM TO THE EXILE

CHAPTERS X-XII

Rehoboam, the First King of Judah (937-920 B.C.). See 1 Kings 12¹⁻¹⁴²⁰. The Chronicler has assembled from other sources a wealth of additional information. Much of this latter is historically important, and still more of it is religiously instructive.

Rehoboam's fortifications (see 11⁵⁻¹²), situated on the highway into Egypt and on the west Judean hills, were very necessary, as is shown by the story of Shishak's (? earlier) invasion and devastation of the country. They were justifiable defensive measures as distinct from modern forms of aggressive militarism. In 11¹³⁻¹⁷ is related, in restrained terms, the glorious story of families who, like the Pilgrim Fathers of old, left their homes and kindred to migrate to a land where conscience told them they would find liberty to worship God in the highest and purest form known to them. To the Chronicler and his contemporaries, irritated by the Samaritan community and schismatic Samaritan Temple of their own day, this migration from Samaria to Judaea by pious men of ancient days must have appeared as glorious as do stories of early Christian martyrs and confessors to us in the twentieth century. 11¹⁸⁻²³ shows that the Chronicler was not so narrow-mindedly immersed in ecclesiastical matters as not to be interested in the details of the royal household and its still extravagantly luxurious harem, far exceeding the resources of the small kingdom over which Rehoboam now ruled.

The section 12¹⁻¹¹ contains a much fuller account of Shishak's invasion than 1 Kings 14²⁵⁻²⁸. In v. 12 the Chronicler stated for his contemporaries' benefit a truth which, if modern nations appreciated it, would transform the national and economic life of to-day: a nation's "goods" consist neither in its extent nor in its mere political influence, neither in its riches nor in its possession of financial magnates, but are to be measured by its ideals and by the realization of these in the daily life of its citizens.

CHAPTER XIII

Abijah, the Second King (920-917 B.C.). See 1 Kings 15¹⁻⁸, for part of which the Chronicler substitutes (a) a description of a war waged by Abijah against the backsliding Northern Kingdom (v. 3); (b) a statement of the religious and moral grounds which alone justified the declaration of war against a neighboring and kindred nation (vv. 4-12); and (c) the valuable comment (vv. 13-20) that victory comes from God alone, and comes not necessarily to the side with superior forces and technique (Israel) but to the one which has justice and right on its side (Judah).

CHAPTERS XIV-XVI

Asa, the Third King (917-876 B.C.). See 1 Kings 15⁹⁻²⁴, where Asa, unlike his two predecessors, is represented as a good and successful monarch. The present narrative contains ample justification of the verdict on Asa. 14³⁻⁸ claims that Asa inaugurated a sweeping iconoclastic and anti-foreign religious revolution as well as a defensive military reorganization; 14⁹⁻¹⁵ claims that as the outcome of his reliance on God he crushingly defeated both the Cushite invaders led by Zerah (either—Egyptians under Osorkon I or II, or the Arabian Cushites—see 1 Chr. 19, or people of Saba) and the Gerarites. The latter were thus taught that light-hearted interference in others' military struggles brings trouble to the intervener.

But, as interpreted by the Spirit-inspired Azariah, son of Oded (15¹⁻⁷), this war taught Judah the still more important truths, often vindicated but often forgotten before and since, that (a) The Lord is with you if (when, while, or because) you are with him, and (b) If ye seek him, he will be found of you (cf. Isa. 55⁶ Mt. 7^{7f.}, etc.), as well as (c) the message which inspires reformers of all ages: Be strong . . . your work shall be rewarded. Consequently in 15⁸⁻¹⁹ Asa's reformation, only less sweeping than that of Hezekiah and Josiah, is carefully recorded.

Asa proved himself in the hour of trial, however, faithless to his own ideals and lacking in faith in God (16¹⁻¹⁰). It was to Syria, not to Jehovah, that he turned for help against the Northern Kingdom. Hanani the seer, along with some of the people supporting him, was imprisoned for pointing out the truth which should have been, but was not, a source of comfort to Asa: the eyes of the Lord run to and fro throughout the whole earth . . . in the behalf of them whose heart is perfect toward him. As if in punishment for this, Asa became diseased, and died (16¹²⁻¹⁴). All the paraphernalia of burial rites suited to his royal estate were, however, enacted, including a great burning (not of his body but of funeral spices). In this connection the Chronicler incidentally expressed his views on a disputed question of his day. Men of meticulous faithfulness to the traditions of Judaism regarded resort in illness to physicians as an act of apostasy from the faith of their fathers, since the practice of medicine was then a profession newly introduced from non-Jewish, i.e., Hellenistic, sources. Hence the Chronicler's condemnation of Asa's resort to them. Others, like Asa, had no scruples in pinning their faith to the physician's skill. The via media, however, between these two extremes, which Christian thought would approve to-day, was reached soon after the Chronicler's day by Ben Sirach (see Ecclus. 38¹⁻¹⁴). Unfortunately, our own age, with its materialistic outlook, tends to approximate to Asa's standpoint.

CHAPTERS XVII-XX

Jehoshaphat, the Fourth King (876-851 B.C.). To the information contained in 1 Kings 15^{24b} 22^{1-35a}, 41-50, the Chronicler added narratives chosen by him to exemplify certain ideals of civic life which seemed to him of vital religious value. The first (see 17⁷⁻⁹) inculcates the provision of qualified teachers, not only ministerial ("priests and Levites") but also laymen (a real indication of a historical kernel underlying the story), to undertake the religious education of all citizens. In the second place (17¹⁰⁻¹⁹), the excellent effects of such education are exemplified (1) by the admiration shown by other nations for a state so instructed, especially, and in tangible form, by Philistines and Arabians (=desert tribes in Jehoshaphat's day, but in the Chronicler's day—the important Nabataean state south and southeast of Judah), and (2) by the efficiency of the army. In the third place (see 19¹⁻²⁰³⁶) the complete boycott of the schismatic Samaria and abstention from all relations with it are inculcated in the narrative of the message of the seer Jehu, the son of Hanani, and by the destruction of Jehoshaphat's fleet, as predicted by the prophet Eliezer, in punishment of his alliance with Samaria's king. This represents an attitude of sectarian aloofness and ecclesiastical bigotry. It was, unfortunately, far too deeply ingrained in the outlook of men of the Chronicler's day, and was condemned by our Lord's action in freely conversing with the woman of Samaria. It is still all too prevalent among Christian denominations in our own day. Next (19⁴⁻¹¹) the lesson that national leaders with religious ideals should insist on the impartial administration of justice is taught by the narrative of the establishment of local courts and also a central court of appeal (Deut. 16¹⁸⁻²⁰ 17¹⁸). Lastly (see 20¹⁻³⁰), the necessity for facing national peril, and even actual invasion of national territory, not merely with well-drilled armies but in perfect confidence in the transcendent God (God in heaven), the invincible ruler over all the kingdoms, is exemplified in the Moab-Ammon attack (a seeming adaptation of 2 Kings 34-27), the contents of Jehoshaphat's prayer, the Spirit-inspired utterance of the Asaphite Levite Jahaziel, and the triumph celebrated in the valley of Beracah (v. 26).

CHAPTER XXI

Jehoram, the Fifth King (851-843 B.C.). See 2 Kings 816-24. The preceding reign provided the Chronicler with opportunities for emphasizing the beneficent results of the reign of a good king. The opportunity to drive home the unfortunate results of the political program of a decadent ruler is provided by the present reign: vv. 2-4, the weakening of the state owing to Jehoram's jealousy and murder of his own brothers as being possible rivals; v. 6, its degradation owing to his alliance (constituted by his marriage to Athaliah) with Israel and (through her mother Jezebel) with Tyre; vv. 8-11, the opportunity for revolt presented by Judah's lowered morale and seized on by Edom and Libnah. The religious significance and direful results of all this are emphasized in the "writing" (vv. 12-15) ascribed to Elijah. They are also emphasized by the pillaging expeditions of the Philistines and Arabians (vv. 16, 17), by the fatal tragedy of Jehoram's internal illness, by the absence of all forms of public mourning at his death, and by his burial elsewhere than in the dynastic mausoleum (vv. 18-20).

CHAPTER XXII

1-9. Ahaziah, the Sixth King (843-842 B.C.). See 2 Kings 824-29. The Chronicler emphasized the evil effects (a) of Jehoram's disastrous reign by hinting at a disputed succession in which the inhabitants of Jerusalem took sides (v. 1); and (b) of a bad mother's influence on the subsequent development of a child's character, and of that of bad counselors in an already corrupt court (vv. 2-4), resulting in Ahaziah's close alliance with Samaria (vv. 5, 6; see 216 above), and, as divinely predestined, in his death in Samaria (not at Megiddo as in 2 Kings 927f.), where only his grandfather Jehoshaphat's merits sufficed to secure him decent burial (vv. 7-9).

10-12. The Reign of the Usurper Athaliah (842-836 B.C.) did not detain the Chronicler and he passed on to the career of Joash.

CHAPTERS XXIII, XXIV

Joash, the Seventh King (836-796 B.C.). See 2 Kings 111-1221. In 231-21 we see the Chronicler freely modifying the story of 2 Kings 114-12. Himself a devotee of the Temple, its etiquette, ceremonial, and ritual, and desirous of inculcating a love of the same in his readers, he transformed the foreign bodyguard of pre-exilic days (1 Kings 138, 44; cf. 2 Sam. 818 and note there) into prominent Levites, allowing only priests and Levites within the Temple, as was the case in his own day. Not a small cabal, as in Kings, but all the Judeans of importance are here cognizant of a plot of which all religious men of the Chronicler's own day must needs have approved. Fidelity to the same presuppositions of his day explains the changes in 244-14 as compared with 2 Kings 124-12. 2415-24, however, contains valuable hints of the reaction which took place in the latter part of Joash's reign against the reforming policy of the now deceased Jehoiada—such reactions are inevitable after any reform. The more extreme the reformation is, the more sweeping will be the reaction. But, though needing to be resisted, such reactions should never disturb unduly the disciples of the cause of progress. They are ultimately brought to an abrupt ending, and reform in the long run always triumphs. Such, the Chronicler pointed out, was the fate of this particular reaction. Scarce had the blood of Zechariah, Jehoiada's son, the Spirit-inspired apostle and martyr of reform, dried on the pavement of the Temple court between the Temple and the altar (cf. Mt. 2335 Lk. 1151) when the Syrian invaders (cf. 2 Kings 1217f.) swooped down upon Jerusalem. Though numerically weak they seized the reactionaries' leaders and plundered their possessions. They served, as it seemed to the Chronicler, the plan of Divine Providence in swiftly punishing the sinner in this life. Joash himself (2425-27) finally met with retribution—disease in his lifetime, assassination at the hands of his foreign or semi-foreign court-officials, and, after his death, deprivation of a place in the dynastic mausoleum. Truth and religion, as it seemed to the Chronicler, had, after all, triumphed—as, indeed, in the long run they must, though not necessarily as speedily or as mechanically as the Chronicler imagined.

CHAPTER XXV

Amaziah, the Eighth King (796-789 B.C.). See 2 Kings 141-22. The Chronicler's important additions to the story of Kings are chiefly confined to its fuller description of the Edomite war (vv. 5-13). He sought once more to illustrate the truths which he had so much at heart: (a) the need for abstention from all relations with the Samaritans (vv. 6, 7); (b) the dire results of having even business relations with them (v. 13); (c) faith in God, and God only (vv. 8, 9), who, indeed, rewards such faith in him by granting victory to the man of faith (vv. 11, 12); (d) the danger of temptation assailing a man, thus rewarded for his faith, so that he falls subsequently into unbelief and sin, even into defiance of God's spokesman specially commissioned to warn him of his sin (vv. 14-16); and (e) the certainty of punishment in this life for those who yield to this temptation (vv. 17-24).

CHAPTER XXVI

Uzziah, the Ninth King (789-740 B.C.). See 2 Kings 15:1-7, where Uzziah is called Azariah, but cf. vv. 13 and 30. This reign, in spite of the growing power of Assyria, was one of the utmost prosperity. This prosperity the Chronicler ascribed to Uzziah's obedience to the heavenly vision as revealed by Zechariah. 6-15. Here is contained valuable information, not otherwise extant, as to Uzziah's military successes over the Philistines and certain Arabians, his vassalship over the Ammonites, and the material prosperity of his realm. 16-21. The story of Uzziah's priestly act at the altar of incense is introduced by the Chronicler to explain the reason for his tragic physical suffering. But it is also valuable as showing that, even as late as the eighth century, B.C., the reigning monarch still claimed the privilege and duty of acting as head priest in the Temple (cf. notes to 6:1-42).

CHAPTER XXVII

Jotham, the Tenth King (740-735 B.C.). See 2 Kings 15:32-38. The notices in vv. 3-6, probably from ancient sources, of his building operations and success over the Ammonites, have been preserved for us only by the Chronicler.

CHAPTER XXVIII

Ahaz, the Eleventh King (735-726 B.C.). See 2 Kings 16:1-20. The Chronicler utilized both the narrative of Kings (which he considerably modified) and other available information in order to emphasize the doctrines for the propagation of which he had already contended in his record of previous reigns. Thus Ahaz's idolatry (vv. 2-4) is brought into immediate relation to its punishment not by a combined attack of the Syro-Ephraimites (as in Kings), but by the inroads first of Syria and then of the Northern Kingdom (vv. 5-7). 9-15. He emphasized the value of the intervention of heaven-sent prophets; Oded this time carried conviction even to the (in the Chronicler's estimation, godless) Samaritans. 16-19. The Chronicler emphasized too the divine purpose of chastisement in the inroads of the Edomites (cf. 2 Kings 16:6) and Philistines. 20-25. To these divine warnings Ahaz reacted, not with repentance and contrition, but—so the Chronicler interprets Ahaz's motives—by committing the further sins of calling in the aid of Assyria, of adopting the religion and cults of Syria (not merely a Syrian altar, as in 2 Kings 16:10-16), and even of interdicting the worship of Jehovah and restoring the baser types of local sanctuary worship. Thus in Ahaz the Chronicler exemplifies how a man who has erred and has been divinely warned as to his conduct may refuse the divine discipline and persist in defying God: in 33:1-20 he illustrates how another may heed the divine warning and so find spiritual refreshment and a return of material prosperity.

CHAPTERS XXIX-XXXII

Hezekiah, the Twelfth King (726-697 B.C.). See 2 Kings 18-20. In contrast to the apostasy of his predecessor, this king is envisaged by the Chronicler as a much more thoroughgoing reformer than in Second Kings, a reformer after the Chronicler's own heart.

Ch. 29. Hezekiah, for instance, reopened the Temple doors and called on priests and Levites alike (see note to 1 Chr. 13:1-5) to resume their faithful service.

Ch. 30. He kept the Passover, just as 2 Kings 23:21-23 recounts that Josiah afterward did, but, unlike the latter, he invited to it all Israel and observed it for two weeks.

Ch. 31. The celebrations culminated (v. 1) in an iconoclastic orgy. Priests and Levites (see note to 1 Chr. 13:1-5), encouraged to perform their respective offices, now received their due support as they did in the Chronicler's own day (vv. 2-21). This may not be history, but, sympathetically read, it makes an appeal to the modern reader as being the daydream, the unceritcal but none the less truly devout and mystical imagining, of one for whom the Temple was the gate of heaven, its clergy the earthly counterparts of God's own heavenly temple, and its festivals and sacraments the outward yet effective signs of a real spiritual grace.

Ch. 32. See on 2 Kings 18:13-1937; cf. Isa. 36:1-37:38.

CHAPTER XXXIII

1-20. Manasseh, the Thirteenth King (697-641 B.C.). See 2 Kings 21:1-18. 11. It is to the Chronicler alone that we are indebted for two exceedingly probable and enlightening items of information—Manasseh's rebellion against Assyria and his journey to Babylon to make obedience to his conquerer. The historicity of these statements has been questioned on several grounds. But his name occurs in lists of tributary vassals both of Esarhaddon (681–668 B.C.) and of Ashurbanipal (668–626 B.C.). Moreover, in the latter's reign parts of Palestine are known to have been in revolt against that monarch and to have supported the rebellion of the viceroy of Babylon, the Assyrian king's brother. At Babylon, moreover, as the Chronicler here states, and not merely at Nineveh (as might have been expected since it, not Babylon, was the capital of Assyria), this monarch, according to inscriptional evidence, did indeed receive the obedience of his vassals. Lastly, Manasseh, in having his life and kingdom spared to him (vv. 12, 13), received no greater boon than did Necho I of Egypt. Hence the probabilities are in favor of rather than against the tradition that Manasseh rebelled and made his submission at Babylon.

Interesting as they are to the archæologist and the critical historian, these historical questions occupied for the Chronicler a very subordinate, if any, place in his interests. For him, not the events themselves, but their religious significance, as that was interpreted in his own day, constituted the vital issue. Fortunate indeed was Manasseh if his adventure really involved for his own spiritual experience even a small part of what the Chronicler found in its results—resort to prayer, repentance, contrition, forgiveness, amendment, restitution. Fortunate too is every man who can see and realize these results as he reviews his own life-history, his own mental and emotional development, and his own spiritual and mystical experience and can express himself as Manasseh is made to do in The Prayer of Manasses preserved in the Apocrypha. (See art., Intertestamental Literature, p. 193b.)

21–25. Amon, the Fourteenth King (641–639 B.C.). See 2 Kings 21^{19–26}.

CHAPTERS XXXIV, XXXV

Josiah, the Fifteenth King (639–608 B.C.). See 2 Kings 22^{1–23³⁰}. The occasion, and even the immediate cause, of the vitally important reformation of his eighteenth year was doubtless the finding of the Lawbook (2 Kings 22^{3f.}). But the ultimate causes must be looked for in the teaching of the great writing prophets, in their disciples' faithful preaching of those prophets' message, and in the predisposition of Josiah himself, probably from earliest boyhood, toward the realities of the spiritual life. This last was fully realized by the Chronicler; indeed he overemphasized it. In the narrative before us, not in his mind simply, but even in official actions, the young king, when only twelve years old, is made by the Chronicler ruthlessly to embark on the task of reformation—a task gigantic in itself and so momentous in its effects upon the later development of this nation's religion and, through it, on that of two thirds of the world to-day.

Once again the Chronicler lays himself open to the charge of being an uncritical historian; but as a psychologist he triumphs. Sudden conversion after adolescence does not more easily or more usually produce the balanced judgment and the inner self-dedication necessary alike for an individual's own spiritual development, and for his leadership in a nation's religious evolution, than does a childhood of piety and an adolescence of pure and holy thoughts fixed on God and unerringly devoted to ideals of service to humanity. The boy, thus self-dedicated to God and his fellow men, at twelve years of age is as likely to serve both, and do so as whole-heartedly as he whose ideals have remained undeveloped and undirected till the manifold calls and interests of manhood have well-nigh usurped the place which those higher ideals would otherwise have occupied. The story will have a real message for to-day and a blessing for posterity if, in addition to acting as a trumpet call to have done with mediæval superstitions and to spread a more spiritual and pure type of religion and morality, it drives home, in the form in which the Chronicler gives it, the desirability of our children being educated from their earliest days in religious knowledge, and that based on no reactionary presuppositions. It must be based on the results of the most modern biblical criticism and of the most recent ethical and moral conceptions of God, who himself will thus be revealed to the next generation more clearly and more fully than to any which will have gone before.

CHAPTER XXXVI

1–4. Jehoahaz, the Sixteenth King (608 B.C.). See 2 Kings 23^{31–35}.

5–8. Jehoiakim, the Seventeenth King (608–597 B.C.). See notes to 2 Kings 23^{36–24⁷}. "Nebuchadrezzar" is a more correct form than Nebuchadnezzar.

9, 10. Jehoiachin, the Eighteenth King (597 B.C.). See notes to 2 Kings 24^{8–17} 25²⁷ Jer. 52³¹ and cf. 1 Chr. 31^{1f.} for his descendants. Chronicles increases the length of his reign by ten days and puts his accession in his eighth year.

11–21. Zedekiah, the Nineteenth and Last King of Judah (597–586 B.C.). See notes to 2 Kings 24^{18–25⁷}.

22, 23. The Decree of Cyrus. Cf. Ezra 11-3a. Just as Second Kings closes with a message of optimism and hope for the future, so the Chronicler's work as it now stands hints at a brighter future. The story of that future, as told by the Chronicler, now appears divorced from First and Second Chronicles in the books of Ezra and Nehemiah. The Compiler of Kings envisaged a restoration of the Davidic dynasty in Jehoiachin and his descendants: the Chronicler lived sufficiently late to see that, though David's dynasty no longer held the throne, David's spiritual creation, the Temple, was once more the spot where men might find David's God and offer up their adoration to Him to whom David had said, in words that have since become classic, "All things come from thee and of thine own do we give thee."

EZRA AND NEHEMIAH

BY PROFESSOR ROBERT W. ROGERS

INTRODUCTION

A Priestly History. There are many ways of apprehending or of accepting and explaining human ideas about God, and many ways also of teaching men about him. In the beautiful pages of the O.T. three of these ways stand out prominently, represented respectively by Priests, Prophets, and Wise Men. The reader who has not met already examples of these three has not yet read widely in this volume of popular presentation and interpretation of the O.T. If he has read Leviticus and Numbers, with considerable portions of Exodus, he has seen the priestly method of teaching about God and his relations with men. On the other side of the picture, he who reads Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, and the Twelve Minor Prophets has the prophetic approach to the divine before his eyes, and then in Joshua, Judges, Samuel, and Kings he may read the prophetic view of history. In Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, and Job he will have before his delighted and interested eyes the thoughts of the Wise Men. Besides these greater and more comprehensive expressions of the three types of teachers, he will find many other examples of their work in other books. Thus in Genesis and Exodus he will find both priestly and prophetic teaching, and in the Psalms all three may often be followed, and in yet other books are here and there evidences of effort to bring men to God by any means. There still remain, however, for comment here, a most important collection of books which represent distinctly and insistently the priestly way of looking at the history of Israel.

During the Exile in Babylonia from 597 and 586 to 537 B.C., the priests who were earnestly seeking to save the Jews from dangerous contacts with the religion there in vogue were busily assembling, compiling, and preserving records and traditions of their people. They had the book of Deuteronomy, largely a prophetic book, and much of the material now in Joshua, Judges, Samuel, and Kings, together with many other bits of writing or of memorial tradition, and as they read it all over it was easy for them to see how much of it represented the prophetic viewpoint. Here were the prophets in complete possession of narrative history. "Why," said they among themselves, "why not a narrative history after the priestly way of thought?" See how Robertson Smith states their case: "Thus there seemed to be room for a new history, which should confine itself to matters still interesting to the theocracy of Zion, keeping Jerusalem and the Temple in the foreground, and developing the divine pragmatism of history, not so much with reference to the prophetic word as to the fixed legislation of the Pentateuch, so that the whole narrative might be made to teach that the glory of Israel lies in the observance of the divine law and ritual."

So did it come about that during the Exile and long afterward, as men brooded earnestly over these things, some men or men must finally begin the writing. The final product was Chronicles, Ezra, and Nehemiah. These were, I think, all one book, composed originally by the one set of hands, whether of one man or of several men. To understand Ezra and Nehemiah you ought first to read very carefully Chronicles, first by yourself and then with the aid of Professor Simpson's commentary on Chronicles in this volume. You should, however, do some work of your own. You will find (see p. 439a) in Simpson's commentary the evidence of the use which the Chronicler made of Samuel and Kings, and he will have set down for you (see p. 439b) lists of passages which show how and wherein the compiler of Chronicles has supplied materials of his own not found in the earlier books. But though you see and even read some of these, it will mean nothing of value to you unless you make some real effort to make the comparison for yourself. Long ago the lamented Professor Driver, whose pupil Professor Simpson was, told us how this should be done. He said: "The reader who desires properly to understand the method and point of view of the Chronicler should mark in his Revised Version—by underlining in the case of simple words or verses, and by drawing a line along the margin in the case of longer passages—these and the other passages peculiar to him. He will then soon discover that they have a character of their own, in language and expression, not less than in subject matter, which differentiates them materially from the parts transferred unaltered from Samuel or Kings." There precisely is the way to come to some understanding of the difference between a prophetic and a priestly view of Israel's history. He who would do that would have some knowledge that was really his own. And now do this in some measure, and read the books of Chronicles through and accompany the reading with Simpson's commentary. When you have done this you will be ready to begin your study of Ezra and Nehemiah.

You will then have learned that Chronicles-Ezra-Nehemiah, all forming one book, were probably written somewhere between 300 and 250 B.C., and that Ezra-Nehemiah were severed from the rest and received into the canon of Sacred Scripture, but that a dispute arose among the learned men of Judaism, and the books of Chronicles had a sore struggle to pass through before they were so admitted. This explains the reason why Chronicles is the last book in the Hebrew Bible, and is preceded by Ezra and Nehemiah, though the proper sequence of historical events would require the order to be Chronicles, then Ezra, and last of all Nehemiah. There are many haphazard strokes in the long process of the writing and compiling and canonizing of the sacred books. When we consider the long stretches of the years and remember the vagaries of men we shall have no excuse for surprise. The Bible is clearly not only a divine book, but also a human book. Let us not over-emphasize either of these two readily recognizable sides of its form and contents. God has spoken to men in these books, but he has spoken to them through men, and so though the books come into our hands trailing clouds of heavenly glory, they come also well sprinkled with earthly dust.

The Two Heroes. The two heroes of Ezra and Nehemiah are these two men. Let us see how we may place them historically, both in the order of time and in their several peculiarities, in their character and in their work. They represent two orders in the religion of Israel which are not found in the early days, for Ezra is a scribe and Nehemiah a statesman. The former corresponds in some respects to the priests of earlier days, but in other respects is very different from them, so different as justly to be placed in a separate category. The latter fulfills some of the functions of a king in the earlier days, for he was the governor of his people. Yet is he different, for though some of the kings were indeed under foreign domination, as, e.g., Hoshea under the Assyrian king Tiglath-pileser III and Zedekiah under the Chaldean king Nebuchadrezzar, still these had some authority of their own, while Nehemiah was governor only and entirely under Persian appointment. There was no longer an Israelite or Jewish state even nominally independent. The position of governor we find easy enough to understand, but perhaps a word about the office and work of the scribe may be useful to us in attempting to visualize Ezra in his proper person.

The Scribes. During the Exile there came slowly a great change in the religion of Israel. Slowly indeed, but surely the foundations were laid which transferred the people from the influence of the prophetic word spoken audibly into men's ears, into a nation bound to observe a rigid code of laws. The old freedom gave way before the new norm. Religion ceased gradually to be a communion with God, and became a walk, legally correct in all its details, according to a written standard. The simplicity of Deuteronomy, which, though it contains many laws, was yet prophetic in tone, was being supplanted, and in its place were coming the elaborate codes governing not merely the priest in his functions, but every act of everyday life. These fundamental laws we may now read in portions of Exodus and Numbers, and in still more elaborate and sustained form in Leviticus. But as men tried to observe these laws it soon became evident that difficulties of interpretation were continually springing up. Who should explain how the Law, in its letter, was to be interpreted when contradictions, or, at least, contra-indications seemed to appear between different passages? So to fill this new function there began slowly to arise a new order of men who sat during every hour that could be taken from their bread-earning laboriously poring over the sacred rolls of the books, comparing and contrasting laws, and carrying them forward to new uses by elaborate processes of deducing from them implied or supposedly implied new applications. These men were called Sopherim, or scribes, and soon formed themselves into a separate class. Ezra the scribe became the great exemplar of this new class. They who came after him did many things which he did not attempt, but he was their father in the Law, they were his sons, and in their eyes he became a splendid person. They became not merely editors and interpreters and expounders, but from them came pupils who were skilled in the copying of manuscripts, as we should say, calligraphists. The higher, abler, and more learned became jurists and gave themselves to the most elaborate expositions of Scripture. If we carry this story down into the Greek period, we shall there behold an elaborately organized separate order which had begun chiefly by recruits from priests and Levites but had drawn many devout laymen into their ranks. When Antiochus Epiphanes attempted to destroy the Jewish faith, martyrs were not wanting to cling to copies of the proscribed books, and their blood strengthened their ardor, and gave it a touch of heroism of which survivors might well be proud. After the Maccabees uprising they were accorded seats in the Sanhedrin as a separate class, and thereafter became more exclusive, opinionated, and determined in their zeal for the Law. They seem largely then to have become Pharisees, but there are hints enough to connect some of them with the Sadducees. In the N.T. period they had become avid of praise and of public and private honor. They were addressed as Rabbi, which meant, literally, "my Lord," but came to mean technically "my Master" or "my Teacher," and under that fine old title they wrapped themselves in honor and demanded it for themselves and commended its extension to their pupils. "Let the honor of thy disciple be dear unto thee as the honor of thy associate; and the honor of thy associate as the fear of thy master; and the fear of thy master as the fear of heaven" (Sayings of the Fathers—Pirke Aboth, iv, 17). They were sometimes addressed as Rabban, or Rabboni, which means "master and father," and placed themselves above the claims of family. If one's own father and one's own teacher were in any trouble or distress, the teacher must first have assistance.

As members of the Sanhedrin they had come into a quasi-judicial capacity, which they did not possess in their earliest development, but even above this they had duties more wide reaching and even greater in importance. The first of these duties here to be mentioned was teaching. It was their business to raise up disciples, whose bounden duty it was first to commit to memory all that the teachers imparted, and, second, never to depart from a master's word no matter what might happen or ensue. In N.T. times the pupils sat on the ground and the rabbis on a bench, much as do the Mohammedan teachers to this day. Even more important than this function was the duty of so studying the Law as to be able to interpret its every rule or precept or admonition and to apply these to every possible occasion in life. As social life developed this was often very difficult. Sometimes the Law simply could not be stretched or interpreted to meet every new occasion. Then they had recourse to some saying of a former rabbi which might be elevated into a tradition and so be added to the general body of instruction. Here, then, were the beginnings of the Mishna, which would creep on by repeated accessions into the fearsome, awesome masses of the Talmud. The principles laid down by the men of the Great Synagogue for the scribes were three: "Be deliberate in judgment; and raise up many disciples; and make a fence to the Torah." This "making a fence to the Torah" meant the devising and expanding of legal precepts to such a point that if a man were devout and attempted to follow them, he would be so bound up by rules and regulations and traditions that he would not be tempted to break the fundamental law in even the slightest degree. This accumulating mass of traditions and interpretations and legal determinations was grouped together under the word Halachah, which means primarily "a going," hence "a way," then figuratively "custom," "usage," "rule." As it grew in mass, it grew in favor and in reverence so that it came to be placed with even the original Scriptures as divine and then was projected into the remote past. The rabbis began to talk about Moses as having been taught by God not only the written Law but also the oral law. Some of them still held that the written Law was supreme, this as a theory, but in practice they assigned a greater authority to their oral laws, expansions, developments, and decisions (see Mt. 15^{2f.} and Mk. 7^{5f.}). Edersheim (Life and Times of Jesus the Messiah, vol. i, p 97, footnote 5) quotes a rabbinic saying that, "An offense against the sayings of the scribes is worse than one against those of Scripture." "Scripture" here means the "Law," the five books of Moses; but if these were so treated, even with greater freedom did they handle the remaining sacred writings. They set forth the teaching of the other books in what is often translated "commentary," but really ought always to be known by its Hebrew name Haggadah. This word is clear enough in its meaning to those who have long studied the Scriptures and the traditions in Hebrew, but it is not easily defined for the general reader. For the present purpose it will be better to define it by means of a description rather than by the use of some definite English word. By Haggadah the scribes, in practice, meant a writing which gave a doctrinal and practical expansion and exposition of the sacred text, not excluding fabulous embellishments. Haggadah began early to be manifested among the scribes, how early we do not know, but there were actual written specimens of it available when the Chronicler made his book, for he refers specifically to the Haggadah ("commentary" in R.V.) of the prophet Iddo (2 Chr. 13²²) and to the Haggadah ("commentary") of the book of the kings (2 Chr. 24²⁷). These may have been only small beginnings, but the harvest was great and evil in later days.

But the reader may now be saying to himself, "What has all this to do with Ezra?" The answer is that it has much to do with any estimate of his work and worth. A man must be judged not only by his work but by the consequences of it. As Ezekiel is justly to be declared the father of ecclesiastical Judaism, so Ezra must bear whatever of honor or of reproof belongs to him as the father of the whole wearisome system of "scribeism"—if there be such a word. He did not will or wish it, but he fathered its beginnings and the result is with us still. Our Lord loved it not, nor need we feel any strong impulse to do so. It had its uses, and its value for its own day, and some returns has it made to us because of its devotion to the Scriptures, and its care of them in dark days, but it is probably just to say that the evils it has brought exceed the good. Let us now turn more definitely to survey the man Ezra.

Ezra the Man and His Work. We have no knowledge of Ezra beyond what may be gleaned from the books of Ezra and Nehemiah, and what may from these be gleaned has more difficulties than may properly be raised in this commentary, to say nothing of any close discussion of them. We can do no more or better than to draw out before our eyes such few facts as may be reasonably regarded as significant or important and therewith be content. There is, to begin at the beginning, a very fanciful, imaginative, and artificial genealogy given of him (Ezra 7:1-6) which contains fifteen names of his supposed ancestors by which his line is carried back to Aaron. This is plainly an insufficient number to span one thousand years. By comparisons with the lists in Chronicles and in the apocryphal books of First and Second Esdras we can make up a list of thirty names, but one cannot but feel that the whole is artificial. Genealogies, whether ancient or modern, have a sad trick of following hopes rather than facts. When we come below to our little attempt to reconstruct the historical background of the books of Ezra and Nehemiah, we shall have a few words to say about Ezra's work, and there are other words in the commentary later to follow about his journey to Jerusalem and his work there. Let us here bring out an impression of the man rather than a biography in historical environment. It must be confessed at the outset that he is not a figure beloved among Christians in our age, nor is the book which bears his name a favorite book for devotional reading. His is, in general, a cold, austere figure, harsh in judgment and intensely severe and uncompromising in the execution of an imperious will. We must put forth a strong effort to excuse some of his deeds, and go back over his career with a fixed determination to judge him very generously, finding excuses for him in the spirit of his times. The book of Ezra is for the most part not inspiring reading, but there are two fine bits in it, and they are found written in 3:11-13 and 8:21, 22. I advise the reader to turn to them and take comfort from them. He will not find anything elsewhere in the book to match them. This unfavorable view of Ezra goes far back in the history of Judaism. When Ben Sira calls the roll of heroes in a passage of the highest beauty (Ecclesiasticus 49:11-13) at the beginning of the second century B.C., he mentions Zerubbabel, Jeshua, and Nehemiah, but gives no word to Ezra. In a later book (2 Macc. 11:36) there is much glorifying of Nehemiah, but no mention of Ezra. But when a later tradition got a good chance it magnified Ezra beyond all rime or reason. He became then the actual founder of the Great Synagogue and the father of the scribes. In the apocryphal Fourth Book of Ezra he is presented as a man who restored the Law and rewrote all the sacred records which had been destroyed, and produced seventy apocryphal works! Then to others he was the man who closed the sacred canon, though it was, indeed, not closed until long after his death. What remains of his own personal writing will come up for mention in the commentary below.

Nehemiah the Man and His Work. Pleasant indeed is it to turn from Ezra even at his best to the far more attractive figure of Nehemiah. He was quite human enough to have positive faults, but there is yet so much that is noble, and he displays so much generosity, faithfulness to high ideals, a splendid patriotism, and quickness in action, that the modern man feels at once a sympathy with him quite impossible with Ezra. If one were to read passages from Ezra in public, he would speedily see that he had a listless following, but there are whole chapters of the book of Nehemiah which make the average congregation or assembly straighten up and listen eagerly. The mind of the common man knows what it likes and shows no small amount of wisdom in the choice. In one point only does Nehemiah display an unlovely side much like that of Ezra. He was intense in his attempt against those who had contracted marriages outside the Jewish pale. This zeal of his finds a characteristic expression in the words, "And one of the sons of Joiada, the son of Eliashib the high priest, was son-in-law to Sanballat the Horonite: therefore I chased him from me" (Neh. 13:28). This proved in the sequel to have been a sad blunder, for it was a high contributing factor in the formation of the Samaritan religion destined long to be a thorn in the side of Judaism. It was a pitiful and cruel act to attempt to separate families many of them had founded years earlier. Here was a Hebrew who had married, quite innocently, a woman from a nearby village. She was a Canaanite, and had borne him three children. What rime or reason was there in Nehemiah's plan to say to this man, You must put her away—drive her out as was Hagar, with little Ishmael, driven out centuries earlier? Logic is good in its place, but forbearance is often better. To save Judaism it might be necessary to forbid any future mixed marriages, but to break up those already consummated was a horrible atrocity, and no amount of effort on our part to justify Nehemiah by an appeal to different customs in a different age should require us to justify these acts. The whole story besmirches his soul, disproves his possession of a sense of justice, and makes him, in this one particular, an intolerant monster. (This is great plainness of speech, let the reader bear it with whatever patience he may be able to command.)

But if this be a dark strain, the rest is nearly all good, clean, admirable, and the man otherwise a fine figure. He was a man of action, not only in the matters of social organization but equally in the physical affairs of his city. To him the city owed the reconstruction of its defensive external walls. He knew that a city in that age without walls might readily be the easy prey of some marauding tribe, or be conquered by an external enemy strong enough to snatch a bit of domain from the hand of the Persians, who now held it in what seemed to be a firm grip. He was too prudent to trust to future contingencies the exigencies of the present. He knew that hostile neighbors were near by and that none knew when signs of weakness among Jerusalem's leaders would encourage them to attack. He therefore made provision that even the men who worked on reconstruction should be armed with weapons and be ready to stand their ground and hold by force their own just possessions. There is a lesson here we do well to heed.

The Historical Background. It is idle to attempt to secure either knowledge or intellectual pleasure from the reading of the books of Ezra and Nehemiah without some attempt to reconstruct by the use of historical and archaeological and critical methods the age in which the men lived. If to this knowledge we are able to call into service the priceless help of imagination, we shall then see them working in their own environment, and understand them far better. But to do this we must go back over a long and tumultuous stretch of history, the earlier part of which needs but little exposition, the latter part much.

1. The Exile and the Restoration. Let us remind ourselves that in 597 B.C. Nebuchadrezzar carried out of Jerusalem to be exiles in Babylonia eight thousand of its people. Among these was the aristocratic and very able figure of Ezekiel, who in 593 was called to be a prophet and was thenceforward quick to do his utmost to save his people from disintegration, and from absorption not merely into the economic but even into the religious situation in Babylonia. In 586 B.C. Nebuchadrezzar's army again besieged Jerusalem and carried thence to join the other band of exiles a larger company, who may have numbered forty-eight thousand, or perhaps even more. Here, then, in far distant Babylonia was a considerable Jewish colony, with representatives of every grade of society—artisans, farmers, city workers, and men of affairs, men of skill, men of knowledge, men of deep piety. The process of adjustment was neither easy nor quick, but in due time it was accomplished. Few races have ever inhabited this earth with more of a mixed endowment of industry, capacity, power of accommodation, patience, and skill in husbanding resources and of saving returns in money or other valuables. Some of them rose to power and to financial influence, and to their skill the great banking houses of Egibi and Murashu bear eloquent witness.

They were in Babylonia when one of the greatest events of ancient history came to pass. Beyond the borders of the great valley of the Tigris and Euphrates there was in process of formation a new empire. A man named Cyrus, born in an obscure province known as Anshan, or Anzan, in 559 B.C., became its king. and in 550 conquered Astyages, king of the Median empire, and annexed to himself this domain. Cyrus was now the chief ruler of Asia, and in it had only two rivals: far away beyond the River Halys in Asia Minor, was Croesus, king of Lydia; and near at hand was Nabonidus, king of Babylon, a doctrinaire prince and far from any equality with this new and virile conqueror. In 546 B.C. the kingdom of Lydia fell into the hands of Cyrus, and in 538 Babylon was likewise taken. The Jews in Exile had seen or heard a shift in human history unparalleled before, the making of the greatest empire the world had seen up to that time, and all within little more than twenty years.

In 537 B.C. Cyrus issued a decree permitting all the Jewish exiles who wished to do so to return to their homeland. The news must have run like wildfire, and have imparted a shock comparable only to a bolt of lightning.

The devout and God-fearing who had heard or read the promises of the prophets may well have felt that dreams had become realities and prophecies fulfillments beyond compare. But permission to return was not compulsion to return, and the problem then set for the Jews was not easy. We must remember that the Jews in Babylonia were now divided into three clearly marked classes: (1) Some had been carried away in 597 B.C. They had now been fifty-nine or sixty years in Babylonia and all were now old; even those who were boys of ten or twelve years of age were about seventy years or above it. Some of them would be too old for the long, hard journey or unfit to face the struggle needed to gain a foothold in the old land of which they could have only shadowy memories. (2) Others carried away in 586 B.C. had been now forty-eight or forty-nine years in Babylonia. In that time they had founded homes, earned a livelihood, learned the language, and were in many respects Babylonians; and some of them had married Babylonian wives, adopted the civilization about them, and even had adopted the religious ideas and were following the worship of their neighbors. (3) There was still another and a very large class composed of those who were born of Jewish parents in Babylonia. They knew Palestine only by hearsay, and if they had met with success in business, would hardly be eager to go to a strange land, however much their fathers had loved it. When the decree was issued there would arise a serious question as to how many might seize the opportunity and who they might be. It seems a fairly safe conjecture that few of the first class would attempt the enterprise; and if they were willing, could hardly be regarded as valuable settlers—nay, they might even be a burden rather than an asset. Perhaps few of the third class would wish to go, and might need much pressure to induce them to undertake it. This, then, would leave the attempt chiefly to the second class. However that may be, the number that did actually return fell far short of expectation. How many they were we do not know, for the lists that have been preserved show wide divergence in the numbers, as the commentary to follow shows clearly enough. They who went were confronted with serious problems. The glories which the prophets had foreseen were elusive or undiscoverable. The lands which they or their fathers had owned had long since passed into other hands, and they must buy new property out of whatever means they had brought from Babylonia, or set themselves with the proverbial diligence and prudence of their race to make such livelihood as was possible. It must be a process of peaceful penetration much like that which their remote forefathers had carried out in many cases in the days of Joshua and his successors. The people whom Nebuchadnezzar had left behind in 586 had done nothing to rebuild the Temple or to restore the city walls. They had been a poor folk indeed; the energetic and enterprising were exiled, and they who remained were content to live humbly and put forth no great effort to emulate the greater deeds of their fathers. To those who now returned to join them the city must have presented a sorry sight. There lay the ruins of the Temple, still blackened here and there by the fire of long ago. The city walls were little more than ragged and jagged heaps of debris. Where were the hopes and dreams of the prophets? What could they now do? Their answer was that they must first provide housing for their families who would need shelter in a climate by no means bland, but, rather, often fierce and dangerous with wet and cold. They must lay the foundations of an ordered economic life, then something more and better might be secured. Whether they all knew it or not the gravest problem before them was the question, What could be or should be done about the Temple? There lay its ruins as Nebuchadnezzar had left them, and no man for fifty years had set hand and heart to the work of restoration.

2. Rebuilding of the Temple. It is fully established by the experience of the ages that no religion can exist and propagate without some visible place of assembly. There must be a meetinghouse, a church, a synagogue, or a temple. If they provided nothing of the sort, Judaism must die. They were confronted with the prospect of a real tragedy, not for them only but for all succeeding generations—nay, for us also. One might have supposed that whatever the motive or the reasoning, they would surely make an attempt at this imperative need. But they did not. There is justification enough for not undertaking any enterprise so great, but it is a sorry commentary on human weakness of will and lack of even ordinary foresight that they did so little. What they actually did was to set up the altar of burnt sacrifice. This was, indeed, something, some recognition of the just claims of the human heart for worship. But it was hopelessly insufficient. It was only a stop gap, and had really the effect of satisfying some scruples, and then they sank back into a dangerous content. So the years slipped by. They built homes, rude enough in the beginning, but soon made comfortable and then even embellished. Their religion was in grave danger. Sixteen years of religious inaction followed, and in September, 520 B.C., and then on into the following January, a new prophet, Haggai by name, preached four little discourses urging action. His efforts were seconded by another prophet, Zechariah, and at once the work began. In four years the Temple was finished. It was not so large, so imposing, so richly adorned as had been Solomon's Temple, but it sufficed to save the faith. We have been following affairs in Palestine, let us now turn quickly to see what was going on in Babylonia during these fateful years.

3. The Persian Rule. Cyrus reigned from 558-528 B.C. and was succeeded by his son Cambyses, who lacked, indeed, many of the qualities of his father, but was nevertheless no mean king, and even added Egypt to his empire, which had now become the largest the world had known up to that day. But Cambyses lacked entirely the wisdom of Cyrus, and departed seriously from his generous treatment of conquered peoples. His life ended in a cloud, whether by his own hand, as has been reported, or not. His successor, Darius I, justly called Darius the Great (521-485 B.C.), was in administrative capacity greater, so far as we can see, than any king in any Oriental land before his day. It was he who organized what Cyrus had won, and Cambyses had left in disorder, and to him quite as much as to Cyrus is due the praise of men in his age for combining power and order with a considerable amount of peace. His successor was Xerxes I (485-465 B.C.), whose fame to us rests chiefly upon his fortunately unsuccessful attempt to conquer Greece, which failed by his defeat at Salamis in 480 and at Platea in 479 B.C. This is here mentioned that we may connect in our minds the history of Greece with the O.T. history, for Greece is the foundation of our western culture, and the roots of N.T. doctrine are in the Hebrew thought and life.

The next king of Persia was Artaxerxes I, surnamed Macrocheir, Longimanus, "long hand," because his right hand was longer than his left (465-425 B.C.). He was a man well fitted, on the whole, for his great task. He held together by force widely separated provinces such as Bactria on the east and Egypt on the west, and so postponed for a time the downfall of the empire, which was certain to ensue in later days. During his reign, the Jews who had been carried away in 586 and had not accepted the permission to return home in 537, continued to live peaceably in his empire and especially in Babylonia. Many of them had become prosperous and there must have been men of considerable wealth among them. Some had reached posts of honor and of emolument in the empire, but with one distinguished exception their names have perished. This may well be due, in large measure at least, to the widespread habit of adopting other names either distinctively Persian or at least not clearly Jewish. To this the Jews in all ages have often been compelled by persecution or by artificial difficulties made and provided to stem their prosperity. Nor, as we know, has this device ceased to produce examples in many lands even in our own day.

Among the Jews in Babylonia were two men whose names have been preserved, Ezra and Nehemiah, and, yet more important, portions of memoirs of their own deeds and works remain in the composite book Ezra-Nehemiah which the Chronicler has rescued and copied. For this service only he deserves deep and abiding gratitude, and for it others of his all too obvious faults in recounting the past may well be forgiven.

4. Return under Ezra. To Ezra and to Nehemiah there had been coming from Palestine reports of the conditions there prevailing, to which story we have been making reference above. To an emotional man like Nehemiah the intelligence was distressing and he was anxious to give some help or inspiration to men who were obviously in a sad plight. Yet the opportunity came first to Ezra. In the seventh year of Artaxerxes (458 B.C.) he secured a royal decree of broad and generous compass which gave him permission to visit his people in Jerusalem. He gathered in Babylonia fifteen hundred compatriots who had resolved to cast in their lot with the restoration. They set out from Babylon and made a rendezvous at Ahava, a Babylonian district on a river of the same name. Neither the place nor the river has been identified, but they must have been near the capital city. A stay of three days made some organization possible, and permitted the making of provision for defense against possible attempts at robbery on the journey. Ezra might well have had a guard of soldiers, but he was ashamed to ask for them, "because we had spoken unto the king, saying, The hand of our God is upon all them that seek him, for good; but his power and his wrath is against all them that forsake him. So we fasted and besought our God for this: and he was entreated of us" (Ezra 8:22, 23). In this there was a touch of fanaticism, for the taking of the ordinary and usual precautions would not in the least have dishonored God or made prayer to him for protection unnecessary. He who prays for his daily bread is not thereby dispensed from taking every effort to earn it.

Ezra's company numbered fifteen hundred and ninety-six men, besides some priests, and he was bearing rich offerings to the Temple at Jerusalem not only from his own people but even from the king himself (Ezra 8²⁵⁻²⁷). His caravan would have been a rich prize for some of the wandering tribes of the desert, but the long and very difficult journey was made successfully, and on the twelfth day of the seventh month (Tishri, October) the caravan entered the city. It must have awakened great enthusiasm, but many who rejoiced then quite probably were cheerless afterward when they had experienced the heavy hand of this new master. His first move was against mixed marriages, and many and cruel were the hardships then caused, of which in the case of Nehemiah there is some discussion above. This would very probably produce much irritation and would doubtless rouse local opposition to any other measure which he might propose. He had another and larger purpose and the long delay in beginning it is still a puzzle to our minds. The uproar over the marriage question may have been one factor in his waiting, but he who acted with so great severity in this may have been equally severe or autocratic in other matters. Whatever the cause, he was slow to act upon what would seem to have been his supreme desire. From Babylonia he had brought with him a roll of the Law, a great body of religious practice and order which now forms a large part of the Pentateuch. The people in Palestine, insofar as they were maintaining the worship of Jehovah, were continuing the order found in the book of Deuteronomy. Ezra was bringing a far more elaborate liturgical law, which had been compiled and arranged in Babylonia, which he undoubtedly hoped would have great value in intensifying religious zeal, in increasing devotion, enriching the forms of worship, and in the quickening of the spiritual life. But he delayed, hesitated, and perhaps was waiting a more auspicious occasion.

5. Return under Nehemiah. While Ezra was busily engaged with reforms, whether wise and necessary or foolish and precipitate, help of distinguished character and of the highest value was preparing in the east. In the winter of 445-444 B.C. the Persian court was in Susa, the ancient capital of Elam. There in a position of honor and influence was a Jew named Nehemiah, who is called cup-bearer to the king, but we know nothing of any office with such a title and can only draw the inference that he was in some way one of the king's ministers. From Jerusalem there returned a company of Jews, among whom was Hanani, own brother or near relative of Nehemiah. When questioned he gave a sorry report of the conditions in the Holy City. Nehemiah was overwhelmed and "sat down and wept, and mourned certain days; and I fasted and prayed before the God of heaven" (Neh. 1^{4f.}). He wished to return to Jerusalem to give help, and to inspire the people to make some effort. Four months passed before he saw a favorable opportunity of laying before the king the troubles of his people and the anxieties of his own heart. But when he finally laid the case before the king he found immediate acceptance of his plea. The king gave him four months leave of absence, with permission to go to Jerusalem, and undertake its reconstruction. He was strengthened by letters to the Persian governors west of the Euphrates, and to Asaph, keeper of the royal forest, to supply timber for the gates of the city wall and of the Temple. These letters to the governors would serve much as passports do now, and the gift of wood would be highly appreciated by a people who were poor enough to need it. Unlike Ezra, Nehemiah set out with an armed escort provided by the king, traveled unmolested, and reached Jerusalem in safety. For three days he studied the situation and then made a night inspection of the city walls. The story of this night ride, admirably and eloquently told, has captured the imagination and touched the heart of later ages.

Having arrived at a conclusion, he summoned the people, and in burning words laid before them the state of their city. Aroused by him, they took quick resolve to begin work upon the walls. All Jerusalem was roused to action, and far away from the city swept enthusiasm until men came to work from Jericho, Tekoa, Gibeon, Mizpah, Zanoah, and Keilah. It was a veritable outburst of a new national spirit. To the hard manual labor came many previously unaccustomed to it. Here were priests and Levites, goldsmiths and perfumers, even rulers of districts. A masterful man and a master of men had come and they were willing to accept his bidding and do his will. But the difficulties were many. Sanballat and Tobiah, old enemies of the Jewish people, assisted by one Geshem, or Goshem, of an Arabian tribe, sought to stop the work by getting word to the king that these were rebels against his authority, probably insinuating that they were rebuilding the city walls that they might use them against any troops he might send. When this failed they tried ridicule. Tobiah scoffed at the work they were doing, declaring it to be too weak to be of any value as a defense, saying,

"Even that which they build, if a jackal (mg.) go up, he shall break down their stone wall" (Neh. 43). Nevertheless, "the people had a mind to work" (Neh. 46). Ridicule having failed, Sanballat determined upon sterner measures. He raised a force of Arabians, Ammonites, and Ashdodites and planned a secret advance and a sudden attack. Nehemiah was prepared, and had even his workers armed. When Sanballat saw this situation he gave over the plan of assault and undertook a sort of siege. As Nehemiah was acting under royal decree, Sanballat had now made himself a rebel against Persia, which might end in a very uncomfortable situation.

The next move of Sanballat was a shrewd attempt to induce Nehemiah to enter upon a conference with him. Nehemiah refused. Then Sanballat tried a threat, declaring that there were rumors abroad that Nehemiah was seeking to make himself a king, and that he would do well to take steps to clear himself. Nehemiah decided to take the risk of a possible misunderstanding in Persia. These were difficulties enough to try even a strong man's soul. But there were dangers also among his own people. There were so-called prophets ready to act the traitor against the greatest leader whom these times had produced. The name of only one of these miscreants has been preserved, Shemaiah (Neh. 6¹⁰), but there were surely some others, and perhaps even many of them.

In spite of all these forms of opposition, the policies of Nehemiah went steadily forward. The walls were reconstructed, the gates framed, and the city was again fit to be called a city according to the standards of that age. The time occupied in all this hard labor with the hands and struggle with enemies within and without cannot now be certainly learned. The mention of fifty and two days (Neh. 6¹⁵) as the time consumed in the restoration of the wall is obscure because the year is not mentioned. Josephus gives two years and four months as the period of rebuilding, while Ewald has made an ingenious computation and offers the conjecture of five years, which seems none too much. The completion was celebrated with much acclaim, with two processions marching round the circuit in opposite directions, with Ezra at the head of one and Nehemiah of the other (Neh. 12⁴³).

The way was now fully prepared for Ezra's work of introducing the new code of laws which he had brought from Babylonia. With all pomp and dignified ceremonial the book was read in the ears of the people (Neh. 8-10). This was the book now commonly called the Priest Codex, with which were combined them and soon after other and earlier writings to form the Pentateuch—a book surpassed by none in all the history of literature when judged by the influence which it has exerted; for three great religions have their roots in it—Judaism, Christianity, and Mohammedanism. The people accepted it by popular acclaim and at once set about the introduction of its ceremonial provisions. This began a new era among the Jewish people; henceforth they were to be the people of a book, and not men attending upon the spoken word of the prophet. The prophet must decrease, while the scribe, the lawyer, the interpreter of a written Law, must increase. Ezra and Nehemiah had worked well together, each doing his own share in accordance with his own genius and qualifications, Nehemiah in political affairs and Ezra in morals and religion. Ezra's work would far outlast Nehemiah's, for the state would perish, but the book live on. (See art., Pentateuch, pp. 138-141.)

Nehemiah had proved well his right to be the governor of his people, to which office Artaxerxes had appointed him. He must now return to Persia to render account of his stewardship. There are unhappily some chronological difficulties which must be discussed in the commentary below. He left his province in a far better state than he had found it. But when his strong hand was removed, new difficulties and troubles, mostly internal, appeared. The Temple precincts were profaned (Neh. 13^{4f.}); the Levites did not receive their lawful dues and had to seek a livelihood in the fields (Neh. 13¹⁰; cf. Mal. 37-12); the laws of Sabbath-keeping were violated; mixed marriages began again. It seemed as though the whole new structure of political and religious life so carefully set on foot was about to fall into pieces. The situation called loudly for the personal presence of Nehemiah, and in the year 433 B.C. he returned again to Jerusalem ready for vigorous measures of repression and of reorganization. He had no mock modesty; he knew his worth and fearlessly made mention of it. He concluded his labors with the bold words, "Remember me, O my God, for good" (Neh. 13³¹). So ends our story of the background in history and of the work of Ezra and Nehemiah.

The Sources of the Books. It has been stated that we owe these books for their compilation and preparation to the Chronicler, from whose hand or hands came also the two books of Chronicles. It needs only that we here mention so far as known the materials which he used. His sources may be briefly enumerated here, and there will be some further hints and explanations.

(1) The Memoirs of Ezra, from which there were certain portions extracted verbatim, as, e.g., Ezra 7²⁷. 81-36 and 91-15, and these are of priceless value to us. Besides this he used the same source for material without making verbal extracts as in 712-26. Furthermore, he took still other portions and worked them over in his own way and in his own style.

(2) The Memoirs of Nehemiah. From these he has made verbatim extracts, as Neh. 11-75 and 134-31, and, as in the case of Ezra, utilized other portions, turning them over for his own special purposes.

(3) Temple Records. In the accounts of the building of the Temple there seems to be evidence of the use of some record or records which may have been preserved in the Temple precincts and made available. The passages which particularly suggest this are Ezra 46-23 and 51-615. Furthermore, in the list of the heads of families, both priestly and levitical (Neh. 121-26), we may presumably conjecture that these also came from records preserved in the Temple.

(4) Doubtful Sources. There must have been much material derived from sources no longer in existence and not now to be differentiated or surmised by us.

Literature. In the case of Ezra and Nehemiah, as in that of every other book, the only sure method is to begin with repeated reading of the books in the R.V. He who will do this will have a reward to be secured in no other way. Reading and re-reading and reading again is the only way to gain familiarity. So, and so only, are supposed difficulties and obscurities removed, and then the real difficulties stand out clearly and we are ready to ask for help looking toward their solution. When this has been done and this commentary has done all that may justly be expected of it, the real student is ready for something larger and better. But he will now be confronted with a disappointment, for the literature available to those who read only English is not so extensive as in the case of the more popular books, such as Genesis, Isaiah, and the Psalms. The most helpful books are: Ryle, Ezra and Nehemiah (Cambridge Bible); T. Witton Davies, Ezra, Nehemiah, and Esther (Century Bible); Batten, Ezra and Nehemiah (International Critical Commentary); George Adam Smith, The Book of the Twelve Prophets, especially pp. 187-272 (Expositor's Bible); Foakes-Jackson, The Biblical History of the Hebrews to the Christian Era; Kent, The Makers and Teachers of Judaism.

EZRA

1-4. Cyrus Permits the Jews to Return Home. The book begins with an account of the issuance of a decree by Cyrus permitting the Jews to return to Palestine. The decree is unfortunately not given verbatim but in the words of the Chronicler giving in his own way the sense. In 2 Chr. 36^{22f.} the first three verses down to let him go up are repeated. They are original here, and were there quoted to give the book a cheerful conclusion. In the first year is 537 B.C., which was not really the first year of his reign as king, for he had been king in his own country from 559 or 558, but it was the first year of his reign as king of Babylon, which was taken in 538. For this reason the Jewish chronicler calls it the first year, i.e., the first year of Cyrus' rule over the Jews in Babylonia, who had before this been under the rule of Nabonidus, king of Babylon. By the mouth of Jeremiah means the seventy years as predicted by him in 29¹⁰ as follows: "For thus saith the Lord, After seventy years be accomplished for Babylon, I will visit you, and perform my good word toward you, in causing you to return to this place" (cf. 25¹¹). All sorts of antics have been performed by commentators to locate this seventy years, which is obviously a longer period than the Jews were in Babylon, for 597-537 is but fifty-nine or sixty years, and 586-537 is only forty-nine years. The true explanation is that "seventy" is only a general statement in a round number for a long period, and is not to be taken as a literally exact definition of the years of Exile. The Lord stirred up . . . Cyrus. Cf. Isa. 45¹, where Cyrus is denominated the Lord's anointed. All the kingdoms—a very great boast, but such were common among Oriental kings. The Chronicler goes on to declare that Cyrus acknowledged Jehovah as the God who inspired his deed (v. 2). But we see from the Babylonian and Persian inscriptions which we now possess that Cyrus was a polytheist and so remained. Whatever honor he showed the gods of other peoples was not done because of an acceptance of them but for political purposes. Whosoever is left—read remaineth. This sounds as though the decree bade peoples other than the Jews to help them. Though this might come about in some places where good relations existed it seems hardly likely to be commonly the case. The text as it stands is awkward in the Hebrew, and it seems most likely that the original meaning was that Jews who did not choose to return should help those who did go.

5-11. The Return of the Jews Under Shesbazzar. The Jews gave liberally to those who were going in the return, and Cyrus even ordered that the sacred vessels which Nebuchadrezzar had removed from the Temple (2 Kings 24¹³ 25^{14f.} 2 Chr. 36⁷) should be restored, and this was to be done by Mithredath. The name is in Persian Mithradata, which means "Mithras (the Persian sun god) has given," known to us in the Greek form Mithridates, or, more correctly, Mithradates. These vessels and other gifts were to be given to Shesbazzar, a name of uncertain derivation and meaning, which has long been a puzzle to commentators. He has often been identified with Zerubbabel, but this should not be done. He was quite probably the uncle of Zerubbabel, by whom he was succeeded in the office of governor. The numbers given in vv. 9-11 cannot be satisfactorily explained and must be regarded as exaggerated.

CHAPTER II

A Register or List of Those Who Returned.

Some of the names are easy to interpret or understand, and some are of persons otherwise known or even famous. This simple commentary is not fitted either by space or its immediate purpose to discuss them one by one. Yet are they all interesting enough to deserve it. Here there must be a restriction to a few only. Zerubbabel (v. 2) means "Seed of Babylon," for there was he born, and the name is Babylonian, not Hebrew. Jeshua is a shortened form of "Jehoshuah," or "Joshua"; he was the high priest of the return, and the son of Zehozadak and the grandson of Seraiah, who was put to death by Nebuchadrezzar (2 Kings 25¹⁸⁻²¹ Jer. 52²⁴⁻²⁷). Nehemiah is not the man who restored the walls of Jerusalem in 445-444 B.C. Upon these names there follows (vv. 2-35) a register of the men of Israel who returned. It certainly has been ill preserved, for it contains not only personal names, but even names of clans and cities, and in a considerable number of cases we are still uncertain as to which is which. After these (vv. 36-39) there is a list of the priests, and then (vv. 40-42) come the Levites and with them the singers and porters, or, rather, doorkeepers. The number of the Levites seems very small, only 431 when compared with 4,289 priests. Some had been compelled to resort to purely secular work in order to win a living, but the total here leaves us still surprised at its smallness. The next list (vv. 43-54) is of the Nethinim, which means "given," i.e., to the Temple. They were a low grade of slaves, some of them captives in war, and belonging to foreign nations, such as Meunim, i.e., Minæans, a people of Arabia. In vv. 55-58 we have Solomon's servants, a subordinate class of the Nethinim, and in vv. 59-63 priests who could not trace their descent, and were therefore not recognized as legitimate members of the tribes. The word Tirshatha (v. 63) is a Persian word corresponding to the Babylonian word Pekkah, or "governor." Lagarde thought that Tirshatha meant "him who is feared," but it is scarcely certain. Urim and Thummim were the sacred tools of the lot by which decisions were given. They have usually been explained as "Light" and "Perfection," but were, rather, Hebrew adaptations of the Babylonian Urtu and Tamitu, the tablets of Destiny; and the method of using them still remains uncertain (cf. comment on 1 Sam. 1³). In vv. 64-67 we have the summary of all who returned, and the total comes out at 42,360. But if they be added up as they have here been given, the total is only 29,818. The numbers given in Nehemiah foot up to 31,089, and in the apocryphal book of 1 Esdras the number comes out at 30,143; yet in these cases also the total is given as 42,360, which shows plainly that some editor has corrected them to make all three passages agree. The Bible has not been miraculously preserved from errors in numbers, or from their artificial editing and correcting. The difficulties about the numbers of persons who returned appear also in the enumeration of animals; so, e.g., the horses (v. 66) are numbered at 736, but in 1 Esdras as 7,036; and the asses are set down here and in Nehemiah as numbering 6,720, but in 1 Esdras the number of them is 5,525. Then the chapter specifies (vv. 68, 69) the contributions made for the restoration of the Temple. The amounts seem hopelessly exaggerated, for certainly most of those who returned were poor, many very poor. As a modern analogy one needs only to be reminded of the condition of the Jews now returning to Palestine, for whom large sums must periodically be raised among their rich brethren in America and in England who have no thought of returning.

CHAPTER III

1-6. Restoring Religion: Rebuilding the Altar. The first act in the restoration of the religious life was the rebuilding of the altar. The month was Tishri, the seventh month of the religious year and corresponding in part at least to our month of October. It was one of the most sacred months in the year, for in it there occurred on the first day the Feast of Trumpets (Num. 29¹); on the tenth the Great Day of Atonement (Num. 29⁷ Lev. 16²⁹), and on the fifteenth the Feast of Tabernacles (Lev. 23³⁴⁻³⁶, 39-44 Num. 29¹²⁻³⁸). It would be difficult to find any month better fitted for the beginning of a work so important. There and then a great public assembly was held, and ceremoniously a beginning was made in rebuilding the altar, and the offerings prescribed for the Feast of Trumpets (Num. 29¹⁻⁶) were made.

Upon its base (v. 3)—read with the mg. in its place. The text of the next clause has not come down in good order, but the general sense seems to be that they were now assured of the divine protection, in the fear they had of their hostile neighbors. Then they kept the Feast of Tabernacles, the most joyous of all, for it celebrated the vintage and lasted seven days (Ex. 23¹⁶ Lev. 23³⁴⁻⁴²). This was followed by the re-establishment of the daily offering, morning and evening, of a lamb of the first year (Ex. 29³⁸⁻⁴² Num. 28⁶). There followed in due order the observance of all the set feasts (v. 5), Sabbath, new moons, Passover, Weeks, Trumpets, Atonement and Tabernacles. But the Chronicler adds a note, But (or although) the foundation of the Temple of the Lord was not yet laid. By this he means to intimate that all this was provisional, unusual, extraordinary, for he could not think that all this could properly be done until the Temple was rebuilt.

7-13. Rebuilding of the Temple Begins. Before actual work on the Temple could begin they must first quarry new stone, which could be obtained on the spot, and arrange for the securing of wood from the Lebanon. This was a costly and difficult procedure. The great trees must be felled, and then dragged over the crest of the Lebanon, and slid down the slopes of the mountain range, then rafted to Joppa and dragged thence to Jerusalem. It was a big undertaking for people so poor. This next step was taken in the second year (536 B.C.), and the second month (Iyyar, corresponding in part to May) by the appointing of Levites to carry on the great task. The text of vv. 8-10 is too difficult to make anything of it save by extensive alteration, partly by subjective conjecture and partly by the use of the Greek Ezra (cf. p. 194b). The student must study this in critical commentaries. The ceremony connected with the laying of the foundation was elaborate and was accompanied by singing which was apparently done by two choirs antiphonally. The meaning seems to be that one choir sang, O give thanks unto the Lord, for he is good, and the other responded, For his mercy endureth forever. But among the people were old men who had seen the first Temple, and, as they now looked on, they wept, thinking how small seemed all these preparations in comparison with the grandeur of Solomon's Temple. (Cf. also Hag. 23-9 Zech. 4¹⁰.)

CHAPTER IV

1-7. Hostility Toward the Undertaking.

This is a chapter of struggle against great odds. The neighbors of the new community were quite ready to make trouble unless very tactfully handled, and perhaps in any case, or under any condition. The whole case is not difficult to understand. When Sargon took Samaria, capital of the Northern Kingdom, in 722 B.C., he carried off twenty-seven thousand two hundred and ninety of the inhabitants and settled them within the borders of his own kingdom. To occupy the space vacated by them he brought in colonists from a number of conquered peoples. During the reign of Esarhaddon, king of Assyria (681-668 B.C.), still others were brought in. The original Hebrew stock intermarried with these colonists and the mixed race thus produced came to be called Samaritans. These people now applied to the Jews, most of whom belonged to the tribes of Judah and Benjamin, to be permitted to unite in the work of rebuilding and so be received into the company of God's people Israel. They made the claim that it was their custom to sacrifice unto Jehovah (v. 2); there is, however, another reading, yet we do not sacrifice (R.V. mg.), but the first is preferable. This request was denied very haughtily, and one thinks, very unwisely. There would have been difficulties and dangers in their admission, but their rejection made bad blood and ill feeling, and unto our own day the evil effects continue, though now the Samaritans are but a pitiable remnant. The people of the land (v. 4) means all who were not of pure Israelite extraction. Weakened the hands might be rendered "disheartened" and troubled them in building should read terrified them from building. This attempt to stop the work went on during the rest of the reign of Cyrus. He was succeeded by Cambyses, who died or committed suicide in 522 B.C. In the same year came Darius to the throne. Now, we know from Haggai that the rebuilding was resumed in 520, the second year of Darius, and it would appear, therefore, that from 536 to 520 nothing was done. There is, therefore, a historical and chronological tangle in v. 5. The tangle is made much worse in vv. 6, 7, for here we have Xerxes, who began to reign in 485 B.C., and then Artaxerxes (464-424), and then in v. 8 we have another letter mentioned. No reasonable and solidly based solution to this problem has yet been found.

8-24. Letter to Artaxerxes, and the Reply. With v. 8 begins a long section of the book (48-618) which is an extract from an Aramaic document and is written in Aramaic, and not in Hebrew. It begins with a letter written to Artaxerxes with the purpose of preventing any further rebuilding of the city walls; following that letter's conclusion there comes the king's reply. Let us try to shed a little light here or there upon some portions of these letters. Rehum and Shimshai are both foreign names. They may be Persian, but that is quite doubtful. The list of nations or peoples for whom they acted are apparently all non-Hebrew. The king Osnappar (v. 10) is Ashurbanipal, king of Assyria, 668-625 B.C., to whom also is credited the bringing of colonists into Samaria. Now, Rehum and Shimshai as representatives of this long list of peoples appeal to Artaxerxes against the returned Jews in Jerusalem, and they attempt to prejudice the king against them by calling Jerusalem a rebellious and bad city. In v. 12 it is said that walls are finished and in v. 13 it is implied that they are still unfinished, and the petitioners pray that their completion be prevented. In v. 14 the petitioners represent themselves as being in the king's employ, which is the meaning of the expression eat the salt of the palace. (Cf. the English word "salary," salarium—"salt-money.") Then they ask the king to examine into the history, for there shall he learn that Jerusalem has been a rebellious city, and the inference that they desire to have drawn is that the king is in danger of losing all the province west of the Jordan. The king was deceived by these specious pleas and returned a reply (vv. 17-22) ordering the Jews stopped in their work; and this was done by force. After this there follows a long interval, a break in the narrative due to this Aramaic document. The document seems ill placed here, and makes us much difficulty in following the order of events (see the more detailed commentaries).

CHAPTER V

The Building of the Temple Resumed; A Letter to Darius. Now we come to the remarkable story of the resumption of work upon the Temple, after a suspension of sixteen years. The year of the resumption is given in 424 as the second year of Darius, i.e., 520 B.C. and this chapter begins with some account of what led to this new effort. It was due to two prophets who fitted well into each other's work, Haggai and Zechariah. It would well repay the reader to turn to the messages of these prophets and read Haggai entirely and Zechariah 1-8, and take a look into the commentaries on these books in this volume. The last phrase in v. 1 should read as in the R.V. mg., in the name of the God of Israel which was upon them. Zerubbabel was now the governor and Jeshua was the high priest. Haggai and Zechariah had eventually won, and their ringing and urgent words had also won the people, so that the work began with leaders and people all in good heart. Tattenai (v. 3) was Persian governor over the whole district west of the river, and was therefore superior to Zerubbabel. We have found his name nowhere else. Shetha-bozenai was apparently a Persian name, the original form of which has been conjectured to be Shethar and boznai, a corruption of the title of the man's office (so Batten), but this is quite uncertain. Tattenai had perhaps been incited by the Samaritans, but, at any rate, he thought it his duty to ascertain definitely whether the Jews had authority for rebuilding the Temple. He sent therefore a letter to Darius asking that a search be made among the archives to learn whether any Persian decree had ever been issued giving royal permission. At the beginning of v. 4 both in A.V. and R.V. stand the words, Then said we unto them. The best solution yet offered is to read conjecturally, Then spake they unto them. The Apharsachites (v. 6) have not yet been identified. The great king (v. 11) was Solomon. In v. 16 what is said of Sheshbazzar is in contradiction of the statements in 38, where the work is ascribed to Zerubbabel.

CHAPTER VI

1-18. Darius Discovers and Confirms Cyrus' Decree. The king has a search made at Achmetha, i.e., Ecbatana, the summer residence of the Persian kings, and there was found a decree of Cyrus specifically ordering the rebuilding of the Temple in Jerusalem. The words of the decree as here set down are apparently not a literal copy but the substance of it in the words of the Chronicler. That which follows about supplying help to the Jews not only for the rebuilding but even for sacrifices afterward was very generous, and though not quite improbable is so much in the style of the Chronicler as to make one disposed to think it rather elaborated. The work went on rapidly thereafter and was carried to its conclusion (vv. 13-18). The success is ascribed primarily to God, but as helpers three Persian kings are mentioned, Cyrus, Darius, and Artaxerxes. The first two are correctly named here, but Artaxerxes is not, and the name is therefore probably an insertion by a later editor. The third day of Adar (v. 15) in the sixth year of Darius, 516 B.C., is the day of the finishing of the work (Adar is the twelfth month, approximately March). The foundation was laid in 537, and the work recommenced, as Haggai says, on the twenty-fourth day of the sixth month (Elul=September) of the second year of Darius, so that four and a half years of work had been given to it from that time to the completion. Then the dedication took place, but the sacrifices seem small when compared with those of Solomon (1 Kings 8⁵, 63) or of Hezekiah (2 Chr. 30²⁴) or of Josiah (2 Chr. 35⁷). At the end of v. 18 the Aramaic language portion ends and with v. 19 Hebrew is resumed.

19-22. The Celebration of the Passover. This took place on the fourteenth day of the first month (Nisan). In only five places in the O.T. is a celebration of the Passover mentioned: (1) Under Moses (Num. 9⁵); (2) under Joshua (Josh. 5¹⁰); (3) under Hezekiah (2 Chr. 30); (4) under Josiah (2 Kings 23²¹, 2 Chr. 35); and (5) this one under Zerubbabel. In every one of these cases there was some special or important rededication of the people to the worship of their God. Here two classes are mentioned as participating in the ceremony, namely, those who had returned from captivity and all such as had separated themselves unto them from the filthiness of the nations of the land, to seek Jehovah, the God of Israel. The filthiness of the land is idolatry, and the people here described are in large measure, if not wholly, Israelites left behind by Nebuchadnezzar who had drifted off into idolatrous practices but were now returning. The king of Assyria here meant is certainly the Persian king, who also ruled both Babylonia and Assyria since the days of Cyrus.

CHAPTER VII

1-10. The Return of Ezra the Scribe to Jerusalem. We come now to the second part of the book of Ezra, which is devoted to an account of the return under Ezra and to his work. It begins with a summary, setting down first Ezra's genealogy and then his return to Jerusalem. Between the preceding chapter and this a period of nearly sixty years is passed over silently. There had been an allusion to Xerxes (47) and into this reign is also fitted the episode narrated in the book of Esther, which, insofar as it contains any historical material, was deemed interesting and important, but it had no influence in the course of events, and the Chronicler could find nothing to tell. The phrase Now after these things is not uncommon (Gen. 15¹ 22¹ Lk. 10¹) but is otherwise insignificant. For the genealogy of Ezra see the introduction, p. 457a. The reign of Artaxerxes extends over the period 465-425 B.C., and the event now to be described occurred in 458. A ready scribe (v. 6). For the scribes and the significance of their work in later days see the introduction. Note that here the description of Ezra is given in the third person, and contrast the use of the first person beginning with v. 27. The enumeration of those who came up with Ezra is elaborate. Every possible order from priests to Nethinim is mentioned (on the last named see 243-54 above), and this points to a very careful maintenance of communal life in Babylonia. Everything that could be done to hold the people to national and religious order seems to have been done. The fifth month (v. 9) was Ab, corresponding approximately to August. The rendezvous occurred apparently in the first month (Nisan) and the time occupied was in all about three months and a half, and the distance by the route which they had to take up the Euphrates and then down through Syria would be about nine hundred miles. The journey would be very hard in summer (April to August), and to avoid the blistering heat it would be necessary to bivouac during most of the day, traveling by night and in the early morning. (On the names of the Hebrew months here and following, see p. 77b.)

11-28. The Letter Given by Artaxerxes to Ezra. Here follows a copy of the letter of authority from Artaxerxes which Ezra carried. As to substance there is no reason to doubt it, but the Chronicler attempts only a synopsis, and his own views are discernible in it. V. 11 introduces it in Hebrew, and then with v. 12 Aramaic begins. The enumeration of gifts from the royal bounty, and the gifts of Jews who remained in Babylonia and of those met on the way made a considerable sum, but is not here added up. Ezra has complete authority for all expenditure and need have no fear about his responsibility (v. 18). He has even authority to draw for more on the royal treasure, but a limit was set of a hundred talents of silver (v. 22), which would be about one hundred and ninety thousand dollars, with an actual purchasing power of above three times that amount in the present day. It is not possible to estimate with any certainty the value of the goods which he was to have. Ezra is also commissioned to make judicial appointments and make provision for social order among his own people, so that he really exercises the authority of a governor, for even the power of death was given into his hands (v. 26). It has been said that this applies only to the religious reorganization, but it is not easy to see where the qualification appears. Ezra, according to the literal word, is made a sort of despot. And now, suddenly, in v. 27 the narrative switches back into Hebrew, and we read in two verses an outburst of joy and gratitude from Ezra, who prepares at once to exercise the authority committed to him. The deeds that follow show how willing he was to wield the scepter. Indeed, from his day until now there are few religious leaders who have not gladly exercised as much authority over secular affairs as they dared.

CHAPTER VIII

1-14. The Heads of Families Who Accompanied Ezra to Palestine. Some of the names are interesting, and they who have a care for genealogies might find it worth while to pursue their studies into the elaborate commentaries and dictionaries. It is not fitting to take up these minute problems here.

15-30. The Rendezvous at Ahava. The exact place is still unknown; nor has the name been found in any Babylonian document. It would seem to have been on one of the great irrigation and drainage canals not far from the capital. As the main company numbered fifteen hundred, and with all those who might be called camp followers there must have been eight thousand or more, a considerable space would be necessary for the camp. There they remained three days in tents, while Ezra made a numbering and a survey. He found that there were no Levites among them, and as one of his chief objects was the setting up of an elaborate liturgical form they were indispensable. He therefore sent messengers to a place called Casiphia (v. 17) whose site is quite unknown but must have been not far away, where was apparently a settlement of Levites and Nethinim, and thence drew to join them eighteen Levites of one family with twenty of another and two hundred and twenty Nethinim. Then a fast was proclaimed as a religious exercise (v. 21), and prayer offered for safety and guidance, as Ezra was unwilling to ask the king for a guard, which was really as needful in that journey then as it is now. In this matter Nehemiah displayed better judgment. When the religious ceremonies were over, Ezra set himself to have a reckoning made of the money and of the value of all the vessels for the sanctuary, and the total came out at nearly five millions of dollars, with a purchasing power perhaps thrice what it now has.

It seems clear enough that the amounts have been greatly exaggerated.

31-36. The Journey and the Arrival at Jerusalem. As has already been said, the difficulties were enormous and the successful conclusion leaves to us only a desire to speak a word of praise for the management of the whole affair. Ezra proved himself equal to the task. Upon arrival offerings in large numbers and at much cost were made by those who had returned, and when these ceremonies were concluded Ezra was ready to begin his real work. It would be no easy matter, but he was eager for it.

CHAPTER IX

Enforcing the Principle of Nationalism.

The first business that came before Ezra was the sorry story of the departure of the people from the principles which he regarded as essential to the national existence. The report was of intermarriages, evidently on a large scale, with the neighboring peoples, of whom there is a long list. Ezra was plunged into a fury, tearing his garments, plucking out both hair and beard, and then sat down in mourning posture until evening. Then, before the people, at the evening assembly he tore garment and mantle and began a confession in the name of the people. In v. 8 there is a curious and difficult phrase—a nail in his holy place—which is apparently a metaphor of some sort, if the text is correct. The Greek Ezra gives a simple text, reading, “a root and a name in the place of thy sanctuary.” This may be correct. Bondmen and bondage (v. 9) are very strong words and ill suited to express the conditions under which the Jews were living in the Persian empire, but Ezra was not in a state of composure, and might say anything. A wall in Judah and in Jerusalem has reference to any means of defense, not the city walls which were in ruins until Nehemiah had them rebuilt. In v. 11 Ezra seems to be depending upon Deut. 71-3 237 and these passages he links with the prophets in a dual authority. This is interesting, for we do not meet with such an identification earlier. We are here standing at the beginning of the new scribal era. In v. 12 Ezra is repeating in a general way the law in Deut. 73, but he makes it very strong, and that which had originally applied, in the full force of its severity, only to the Moabites and Ammonites, he now applies to all the neighboring peoples, though Edomites and Egyptians had been expressly excepted from the curse (Deut. 237). In vv. 13-15 Ezra declares that this deed of theirs is so evil that God might even have utterly consumed them. He has indeed punished them less than their evils deserved.

CHAPTER X

1-5. The People Confess and Make Promises. While Ezra was confessing and praying in public the people were gathering in a great assembly. The news would have spread widely and such a spectacle would create great excitement. And now the narrative shifts back into the third person. The Chronicler in the preceding passage has been quoting Ezra's memoirs, though in his own fashion. He now drops this method and, whether using the memoirs as a source or not, goes back into his own style. In a state of high excitement and under the leadership of a man named Shechaniah—a name with the almost ironical meaning here of "Jehovah has taken up his abode"—the people covenant to put away the foreign wives and their (little) children. And Ezra made them take oath to do this barbarous, cruel, atrocious deed. O religion, what crimes have been committed in thy name!

6-17. The Process of Putting Away Foreign Wives. The next step was to devise machinery and provide checks in the carrying out of this business. Ezra went aside to mourn and fast, not in sorrow for the poor women and the children that must suffer, but because these marriages had ever taken place. A little more mercy and pity would have made him seem more like a human being. But we need cast no stones. The spirit of intolerance survives the flight of time. All were now summoned to Jerusalem, and a time limit of three days set, after which the goods of those who did not appear would be forfeited (in Hebrew "devoted," i.e., "destroyed") and they would be excommunicated. The assembly was duly convened on the twentieth day of the ninth month (Chislew=approximately December) which was in the rainy season. There they sat in the broad place before the Temple, while the cold rain of the hills poured down upon them, for it is particularly called a great rain. There, in the wet, Ezra addressed them in minatory words, bidding them not only to separate themselves from the poor, miserable wives, but even from their neighbors. The LXX supplies in v. 12 an interesting reading, "Great is this thy demand for us to do," which suits well with the context. There were men of sense and feeling among them who mentioned the weather and measured the task as a great one. Perhaps some thought of postponement until better weather conditions might make it a little easier to drive out the women and the children. They even ask for the appointment of a commission. This was done and the commission sat during three months, hearing and adjudicating separate cases (v. 17). They began on the first day of the tenth month (Tebeth=approximately January) and sat through Tebeth, Shebat, and Adar, or three months, and made an end by the first day of the first month (Nisan=approximately April) which would certainly be a month more reasonably suited for the horrors of this family disruption. The climate of Jerusalem in April is usually pleasant. The wives could now take packs on their backs, and lead the children by the hand, and go out under God's blue sky with less peril.

18-44. A List of Those Who Had Taken Foreign Wives. There appear among them no less than seventeen priests, together with Levites, singers and doorkeepers. It is clear, therefore, that those who were religious leaders had a considerable share in breaking the laws. Ezra has shown no mercy. He has carried out the provisions of the matter as logic, not as mercy required. Some commentators provide unconscious humor in their desire to exculpate him. Let us leave him as he was and pass on to the next man, until we see Ezra again in another capacity.

NEHEMIAH

Introduction. For a discussion of the general questions connected with this book, see the introduction to Ezra-Nehemiah, pp. 454-463.

CHAPTER I

The Sadness of Nehemiah: His Prayer for the Prosperity of Jerusalem. We are now come to the work of Nehemiah. Ezra completed his work concerning the foreign wives on the first day of Nisan (April) of the eighth year of Artaxerxes (457 B.C.). We are now suddenly transported to Chislew (December), the ninth month of the twentieth year of Artaxerxes (445 B.C.). There is, however, a tangle in the dates, and it is best to admit it frankly. In Neh. 21 we read of events in the first month (Nisan), while here in this first chapter we read of the ninth month of that year. What took place in the ninth month surely did not precede what took place in the first month. Some compiler or copyist has blundered. The introductory words of this chapter were, apparently, placed here when Chronicles, Ezra, and Nehemiah ceased to be one, and became three books. They were then necessary to introduce Nehemiah as a separate book.

Nehemiah was now in Susa (for Shushan), the winter capital of the Persian kings; and was in the palace, or, rather, the royal castle.

There he received a visit from a man named Hanani, who was apparently a relative; the word describing him does not necessarily mean brother. With him came some other Jews from Jerusalem who brought a sorry report of the state of affairs at Jerusalem. Ezra's great marriage reform had borne no good fruit in an energetic policy of political and external progress. The walls and gates were still in ruin thirteen years later. What was needed was practical wisdom and efficiency rather than religious fanaticism. The news plunged Nehemiah into grief, which continued for days. He fasted and prayed and the prayer here ascribed to him (vv. 5-11) sounds much like a regular liturgical prayer which may have come from some sort of Temple prayer book. It is strongly charged with phrases from Deuteronomy. Everything in the prayer is so plain that it needs no exposition.

CHAPTER II

1-11. Nehemiah's Desire to Return to Jerusalem. Nehemiah was cupbearer to the king; we do not know what sort of office this was, but it is clear enough that it was a post of dignity and near to the king. The English version of v. 1b adds something to the Hebrew in describing Nehemiah's attitude. The Hebrew says only "I was not sad," but the king observed a change in his countenance, and Nehemiah, knowing that he must not be gloomy in the royal presence, was much perturbed, and confessed the reason for his demeanor. The king asked what he desired, and learned that Nehemiah wished to visit Jerusalem and see what he might be able to do for its rebuilding. Nehemiah asks boldly for permission to go, for letters of convoy, and for materials from the royal possessions to be used in restoration works. The memoir of Nehemiah which the Chronicler has been using must have been much abbreviated by him. We are whisked along swiftly over the long journey, which went probably from Susa to Babylon, and thence up the Euphrates, and across by way of Damascus and then down to Jerusalem. There Nehemiah waited three days, as Ezra had done before him in his time. He needed some rest, and he may well have made some ceremonial visits to men of promise in Jewry.

12-20. Nehemiah Surveys the Walls by Night. Following these preliminary labors, he was ready to make a personal survey of the situation. He decided to do it by night in order, as far as possible, to give no occasion for enemies to stir up trouble. He would probably ride on a mule or ass as much more sure-footed than a horse, and so he made a circuit of the ruined walls. The various places mentioned—the valley gate, dragon well, and dung port—have been for ages matters of dispute among archæologists, and he who would know how uncertain and difficult they are still may consult the larger commentaries and read in George Adam Smith's learned, interesting, and monumental book on Jerusalem. But whatever way he took, or however he went, there can be no doubt of the interesting quality of the story. It is picturesque, and he who has not enough imagination to feel a stir as he reads of it deserves real pity. Then he got together the leaders of the people, and having told them of the impression which the moonlit sight had made upon him, he urged them to unite in a great effort to put the city in a state of proper defense by rebuilding its walls. The enemies whom he must now confront are named as three, Sanballat, Tobiah, and Geshem the Arabian. The first name is Assyrio-Babylonian; its form in that language would be Sin-uballit, which means, "Sin (the moon god) has given life"; he is mentioned in the Elephantine papyri as governor of Samaria. Tobiah was an Ammonite, but his name is Hebrew and means "Jehovah is my good." Geshem is called an Arabian, and his name is written "Gashmu" in 66, where the ending "u" is Nabatean. These opponents were an ill-assorted group of mixed nationalities, but perhaps likely to be all the more efficient in stirring up trouble if each had some of his own nationals as followers. Their present plan was to sneer and insinuate that Nehemiah and his followers were planning to rebel against the king of Persia by setting up here a city to be defended against him. Nehemiah, sure of his ground, repudiates them and declares his confidence in God's support.

An Independent Account of the Reconstruction. In ch. 3 we have an independent account of reconstruction work, which breaks the connection between 220 and 41, where the story resumes. It is clearly incomplete and must be an insertion from an independent source. The distribution of the work as here set down disagrees in certain particulars with that given in ch. 6, nor is our knowledge sufficient to enable us in every point to bring them into unity. Eliashib, now high priest, was the son of Joiakim and grandson of Jeshua (Ezra 32 Neh. 12¹⁰). He here co-operates with Nehemiah, but his association with Tobiah (134) would seem to indicate that he was hardly in sympathy with Nehemiah in all points—perhaps not in Nehemiah's moves to bring about complete separation between the returned Jews and the peoples of the land. The localities here mentioned bristle with difficulties, and it is idle to attempt a solution for more than a few of them. The sheep gate lay on the north side of the Temple inclosure and may have been so named because through it sheep were brought to the sacrifice. The tower of Meah was northwest of this and corresponds to the birah, or castle, which Nehemiah mentions (28), which appertains to the house of Jehovah (see also 72). It was the residence of the Persian governor, and afterward of the Maccabean kings. It was rebuilt by Herod the Great and named Antonia. The tower of Hananel was further toward the northwest, not far from the present Damascus gate, which should probably be identified with Nehemiah's fish gate (v. 3). It was named from its proximity to the fish market to which resorted the fish dealers from the Sea of Galilee and from the Phœnician cities. The fish supplied were probably salted and sun dried. The old gate (v. 6) lay at the northwest corner of Solomon's wall and would therefore correspond approximately with the Jaffa gate. The broad wall (v. 8) corresponds to the present wall south of the Jaffa gate. The tower of the furnaces (v. 11) has been identified with the rock-cut foundations which have been found in the grounds of Bishop Gobat's school, and known to archæologists as Maudslay's scarp. The valley gate (v. 13) was at the southwest corner of Solomon's wall and the dung gate at the extreme southern side of the city. It has been excavated by Bliss, and was perhaps so named as the gate through which the refuse of the city was carried. The fountain gate (v. 15) lay near the pool of Siloam at the crossing of the Tyropean valley.

Next came the pool of Siloam (v. 15; see text and mg.) to which water was conveyed by a rock-cut from Gihon, called commonly the Virgin's Spring. The overflow from Siloam made a fertile spot in the mouth of the Tyropean which was called the king's garden. The stairs of the city of David are the rock-cut steps which may still be seen at the southern end of the eastern hill. The tower that standeth out (v. 25) was excavated by Warren, south of the Haram, on which stand now the sacred buildings of the Mohammedans. The water gate (v. 26) lay near this and gave access to the spring of Gihon. The horse gate (v. 28) was in Solomon's wall at the southeast corner of the Temple inclosure. The gate of Hammiphkad (or the "mustering"—v. 31) was the same as the old east gate of the Temple.

x-6. The Samaritans Purpose to Stop the Work. The text beginning with v. 2 and onward is in grave doubt. Its difficulties are so numerous that we can only suppose that there are copyists' mistakes in it. The problems may be sought out in the larger commentaries. Here it need only be said that as the R.V. makes reasonable sense the ordinary reader will do well to be content with it. By the army of Samaria is probably meant not an army in the modern sense but, rather, groups or mobs of men more or less armed. The next phrase but one, will they fortify themselves? is unsatisfactory. Ryle most ingeniously proposes an emendation of the Hebrew which produces "will they commit themselves to their God?"—which seems almost too good to be true, though it does combine beautifully with the following clause, will they sacrifice? Revive should be translated restore. In vv. 4 and 5 we have a prayer interjected. All went well until the wall was raised to half its former height all the way round the city. It has been calculated from the foundations discovered by Sir Charles Warren that the original ancient wall had been two hundred feet high!

7-23. Nehemiah's Preparations to Meet the Opposition. In most printed editions of the Hebrew Bible the fourth chapter begins with v. 7 of ch. 4 in the English Bible. The story goes on now to describe a very dangerous critical situation. The success thus far attendant upon Nehemiah's reconstruction work had impressed the enemies strongly with the probability that the Jews would succeed in their enterprise unless other steps were taken. The three leaders already mentioned combined forces and secured also the aid of some allies from Ashdod, then probably the chief Philistine city on the coast. They decided now to resort to force and make a combined attack. Nehemiah had a sufficiently good intelligence service to learn of the danger and prepared to meet it. He prayed unto God, which was an admirable beginning, but only the beginning. He knew what were the realities, and prepared to do the duty of a man, and not imitate a rabbit to run away. Nehemiah had also to cope with cowardly Jews, who lived near the enemies and ten times (v. 12) warned his people of their danger and tried to get them to leave the works and return home. Nehemiah, in order to ward off any surprise attack, armed his people with swords, spears, and bows, and did his best to inspire them with courage and make them willing to fight, and so he got them to go on with the work, with half at work and half on the watch to repel an attack. Some even of the workers had a tool in one hand and a weapon in the other. So did this manly man keep men at work and on guard, and inspired by hope, and assured of God's help for those who help themselves. He is indeed a noble picture, a man to remember, a man to imitate in time of peace, or in time of war, to be ready in the former for the coming of the latter, if, when and as it may come.

CHAPTER V

1-13. Economic Difficulties. This passage would be reasonably clear in itself if we could be sure that it was here set in its proper context. There was a stringency in food supplies caused by something which is not here mentioned. The position of the passage implies that this was caused in some way by the work on the walls—perhaps by the withdrawal of agricultural laborers from their fields to work on the walls, or to take part in defense measures against the threats and acts of Sanballat and his followers. There are, however, difficulties in this solution, for in v. 14 Nehemiah is talking about affairs after he had been in Jerusalem twelve years, which was long after the walls had been completed. This, then, points to the economic disturbance as something long after the work on the walls, and due to some other cause, such, perhaps, as one of the famines to which Palestine had often been accustomed. It is a question we cannot answer, a problem we cannot solve. If we had all of Nehemiah's memoir complete instead only of the excerpts which the Chronicler has preserved, this might be made plain. The people who cried out in their want are the poorer classes, as distinguished from the aristocracy of riches or of rank such as the priesthood. Some had borrowed to buy food, others to pay the king's tribute, i.e., taxes. Nehemiah was very angry and provided for a conference to consider the matter, and learn who was responsible for usurious practices, and for selling people into slavery (v. 7). The laws of slavery had been changed several times, for those in Deuteronomy are quite different from those of Exodus, and again from those in Leviticus. He applied so far as he could a law of mercy and demanded restitution of lands and goods, and made priests swear that they would do this. He made a vigorous speech, and accompanied it with a symbolical gesture, pulling in his outer garment to his body and then shaking it out loose (v. 13). They would remember that. Ah, what a man he was! A man for that day indeed.

14-19. Nehemiah Enumerates Other Sacrifices and Work of His for His People. He is speaking of a period of twelve years, 445-444 to 433-432 B.C., during which he was governor. We do not know how much of his time he actually resided at Jerusalem. It is clear that at some time he had gone back to Susa (see 136f.), and in 432 returned to Jerusalem. He did so much at Jerusalem that we must think of him as being there most of the twelve years, but it may not be so. We do not know, and conjectures do not carry us far. Here, again, we wish for the whole of Nehemiah's memoir. If only it had survived; if only it might yet be discovered—but there seems to be no probability. Alas, and alas! Nehemiah not only took nothing from the public purse but he spent lavishly upon entertainment of others, and as he concludes the survey he has the boldness to call upon God to reward him. There is no mock modesty in the prayer, and there is also nothing of a petty conceit or of self adulation in it. He knew he had done well. His conscience was clear. He had a just right to a decent degree of pride in his career, and was man enough to say so. Let the record stand.

CHAPTER VI

1-9. Another Attempt to Hinder Nehemiah.

Here, now, owing to the bad arrangement of the different sections of this important book, we are carried back to the story of the rebuilding of the walls, which was interrupted by ch. 5. We are here again observing the efforts of Sanballat, and his motley crew, to prevent the conclusion of the work on the wall. They propose now to try chicanery, get Nehemiah into a conference and contrive some scheme to get him into their power. They invite him to Ono, which may be at Keفر Ana, north of Lydda (Ezra 2³³ 1 Chr. 8¹²). This would involve his absence for three or four days. He refused. This attempt was made four times, and then as a fifth attempt a letter was sent to insinuate that he had better prepare to defend himself against a charge that he was plotting a rebellion against the Persian king, and suggesting that he had better confer with Sanballat, who would endeavor to give him aid. Nehemiah responds, curtly denying the impeachment and goes on with the work, offering a word of prayer to God for help.

10-14. Nehemiah's Enemies Resort to Treachery. The narrative is so concise as not to be very clear to us at this long distance in time and space. So far as we can fathom it, it would seem that Nehemiah is warned that an attempt on his life is probable and he was advised to seek asylum in the inner sanctuary, accompanied by Shemaiah. Now, Shemaiah was shut up, that is ceremonially unclean (cf. Jer. 36⁵). No layman had a right to enter the inner sanctuary and Nehemiah was a layman. Moreover, to enter with a man ceremonially unclean would greatly increase the breach of law. But Nehemiah is too keen and quickwitted so to be entrapped.

15-19. Completion of the Walls. The walls are completed in fifty-two days in the month Elul=August-September. The time seems too short. See the remarks in the introduction concerning this matter, p. 462a.

CHAPTER VII

1-4. The Necessity of Continued Vigilance. The work was done, but there was now need to guard what had already been attained. The price of safety, then, as often since, was vigilance. Nehemiah ordered the gates kept closed until the sun was hot, though the usual practice was to open at sunrise. This precaution would prevent a surprise visit before the whole city was active. Even the late sleepers, then, as now, are a menace in the eyes of men of action. The houses were not builded (v. 4) does not mean that there were no houses within the walls but that there were unoccupied spaces; the city was not full of inhabitants.

5-73. List of Returned Exiles. Nehemiah found among the archives a register of those who had returned. This means probably those who returned under Zerubbabel, and this supposition is confirmed by its close resemblance to that in Ezra 21-70, with which there is also for comparison the Greek Esdras. There would be no profit for us in a minute examination of these names. Let us pass them by. We come now to the story of the great religious reform and to the interesting story of the introduction of the new Law. We have first the public reading of the Law.

CHAPTER VIII

The Great Religious Reform. The next three chapters contain a description of the great religious reform initiated by Ezra and Nehemiah.

1-12. The Calling of a Public Assembly. There is a great public assembly, brought about we know not how, for only parts of the original story have here been preserved. For even this much we should be very thankful. The assembly was held on the first day of the seventh month, which was the day appointed for the Feast of the Trumpets (Ezra 31 Lev. 2323-25 Num. 291-6). This month was Tishri, approximately October, and therefore a good season in most years, before the winter rains began. And now the name of Ezra appears for the first time in the book of Nehemiah. What had Ezra been doing all this while? This we do not know. We may speculate, which is harmless and sometimes amusing, but it carries us not very far. He may have gone back to Babylon. He may have remained at Jerusalem and gone on with his reforms, and we are left without information solely because the part of his memoir which contains information about his work has perished. Let us be thankful to the Chronicler for all that he has preserved and be as contented as we may without the rest. What we now have before us is the account of the promulgation of the Law. The assembly is present. Ezra has the roll as priests and scribes and lawyers had put it together in Babylonia. He is now, at long last, and after much preparation ready to read it. Ezra stood upon a pulpit of wood (v. 4), in Hebrew, a "tower"; it probably means some sort of a platform, for on the platform with him were a certain number of men. The number cannot now be definitely ascertained. The Hebrew makes the number six on the right hand and seven on the left, as does also the LXX, but 1 Esdras gives seven on the right hand and six on the left. Who were these men? Were they Levites? Where was the high priest, and why was he not present? It is idle to speculate. In v. 8 there seem to be confusions in the pronouns. The verse should probably read, And he (Ezra) read in the book, and they (the Levites) gave the sense, and they (the people) understood the reading. The word distinctly does not exactly correspond to anything in the Hebrew. The expression gave the sense is to be taken with this. The R.V. is paraphrasing rather than translating, but the result is good rather than bad. But we cannot successfully reconstruct the whole scene with any strong assurance. As good a guess as any is that Ezra first read a bit aloud, then offered some explanation, and the Levites followed with an exposition and interpretation, perhaps even translating some of the Hebrew words into Aramaic, which language must now have been in considerable use. The main point is that by some process the newly expanded and greatly enlarged Law, now represented as a whole and in a final form in the Pentateuch, was presented to the people for their acceptance. Then the people, much solemnized by the scene and the Law, wept, thinking how far short they came of all these requirements; but their leaders told them to go away rather and make merry and rejoice, and send gifts in token of the happiness with which they received the words of the Law of their God.

13-18. Celebration of the Feast of Tabernacles. In this new Law they found the regulations governing the Feast of Tabernacles. They seem to have known nothing of this before, but now prepare to celebrate it. The Law is found in Ex. 23¹⁶ Lev. 23²⁹⁻⁴³ Num. 29¹²⁻³⁸ Deut. 16¹³⁻¹⁵. Yet there are records elsewhere of its having been observed by Solomon (2 Chr. 7⁸ 8¹³) and by Zerubbabel (Ezra 3⁴) and it would therefore appear that the Chronicler had forgotten or overlooked these instances. In v. 18 there is some doubt as to whether we should understand he read, i.e., Ezra, or "one read," i.e., somebody else.

CHAPTER IX

1-5a. The Fast. The Fast and the Confession and the Solemn Covenant are described in chs. 9 and 10. The assembly of which we have been reading took place on the twenty-second of Tishri and after the lapse of only one day, on the twenty-fourth, there begins a great ceremony of national humiliation. And now the seed of Israel, they who had completely separated themselves from all their neighbors, put on the signs of mourning, not for their sins but as an expression of sorrow that they had not been keeping the Law which had now been made known to them.

5b-37. Prayer and Confession. Who offered it is not said. It needs no comment. The phrases are familiar, for they are taken from Scripture elsewhere, especially from the Psalter. It has the prophetic rather than the priestly tone and may have been inserted here from some earlier writing. The passage is liturgical and shows how rich is the biblical material in forms of prayer, and he who knows the Book of Common Prayer will there find how much the Bible has contributed to its rich and beautiful store of words of supplication.

38. The Hebrew begins ch. 10 at v. 38, and Luther has accepted this division for the German Bible.

CHAPTER X

1-29. Those Who Accepted the Covenant. Here is the covenant, and, as was later and very often an Oriental custom, the names of those who accept the covenant and agree to keep it are placed at the beginning, and not at the end as they would be in our usage. The first name is quite properly Nehemiah, the governor, whose title is here given as Tirshatha.

30-39. The Obligations of the Covenant. The first prohibition is the intermarriage with foreign women. This is the old bone of contention, which Ezra (9²) had so strenuously and so severely tried to have carried out. The immense difficulty of even an approximate securing of compliance may be seen at a glance in Neh. 13²³⁻²⁸. The next prohibition relates to the Sabbath (v. 31), which contains an extension over the phraseology of the Pentateuch. This was the beginning of a fearful series of extensions and refinements and casuistries prolonged through centuries until Another and a Greater should declare that the Sabbath was made for man, and not man for the Sabbath—yet are there many in Christianity still in the old bondage of law in this matter. With the Sabbath observance is linked also the seventh year (Lev. 25²⁻⁷), but there is evidence enough that it was not carried through (Lev. 26^{34, 35, 43}; 2 Chr. 36²¹). There would appear to have been some efforts to do it in later times (1 Macc. 6⁴⁹, 53 Josephus, Antiquities, bk. xi, ch. 8: 6). It is amusing to note that Tacitus ascribes this custom to national laziness (History, bk. v, ch. 4), but laziness has never been a Jewish vice. As to the exaction of debt on the seventh year it may be remarked that this does not mean extinction but only postponement until the next year. The law of poll tax (v. 32) follows and provides a charge of one third of a shekel, but, according to the written Law (Ex. 30¹¹⁻¹⁶), a half shekel was due. This shows that Ezra was quite willing to modify the Law to suit conditions. He was not a complete literalist. The next provision was the arrangement for the supply of wood for sacrifices (v. 34). The quantity necessary for the multitudinous sacrifices must have been great, and the maintenance of the supply very difficult, for the country was small, the soil poor and lacking in depth for tree growth. The last provision was for first fruits and tithes (vv. 35-39). The laws concerning tithe vary enormously in the O.T. and it is impossible here to discuss and disentangle them. They who really wish to know must have recourse to Bible dictionaries and to critical commentaries. It seems a pity that so many in the Christian Church still cling tenaciously to the idea of tithing as a perfectly clear, simple, straightforward, comprehensive divine law, though a few hours of study would show how little such adjectives would properly apply.

CHAPTER XI

Miscellaneous. We have come now to the very last section of the book which is comprised in chs. 11-13. It may well be called "Miscellaneous," and is conveniently taken in the order in which it stands. It has not much of interest for us, and seems to have been rather loosely put together. The first section of it (11¹⁻¹²²⁶) consists of lists of various kinds and of mixed importance.

1, 2. Increasing the Population of Jerusalem. We have already seen that Jerusalem was underpopulated, and that the city had unbuilt spaces within its walls. Here is an effort to remedy this situation. Lots were to be cast, so that people from the villages should be selected, one out of ten, to come and make homes in the city. In some cases this would involve a serious re-adjustment, for it might be difficult to find bread-earning labor. Some who came voluntarily were much honored for their patriotism and self-sacrifice.

3-24. Lists of Names of the Chief People in Jerusalem. There are first (vv. 3-9) the chief laymen; upon which there follow the priests (vv. 10-14); the Levites (vv. 15-18); the gate keepers (v. 19), with a few miscellaneous (vv. 20-24). We can see signs of the difficulty with which these lists have been preserved and handed on to us. Thus in the list of priests the total comes out at one thousand one hundred and ninety-two, but in the list in 1 Chr. 9¹³ it is one thousand seven hundred and sixty. The king referred to in vv. 23, 24 is Artaxerxes, and this proves this list to belong to the time of Nehemiah.

CHAPTER XII

1-26. Another List. Names of those who returned with Jeshua and Zerubbabel, with sundry extracts from other lists. If we compare the lists here in vv. 1-7 and again in vv. 12-21 with 103³⁻⁹, we shall find many discrepancies, the complete explanation of which is not easy. The only point of importance here to be noted is that the Ezra in vv. 1 and 13 is not Ezra the scribe; this Ezra appears in 103 with the name written Azariah.

27-43. A Narrative of the Dedication of the Walls. The natural place for this narrative would seem to be immediately following upon 6¹⁵. It is only another instance of the loose editing of the parts which compose the book. But however ill its placing here, it is of great value, for it is evidently based upon the authentic memoir of Nehemiah, as we may see from several verses (31, 38, 40), but the Chronicler has probably used it in his own way, making over its phrases into his own manner. We should like to have the original, but as fate has denied us that boon we do well to value what we have. The instruments used in the joyous celebration are still not any too well identified, but the psallery was apparently a small, portable harp, played with the balls of the fingers, while the instrument here called harp corresponds more nearly to a zither and was picked with a piece of metal held between the fingers. There is not much that needs comment in this passage, save only here a word or two. The house of Gilgal (v. 29; beth is the Hebrew word for house) is probably the Gilgal of 2 Kings 21⁴³⁸ about fourteen miles north of Jerusalem, and so probably one of the most distant points occupied by these Jews. Purified themselves (v. 30) means by sacrifices and the sprinkling of blood. It would appear that even the gates and walls were sprinkled. The two processions which Nehemiah arranged set out from near the valley (that is the Jaffa) gate, the one proceeding northward and the other southward, and the two meeting in the open space east of the Temple.

44-47. Regulations Concerning Provisions for the Priests and Levites. In this section Zerubbabel and Nehemiah are mentioned by name and together. Here then in the third person we have something which did not come from the memoir of Nehemiah but was later written when these two men were heroes of the past.

CHAPTER XIII

1-3. The Separation of the Mixed Multitude. These verses are intended to serve as an introduction to the episode which follows. Let it be noted that the phrase is they separated, not "he separated." This indicates, of course, that Nehemiah did not do this, and that this does not come from his memoir.

4-9. Nehemiah's Second Visit to Jerusalem. In these verses we return to Nehemiah's memoir, in which we shall read what Nehemiah did, or sought to do, upon his second visit to Jerusalem. Nehemiah after twelve years of governorship in Jerusalem had gone back to the Persian king. From v. 6 it appears that in the year 433 B.C., he had gone back to Susa, where his stay must have been brief, for in 432 he was again in Jerusalem, drawn thither by his anxiety about the state of affairs. He had probably been only a few months absent. The expression Now before this (v. 4) refers to his second visit to Jerusalem which is mentioned, as we have just seen, in v. 6. This is a useful hint to us that the compiler often put down verbatim what he found in the memoir, without stopping to fit it in with what he had already written. How much before the second visit this difficulty occurred we do not know, nor do we know any way of finding this out. In vv. 4-9 we learn that Eliashib, the high priest, had taken one of the chambers of the Temple and fitted it up as lodgings for Tobiah. This was a shocking breach of order and propriety in the eyes of Nehemiah, and he took sharp action, casting Tobiah's goods and chattels out, and then had the place cleansed ceremoniously after such a desecration.

10-14. Nehemiah Befriends the Levites. Nehemiah discovers that the Levites were not receiving their lawful dues, and to support themselves were compelled to go out and work upon farms. He introduced a reform in methods and attempted to secure a proper payment of tithe. Let it here be noted that the tithe was then difficult to enforce or enjoin. And after this struggle Nehemiah again asks God to remember what he had sought to do. He had so spoken before (5¹⁹) and there is no impropriety or indelicacy in it.

15-22. The Difficulty of Sabbath Observance. Now, again, is Sabbath observance a difficult problem. Nehemiah definitely accuses his brethren of treading grapes in the wine press, and of bringing in sheaves of grain, and all sorts of burdens on the Sabbath day. Furthermore, the Tyrian fishermen were carrying on their traffic in fish, salted and dried. Nehemiah rebukes them and reminds them of former breaches of the Law (see Jer. 17²², 23, 27), and to prevent the traffic he ordered the city gates closed when twilight was coming on before the Sabbath and kept closed until the Sabbath was over. This only partially succeeded, for merchants then stayed outside the city walls to carry on trade, and he then had to threaten to lay hands on them and they knew that he would do it. Again he appeals to God to accept this from him and grant him a blessing.

23-29. Mixed Marriages Condemned. And now, yet again, comes up the vexed question of mixed marriages. There were children who spoke partly in a dialect of Ashdod and partly in the Jew's language, i.e., in Hebrew. Nehemiah could not endure it, and took savage means to end it. He strove with them and cursed them and beat them and pulled out their hair and made them swear to abandon the process. It's a sorry piece of business. It hurts Nehemiah's noble and splendid repute far more than those who suffered. O religion, religion, who shall restrain thine excesses!

30, 31. Summary. Nehemiah gives a scant summary of his reforms, omitting probably by simple inadvertence the reference to his attempts to secure a better Sabbath observance.

ESTHER

By PROFESSOR ROBERT H. PFEIFFER

INTRODUCTION

Contents. Ahasuerus, king of Persia, after divorcing his favorite wife Vashti, chose Esther, the cousin of Mordecai, as the queen. Haman, the chief minister, irritated by Mordecai's disdain, obtained from the king a decree ordering the extermination of the Jews. Esther, not without danger, brought about the downfall of Haman, whose place was taken by Mordecai, and the publication of a new edict which, without abrogating the former one, allowed the Jews to slaughter their foes. The festival of Purim was instituted to perpetuate the memory of that event.

Historicity. The chief argument for believing that the book is a record of actual events is the correct and detailed description of some Persian manners as we know them through Greek historians, and of the royal palace at Susa which has been excavated (M. Dieulafoy, L'Acropole de la Suse, 1890; cf. Bibliotheca Sacra, lvi (1889), pp. 626-53). However, even disregarding the anachronisms, the extraordinary coincidences, and the improbable incidents that have been pointed out in the book, it is clear that the accurate reproduction of the local color and the comparative lack of discrepancies in the narrative do not necessarily prove that the incidents related are real. On the whole, the apparent exaggerations, the dramatic structure, the transparent purposes (the institution of Purim and the glorification of militant Judaism), and not a few incredible incidents, classify Esther as primarily a didactic work. The most elaborate and most recent attempt to prove the historicity of this book by conceding that the story would be unbelievable under Xerxes and by identifying Ahasuerus with Artaxerxes II (J. Hoschander, The Book of Esther in the Light of History) is far from convincing.

Date. The Book of Esther was written long after the time of Xerxes—in fact, when the Persian Empire was a dim memory of distant days (11). Like the book of Daniel (which knows only four Persian kings) the Persian period (two centuries) is shortened so that, instead of being separated by a century, Nebuchadrezzar and Xerxes are practically contemporaries (251.; cf. Tobit 14¹⁵). The edict of Haman (381.) may be an echo of the measures of Antiochus Epiphanes in 168 B.C., and the victorious attack of the Jews upon their enemies (91^{f.}) may be an anticipation of the Maccabean rebellion (beginning in 167 B.C.). Forcible conversions to Judaism (817) are historically unknown before the time of John Hyrcanus (135-105 B.C.), during whose rule the book was probably written.

Purpose. The author lived at the time when the Jewish nation, after saving its religion from the annihilation planned by Antiochus Epiphanes, had taken the offensive against the heathen, first for political independence, then for extended territory. Daniel (164 B.C.) was a call to arms in defense of the faith; Judith (about fifteen years later) was an appeal to fight for deliverance from foreign rule (attained in 141 B.C.); Esther (about 130 B.C.) was an invitation to a war of conquest and revenge. The story leads up to a wholesale massacre of non-Jews and the yearly celebration of that carnage. The festival of Purim (37 91^{f.}), presumably of Babylonian or Persian origin, was at first not religious, but social and patriotic in character: the author wrote his book to keep alive the memory of the day in which the plan of Haman was reversed, to the glory of the Jews and to the ruin of their foes.

Religious and Moral Teaching. Esther is spiritually on a much lower plane than Daniel, and even than Judith. Ethical religion has no place in the book, its characters betray no religious aspirations or convictions. The Jews distinguish themselves from the heathen only because they have peculiar laws (38), which, however, they readily disregard when it serves their purpose (29), so that it becomes easy to conceal their Jewish extraction (210). The moral teaching of the book can be summarized in the command: Love your kindred, hate your enemies. The individual Jew must disregard his own life when national existence is at stake (413-16); the might of the Jews and the destruction of their enemies are the supreme moral ideals of the book. The lack of religious elements (which the LXX supplied in the apocryphal additions) and the moral conceptions totally at variance with those of Jesus may explain why the book was never quoted in the N.T.; among the Jews, however, it was very popular (two ancient Aramaic translations, or Targums, have come down to us), and chiefly because of this popularity it was admitted to the Hebrew canon of Scriptures.

The general spirit and attitude of the book are far removed from prophetic ideals or the teaching of Jesus. Its religion is a fierce, unethical nationalism. Its low moral and religious tone cannot be justified, but it can be explained. At a time when the extreme cruelties perpetrated by Antiochus were still fresh in the memories of the people, and when every pious Jew was convinced that his enemies were really the enemies of his God, the bitter fanaticism reflected in the book is quite intelligible. Moreover the popularity of the book shows that prophetic religion was far from dominating the Judaism of the second century B.C. It also explains in a measure why the lofty spiritual and ethical teaching of Jesus encountered such bitter opposition in representative Jewish circles.

THE DISMISSAL OF QUEEN VASHTI

1-8. A Festival Lasting Six Months. Ahasuerus (Xerxes I, 485-465 B.C.; not Artaxerxes II, 404-358 B.C., as in LXX and Josephus) ruled over a vast empire (cf. 101), comprising 127 provinces (120 in Dan. 6:1; 20 satrapies in Herodotus). To the acropolis of Susa, in Elam (Neh. 11 Dan. 8:2), his spring residence (Xenophon, Cyropaedia, viii, 6.22), he invited the grandees and the army, presumably to celebrate his coronation. At the close of the period a seven days' feast was arranged for all who had gathered at Shushan for the occasion. White and blue (the national colors, 8:15) draperies were fastened by means of white and purple linen cords to silver rings attached to marble pillars. Gold and silver couches stood on mosaic floors (alabaster, white marble, mother of pearl stone, and speckled marble). Wine was served in regal fashion, without restriction (LXX) or compulsion (Vulg.).

9-12. An Unruly Queen. Queen Vashti gave at the same time a feast to the women. Merry with wine, the king sent seven eunuchs to ask the queen to show her beauty to the drinking guests; with befitting modesty she refused. Women in Persia often sat at great banquets (Neh. 2:6 Dan. 5:2); in Judæa usually not (Mk. 6:24).

13-20. The Consultation and Verdict of the Wise Men. The court astrologers (which knew the times, cf. 1 Chr. 12:32; experts in fixing the calendar) were jurists and formed a sort of supreme court (cf. Ezra 7:14), although astrologers and judges were usually distinct persons. The queen, in the opinion of the wise men, was guilty in two respects: she openly defied her husband and she gave to all other wives an example of domestic insubordination. Her deed must be publicly reproved and she must be deposed: the publication of an irrevocable (8:8 Dan. 6:8, 12, 15) decree to this effect will improve domestic discipline in the Persian empire.

21, 22. A Law for the Benefit of Husbands. Letters containing the decree outlined by the wise men were sent to the various provinces in the local language and script. Darius engraved an inscription on the rock of Behistun in Persian, Elamitic, and Assyrian (cf. the three languages of Switzerland). The last words of the chapter (and should publish it . . .) are uncertain: LXX omits them; Vulgate says and it shall be published among all nations; the Targums understand the clause to mean that in mixed marriages the wife must speak the language of the husband; some modern critics propose the reading, and she shall speak whatsoever seems fit to him (cf. A.S.V., v. 22).

CHAPTER II

ESTHER CHOSEN AS THE QUEEN

1-4. The Search for a New Queen. Noticing that the king, now in a calmer mood, regretted his summary rejection of Vashti, the chamberlains proposed a plan for the selection of another wife, which reminds us of 1 Kings 11:4. The most attractive maidens of the realm should be brought to Susa: under the supervision of Hegai, the chief eunuch, they should prepare themselves by means of cosmetics for the royal inspection.

5-8. Esther. She was the cousin and foster daughter of Mordecai, a Benjamite descendant of Kish, the father of Saul (1 Sam. 9:1), who had been deported with Jecooniah (Jehoiachin, 2 Kings 24:11f.) in 597 B.C. and who, if the chronology of our author were not at fault, would now (482 B.C.) be at least one hundred and fifteen years old. Curiously Mordecai and Esther are named after Babylonian deities (Marduk, or Merodach, and Ishtar). Hadasah means "myrtle."

9-11. Esther in the Custody of Hegai. The chief eunuch liked her and gave to her beauty preparations and royal food, assigning to her seven maids and lodging her in the best part of the harem, where Mordecai came daily to see her. Esther did not, like Daniel (18), observe the dietary laws of Judaism; she actually concealed her nationality. How Mordecai could have access to the harem, and how Esther's kinship with him, and therefore her race, could remain a secret are questions which are more disturbing to us than to the author, who likewise sees nothing wrong in this sacrifice of principles to worldly ends.

12-15. The Maidens Prepare for the Royal Inspection. After one whole year devoted to enhancing their beauty (six months with myrrh and six with balsam and other cosmetics) each one of the virgins was brought before the king and became then one of his concubines. Esther wisely let herself be guided by the judgment of Hegai, who besides being an expert in such matters must have known the taste of the king.

16-18. Esther Crowned Queen. In Dec.-Jan., 478 B.C., four years after the rejection of Vashti (the author knows nothing of the ill-fated expedition of Xerxes against the Greeks during the interval), Esther's turn came: she pleased the king instantly and was made queen. On the occasion of the feast of coronation a release (tax-relief? amnesty? holiday? discharge from military service? cf. Mt. 27¹⁵) was granted to the provinces and gifts (of food?) were distributed lavishly.

19-23. A Conspiracy Disclosed by Mordecai. While he was sitting, as was his custom, at the entrance of the royal palace, Mordecai discovered a plot against the life of Xerxes (who was ultimately assassinated), whether through a Jewish servant of the conspirators (Josephus), or through his knowledge of seventy languages (Targum), or otherwise, the author does not say. Through Esther he communicated his discovery to the king. After an investigation the two guilty courtiers were hanged and Mordecai's service was recorded in the royal annals (cf. 6^{1f.} 10² Ezra 4¹⁵). V. 19 is obscure; Gunkel reads: "when the [remaining] virgins [whose turn had not yet come] were brought into the second harem."

THE DESTRUCTION OF THE JEWS PLANNED BY HAMAN

1-4. A Firm but Irritating Jew. Sometime between 478 B.C. (2¹⁶) and 473 B.C. (3⁷) Haman was made grand vizier. He was an Agagite, presumably a descendant of the Amalekite king defeated by Saul (1 Sam. 15^{8f.}); the hostility between Agag and Saul is transmitted to their descendants Haman and Mordecai (see comment on 2⁵ and 6¹²⁻¹⁴). As Daniel's friends refused to prostrate themselves before the statue (Dan. 3^{12f.}), so Mordecai remained conspicuously seated when Haman went by, either because he regarded the customary prostrations as acts of idolatry connected with emperor worship (Æschylus calls Darius "Persia's god born in Susa") or because he despised the descendant of Agag. His explanation to those who were curious to know the reason for his behavior was that he was a Jew. It was not long before Haman's attention was called to this matter.

5-11. An Enraged Minister. The pompous vizier, when he verified the report, was so furious that, regarding the execution of Mordecai as an inadequate revenge, he decided to destroy the whole Jewish nation within the Persian empire. According to a common conception (of Babylonian origin) there was an appropriate time fixed by fate for every undertaking (cf. Eccl. 3¹⁻⁸). To determine the proper day for the proposed pogrom, Haman had lots (Pur, an obscure word; cf. 9²³⁻²⁸, notes) cast in his presence in March-April, 473 B.C. Every day was taken up in turn "and the lot fell on the 13th day of the (12th) month, which is the month Adar [February-March]." (These words were accidentally omitted in the Hebrew and are preserved in the LXX; cf. v. 13.) Haman then reported to the king that a certain race, which he does not name, had its own laws and did not observe the royal edicts; as an inducement for its destruction he promised to pay into the treasury a sum of about $18,000,000. The king, taking off his signet ring (the symbol of supreme jurisdiction, cf. 8², 8, 10 Gen. 41⁴²) and placing it in the hands of the Jews' enemy, told him to keep the money (as a reward for ridding the state of an internal enemy) and proceed as he saw fit.

12-15. A Bloody Law. Eleven months before the fateful day (the author does not notice that the Jews had ample time to escape) the decree of Haman was drafted and dispatched posthaste to the satraps and governors (1¹); it was written in the local languages and scripts (1²²). On the 13th of Adar the Jews were to be killed and their goods plundered. The Jews of Susa were panic-stricken, whereas Xerxes and Haman drank to the success of the undertaking.

CHAPTER IV

ESTHER'S RESOLVE TO SAVE THE JEWS

1-3. A Nation in Mourning. Mordecai, who had unconsciously caused the impending calamity, and the Jews mourned according to the ancestral customs, which included tearing the upper garment (2 Sam. 3³¹), wearing sackcloth (Isa. 15³ 22¹²), putting ashes (or dust) on the head (2 Sam. 13¹⁹) or wallowing in them (Jer. 6²⁶), fasting (2 Sam. 11²), and weeping (Jer. 22¹⁸). See also on 6¹²⁻¹⁴.

4-11. An Appeal to the Queen and Her Answer. Esther sent to Mordecai a robe to replace his sackcloth, so that he could enter the palace (see v. 2), but he refused it and informed her through Hathach of the gravity of the situation, urging her intervention in behalf of the Jews. Esther replied that she could not intercede for her people before the king without risking her life. No one dared appear unsummoned in the presence of the ruler, or even enter the inner court, from which he could be seen (5^{1f.}), under penalty of death, unless the sovereign held out to the intruder his golden scepter. The author does not reckon with the fact that one could have oneself announced to the king (Herodotus iii, 118; 140), either through ignorance of Persian etiquette or to enhance the heroism of Esther (see v. 16). Josephus (Antiquities xi, 6.3) solved the difficulty through an absurd guess.

12-14. A Warning. The reply of Mordecai was illogical, but, as often, a weak argument presented forcibly carried conviction. If the decree is executed, he argued, Esther will perish (but would not Haman make an exception for the queen, even if he knew her race?); if the Jews are saved without Esther's intervention, she will lose the opportunity of a lifetime (but why should she risk her life if there is such a possibility?). Humanly speaking (and the author does not count on divine help) it seems far more likely that the king would spare his beloved wife than that the Jews should be saved through their own efforts or through foreign intervention. Here and in the next verses religious faith, confidence in Jehovah in desperate straits, is deliberately suppressed to emphasize human ingenuity (cf. above on 29-31). 1 Maccabees likewise attributes the military success of the rebellion to human shrewdness rather than to divine intervention.

15-17. A Heroic Decision. Esther's noble resolve to go to the king at the risk of her life is the moral high-water mark of the book, even though a cynic may remark that according to Mordecai's argument she had everything to gain and nothing to lose by doing it.

CHAPTER V

THE OPPOSING PLANS OF ESTHER AND OF HAMAN

1-8. Taking a Chance. Tense with the consciousness that her life depended on a royal whim (⁴¹¹) and wearing, with true feminine shrewdness, her royal apparel, Esther entered the forbidden inner court on the morning of the third day after her decision. Fortunately, the king, who spied her from the throne room, was in good humor and extended to her the golden scepter; approaching, she touched it reverently. On being asked what her wish was (it would have been a violation of etiquette to ask a favor from the king without being invited to do so: see Neh. 2⁴; cf. 1 Kings 11⁶), with the promise that it would be granted even to the half of the kingdom (v. 6, 7² Mk. 6²³), Esther, postponing her real petition, simply invited the king and Haman to a banquet. After the meal, when according to Persian custom wine and fruit were served, the king again asked Esther to make her petition. Esther started out to implore the king to save the Jews when suddenly, her strength proving unequal to the ordeal, she procrastinated again and wound up with another invitation.

9-14. Gratifications and Vexations of Haman. Leaving the banquet in high spirits Haman met Mordecai (who had evidently removed his mourning garb when Esther promised her assistance), and at the sight of the unobsequious Jew he lost his good humor. At home he boasted of his wealth and progeny, and, not dreaming that it would be his undoing, of the invitation to the queen's table. But Mordecai was the fly in the ointment. No matter how much we have, one thing is always lacking: David and Ahab obtained it through murder (was it worth the price?); Haman met his doom in the attempt to get it. Haman's wife and friends advised that Mordecai be hanged on the morrow and swing in the wind while Haman should sit happily at the queen's banquet.

CHAPTER VI

MORDECAI HONORED BY THE KING

1-3. An Unrewarded Service. Xerxes was sleepless that night and ordered the royal annals (22³) to be read before him, surprisingly without obtaining the desired result. Toward morning, when they came to the story of the conspiracy disclosed by Mordecai (22¹⁻²³), the king became interested and asked how the man who had saved his life had been rewarded; he was told that nothing had been done for Mordecai.

4-9. Haman's Irritating Blunder. Haman, who had come to the palace early to obtain permission to hang Mordecai, was summoned before the king to propose a plan for honoring a faithful subject. Imagining, in his conceit, that he himself was the person in question, Haman answered that this man should be mounted on a royal steed, crowned, and led through the streets by a high official making a proclamation before him (cf. Gen. 41³⁸⁻⁴⁴).

10, 11. A Public Recognition of Mordecai's Loyalty. The shock to Haman in hearing that the man he was proposing to have hanged was to be honored with the dignities he expected for himself must have been as great as the shock to David when Nathan said, "Thou art the man" (2 Sam. 12⁷); but, concealing his feelings, he carried through the ordeal unflinchingly.

12-14. Haman's Misgivings. After the unexpected demonstration of royal esteem Mordecai went back to his familiar haunt. But Haman went home mourning and having his head covered (cf. comment on 4¹⁻³ and 7⁸ 2 Sam. 15³⁰ Jer. 14⁴). His wise men gave him no comfort. In the duel between the Jew Mordecai and the Agagite Haman (3¹) the doom of the latter was foreordained in the scriptural predictions of the fall of Amalek (Ex. 17¹⁶ Num. 24²⁰ Deut. 25¹⁷⁻¹⁹ 1 Sam. 15^{2f.}). In the midst of these forebodings a chamberlain came to summon Haman to the banquet (cf. Lk. 14¹⁷).

THE DOWNFALL OF HAMAN

1-6. Esther's Petition. While drinking wine after the meal (5⁶) the king for the third time (5³, 6) asked Esther for her wish. With impassioned words Esther begged for her life and for that of her people (without naming their nationality): they have been sold to be destroyed; had they been sold into slavery she would have said nothing. The end of v. 4 (although, etc.) is unintelligible in the Hebrew. Horrified, the king asked who had made the murderous plan; Esther, pointing her finger to Haman, forthwith accused him. Haman, who had not had the opportunity to vindicate himself, realized, in his panic, that he had unwittingly planned the death of the queen.

7-10. Haman's End. While the king had gone out in the park (1⁵) to recover from the shock, Haman, wild with terror, fell at the feet of the queen, who was reclining on her couch (cf. Amos 6⁴), for she alone could now save him. Xerxes, detecting him thus, misconstrued his intentions; Esther, adamant against all pity, took an unfair advantage of an absurd suspicion of the king and allowed Haman to be condemned for a crime he had not committed. Perhaps she surmised that Haman could have justified the decree against the Jews if given a chance, although later the king thought he had condemned Haman for his hostility against the Jews (8⁷). The eunuchs covered Haman's head, in Greece and Rome a mark of capital punishment. Harbonah (1¹⁰) mentioned the gallows erected in Haman's house for Mordecai (5¹⁴), and the king, a man easily influenced and moody, took the hint. The author loved poetic justice: the dignities expected by Haman belong to Mordecai (6^{6f.}), and on the gibbet that he had erected for his enemy Haman was hanged himself: "Whoso diggeth a pit shall fall therein" (Prov. 26²⁷).

CHAPTER VIII

MORDECAI'S ELEVATION AND THE RESCUE OF THE JEWS

1, 2. Mordecai Made Prime Minister. As was done with people condemned to death (Herodotus iii, 129), Haman's property was confiscated and presented by the king to Esther, who intrusted it to Mordecai's administration. When the king heard that Mordecai was a cousin and foster father of the queen (2⁷) he gave him the rank of the highest officials (1¹⁴; cf. 1¹⁰ 7⁹) and granted him the possession of the royal signet-ring (3¹⁰). In power and wealth Mordecai was henceforth second only to the king.

3-8. The Appeal for the Jews. With unnecessary personal risk (4¹¹), for Mordecai was now the grand vizier, Esther made her petition in behalf of her nation; with disinterested and ardent patriotic zeal, now that her own safety was not in question, even before the golden scepter was stretched forth as a sign of immunity (4¹¹), she begged the king to revoke the edict that Haman had devised for his private vengeance (3^{12f.}). In spite of his favorable attitude the king was unable to revoke the edict (1⁹), but he gave Esther and Mordecai full authority to make it harmless with another one (cf. 3¹¹).

9-14. A New Edict. Two months and ten days after the promulgation of Haman's edict (3¹²) its counterpart was prepared and published with the usual procedure (3^{12f.}), only that to gain time especially swift and well-bred horses were furnished to the couriers. In the new law the prescriptions of 3¹³ were reversed: the Jews were allowed to massacre and plunder their foes. Would any king of Persia ever have allowed the Jews to kill at will his faithful subjects?

15-17. Contrasting Reactions to the Edict. An ovation greeted Mordecai as he went forth from the palace with a royal garment (6⁸, 11) of blue and white (1⁶), crowned with a diadem (different from the royal crown, 1¹¹ 2¹⁷ 6⁸). In the provinces the Jews received the new edict with exuberant joy and proclaimed a holiday; the heathen were struck with terror: many, in their panic, actually became Jewish proselytes.

CHAPTER IX

THE REVENGE OF THE JEWS AND THE FEAST OF PURIM

1-5. The Day. On the 13th of Adar (February-March), when the two conflicting decrees (313 811) went into effect, the Jews assembled themselves for the fray while their disorganized enemies fell into a panic (817). The provincial authorities, now that Mordecai was at the helm, did not hesitate between the opposite instructions received from the king (312 89): siding with the Jews, they contributed to wipe out their foes, whether active or passive. It was not a battle but a massacre of Saint Bartholomew: the heathen did not attack, the Jews suffered no casualties. The murderous plan of Haman was simply reversed (for another instance of poetic justice see 77-10).

6-10. The Bloodshed in Susa. In the capital five hundred heathen were slain in addition to the ten sons of Haman, whose names are written in a vertical column in the Hebrew text "because they were hung (v. 13f.) perpendicularly one over the other" (Buxdorf). No property was plundered (in spite of 811), lest the heathen say, "I have made Abraham rich" (Gen. 1423; so Grotius).

11-15. A Second Massacre. The king was so unconcerned with the slaughter of so many of his subjects that he offered to grant another wish of Esther. The cruel queen asked for a renewal of these atrocities on the following day and for an exhibition of the ill-fated sons of Haman upon the gallows (cf. on vv. 6-10). So it was done; three hundred more victims fell on the 14th in Susa, for no other reason than to justify the celebration of Purim on both days (cf. on v. 18f.).

16-19. The Feast of Purim. In the provinces the Jews slaughtered seventy-five thousand (LXX 15,000) heathen on the 13th of Adar and celebrated on the 14th; in Susa, where the butchery continued for two days, the celebration came on the 15th: thus the author explains why Purim was celebrated on the 14th in the villages and on the 15th in the cities (see, however, vv. 21f.). The reason for the divergence seems to be that the fast of the 13th, when the festival was introduced from the Eastern provinces into Jerusalem, had to be postponed to the 14th because the 13th was the celebration of the defeat of Nicanor in 161 B.C. (1 Macc. 749; cf. 2 Macc. 1536).

20-22. Instructions for the Celebration of Purim. Mordecai ordered all the Jews to celebrate on both the 13th and the 14th, obliterating the difference between villages and cities in the date (vv. 16-19): Josephus asserts that in his time both days were observed, and the Mishna (200 A.D.) legalizes the two different dates of vv. 16-19.

23-28. The Significance of Purim. The name of the festival is derived from the word "Pur" (plural Purim), which is said to mean "lot" but cannot be identified in any known language. Haman had determined the day of the proposed pogrom by casting lots (37), but was ordered hanged together with his sons by the king (Esther's intervention is not mentioned here). The averted danger was to be celebrated yearly by the Jews and their proselytes, everywhere and in all future time. This summary does not agree in all details with the rest of the book.

29-32. A Second Letter of Instructions. Esther joined Mordecai in prescribing to the Jews of the one hundred and twenty-seven provinces (11) the observance of Purim, adding to the previous directions that one day (later the 13th was chosen) be devoted to fasting, in commemoration of the fasting of 43 and of that of 416f.

CHAPTER X

THE EPILOGUE

The author breaks off an account of the reign of Xerxes (a new tribute is mentioned) by referring the reader, after the pattern of the books of Kings, to the Persian royal annals (223). In his exaltation Mordecai did not forget, as often happens, his own nation: active in furthering the welfare of the Jews, he was free from envy on their part and was greatly beloved.

JOB

BY PRINCIPAL W. F. LOFTHOUSE

INTRODUCTION

Literary Classification. The book of Job occupies a unique position in the O.T. It stands outside all the recognized classifications of O.T. literature. It is neither Law (Torah) nor history; it has nothing in common with the Prophets, nor (for the most part) with the piety of the Psalms; it is often classed as part of the Wisdom Literature, but both in literary form and general outlook Job is different; still less has it anything in common with the apocalyptic books. A large part of the book may be called a dialogue; but the dialogue is rather a succession of elaborate speeches than the quick interchange of conversation, such as is often found in the narrative books. There is no direct attempt at edification; in fact, a great deal of the book would be, and actually was, found disturbing to Jewish orthodoxy; and although it is concerned with ideas that may be called theological, there is no formal theological system to be discerned. The author has, indeed, been classed among the "skeptics of the O.T.," and regarded as deliberately cutting himself off from all the traditions of his race. The first effect is bewildering to one who is familiar with the spirit of the rest of the O.T.

General Character. Certain things, however, are clear: the book is poetry (with varied but quite distinct rhythms, and all the parallelism which characterizes Hebrew poetry) set in a framework of prose; it is concerned all through with the relation of God's government of the world to suffering and evil; certain speeches, attributed to Elihu, could be removed without apparent detriment to the composition or symmetry of the rest of the book; the "speeches" of Jehovah at the end of the book, or something like them, are needed, and yet they seem curiously irrelevant to the questions which have hitherto been asked; and some few passages (notably ch. 28) fit very badly into their context.

Thus, four large questions immediately arise: (1) Is the book a compilation; and, if so, how did the compiler treat his material? (2) Were the materials used independent of each other, and what was their relation to the general current of Hebrew thought? (3) What is the date of the book in its present form, and of its materials, so far as they had a separate existence? (4) What was the purpose of the author or of the compiler and of the separate authors?

Every conceivable answer has been given to each of these questions, by professed scholars, and by "amateurs" like Froude in Short Studies on Great Subjects and (by implication) H. G. Wells in The Undying Fire. The details will be found in the longer commentaries. The following paragraphs, without explicit reference to existing theories, attempt to set forth the main considerations necessary to the reader of the book in forming his judgment.

The Problem of Evil. The subject of the book is commonly held to be the Problem of Evil; and at first sight the book contains five answers to the question, "Why is evil allowed?"—the answers (1) of the Satan (or adversary): to test a goodness that may be only skin-deep; (2) of the friends: to punish wickedness, recognized or unrecognized; (3) of Job himself: because God is really unjust; (4) of Elihu: to warn or to educate and train; and (5) of Jehovah: to bring home to man his ignorance. The arrangement by which these answers are contrasted with one another is as ingenious as it is effective; the first, being the most superficial, is naturally put into the introduction or prologue; the second and third are elaborated in three cycles of speeches, in each of which Job answers the separate Friends in turn; the fourth (for the literary independence of the Elihu section is not universally held) is placed in a set of discourses to which neither Job nor his friends, from their standpoints, could well make reply; and the fifth, like a mysterious storm suddenly gathering and then clearing the air, reduces all the speakers to an awed silence, and a brief Epilogue leaves us again, not inartistically, at the lower level of the Prologue.

Apparently no one of these five answers is meant to be decisive; the fifth, indeed, seems no answer at all, but only the denial of the possibility of an answer. The other four, undoubtedly, contain elements of truth; but each of them raises about as many new questions as it answers. The Satan is apparently right; Job utters curses which even to our ears sound shocking; the contentions of the Friends are in several places echoed, with a good deal more force, by Job himself; Job is condemned, yet divinely rewarded at the last; and what he is condemned for is not clear—certainly not for the sins of which the Friends had accused him, while nothing is said to suggest that Elihu's view of suffering is really wrong. Whatever the separate authors (supposing them to have existed) may have thought, can we imagine that the compiler had made up his mind?

The Main Question. The main interest of the book, however, is not so abstract; the Satan is not interested in general theology, or even in a theodicy; he wants to know, "How will a pious man stand the test of pain?" and, with all the writhing of the tortured thought in the chapters that follow, that question is never lost sight of. The Satan's own answer (which, it may well be, we are never intended to forget in the later chapters) is, "He will renounce God"; Job's answer, in the Prologue, is, "He will take what God sends," and then "He will pray to die," "He will deny God's justice," and "He will appeal from God to—whom?" The Friends, in tones that vary between courtesy and brutality, insist, "He will ask with confidence for forgiveness and release. It is to the wicked that suffering comes." The central part of the book shows Job twisting in the chains of this logic, and finally throwing them off: "I am not wicked, but you are unjust or God is! Let me die. Yet this cannot be God's last word; he will vindicate me at the last." Elihu takes even less account of the promethean struggles of Job than do the Friends; but he recalls our attention to the original question, and replies, "He will bear it with equanimity, knowing that there is a purpose in it all, to be understood in good time." And, with the practical issue in mind, Jehovah's addresses become less perplexing: "He will turn from his own sufferings to the vast magnificence of nature, and complaint will be silenced in awe."

Hebrew "Orthodoxy." The book, we said, is unique in Hebrew thought; yet it implies Hebrew thought on every page. Without the rest of the O.T. it would mean nothing. It is written, indeed, against a background of Hebrew "orthodoxy" and the perplexities that followed for the orthodox. Evil, as all that causes pain or suffering, must be distinguished in the O.T. from sin; but since God is regarded as the author of good and evil alike, it was natural to look upon all evil as the penal result of sin. This at once raised practical difficulties. If evil is punishment, it obviously falls upon the wrong persons. Why do the wicked flourish, and why are the righteous reduced to poverty? In Proverbs, indeed, the old-fashioned attitude is for the most part preserved: "Do good and you will be rewarded; do evil, and you will suffer for it." But what if the rule does not hold? This is the question that puzzled many of the psalmists; and the natural course was to fall back on one of two statements; either, "There is no need to fret; the wicked or their descendants will be punished in the end"; or, "The good suffer only for a time; the pious man will never starve" (cf. Psa. 37, 49, 73). Both these expedients seem at times to be pointing to something further: "The good can never really suffer; for goodness means the favor of God, whatever outward circumstances may be; and God's favor is the pearl of great price."

This conception, however, had not made its way generally into Hebrew thought, and the book of Job is very far from taking it for granted. As far as the central part of the book is concerned, the Friends and Job start on the same level; a modern psychologist might see in the Friends the expression of an element in Job's thought, projected outside him to gain fuller emphasis. It is as if the sick man says to himself: "This must be a punishment for my sin. Yet how have I sinned? It is a cruel thought. And God must be cruel too. But is he? Does he believe that I have sinned? Let him come into the open and charge me to my face. If he would, my innocence would be proclaimed. He terrifies me now; then, he would clear me. He will clear me. I could wait for that, even though he were to kill me while I was waiting."

Job's Reaction. Such are the quick transitions of Job's thought, as, on fire with resentment or longing or despair or anguish or rapture, he flings his guesses at truth against the ruthless reiteration of traditional beliefs, his friends', or his own; a reiteration which deepens in intensity and pitilessness as the dialogue proceeds. He hardly ever challenges them outright; in his agony he is made to double hither and thither like the hunted creature he feels himself to be, till he flies for refuge "from man's God to God's God." It is here that we are aware of the supreme art of the poem, for even if in the entire absence of action we do not call it dramatic, as we call an Elizabethan play dramatic, the author has taken the surest way to make us feel the triple contrast—the contrast between Job and his friends, between the more benignant and the more cruel forms that their orthodoxy (the orthodoxy of Psa. 37, be it noted) might take, and between the nervous shifting of Job's emotions and the steady advance to a conception of God of which they could understand and know nothing. If, on the other hand, the author wished to show the wrestling of an individual soul, stricken down by some immense woe, with the beliefs in which he had been brought up, but which, like some ancient idol, only brought terror when men craved for comfort, how could he have done it better?

Speeches of Elihu and Jehovah. When we pass to Elihu, we are on a lower level of experience. Elihu has not made up his mind; he has three theories, none of which appears to satisfy him. Elihu understands Job's agony as little as do the Friends. For a milder kind of suffering his suggestions might be, and are, well enough. And they take us further than most of the psalmists had traveled. But if we are intended to imagine him addressing Job as Job lies stretched on his dunghill, it is fit that no reply should be made to him. Job turns from the irrelevant youth with mute contempt. To turn from Elihu to the speeches of Jehovah is like turning from Wordsworth's Ecclesiastical Sonnets to the noblest of his Odes. Here we have Hebrew nature poetry at its best and most characteristic. It is entirely different from the romantic and imaginative nature poetry of the West. Neither Keats nor Shelley nor perhaps Byron could have written a line of it. Its real strength lies in its descriptive powers and its controlling sense of the unseen. For the Hebrew poet vision is much more than feeling. To another great poet (in Psa. 104) the world is a vast storehouse of wonders, whose usefulness for the human race is its chief glory.

Here, however, not as in Psa. 104, the poet takes the opposite line; his eye rests on all the elements in this varied world that man cannot use, nor even understand, and his thought trembles at the hidden operations that cause the changes he sees. The result is a series of rhetorical questions to which only one answer is possible, and which leave the mind half paralyzed, as if the repeated shocks of suffering were to be overcome by a yet deeper shock, of helplessness in the presence of the unknown and unknowable. Yet is this psychologically true? Would the restless moods of Job, embittered by the heartlessness of his friends, irritated by the well-meant commonplaces of Elihu, have been calmed by this majestic summons to humility? The description, indeed, of Job as darkening counsel by words of no understanding (if meant for Job) seems either beside the mark, or cruelly unjust. We may indeed be intended to conclude that there is no answer to the question, "Why does the good man suffer?" save omnia exeunt in mysterium; but what are we intended to say, now, to the book's central question, "What will the good man do under the test?" How does Jehovah in all this give his own answer to the Satan? Or are we intended to regard these addresses as an interlude, and, satisfied that Job has not really renounced him, find the real answer of Jehovah in his restoration of Job to more than his former prosperity?

Composition of the Book. At this point we must return to the subject of the composition of the book. Was it a compilation? We have now some data for a solution of this problem. The book can be called an intellectual unity, yet the joints between the different parts are clearly visible. Some of them become more visible when we consider the literary characteristics. The Prologue and Epilogue are in simple straightforward prose, with some of the qualities of the "folk-tale," but the narrator understands the value of repetition, and the scene in heaven is described with a very dignified reticence. Job himself is set before us as an august patriarchal hero, who might well have suggested the reference in Ezek. 14 or in Jas. 5¹¹. It is tempting to regard the Prologue and Epilogue as a single composition; but while the point of view is the same in both, and quite innocent of the deeper questions raised in the body of the book, the first verse of the Epilogue demands more than the narrative of the Prologue has actually given. When we pass to the Dialogues, and to poetry (of a very high order throughout), we notice at once a change in the use of the divine names; the name "Jehovah" is never used outside the prose sections (save in the "stage directions"); instead, the non-national names "El," "Eloah," "Shaddai," and "Elyon." These suggest, like everything else in the poem, a deliberate desire to keep the reader's thought away from any association with the chosen nation. When we approach the Elihu chapters, however, we find that he seems to have a special preference for the first of these names; there are other linguistic peculiarities which, taken together, are not negligible; and the prolixity of the style marks off these chapters. On the other hand, the Jehovah speeches show no noticeable differences in style or language from the dialogues.

Certain sections (namely, ch. 28 and parts of chs. 40, 41, 42) seem clearly out of harmony with their surroundings (see notes there), and other shorter passages, omitted in the LXX (see below), may have been inserted later; when allowance has been made for these, the possibilities of the composition of the book are almost endless. Were each of the four main divisions of the book independent—the Prologue and Epilogue (symbol PE in the following discussion), the Dialogue (symbol D), the Elihu speeches (symbol E), and Jehovah (symbol J), with a compiler to fit them all together later? Or did the author of one division (e.g., D) take the others and adapt them to his own work? Or was PE first in existence, and were the divisions added to it, at once, or gradually? The only point on which everyone seems agreed is that D is homogeneous, if some rearrangements are made toward its close (see notes prefixed to ch. 22). It is equally clear that D is not complete in itself. Something is needed, both by way of beginning and end. For this we have PE. (These are not the symbols J, E, P, D of the Pentateuch; cf. p. 137a.)

Many readers will think that if the author of D had written PE, he would have introduced into both parts of his work more cross-references. The frame seems to have been made with no thought of the picture. For this reason, PE has often been held to be an older tale of a half-legendary hero, which suggested D to some later thinker, as Holinshed or Saxo suggested Lear or Hamlet to Shakespeare. It is specially difficult (though of course not impossible) to think that a man who could write D would be satisfied with the rather "bourgeois" magnificence of the Epilogue. Yet is PE homogeneous? The story of Job's distress and his patience beneath it may well have been a popular tale; but the scenes in heaven, unreferred to in the Epilogue (see on 42^{7f.}), do not belong to a folk-tale motif. They are nearer to Goethe than to Marlowe. Where certainty is unattainable, we can but guess that the author of D took (and perhaps rewrote) the beginning of the old story, added the episode of the Satan and Jehovah to lift it to the region in which his own thought was to move, and then, at the end, added (or left for another) the traditional conclusion.

What, then, of J? It must be remembered that the problem is simpler if we omit from J the dubious sections (40⁶–41³⁴); but would not the author of D have been more direct? Does Jehovah say what the argument of the book demands? On the other hand, we can well believe the descriptions of behemoth and leviathan to have been independent compositions. The conception of an address by Jehovah himself as the answer to the agonized cries of Job is masterly, and worthy of the author of D. Equally worthy is the elevated style and imagery of chs. 38, 39. But what is the answer which the author embodies in these chapters? The words out of the whirlwind make no reference to the Friends, nor (still more surprisingly) to Job's sufferings. And Jehovah's presence does not bring a moment's respite to Job's sufferings. Job is lying all the time in dust and ashes. Nor is there a single word of sympathy, still less of vindication (the last is left for the Epilogue). The effect on Job is best expressed by Rom. 3¹⁹, "that every mouth may be stopped, and all the world may be brought under the judgment of God." But Jehovah vindicates his justice as little as he vindicates Job's innocence. Man must find peace, as Job (we are probably intended to believe) found it at the last, not in God's love to the individual sufferer (a thought quite foreign to the book) but in the contemplation of the broad sweep of his creative and providential wisdom.

But we must recognize, if this is true, that what is to us the real strength of the author's work lies in D. The picture of Job there is fiercely clear, and the reader is made to feel, almost with horror, that if, in the Prologue, God allows Job to be put on his trial, in D Job puts God on his trial. Perhaps, to the average pious Jew, this was enough to deserve the treatment Job receives in chs. 38, 39, with or without the addition of the Epilogue. But it is hardly possible for us to imagine that the author of D, when he wrote, e.g., 9¹⁷⁻³⁵, or 19¹⁻²⁷, could have tolerated Job's submission (in ch. 40^{3f.}) to such appeals as those of chs. 38, 39. The Jehovah of these chapters is neither the God with whom Job would take refuge nor the God whom Job attacks. He at least is never vindicated. Did the author think he would be? That is his secret. This leaves E to be considered. Most scholars have seen strong reasons for separating E from the author of D, though some have regarded it as the very center of the book. The thought is on a lower level. The style is distinctly inferior. The language has a number of dialectic peculiarities, and there are numerous cross-references to the rest of the book, though in word rather than in thought. But it certainly implies the existence of D. If then it did not come from the same pen as D, who wrote it? We can only suppose that someone later on, dissatisfied perhaps with the result of D, and perhaps of J, and unable to appreciate or understand the daring speculations of the author, added something intended to satisfy the more cautious readers, as a later editor seems to have "improved" Ecclesiastes.

But is this certain? Elihu (see on ch. 32) comes forward as an exponent of a kind of orthodoxy brought up to date. He thinks he has much to say; yet he practically says nothing, and with foolish pompousness. But he does clearly refer to Job's words, even if he (not unnaturally) misunderstands them. His main interest is that of the rest of the book—how should a good man behave under suffering? His denials of the need of a theophany, to the reader who knows that ch. 38 is coming, are full of "dramatic irony." May it be that the author, having brought the wisdom of antiquity to silence, wished to show that a revised or modernized traditionalism was still more futile, and so—gave us Elihu?

According to the view here outlined, the author of D, busied over his problem of the testing of the good man and its result, in his breaking away from tradition, used the existing story of Job, finding it the more convenient to his purpose because, lying outside Israel, it enabled him to neglect any special revelation from Israel's God; turning part of it into an introduction, and transforming it by a striking piece of imagination. He then left it on one side, and dramatized his own laboring thoughts; then, perhaps after an interval, he added E (if our conjecture will hold good) and J, and left the work to be rounded off with so much of the concluding parts of PE as were of use to it.

The general view, however, is that later on, when the book passed out of the control of the author of D and J, E was inserted. All this, we must confess, is at best speculation; though what is there to be done but speculate? Many have preferred to postulate a compiler, who took the independent PE, D, etc., and fitted them more or less clumsily together. Against this, however, "clumsy" is hardly a fair word. And the difficulty of seeing how J or E could have arisen apart from D remains. The present position of PE, too, is made far more intelligible by supposing that the author of D was responsible for it rather than a compiler. The most that can be said in this direction is that J may have been added later, as well as E. But if D was left without J, it must have been left without the concluding part, and therefore all, of PE. And we are back again where we started.

Date. PE (see note on 117) regards Job as living at an early period; and it may itself be early; many have regarded the view of the Satan (but see above and note on 16) as distinctly naïve; in D there are no indications of an early stage of thought. On the contrary, although Job is always represented as the patriarchal seigneur, his speeches are full of references to what may be called an advanced state of society; this is specially marked in, e.g., chs. 24 and 29. The extremes of wealth and poverty, the power of unscrupulous riches, the allusions to trade, and the development of political organization, all point to a period in Israelite thought very much later than that of Moses or even David. It is true that in the near East, in biblical times as to-day, what we call old and new live contentedly side by side; the Bedouin sheikh of to-day is really a contemporary of Abraham and Lot; and the Babylon of Hammurabi's time, and even long before, was more "modern" than Ahab's Samaria or Jehoiakim's Jerusalem. But (so far at least as our evidence goes) it was only after the Exile that the Jews were brought into contact with the very varied conditions of civilization with which the book presents us; and there is no sign that, before the Exile, the intellectual problem with which the author is dealing had risen before the Hebrew mind, or that the non-national point of view, already emphasized, would have been understood or entertained. Little is to be learned, indeed, from the considerations of style on which some lay weight; but the "Aramaisms" (idioms strange to classical Hebrew, but found in Aramaic, which after the Exile became more and more the language of everyday intercourse in Palestine as elsewhere in Western Asia) point, especially for E, where they are more frequent, to a post-exilic date.

Literary Relationships. On the other hand, the absence of any references to "apocalyptic" or to the deeper piety found in some of what are presumably the later psalms suggests a date not very long after the return. This, it is true, is not decisive; the author may have chosen to neglect them; but, if he had been writing when they were common property, he would have done so, with such a subject as his, rather at his peril. Other evidence may lie in the numerous similarities between Job and other parts of the O.T. The clearest example of these is in the "parody" of Psa. 84, in Job 717 and perhaps 256. In most instances it is impossible to say which influenced the other; but the balance of probability seems to point to the priority of Job. If the author knew the earlier psalms, later writers had studied him. In any case, the book in its completed form must be placed before the end of the second century B.C., as is shown by its appearance in the LXX, and by its place both in that translation and in the Hebrew canon (see below).

Much discussion of late has centered round the relation of Job to a recently discovered Babylonian work, often known as the "Babylonian Job." This has survived in texts of the seventh century, though it is probably a far older work. In it the hero, a king, laments that he is in sore trouble, in spite of his meticulous piety. His sufferings remind us of Job's; and toward the truncated end of the poem they are apparently removed by the mercy of the gods. But there the resemblance ceases; for the Babylonian sufferer is outwardly very much more "pious" than Job, and is convinced that he must have transgressed unintentionally—a frequent motif in Babylonian "penitential" psalms (cf. Lev. 42 514-19, etc.); and he never suggests that heaven is unjust to him. Further, there is no dialogue; the Babylonian poems, which are usually quoted as instances of dialogue like the book of Job, and which date at least from the eighth century, are wholly different in thought and intention. That the Hebrews were influenced by Babylonian literature there is considerable evidence to prove (though it may easily be exaggerated); but to find motifs for Job one might as well go to Plato (possibly a contemporary) as to the poems here referred to.

On the other hand, Job is commonly connected with the Wisdom Literature of Judaism—Proverbs, some of the Psalms, Ecclesiastes, Sirach, and the Wisdom of Solomon. All of these books show a certain emancipation from the national standpoint which is prevalent in the Law, the Prophets, and the apocalyptic books; though all of them, except Job, some few psalms, and Ecclesiastes, echo the Hebrew's pride in the past and the future of his nation. But with Wisdom, in the three main senses in which we meet it in these books, Job has practically nothing to do. The word "Wisdom" may mean practical skill in the direction of life and its affairs; the half-personified agency by which God carried out his creation; or the humble yet confident piety which, starting from recognized beliefs, would "justify the ways of God to men." Our author's interest lies in quite other directions. Nor is he rightly called a skeptic, like the author of Ecclesiastes. Ecclesiastes illustrates the first kind of Wisdom; life can only be lived satisfactorily by taking things as they come or go; the author is content to "leave our Lord God out of the play." This is the last thing Job can do. He may question all the accepted views about God; but that God is there, and must "make it plain" at the last, he cannot doubt.

Place. The book itself contains many allusions to Edom; Edom was the home of the Friends; it is also suggested that the land of Uz may have been in or near to Edom; but this is quite uncertain. The wisdom of Edom appears as traditional in several passages of the Bible (cf. Jer. 49⁷ Obad. v. 8). Has the author of Job, then, any real connection with Edom, so bitterly hated by the Jews, yet so respected, it would seem, by her sages? This can hardly be maintained. Of the reputed wisdom of Edom we know nothing; and if the author brings three of his characters from Edom (Elihu has nothing to do with Edom, it may be noted), their point of view is entirely Jewish; and, whether it is Edomite or not, Job will have none of it. But is Job himself represented as living in Edom—as being an Edomite chief? This is equally doubtful. Life in Edom, in O.T. times, before the wonderful developments in Petra, was stern and hard; a long conflict with rock and desert. The Edomites (making all due allowance for the hatred of their traditional foes) were little better than brigands. The wealth and the wide agricultural and pastoral prosperity of Job's house and estates point rather to the Hauran, farther north, than to Edom. But the matter is of little importance. The author had quite enough skill to give his characters a non-Jewish environment; his thought is Jewish through and through.

Canonicity and Text. Reference has already been made to the place of the book in the Hebrew canon. When was the book accepted as canonical? It would not be surprising if a work so daring and even in places so irreverent had found difficulty in being accepted at all. This, however, is not the case. The book stands in the third part of the Hebrew canon, the Hagiographa, or the "Writings," following Psalms and Proverbs; in some Jewish lists and MSS. it precedes them, for the same reason that gained its general acceptance, namely, that it was believed to be a work of great antiquity, perhaps referring to the time of Moses. For this reason some Christian writers of antiquity placed it among the histories; its place in our Bibles is due to the position which was given it in the Vulgate, between the histories and the poetical books; and the esteem which led it to be almost universally regarded as historical saved it from the doubts that clustered around Ecclesiastes and Canticles.

From the fifth chapter on, the Greek translation (LXX) omits a number of clauses. In some books, such omissions furnish important evidence for the correction of the text; here they tell us little; occasionally, however, the LXX appears to have preserved the right order of verses where the Hebrew text has been disarranged; for the rest, the LXX shows that even when the book was first translated into Greek many words and phrases were felt to be very obscure, and textual variations were common.

Religious Value. No thoughtful reader can fail to be aware that he is here dealing with one of the great poems of the world. Even if we confine our attention to D, it is the longest sustained poetical composition in the Hebrew canon; and it never sinks below the high level on which it starts. Its terse phrases, its illuminating metaphors and similes, and its brilliant descriptions refuse to be dislodged from the memory. Note especially the dream, 412-21; the peace of the good man, 518-27; the disappointed caravan, 615-20; the hostility of God, 1611-14; the misery of the outcasts, 245-11; the marvels of the heavens, 3831-35 (see notes in the commentary). Equally arresting is its penetrating ethical criticism; ch. 31 is the fullest exposition of Hebrew moral ideals that we possess. Even more surprising are its powers of psychological analysis; at first sight, Job's moods seem to follow one another with merely chaotic violence; closer study shows how each prepares for the next (note especially chs. 9, 10, and 19:13-29).

The very nature of the subject suggests that there will be but little positive religious teaching. And it may be said that the "orthodoxy" against which Job argues so unweariedly has long since lost all interest for us. As we have seen, Jehovah's speeches, where we might have looked for a revelation, appear to contain nothing but a sublime hymn to the power and mystery of nature. This seems to have been the feeling of the N.T. writers. Job is directly quoted only once (1 Cor. 3:19=Job. 5:13; and perhaps alluded to in Mt. 24:28=Job 39:30), and the reference in James (5:11) can no more than that in Ezekiel (14:14) be called a quotation from our book. But when the reader looks deeper, especially if he too has known suffering at all like Job's, he will find how much positive teaching and inspiration is to be found, especially in the speeches of Job himself. The question, "How will a good man act, and what should he think, when he is tested by suffering?" is one which most serious people face at some time or other. In the first place, suffering is felt, throughout the book, to be in direct relation to God—the impulse to hide ourselves in the dark when in pain, or the superstition, perhaps derived from Hebrew "orthodoxy," to think of God as angry with us receives here its death-blow. Secondly, Job's resolve never to deceive himself, to face the worst, and even "to tell God what he thinks of him," is not only a challenge to courage; it is the preparation for intellectual illumination. Thirdly, no one can read the book sympathetically without becoming infected by Job's faith, that even though both nature and experience "shriek against his creed," there is a reason and a purpose and an ultimate vindication of justice and goodness in things.

Unique in Hebrew literature, the book of Job finds a curious parallel in Æschylus' Prometheus Vincitus; a parallel and a contrast. Prometheus, chained to a rock in the Caucasus, has incurred the anger of Zeus, because he had brought to mortals the gift of fire—the means of civilized existence. He is visited there by nymphs, by the spirit of ocean, and by another sufferer from the tyranny of Zeus, and bidden by them, not in superior piety, but genuine sympathy, to submit. He refuses; he will wait till Zeus relents; or he speaks of a secret which will accomplish the doom of Zeus himself. Hermes comes to bid him reveal this secret, Again he refuses, and the earth opens, to plunge him into fresh tortures, and he disappears with the cry, "See the injustice of my fate." The same indignant accusation, the same wistful longing, the same assertion of the sufferer's righteousness, but a world of difference between the Greek and Hebrew outlook on God and the world. Prometheus finds sympathy from his friends, while Zeus is what Prometheus thinks him to be, relentless, savage, and himself under the stern empire of destiny. Job is condemned by men, but finds that God is not what he had been tortured into thinking, but the eternal source of wisdom and power and even of justice.

The Greek is pessimistic; the Hebrew is not. What he is can be seen by a comparison with Jeremiah. Jeremiah too comes perilously near to what respectability would hold blasphemous. But to both, what seemed neglect or injustice or positive tyranny became "a stinging that bids not sit nor stand but go." If there was hidden from both the truth of the redemptive transformation of suffering, as it is learned in Isa. 53, we see in Job the wrestler who cries out to his terrible antagonist, "I will not let thee go except thou bless me." The dialogue (and, after all, the dialogue is the kernel of the book) ends, it is true, on a note of interrogation; but it is an interrogation that prepares the way for Rom. 8 and Jn. 17. Immortality, as the Christian understands it, is hidden from the eyes of the writer; but no one can rightly understand or value that crown of truth unless in some way he has been forced, step by step, as was Job, to look beyond the tragedy of this earthly existence to the eternal life which is rooted in communion with God. In the ordinary sense of the word, the book can no more be called an autobiography than it can be called history; but few will doubt that the author has dramatized questions and agonies of his own; and when we touch that brave spirit, we touch also the Captain of all those who, without us, shall not be made complete (Heb. 2:10 mg.).

CHAPTERS 1 AND 2: THE PROLOGUE

The story of Job's testing, in five scenes: Job's piety and wealth; the Satan's first suggestion to Jehovah; its failure; the Satan's second suggestion; its failure. The whole is a skillful combination of terseness and subtlety, proving that real goodness is superior to anything that the Satan can effect.

CHAPTER I

1-5. Job's Piety and Wealth. The land of Uz—cf. Gen. 10²³ 22²¹ 36²⁸. There is no need to discuss its precise locality. Job is described as a great sheikh and a non-Israelite; perfect, a rounded or full-orbed character. His day—possibly, but not certainly, the birthday. House—cf. v. 19, might be used for "tent." Offered—was Job also a priest? The Levitical regulations would not apply outside Israel. Renounce—the word usually means "bless"; see v. 11, 25, 8; not 31. Perhaps here for "say farewell to"; or a euphemism inserted later in the text (cf. 2 Sam. 12¹⁴).

6-22. Job's First Test and His Faithfulness. Jehovah—the national name for God is used in the prose portions, not elsewhere. He is represented here as holding a sort of court of supernatural beings, sons of god, or the gods of whom the "adversary" (Satan) is one; the word occurs in Num. 22²²; also as a proper name in 1 Chr. 21¹ and with the article in Zech. 3¹. Note, in v. 8, the repetition from v. 1. For nought (v. 9), i.e., without due equivalent. Vv. 11, 12 show that the Satan is entirely dependent on Jehovah; and Jehovah, in accepting his suggestion, forbids him to go beyond it. Note in vv. 13-19 the literary force of the messengers' formula; blow on blow; though there is no climax till v. 18. Sabeans (v. 15)—traders from southwest Arabia (cf. Gen. 10⁷, 28). Fire—cf. 1 Kings 18³⁸ 2 Kings 1¹². Chaldeans (v. 17)—an archaic use; later, identical with Babylonians. LXX has "horsemen." They rush the camels from three sides. Blessed (v. 21), as in 15, etc. (see note). Job here stresses God's power rather than his love. Foolishness (v. 22)="savorlessness"; LXX uses a word which implies the opposite of "discretion."

CHAPTER II

1-10. Job's Second Test and His Faithfulness. Holdeth fast (v. 3)—cf. v. 9; Job's attitude throughout the dialogue. Without cause—cf. 19. Skin for skin (v. 4)—apparently a quotation of some rough proverbial phrase; perhaps a reference to Bedouin blackmail. The loathsomeness of Job's disease is everywhere stressed as much as his actual suffering; the same is true of the sufferer in Isa. 53. It was perhaps elephantiasis, or possibly no definite disease was thought of. Blake, in his illustrations to Job, pictures his wife at his side continuously. Foolish (v. 10)—"heartless," or wanton; not the same word as in 12². God can take away the good (11⁰) and give the evil.

11-13. The Coming of Job's Three Friends. The original story is now complete. The Friends have not been previously mentioned; but their mention here is needed as a linkage. Eliphaz (Gen. 36⁴) from Edom, the traditional home of wisdom. We have no clue as to the origin of the other names.

CHAPTERS 3 TO 31: THE DIALOGUE BETWEEN JOB AND HIS FRIENDS

We are now in a new atmosphere; the point of interest is changed. Job's attitude is the reverse of that of 12¹ 21⁰. Are we to understand that some time has elapsed? To the Friends, God is cosmic power, moral power, and justice, now manifested in ruthlessness, now modified by grace. To Job he is irresponsible power, caprice, neglect, cruelty, a kind of Nero; a tyrant in the court, before the judges, or himself the judge, a kind of Jeffreys. But Job does not forget (chs. 16, 19) the God of his earlier belief (ch. 31), a very different being. The Friends are traditionalists; they have no arguments or replies to Job. Why did they not see this? Their absence of reference to his sufferings, their accusations of impiety, and their often harsh and brutal language, surprising in themselves, are really a sort of "defense mechanism," which finally breaks down. Few discerning readers will doubt that this was Job's effect on the Friends. They could find no answer, and so condemned him (32³, and, more vaguely, 42⁷).

CHAPTER III

Job's Passionate Cry for Death. Would I had died at birth (vv. 2-12); then, I should have had rest in Sheol (vv. 13-19). Why must the wretched continue to live? (Vv. 20-26.) With Job's cry, cf. Jer. 20¹⁴⁻¹⁸. A day that brought poor miserable man into the world should be forever of ill-omen. Shadow of death=thick shadow. The last clause of v. 5 is obscure. Leviathan (v. 8) is a sea-monster, like the Babylonian Tiamat. Hence, perhaps for day we should read (by small alteration) sea. Even if I had to be born (v. 11), why must I go on living? The father's knees (v. 12), when he acknowledged the new-born infant. Vv. 13-19 give a touching picture of Sheol, the abode of the dead; generally, as in Psalms and Isa. 38¹⁸, dreaded (as the Greeks dreaded Hades). Waste places (v. 14)—better "pyramids." In Sheol there is no difference between infants and great lords. Job, once a lord, feels himself now no more than a serf. In v. 20, for the first time Job questions God. Hedged (v. 23)—one of the cross references to the Prologue (110). In despair Job cries out (v. 25), I have only to be afraid of something, and it is upon me.

CHAPTERS 4 TO 14: THE FIRST CYCLE

Eliphaz opens (chs. 4, 5) in what is an attempt at reply to ch. 3; Job replies (chs. 6, 7, using singular, not plural) partly to Eliphaz, partly to God: Leave me alone! Bildad (ch. 8) is briefer and more pointed; Job (chs. 9, 10) replies rather to God than to Bildad; there is now a complete gulf between Job and God. Zophar (ch. 11) treats Job with contempt, but ends much as Eliphaz and Bildad had done; Job (chs. 12-14) indignantly attacks both God and the Friends, and ends with a cry of despair.

CHAPTERS 4 AND 5: THE SPEECH OF ELIPHAZ

An elaborate and dignified statement of the traditional Hebrew view (how natural it would be in a psalm!) but with an unmistakably superior and patronizing tone.

CHAPTER IV

1-11. Security of the Righteous. Eliphaz begins with an apology for speaking at all (vv. 2-5); God is just (vv. 6-11); the vision, Shall man vindicate himself before God? (Vv. 12-21.) Affliction is not causeless, but a punishment. The theme is continued into ch. 5 (51-7); for all his might, God is a refuge to the needy (58-16); the humble will be preserved in inviolable peace; this is sure (517-27). In ch. 3, there is no reference to religion save perhaps in v. 23; Eliphaz is distressed at Job's apparent irreligion and implied attack on his own creed. Having strengthened others (vv. 3f.), surely you should stand firm. Yet you do fear God; then integrity should yield hope. The results of an attack on a den of lions are described in vv. 10, 11 (note the five different words for "lion"): they are rendered helpless; so are the wicked.

12-21. God's Righteousness, Man's Unrighteousness. Note the literary art of the description in vv. 12f. The weird nightmare horror reminds one of Gen. 32^{24f.}; cf. Otto, Idea of the Holy. "Silence (v. 16) and then I could catch a sound." The R.V. of v. 17 is commonplace. Better, "be justified by God?" Before (v. 19)=either "more quickly than" or "like."

CHAPTER V

See notes under 41-11.

1-7. Suffering the Result of Sin. Since angels are inferior, there is no help from them; such folly as yours brings its own punishment

(there is perhaps a suggestion of guardian angels here, the opposite of the "Satan"); as often, a statement calls up an associated picture (vv. 3f.). The doctrine of the "sour grapes" (Jer. 31²⁹) meets us constantly in Job. In v. 5, the reading is doubtful; perhaps omit b, and for c read the thirsty drinketh the milk. The sense, however, is clear. Trouble comes, not by chance, like weeds, but is inevitable—perhaps, because of sin. Sparks (v. 7)—this may be the meaning of the Hebrew phrase, literally, "sons of the flame."

8-27. The Benefits of Chastisement. One is safe with God, who is wonderful, especially in bringing down the mighty from their seats (cf. 1 Sam. 2^{4f.} Lk. 1⁵¹). Some object for saveth is needed in v. 15. Vv. 7f. contain a beautiful passage; but how would it strike Job? For the use of numbers, six and seven, in v. 19, indicating an unlimited number, cf. Prov. 30¹⁸. Scourge=(v. 21) "slander." The stones on the soil would naturally be as exasperating to the farmer as the wild beasts or vermin. Miss (v. 24); literally, "sin," i.e., miss the mark, get wrong in the "tale" or "count."

CHAPTERS 6 AND 7: JOB'S REPLY TO ELIPHAZ

Job's misery; the Friends' heartlessness; God's cruelty. Ch. 6. Job replies: God is doing his very worst; let him kill me! (Vv. 1-10.) You should have showed sympathy; instead, you have deceived me (vv. 11-20); you are unjust, willfully misunderstanding; be kind; I deserve it of you (vv. 21-30). Ch. 7. Surely, my misery can claim this (vv. 1-8). I am a ruined man, so I will let myself go (vv. 9-16); why does God torment me by making this cruel sport of me? (Vv. 17-21.)

CHAPTER VI

1-13. Job's Intolerable Wretchedness. How little the Friends understood Job's perturbation! In v. 4 is the first clear mention of God as the author of Job's calamities. The arrows are poisoned. You should know (v. 5) that there is always a reason for complaints. Instead of fodder I have only the most revolting food, white of egg, or, "slime of purslain," or perhaps "the ravings of a dream." V. 10c suggests that his righteousness would mean some gain for him after death; but this is a thought foreign to Job as yet.

14-23. Disappointment Over the Attitude of the Friends. Better (v. 14), "to him that is in despair." Note brethren (v. 15); not yet foes. A touching figure; cf. Jer. 15¹⁸ (applied to God; but Job has not yet reached this point). The caravan counts on reaching a stream; as so often in summer, the stream is dried up;

hence they must look despairingly elsewhere; in vain! They perish. Tema, in North Arabia; Sheba, South Arabia. Change v. 21 to read so have ye been to me. Why are they so disagreeable? He had asked nothing from them.

24-30. Appeal for Fair Treatment. "How do your attempted reproofs really reprove?" (V. 25.) Do not think of my words but of the despair behind them (v. 26). Ruthless creditors! (V. 27.) The chapter ends with pathetic self-defense—"I can tell if I am uttering 'calamities'" (the same word, probably, as in v. 2).

CHAPTER VII

1-10. Wearisomeness of Life. Man is like a soldier on hard service, or a sweated day-laborer—often treated worse than a slave. V. 6 expresses a double grief: he is going to die, yet he cannot die; at the heart of it is the absence of the old communion with God. With v. 9 cf. Hezekiah's prayer, Isa. 38¹⁸. Sheol cannot be avoided; cf. 19²⁷ (see comment there).

11-21. Challenge of God and Prayer for Death. There is no use in restraint. Perhaps this, like 6⁴, is the real "renunciation" of God. Note the irony in v. 12; to the Hebrew, the sea is the element of disorder and chaos, symbolized by a mythical monster, Leviathan (38), Rahab (26¹²), or (Babylonian) Tiamat (cf. also Rev. 21¹). Mental and physical sufferings are joined. Better be actually strangled (v. 15) than continue in the present condition—choking sometimes accompanies leprosy. For bones read probably pains. With vv. 17, 18, cf. Ps. 84. The word visit in Hebrew has two meanings—to approach an inferior either with grace and kindness, or with condemnation and penalty. Cf. our word "inspect"; and 1 Cor. 4²¹. Hence the bitterness of what must surely be a quotation here. Job's only wish now is to be let alone (contrast v. 6), even for a single moment. Have I sinned? (Vv. 20, 21.) Well, it cannot harm thee; forgive me now; it will soon be too late, and then thou wilt regret it.

CHAPTER VIII

THE SPEECH OF BILDAD

Bildad Declares God's Justice. What rash folly! If you prayed for a return of prosperity, and deserved an answer, it would be given (vv. 1-7); the wisdom of antiquity would tell you that the wicked cannot prosper (vv. 8-19); but a good man cannot be lost (vv. 20-22). The tone of superiority is still evident; but there is nothing new in the argument. Bildad does not directly charge Job himself, but apparently his children, with having brought down the calamity; but his long account of the misery of the wicked suggests a more personal attitude.

In v. 4 is a cross-reference to the Prologue (15). No actual sin, however, was mentioned; 52⁵ and 142¹ must not be pressed as suggesting that the sons were still alive. Seek diligently (v. 5) echoes 7²¹. Thou is emphatic. The promise held out in vv. 6, 7 was fulfilled at the end of the story. Note the half ironical modesty in v. 9. The ancients are commonly but illogically supposed to be wiser than their children, who, as Bildad himself claims, inherit and can extend their experiences. Rush (v. 11)="papyrus," a reed with a stem ten feet or more in height; once common in Egypt, and still found in the Jordan Valley, used as writing material; cf. the word "paper." Withereth (v. 12), merely by the withdrawal of water; so God has but to withhold his favor from the wicked (as he always will) and they perish (cf. Ps. 14^f. 37²). Paths (v. 13); better, end. In v. 14 substitute (giving a closer parallel) their confidence rests on gossamer. His estate is no better than a spider's web. V. 16 presents another simile; before, i.e., beneath the rays of the sun. V. 17 is difficult: About the heap, may possibly be around the spring; he pierceth (LXX, "he shall live in"), i.e., he forceth his roots right into the place of stones; or even "he taketh hold of the stones (in the wall)"; v. 17 is meant to strengthen vv. 16, 18f. The expression in vv. 18, 19 suggests a sudden crash; this is all the joy he has; and he is at once forgotten. Bildad's last words leave a sinister suggestion, which was doubtless intended.

CHAPTERS 9 AND 10: JOB'S REPLY TO BILDAD

Ch. 9. God's might is immense (vv. 1-10); hence, it is impossible to answer him (vv. 11-16); but he is capricious; he cares nothing for moral distinctions (vv. 17-24); but oh, my misery; there is no comfort in God, who only uses his superhuman power to treat me as a criminal (vv. 25-35). Ch. 10. Yet I would appeal to him; he knows my innocence (vv. 1-7); and once he cared for me (vv. 8-12); now, how cruelly he is changed; whatever I do, he is my foe (vv. 13-17); if this miserable life is my fate, let me have one brief respite before the grave! (Vv. 18-22.) Job pays no attention to Bildad; he is still thinking of Eliphaz. He takes up 7^{17f}; his complaint at his woes is now sharpened into complaint against God, and a denial of his justice. If God is the author of suffering, and the function of suffering is punishment for sin, and Job has not sinned, what is the explanation of Job's experience? At the back of Job's mind is the figure of an adversary, now in battle, now in the law court, so powerful as to be beyond justice—once a friend, now a tormentor.

CHAPTER IX

1-21. Job's Helplessness in the Presence of God's Infinite Might. With v. 2 cf. 41⁷, a slightly different expression. Just=counted as guiltless in the sight of God, with the recurrent figure of the court. The Hebrew word for "just" has two (not clearly distinguished) meanings; righteous, and (not always the same thing) pronounced innocent, or discharged with no further liability. In any legal contest with God man is at a decided disadvantage; moreover, God's might is destructive. The three particularly conspicuous constellations (if rightly identified), named in v. 9, are also mentioned together in Homer; but they are no more than probable translations of the Hebrew. Chambers, probably the southern sky and its constellations. In v. 10 Job quotes Eliphaz (5⁹). God is pictured in v. 12 as a mythological hero; so v. 13; Rahab the primeval monster (=Tiamat); cf. 71² Isa. 51⁹; used for Egypt, Psa. 87⁴. In the Babylonian Tablets of Creation some of the gods were the "helpers of Tiamat" in her strife with heaven (cf. notes on Gen. 1, 2; also art., O.T. and Archaeology, p. 120). Even if I were in the right (v. 15), I should have to play the suppliant for pardon. Call (v. 16)="cite with a legal summons." V. 17 describes what he would do if he did answer the summons. Who will fix a time, as a judge, for my case to come on? (V. 19.) Though I be in the right, my own mouth would put me in the wrong (v. 20). But I am blameless (v. 21); beside that, I care not if I die; hence, I am not afraid of asserting God's complete indifference to justice.

22-35. God's Unfair Treatment of Job. God destroys the good with the bad: Job's innocence, therefore, is no protection. Covereth (v. 24), as a bribe might be said to do. "Who else?"—the most burning question of all. Ships—reed boats that skim over the surface of the water. Job's thought passes from the impossibility of getting justice to the horror of being treated as guilty, whatever he does. In v. 30 follow margin. The sentence is properly, if I even washed, . . . that moment thou wouldst. Daysman=“umpire” (v. 33), to exert his authority over us both. V. 35 closes with the assertion, “I am not really the guilty person he pretends me to be.”

CHAPTER X

1-17. God's Present Attitude Is Incomprehensible. Having reached this point of despair, Job will express himself freely, and cross-question God. “A human being might despise justice thus; but wilt thou?” Work (v. 3)—Job himself, or other men; v. 3e is superfluous. Flesh belongs to men but not to God (v. 4). In v. 7a read, preserving the parallel, because thou knowest I cannot save myself. For God as potter (v. 9) cf. Gen. 27 Isa. 45⁹ Jer. 18. For God's care in the creation of man cf. Psa. 139^{13f.}; the process of man's formation is summed up in vv. 10f.: the semen, the foetus, the formation of the whole bodily frame, and the blessings of Providence that follow. These things . . . this (v. 13) refers to vv. 14f., God's cruel designs; vv. 14f. apply 92² to Job himself; looking upon (v. 15), better, sated with. Marvelous (v. 16), not in providence now, but in tyranny.

18-22. A plea for a brief respite before death.

CHAPTER XI

THE SPEECH OF ZOPHAR

Zophar, who has evidently listened intently to Job's previous appeal, now breaks in: Mere confident mockery (vv. 1-6), the idea that a futile human being can find out the designs of God (vv. 7-12); righteousness and piety bring light and peace; but as for the wicked—(vv. 13-20). Zophar repeats his companions' arguments (cf. vv. 18-20 with 82⁰⁻²²), but with an outspoken brutality as yet foreign to them.

1-6. Rebuke of Job's Challenge of the Divine Righteousness. Loquacity, boasting, mockery, self-righteousness, may all be urged against Job; but what of Job's excuse? Zophar repeats (v. 5), though with a different direction, Job's prayer of 10². V. 6c means “bringeth into forgetfulness, for thy benefit, a part of thy sin.”

7-12. God's Wisdom, Man's Blindness. “Canst thou discover the vast range of God's being, or reach the bounds of the Almighty?” All the acts of God must be judged in the light of his infinite wisdom; the divine acts are not arbitrary or unfair; indeed, if Job would only realize it, his sufferings are less than he deserves. Over against the all-wise God is weak and foolish man. Vain (v. 12)—“empty,” “futile.” If the text of v. 11 is right, it contains another (softened) condemnation of Job (92²). In v. 12 read margin: A foolish man will get understanding, when a wild ass's colt (type of indiscipline) grows human, i.e., tamed.

13-20. Exhortation to Repentance. Thou (v. 13), emphatic, wicked as thou art. With v. 17 cf. Job's words in 102^{1f.}; LXX translates v. 17b, “thy prayer as the day-star.” Secure (v. 18), literally, “thou shalt trust”; v. 18b means, after searching in vain for a possible foe, "thou shalt be at peace." V. 20 is an extension of Bildad's words in 8²².

CHAPTERS 12 TO 14: JOB'S REPLY TO ZOPHAR

Ch. 12. What profundity! But as you see from my sufferings, there is no justice in God (vv. 1-6); all nature will tell you of the power and wisdom of its creator (vv. 7-13); but he is the great source of destruction in nature, and of deception and calamity in political life, causing nations to grow, only to fling them into confusion (vv. 14-25). Ch. 13. I have nothing to learn from you; you are defending God with mischievous arguments and lies but you cannot deceive with your maxims (vv. 1-12); but now, whatever happens, I will make the speech which declares my innocence (vv. 13-18); but oh, cease to terrify me thus; tell me why thou dost imprison me in helpless corruption (vv. 19-28). Ch. 14. Do not ask what poor feeble man cannot give (vv. 1-6); for man, unlike a felled or withered tree, can never live again (vv. 7-12); I would gladly die, if after that I might have a discharge from my term of service (vv. 13-15); but thou art relentless to my frailty; all nature decays, and man ceases to know anything but his pain (vv. 16-22).

This striking passage abounds in quick changes of mood—resentment against the Friends, irony, accusations against God, confidence, pathetic appeal, longing for some understanding with God, and despair.

CHAPTER XII

Job Admits God's Power, but Doubts His Justice. Another ironical outburst: Job's insight is not inferior to that of his friends. With v. 3 cf. 13¹². The thought connection in vv. 4-12 is not easy to trace; v. 3 joins naturally to v. 13: Job takes up Zophar's thought, and extends it. God is all-powerful—for destruction! Yet it is unsafe simply to omit the intervening verses for this reason (but see below, vv. 7f.); in spite of the difficulties, the thought is suitable to Job; his consciousness of being despised (a kind of "inferiority complex" after his misfortune) the Friends, in their safety, can neglect. V. 6 brings a quick transition to the thought of divine injustice. For speak (v. 8) read probably the creeping things of the earth. This (v. 9), i.e., all this injustice and chaos (as in v. 6). Note in vv. 7, 8 the singular pronoun and verb (imperatives); it is found in Job's speeches (if correct) only here, 16³, and 21³; see on 26²⁻⁴. Also note the use of "Jehovah" (v. 9), unique in dialogue. This, it is true, throws some further doubt on the authenticity of vv. 4-12. The argument in vv. 11-13 is: "I listen to you with discrimination; do you say that with aged men is wisdom? I reply, Wisdom is with God; and look how he uses it." Still, v. 13 follows best on v. 3. With v. 15b cf. 5¹⁰; "rain, yes; but only for a devastating flood." Vv. 17-21 suggest the vast political changes involved, for all the near East, in the fall of the Assyrian, Babylonian, and Persian Empires between 600 and 300 B.C. God does not only destroy; but destruction is Job's last word about him in these terrible verses; God is pleased to reduce men, in general, to the helplessness of intoxication!

CHAPTER XIII

1, 2. These verses should be taken with ch. 12: Job knows all the Friends know; but how differently he interprets it.

3-12. Worthlessness of the Friends' Defense of God. Surely (v. 3)="but of a truth"; the word is an emphatic adversative. Reason="argue" as an opponent; the law court again. Convince, and even convict, and prove guilty. Forgers (v. 4)="plasterers" or smearers. Reasoning (v. 6)="attack," as in v. 3. Pleadings="accusing speeches." Job is accuser, not defendant. The Friends are regarded as giving, in the court, a verdict for God against Job and justice (cf. 9³³) with partiality (v. 8a; cf. Lev. 19¹⁵). Are you prepared for the consequences? (V. 9.) Job implies that God, in spite of his contempt for justice, wishes for no help of this sort; cf. 12², 11 42⁷, 12.

13-28. New Challenge of God. Wherefore (v. 14) should be omitted (almost identical with the Hebrew letters for the last word of v. 13, cf. mg.). Then v. 14b means, "I am willing to endanger my life," and v. 14a must be a statement parallel to it, perhaps, "carry off, like a wild animal, my own flesh." The well-known A.V. translation of v. 15 is quite unsuitable to the context and is not in accord with the original Hebrew; instead of for him, or it, we should read not. Hence, "he is going to slay me; I will have patience no longer" is more suitable to the context. Maintain, same word as reason (v. 3). V. 16b means, either, the wicked would not be accepted, if they should approach God, or, would not desire to approach. Justice in God there must be, after all; v. 18b, "that I for my part (emphatic) shall be pronounced in the right." I fear no foe (v. 19), though, if I did, I should be content to perish in silence. In v. 20 confidence suddenly weakens; "God must not employ force; then I care not whether he replies or attacks." Yet there follow only questions and complaints; God acts as a condemning Judge (v. 26a), though Job does not profess to be wholly guiltless (v. 26b). V. 28 reiterates v. 25; the pride of v. 17 is now gone; and the way is prepared for ch. 14.

CHAPTER XIV

1-12. Frailty and Brevity of Human Life.

It is absurd to think that weak, helpless man can stand up in court against God; for me (v. 3b) probably read him. V. 4 is rhythmically defective and may be a late marginal note or "gloss." V. 5 is probably the protasis to v. 6; i.e., "if it is true that his fate is fixed, allow him a respite," if life is short, surely some ease might be allowed. Man has not even the advantage of a tree! (Vv. 7f.) Vv. 10-12 express the same thought as 77-10; v. 11 is similar to and may be a quotation from Isa. 19⁵. Sea—sometimes means, as here, inland lake; in Isaiah it is used of the Nile.

13-22. Hopelessness of Job's Condition.

Sheol—the shadowy abode of the departed is man's destiny; if only one might be hidden there till God were kinder, so that he might then return to earth; but no! Job conceives of some idea of a life after death, only to reject it. Vv. 16, 17, better taken as a continuation of v. 15: "for now, in that case, thou wouldest guard my steps, and not watch them jealously; my transgression would be sealed up and done with." And surely (v. 18), the Hebrew is simply adversative. "As it is, as mountains, rocks, stones, and the solid earth perish, so does this poor human hope." Changest (v. 20), in death; away, to Sheol, where (vv. 21f.) there is no knowledge of events on earth (another allusion to Job's own family?) but there is pain (this may be a reference to decomposition in the grave); this is a darker view than was implied in 31⁷¹; Job's speeches regularly end in a deep sigh of misery.

CHAPTERS 15 TO 21: THE SECOND CYCLE

Eliphaz, having listened to Bildad and Zophar (and Job's replies to them), repeats their argument, in a more flowing and dignified but not less galling style, ending with an elaborate picture of defiant but helpless impiety. Job, specially moved by such words when coming from Eliphaz, breaks out into complaints against both men and God, and then appeals from God to a "witness" in heaven. But he has no hope; he is traduced; Sheol alone awaits him. Bildad's speech shows his irritation, but he has no argument save a further description of the fate of the wicked (of this he is never tired!). Job, in resentful tones, attributes his terrible isolation to God; and then for one moment thinks of a vindicator on earth, and turns on his persecutors. Zophar intervenes with a long homily which repeats Eliphaz and Bildad; and Job, now for the first time answering the implied argument, urges that the wicked live in happiness, and that even death is no real punishment to them. In this, the middle portion of the composition, as so often in Hebrew literature, the climax of feeling is reached.

CHAPTER XV

THE SECOND SPEECH OF ELIPHAZ

I can but answer you—so Eliphaz begins his speech—out of your own mouth (vv. 2-6); what presumption to criticize our traditional wisdom! (Vv. 7-12.) A puny and guilty being should fear to challenge the knowledge of past ages (vv. 13-19); an evil conscience never allows its owner to rest (vv. 20-25); defiance of God brings its own inevitable condemnation (vv. 26-35). Eliphaz's eloquence is still sonorous; but imaginative rhetoric cannot redeem platitudes, and he has no conception of an answer either to Job's sufferings or for his daring and tortured thoughts of God.

1-16. Rebuke of Job's Presumptuousness.

The east wind (v. 2), from the desert, is the dangerous sirocco. Belly (cf. A.S.V.)—to the Hebrew, the seat of emotion rather than thought ("heart"). What a travesty of Job's agonized cries! In v. 4 Job is accused of diminishing or holding back the reverent musing which is the mark of true religion. Job's words are said (v. 5) to spring from an evil heart. What is old must be true (vv. 7, 8). Is Eliphaz thinking of 13²? Counsel (v. 8), rather, council. Has Job attended there? Consolations (v. 11), uttered by me, but really coming from God. Wink (or "flash," v. 12), apparently (for the word nowhere else occurs) make hints or suggestions. With v. 14 cf. 41⁷; with v. 15 cf. 41⁸. In v. 16 the reference is to man in general, though doubtless with Job in the speaker's mind.

17-35. Evil Conscience and Speedy Destruction of the Wicked. In v. 19 Eliphaz refers to the freedom of his tribe from contamination by new ideas from foreign political and cultural invasions. The powerful description in vv. 20f. may be taken to mean that the wicked is pursued by calamity all his life, which could hardly be asserted, save by a rhetorician; or that inward terrors plague him from the first. But is conscience always active? Cf. Shakespeare's delineation of Macbeth. In v. 22 LXX has "let him not believe." For fatness (v. 27), as a sign of crass stupidity, cf. Deut. 32¹⁵ Psa. 73⁷. Cities (v. 28), under the curse of God, and therefore to be left in ruins, such as Sidon, or Jericho, rebuilt by Hiel (1 Kings 16³⁴). In- habited, better, should inhabit. Bend (v. 29), like full ears of corn (cf. A.S.V.). His mouth (v. 30), i.e., God's, the metaphor being suddenly dropped; better, his bud is whirled away by the wind. The olive bears very little fruit in alternate years (v. 33).

CHAPTERS 16 AND 17: JOB'S SECOND REPLY TO ELIPHAZ

Ch. 16. Words are as easy as they are useless (vv. 2-5); they are indeed useless to me, the object of God's relentless fury (vv. 6-14); but helpless as I am, I can yet appeal to God to uphold my cause (vv. 15-22). Ch. 17. I am helpless and despised; where can I look for aid? Not to men (vv. 1-7); yet my calamities will strengthen the upright (vv. 8-10); I can hope for nothing now but death (vv. 11-16). Job now drops the image of the law court (save in 16²¹ 17³), regarding himself as the victim of God's rage. There is a sudden and remarkable flash of confidence in 16¹⁹; but the speech ends with utter despair.

CHAPTER XVI

1-5. Reproach of the Heartlessness of His Friends. Miserable (v. 2), who (only) bring trouble. Vain (v. 3), literally, words of wind. In v. 3b Job turns, as very seldom, on an individual (see on 12³⁻¹²). But (v. 5) is not in the Hebrew, and should be omitted, for v. 5 continues v. 4, "I could have comforted you (as you have not comforted me!)"

6-17. Job's Sorrowful Condition: Forsaken by God and Men. Speech and silence are the same (v. 6). What is my company? (V. 7.) Is Job thinking of his former household? Substitute: my evil has seized me. A witness (v. 8), at any rate, to the traditionalists. Torn and gnashed (v. 9) suggest a wild beast; persecuted, literally, "hated." Vv. 9c-11 break the connection; it is difficult to understand the sudden reference (in literal terms to human adversaries); the verses suggest Ps. 22 and Isa. 51. V. 12 carries on the metaphor of v. 9; God is the leader of a band of archers (vv. 12a, 13; unless archers should be arrows), and then a warrior mutilating his foes (reins, archaic for "kidneys"), or besieging a city (not giant, v. 14, but mighty man). Upon (v. 15), i.e., next my skin. Horn, symbol of confident strength. In v. 17 Job repudiates lawlessness, like God's!

18-22. The Witness in Heaven. The blood (v. 18)=the life (cf. Lev. 17¹¹ 14) of an innocent man is regarded as crying from the ground (cf. Gen. 4¹⁰) till his death is avenged by the "goël," or avenger of blood. The blood belongs even more to the tribe than to the individual. If it is covered, the cry is dulled. Job longs that his blood may cry out against his murderer—God. My appeal is not in vain (v. 19); I have a witness to my cause in heaven. Who is this? God himself? God, thinking of Job, as Job hopes later on, with a changed mind? Even now is against this. The witness could not well be other than God. But Job has not thought out the implication of his daring words. There is another flash in 19²⁷. Only in a later age does it become an illumination. In vv. 20f., Job falls back into his old wish that he might be pronounced righteous, but with the significant difference that God is to umpire in Job's case against God, as also against his friends (neighbors), although he himself will not be living to rejoice in the verdict (v. 22).

CHAPTER XVII

1-9. Further Appeal to the Witness in Heaven. The connection of thought in the opening verses is not clear. Probably the meaning is, "Yes, I shall soon die; and even now men mock me bitterly; then let me find a surety in God." Or, v. 2 (translating mockery instead of mockers) may refer to God, giving the same antithesis as in 16²¹; the first half of v. 4 shows that Job has the Friends in his mind. Strike hands (v. 3), in giving the pledge. V. 5 carries on v. 4b, but the text is difficult and uncertain. Vv. 6, 7 revert to Job's persecution; vv. 8, 9 appear out of place; if the thought of the effect upon the good had occurred to Job here, it could hardly have been dropped immediately, and v. 7 connects with v. 11 rather than with v. 10 and its reference to the Friends.

10-16. Death the Only Hope of Deliverance. Return, i.e., to your argument; all of you is in the Hebrew, strangely, "all of them." How do the Friends change night into day? (V. 12.) By pretending that Job is not really in darkness? But when had they done this? In v. 13 the Hebrew points to "if I hope, (yet only) Sheol is my home"; the remaining clauses being categorical rather than conditional. Vv. 15, 16 are thus parallel to vv. 13, 14; but the Hebrew of v. 16 is hardly intelligible. Job ends on his usual note of despair.

CHAPTER XVIII

THE SECOND SPEECH OF BILDAD

Your contempt for us is mere overweening conceit (vv. 2-4); the wicked will be put to confusion—ensnared by his own wickedness (vv. 5-12); calamity will seize both him and his descendants (vv. 13-21). After the customary brief outburst of resentment, Bildad enlarges on Eliphaz's theme, but stresses the fate of the wicked (brought on him by himself) as future, not present. This is not yet peccatum poena peccati, but peccatum instrumentum poenae.

1-4. Condemnation of Job's Rejection of Friendly Counsel. Bildad here retorts on Job with a tu quoque: it is you who need to think, instead of treating us as unintelligent brute beasts. Unclean (v. 3)—probably "stupid" or "silenced." In your own anger, not in God, is the cause of your anguish (v. 4). Is the order of things to be changed to gratify your private desires?

5-21. Calamity in this Life and Dishonor After Death the Lot of the Wicked. The law of the destruction of the wicked still holds good. V. 7b suggests that the trap (note the six synonyms) is successful because of the victim's folly rather than the hunter's skill (cf. 5¹³). For his halting (v. 12), better, when he slumbers, or at his side. The Hebrew cf. v. 13 (literally translated in R.V.) is obscure; is Bildad generalizing from a peculiarly brutal allusion to Job's own disease? Brought (v. 14), better marched. Note the impressive vagueness in v. 15a. The street (v. 17), better, the open country outside his lands (earth). Where he sojourned (v. 19), i.e., being only a stranger, with no rights of his own. Read in v. 20, they that are of the West . . . and they of the East. He is to leave no memory behind him.

CHAPTER XIX

JOB'S SECOND REPLY TO BILDAD

Why do you still refuse to see that it is through God's injustice that I suffer? (Vv. 2-8.) He has brought me down to utter defeat, like a victorious foe (vv. 8-12); into utter loneliness and universal contempt; do not you be like God! (Vv. 13-22.) Would that my words might remain; yet I have a vindicator, and I shall somehow live to look on God; let my persecutors then beware! (Vv. 23-29.)

Job begins by manifesting a deeper and more indignant disappointment in the Friends, which leads him, in thinking on God's harshness, to concentrate on his own isolation. This leads, again, to a pathetic appeal to the Friends, which, as the thought of 16^{18f}. suddenly returns, changes to the wish that, even if he dies, his defense of his cause might remain. But—by a surprising transition—better than that, he has a vindicator, and he will himself be satisfied. This is the magnificent though obscure climax of the whole dialogue; but Job ends immediately, as he began, with a bitter reference to the Friends.

1-6. Protest Against the Reproaches of the Friends. V. 4 reads literally, "If I really did err, is it with myself (emphatic) that my error is to remain as a lodger?" The verb properly means "to stay for a night only" (cf. Psa. 305). Is this a parallel to 6²⁴ or 10⁶? Or is the second clause, like the first, a question? Job is hardly in a mood to admit even error (a milder word than sin). Now (v. 6), however, it surprises you. Subvert—the verb means to bend or pervert justice, treat a man dishonestly. These accusations against God appear in each of Job's speeches.

7-29. Job's Sufferings. In v. 7 read I am crying out, "Violence!" God is once more spoken of (vv. 10f.) as the ferocious invader (invading troops regularly destroyed the orchards; Deut. 20¹⁹). Vv. 13f. describe a yet deeper misery. If the author made use of, rather than invented, the Prologue, we can see how his imagination has been working on it. The proverbial expression in v. 20b should probably be I plucked at my skin with my teeth; as it stands, what can it mean? V. 22b is an echo of the Oriental phrase, "to eat the flesh," "to calumniate." Book (v. 23)—scroll or document of accusation. Inscribed—synonym of "graven" (v. 24b). Either, "in a book, or on lead tablets on a rock," or, "by graving on the rock filled in with molten lead." The redeemer ("goel," v. 25) is properly the next of kin, whose duty it is to avenge a murder, or buy up family property when it comes into the market (Ruth 4^{1f.}), "I have more than a document; a champion who is alive [even when I am dead]." V. 25b is very obscure; literally, "afterwards [at the last, as having the last word, or, simply, after my death], on the dust [on Job's grave, but contrast 16¹⁹] he will take his stand." V. 26a is too corrupt to be translated with any confidence; literally, "and after [i.e., afterward] my skin they have destroyed this"; from my flesh, i.e., "without [or, apart from] or out of [i.e., while I am still in it]." But, however we understand this, the important words are I shall see God, and this as "for myself" (v. 27 mg.), i.e., on my side. And not another, i.e., "and not as a stranger, or, as estranged."

Here Job extends and transforms the thought of 16²¹. The witness or "goel" is God, at last and firmly his friend, and Job is to behold him vindicating that very accusation of God which he has so constantly, daringly, and often despairingly, uttered. This is not an assertion of the (later) doctrine of immortality; we cannot be sure, from our actual Hebrew text, that Job expects by some miracle to come to life again, but he is certain, now, that the final authority in the world is moral ("appealing from man's God to God's God") and that death itself is subordinate to the real justice of God. If we substitute for "justice" God's communion with his children in Christ, we have the essence of the doctrine of eternal life as found in the N.T. V. 27c means, "I am consumed with passionate longing." But Job, even now (v. 28), cannot forget the Friends sitting before him; v. 28b is obscure; "seeing that I really am sincere and conceal nothing," or reading, as is possible, him for me, "since the cause of his suffering lies in himself and in his sin"; v. 29bc is also textually uncertain, but the general sense is clear. Job does not again reach the height of vv. 25f.; but this is quite in accordance with the Hebrew love of placing the most important assertion in the middle rather than the end of a composition. Psychologically, too, it may be verified. Tantalizing as is the state of the text, we can see how the long-drawn-out conflict between the two conceptions of God reaches its height in this second cycle; and the profoundest doubt is met by the most daring "guess at truth," as the old metaphor of the law court receives this startling extension of the "goel."

CHAPTER XX

THE SECOND SPEECH OF ZOPHAR

Job's speech cannot go unanswered (vv. 2, 3); the prosperity of the wicked is short-lived (vv. 4-11); he cannot keep the wealth and pleasure that he has gained through dishonesty and violence (vv. 12-19); when he is about to satisfy his greed he suffers the terror of God's wrath; how great and conspicuous is his fall (vv. 20-29). Zophar is quite unable, like the rest, to understand Job; but he now stresses the dramatic suddenness of the fall of the wicked in language that might suit the calamity of Job himself (ch. 2) or the narrative of Lk. 12. In v. 3b read with wind [or, in argument] void of understanding thou answerest me. V. 10 stresses the greatest indignity. His hands, better, his children, or their hands (either is an easy alteration). Hide (v. 12), like a dainty morsel; a curious parallel in Ezek. 33. "His belly must be filled!" (V. 23.) One (i.e., God) will cast on him his fierce wrath (instead of the dainties he claimed); but the text is not certain. If he escapes one disaster, another ruins him (v. 24).

CHAPTER XXI

JOB'S SECOND REPLY TO ZOPHAR

My complaint goes beyond my personal suffering (vv. 2-6); it concerns the prosperity of the wicked even when they openly defy

God (vv. 7-15); their calamity is at best exceptional; let suffering come on them, not on their children (vv. 16-18); God is not mocked; happy or miserable, all die in the end (vv. 19-26); such arguments as you use about the wicked man bring no peace to me (vv. 27-34).

Here at last Job passes definitely beyond his own misery, and urges that God repudiates retributive suffering in his whole government of the world. He reproduces his opponents' arguments (hence the appearance of contradiction), only to overthrow them.

"Thou wilt mock on" (v. 3; addressed to Zophar himself); not a command if the text is right; but LXX has the plural. "Am I (emphatic) complaining about man?" (V. 4.) For the rhetorical effect of vv. 5f. cf. 412-15. V. 8 should follow vv. 9, 10. Job might be giving a picture of his own previous prosperity. In a moment (v. 13b), i.e., without his own long-drawn-out agony (cf. 322). In v. 16a Job perhaps quotes from the Friends; or the words might be a protesting interpolation of the Friends themselves after vv. 14, 15. V. 16b is repeated by Eliphaz in 22¹⁸. Sorrows (v. 17), "snares" or "pangs, as of travail." In v. 19a, with a change in text read let him [God] not lay upon. Job here states his opponents' position; the opponents, however, have never actually asserted (what Ezek. 18, conscious of attacking a widespread belief, denies) that children suffer instead of parents. "Do you really think that I am trying to instruct God?" (v. 22) or (less conformably to the Hebrew, but logically more satisfactory) "Can anyone take God's place as a teacher?" Vv. 23-26 repeat 922. V. 30, as the text stands, may be a "dogmatic correction" of a later scribe; the change of one letter, however, would give "is spared in the day of calamity . . . is guarded in the day of wrath"; or, if not too farfetched, "your belief (v. 30) is founded on mere travelers' talk" (v. 29). Keep watch (v. 32); the subject is indefinite, or it may be the dead man's shade. "The very tomb [an imaginative tour de force] gives him pleasure (v. 33), such is the way of all flesh." Job's three speeches in the second cycle may be taken as containing three replies to his opponents: (1) his arguments have a higher authority (16¹⁹); (2) he will personally be vindicated (19²⁵); (3) the opponents' position is untenable on the available evidence (ch. 21).

CHAPTERS 22 TO 31: THE THIRD CYCLE

Chs. 22, 23 are quite intelligible, but ch. 24 is difficult in the mouth of Job, if not impossible. Ch. 25 (Bildad) is unusually brief.

Ch. 26 might have been, and may still be taken to be, a continuation of ch. 25, rather than the reply of Job. 27¹⁻¹² is a suitable reply to Bildad from Job, but 27¹³⁻²³ contains a flat contradiction of 27¹⁻¹². In the text there is no speech at all from Zophar, and these verses might well be his reply to the preceding. Ch. 28 has no connection with the argument; it is more in the vein of chs. 38-41, or still more of Prov. 8, and is probably a quite independent poem (see on ch. 41). In chs. 29-31 Job winds up the whole discussion.

The course of the cycle will then be: Eliphaz charges Job with being like the wicked whom he has just described, repudiates Job's account of them, and in dignified and beautiful words appeals to Job to repent. Job, as if influenced by the appeal, laments that he cannot find God, and that the world's suffering is not conterminous with sin. Bildad now appeals, with real eloquence, but little logic, to the inscrutable might of God. To this Job only replies, "I know that I have not sinned; then how can you be right, or God just?" Zophar repeats his last argument, that the wicked has no pleasure in his ill-gotten gains. Job then draws an elaborate contrast between the probity and wide philanthropy of his old life and the bodily and mental suffering of the present, concluding with a magnificent statement of the ideals which he had actually carried out. Chs. 29 and 31 might well be taken as an elaborate commentary on 1¹, and ch. 30 on 2⁶.

CHAPTER XXII

THE THIRD SPEECH OF ELIPHAZ

God has nothing to gain from man's goodness, or to fear from his sin (vv. 2-4); you have abused your position; hence your fall (vv. 5-11); do not be like the wicked; they do not prosper in the end (vv. 12-20); if you would make a friend of God, even now how completely he would receive and restore you! (Vv. 21-30.) A gracious and dignified appeal, if addressed to, e.g., Nabal (1 Sam. 25²¹); but to Job!

1-5. Job's Sins the Cause of His Affliction. God cannot be punishing Job for his piety (fear, in good sense, cf. 4⁶); therefore it must be for wickedness. Note in v. 5 the underlying assumption.

6-20. Enumeration of Job's Alleged Sins. V. 6 implies a disregard of the old Hebrew rule that a garment taken in pledge should be restored at nightfall (Ex. 22^{26, 27}; cf. Deut. 24¹⁷). For nought, for a trifling debt, or for no debt at all. Though you neglected the poor, you acquiesced in the power of the (oppressive) rich (vv. 7-9). The treatment of widows and orphans is regarded as a kind of "acid test" of morality throughout the O.T. In v. 11 substitute thy light is darkness, so that. The thought of v. 12 is, "God, as we both admit, is as high as the stars; hence (v. 13), you will be asking, drawing the wrong conclusion . . ." Job had not said, however, that God could not see, but that he did not judge. Do not imitate the wicked (v. 15) whom you described (in ch. 21); for v. 18, cf. 21¹⁸, note; you forget their real end (v. 19).

21-30. Exhortation to Repentance. Acquaint thyself (v. 21)—"grow used to," as an intimate friend. The law (v. 22), "instruction" (this is the true meaning of the Hebrew word); there is no reference here to the specific instruction or law given to Israel through Moses. Lay (v. 24), as worthless. Delight (v. 26), "take exquisite pleasure in." The Hebrew text of v. 29 is barely intelligible.

CHAPTERS 23 AND 24: JOB'S THIRD REPLY TO ELIPHAZ

Ch. 23. If I could but find God, all would be well (vv. 2-7); but he hides himself (vv. 8, 9); he must vindicate my innocence at the last (vv. 10-12); but, here and now, his plan is unintelligible (vv. 13-17). Ch. 24. Think of the high-handed oppression and abject poverty and furtive crime in the world (vv. 1-17); you may reply, "It is only for a time" (vv. 18-21); yet can it be denied that God preserves the wicked? (Vv. 22-25.)

CHAPTER XXIII

1-7. Job's Yearning for Access to God. Ch. 23 is entirely appropriate in the mouth of Job; neglecting Eliphaz he is holding, though insecurely, to the faith of 19²⁵ (cf. especially v. 7). How far removed is his world from the simple and elementary sequences of the Friends: "sin and be punished; repent and be forgiven!" The effect of the apparent contradictions of ch. 24 is increased by a very uncertain text, and the descriptions in vv. 3-7, though poignant, are, for Job, strangely detached. In v. 6 Job moves beyond 9¹³; he now believes that the prayer of 13^{20f.} will be answered. My judge (v. 7)—is this God? If so, the thought of "God's God beyond man's God" is still implicit in Job's words.

8-17. Reassertion of Job's Innocence. Job is opposing the Friends' "world-order" to another, to which he is precariously advancing. This second order he cannot yet reach (v. 9), but he trusts it (vv. 10f.), though now ~~the~~ thought of it plunges his mind into confusion

(vv. 15f.). What Job is trying to say is that there must be an intelligible order in the universe, though as yet it is wholly unintelligible to him—another aspect of the conviction of 1925.

CHAPTER XXIV

God's Indifference to Wickedness. Why does not God fix definite times for judgment for men (v. 1) (as for Job himself)? As it is, violence is unchecked. Remove (v. 2)—to steal their neighbors' lands; cf. Deut. 19¹⁴ Isa. 58. After v. 3 possibly v. 9 should be inserted. Turn (v. 4), literally or metaphorically; the one, as to-day, generally implies the other. The poor are "as homeless as wild creatures" (v. 5), or, "like wild creatures on the open moor" (the equivalent, to us, of both "desert" and "wilderness"—steppe). A description of some nomadic gypsy group, outcasts or wandering thieves. Provender (v. 6), mere fodder for cattle; "they pilfer the late-ripe fruit of the vines." Wicked should probably be rich (cf. Isa. 53⁹ mg., for the reverse change). Vv. 10f. apparently refer to ill-used slaves, half-starved; vv. 12f., misery and wretchedness dwell in the city, which is also the hunting ground of the murderer, adulterer, thief. Possibly v. 14c should follow v. 15. Shadow of death (v. 17) = profound darkness.

Vv. 18-22 are intelligible here if put into the mouth of Job's Friends. V. 18c should read no trader of grapes turns to their vineyard. The Hebrew text of v. 20 is corrupt, but some such sense as expressed in the translation must be intended. Read v. 22b, riseth up from sickness, but does not believe that he will live. In v. 23 Job resumes his own argument, but v. 24 repeats vv. 18-22. The expedient by which the whole of v. 24 is secured as a part of Job's speech is not wholly satisfactory; possibly the confusion in the text suspected for ch. 25 begins earlier, and part of ch. 24 may even belong to ch. 25.

CHAPTERS 25 AND 26: THIRD SPEECH OF BILDAD

How impossible to justify oneself before the omnipotent! (25¹⁻⁶.) How vain, then, are your arguments! (26²⁻⁴.) The whole framework of earth, sea, and sky is his creation, and how much must lie beyond! (26⁵⁻¹⁴.) Bildad's exalted words, worthy to stand beside Psa. 104¹⁻⁹ or Job 36, are broken by 26²⁻⁴, whose personal tone probably suggested Job as the author (cf. 12^{2f}. 16²⁻⁵); but Job regularly uses the plural of the personal pronoun, while the Friends, to whom such language is by no means strange, use the singular (as here).

CHAPTER XXV

Man's Inferiority to God. Armies (v. 3) = troops; the hosts of heaven; hence, parallel with light. Vv. 4-6 are quoted from Eliphaz, 15¹⁴⁻¹⁶.

CHAPTER XXVI

"The Outskirts of His Ways." "Do your words really aid him who feels himself helpless before God?" Deceased (v. 5), literally, "the shades"; perhaps, as LXX, the mighty dead of antiquity. Inhabitants = monsters of the deep. Beneath should probably be joined as an adverb to v. 5a. Abaddon (v. 6), Hebrew, by derivation, "place of destruction" (cf. Prov. 27²⁰). Stretcheth (v. 7), like a vast tent-cloth, without any pole. Resting on the ocean is a partition ("the firmament"?) (v. 10); within it, the light of the heavenly bodies; without it, darkness. Pillars (v. 11) — mountains of the horizon; it would, however, be precarious to conclude (as is often done) that this literally represents the actual Hebrew views of geography. V. 12 contains another reference to Babylonian mythology (cf. 9¹³). Outskirts (v. 14), i.e., the earth and the world of earth and sky are at the edge and not the center of God's whole universe.

CHAPTER XXVII

JOB'S THIRD REPLY TO BILDAD

In spite of God's treatment of me, I will hold to it that I am innocent (vv. 2-6); there is no real profit in wickedness, as all should know (vv. 7-12); the wicked may grow rich, but they have no joy either in their wealth or in their posterity, and destruction sweeps on them like a hurricane (vv. 13-23). The first six verses follow Job's argument in chs. 23, 24 quite naturally; at all events, Job knows he has nothing to confess which could justify his misery or put his Friends in the right (v. 5). Vv. 11 and 12 are clearly Job's, if only for the personal pronouns. But vv. 7-10 are unlike Job. Has he found a temporary refuge on the level of the Friends' thought? Or does he, rather, in sudden exasperation, think of those who would question his integrity as his enemies, rising up against him (v. 7), and threaten them with the very fate they had described? Certainly, it is not easy to see the reason for the personal touch in v. 7 if the verse belongs to Zophar; but if vv. 12-23 are Zophar's, he, having no fresh replies, and unconsciously echoing v. 8, repeats his general assertions in ch. 20.

1-6. Reaffirmation of Job's Innocence. In v. 2 note the irony of Job's oath. Heart (v. 6) = thoughts or conscience.

7-23. Mental Condition and Material Ruin of the Wicked. V. 10a is quoted from Eliphaz (22²⁶). In vv. 11f. Job proposes another course of instruction; but could he really say anything fresh after chs. 19 and 23? So he breaks off: "you know it; why this futile refusal to confess it?" Raiment (v. 16)—a recognized investment or embodiment of wealth (cf. 2 Kings 5²²). Booth (v. 18)—a mere temporary hut for a watchman in the gardens. Gathered (v. 19)—better, but not again. East wind (v. 21) = sirocco, as in 1¹⁹ and 15². Only at the end of the address is the action of God referred to (v. 22), though even here the word "God" is only implied in the Hebrew.

CHAPTER XXVIII

The Wisdom of God Unattainable by Man. This cannot be taken to be a part of the dialogue, as it has no connection with the preceding or following passages, nor with any part of the subject of the debate. If it were to be taken as an original part of the book, the speeches of Jehovah could hardly be thus anticipated. It belongs to a type of composition known as Wisdom Literature, "wisdom" in the Hebrew being used both in connection with God's providential creation and government of the world, and man's shrewd and provident (and therefore, pious) conduct in it. The subject is treated, from varying points of view, in Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, Ecclesiasticus, Wisdom of Solomon. (See art., The Poetic and Wisdom Literature, p. 157b.) Consider the skill and daring of the miner (vv. 1-4), and his magnificent achievement in the conquest of the treasures hidden in the earth (vv. 5-11); wisdom, hidden more deeply still, is more precious than all that mines can yield (vv. 12-22); God alone, the omniscient Creator, knows its secret and uses it (vv. 23-27); for man, the pursuit of wisdom is true piety (v. 28).

Surely (v. 1)—better for; this implies something to precede it, such as, "wisdom is harder to come by than gold or gems"; it can hardly refer to ch. 27. Mine—in spite of Deut. 8⁹, mining was scarcely known in Palestine, but it was somewhat familiar to the Jews as carried on in Lebanon, Edom, Midian, Egypt. Sinai, at least in earlier times, had its copper and sapphire workings. Separation from the ore is regarded as part of the mining process. An end (v. 3)—apparently by letting in daylight or lamplight. Shaft (v. 4)—elsewhere, torrent or torrent-bed (wady). Sojourn—why this word? Perhaps we should read lamp or light; or perhaps (cf. mg.) torrent is the subject; and hand or swing (at end of rope, in descending) should be are diminished or depart (disappear).

The poet seems not to have actually seen the operation. What a contrast in v. 5, cornfields and blasting! Sapphire (v. 6)=lapis lazuli, whose particles glint like gold. Bird and beast know not wisdom (vv. 7f.); man turns the hills upside down for it: a better order would be vv. 10a, 11a, 10b, 11b. Channels, trickle; read, with mg., passages, weep. Price (v. 13)—better, with LXX, path. Ophir (v. 16)—cf. 22²⁴; onyx—Hebrew, sheham; mentioned in Gen. 21¹¹ Ex. 25⁷ 28²⁰ Ezek. 28¹³, etc.; the actual gem is uncertain. Glass—then, of course, a rarity; rubies should probably be pearls. All living (v. 21) refers to men; a better antithesis would be, with the addition of one letter, all animals. Abaddon (v. 22; cf. A.S.V. mg.), as in 26⁶. A better parallel would be secured to v. 26 if, with LXX, etc., v. 25 were made to read when he was making and meting out (cf. mg.). In later thought (Prov. 8, Philo and Jn. 1 where logos represents "wisdom" as it is used in vv. 12, 20, 28), wisdom is half-personified, as more than a model or tool—a companion; here, more simply, wisdom is definitely set forth in the primal acts of creation, in God's eyes and purpose (as in Gen. 1³). V. 28 is distinct from the rest of the chapter, and in prose; but not ineffective, as an application of the whole by a reference to the other kind of wisdom.

CHAPTERS 29 TO 31: JOB'S FINAL SURVEY OF THE CASE

Job does not now explicitly refer to Zophar's preceding speech (see introductory notes to ch. 27), nor, indeed, to any part of the previous dialogue. He has passed the stage of argument, or even of attack on God. He knows himself to be deserted by God. He no longer asks, Why? Yet indirectly this section is a powerful and final vindication of all that he has urged; his splendid record of far-flung beneficence, the appalling contrast of his present sufferings, and the unbroken probity of his old life. On the other hand, ch. 31 is not without difficulty; since, throughout, Job calls down on himself, if he should have been unfaithful, the very calamities from which he is now suffering, and to which, here, he makes no reference (see below).

CHAPTER XXIX

Job's Former Prosperity. I recall the general honor in which I was held (vv. 2-10), a protection to the poor, a terror to evildoers (vv. 11-17), and my confident expectation of continued prosperity (vv. 18-21); I was held in deep and universal reverence (vv. 22-25).

This is more than the portrait of a desert sheikh; a large and (as we might say) feudal land-owner, with the character of an idealized Abraham; yet the relations mentioned are social rather than political or tribal and all spring from the companionship and guidance of God.

Ripeness (v. 4)=maturity; many years of life were expected (cf. v. 18). Secret=intimate, friendship. Gate (v. 7), the open space where meetings were held, public questions decided, and justice administered. Street=broad place. Job is represented as equally at home in tent (v. 4) and city (v. 7). Vv. 12f. state the reason for this deep respect (cf. Psa. 72¹²). He clothed (v. 14); cf. Judg. 6³⁴. Diadem=turban. For the metaphor, cf. Eph. 6^{10f}. Sand (v. 18)—his days were to be as many as the grains of sand, or with a change in text, like a palm, or the phoenix (symbol of growth or renewed life). Is renewed (v. 20)=shows freshness, i.e., "is pliable." Vv. 21–25 really belong to the description of the assembly in vv. 7–11. Can one cast down the light of a face? (v. 24); perhaps, omitting "cast not down," join v. 25c to v. 24c ("the light of my countenance comforted the mourners").

CHAPTER XXX

Job's Present Humiliation and Wretchedness. Now the most miserable outcasts jeer at me (vv. 1–8); I suffer positive mob violence (vv. 9–15); my disease is horrible and relentless (vv. 16–18); God is the cause, tyrannical, unconscionably cruel (vv. 19–25); my old hopes are changed to utter dejection (vv. 26–31). Job here lays special stress (if the verses are rightly placed) on the contempt which he endures, as distinct from his bodily tortures. All this implies a considerable interval since his calamity, and a quite gratuitous popular Schadenfreude; it is more than an ill-natured glorying when "the mighty are put down from their seat." For the alliance of pain, loathsomeness and popular contempt, cf. again Isa. 53. V. 1 is an appropriate introduction to the chapter, but the text is very uncertain. Ripe age (v. 2)=vigor. Vv. 3f. imply much more than v. 1; famine-stricken, brutal pariahs (cf. 24^{5f}). Bushes (v. 4), where the shade gives the struggling desert plants a bare chance. Broom=the "juniper" of 1 Kings 19; the roots are said to be very bitter. The description would fit such a tribe as the Doms of Bengal.

Why are such loathsome creatures singled out for description? Are we intended to imagine an actual incident? Or have we an extended parallel to 24^{5–8}? If the passage is not original, Job's second speech begins with v. 9, in strong contrast to 29^{21–25}; and it becomes far more effective. Vv. 12–15 suggest an incident once more; but the circumstances of Job's downfall compel us to regard it as imaginative. Stand up (v. 20), as in a law court; cf. 13³ 16²¹. The parallelism necessitates "lookest not." The Hebrew of v. 24 is obscure; possibly it contained a parallel to v. 25. Vv. 28f. refer to Job's disfigurement and repulsive appearance. Unless Job actually was the object of mob contempt and violence (vv. 12, 28), we seem to have here a phantasy suggested by 29^{7f}. and his present misery; 30^{1–8} may then be another phantasy. The parallels to Isaiah's "suffering servant" are noteworthy.

CHAPTER XXXI

Integrity of Job's Entire Life. Impiety, which I have shunned, would bring God's condemnation and punishment (vv. 1–8); this I should deserve, had I been guilty of unchastity or of harshness to my slaves (vv. 9–15), or of anything but the broadest charity to the poor (vv. 16–23); or of trust in wealth, of superstition, hatred, inhospitality or hypocrisy (vv. 24–34); I can justify my whole life fearlessly (vv. 35–40). Some rearrangement of the verses would make the order of thought more logical; e.g., 6, 5, 7, 8, 1–4, 9, 14, 23, 15–22, 38–40, 24–37. The suggestions for such rearrangement are tempting but call for much caution; yet we can hardly avoid placing vv. 38–40 in an earlier part of the chapter; vv. 35–37 are certainly the concluding words. An impressive and noble statement of O.T. (private) ethics at its best. It goes far beyond the Decalogue (being positive as well as negative) and embodies all the rules of conduct (in spirit as well as letter) found in the Torah and the prophets, and may well be compared and contrasted with Rom. 12^{9–20} Col. 3^{5–17}. But, in contrast with his previous speeches, Job's need has changed and softened. Then he cried, "God does not punish the wicked"; now, if not as the Friends, "God does punish them," yet "wickedness is a thing to be punished by God." This form of the traditional creed must be understood (though it is not explicitly stated as such, but note v. 23) as Job's conviction in the old days. Now, instead of denying the moral principles of God's government, he denies (implicitly) God's moral practice. "If only," he sighs, "my case could come up for hearing, how confident I should be of the verdict!" He no longer cries, as in 16¹⁹ and 29⁵, "My case must come on"; but the author leaves the conviction, after so full a statement of the circumstances, that it cannot be neglected, thus preparing the way for chs. 38f.

Covenant (v. 1), as often in Hebrew usage, practically equivalent to rule; like the mediæval ascetics, he will not look at what might prove a temptation. The thought of vv. 2, 3 is as contrary to, e.g., 922 217, 17, as it is consistent with 205 (Zophar) and the Friends' position in general. But Job is expressing his older faith, as is clear if we compare vv. 4, 6 with 1416. Vanity (v. 5)=insincerity. V. 6 (cf. v. 35) implies that God would not judge at all rather than that he would judge wrongly. Grind for (v. 10), i.e., "become another's meanest slave"; a man's household is still part of himself. A crime such as is described in vv. 9–11 is odious even to man; how much more to God! Vv. 13f. present an exalted view of the duties of a slaveholder. For the varying position of the slave in Hebrew society, cf. Ex. 212f., Saul's houseslave (1 Sam. 93f.) and Jer. 349f.; cf. also Philemon, where the bond is not a common humanity, but Christianity. Grew up (v. 18)—better, he brought me up; was my guide, i.e., God's care, for he taught me my duties to them; a very pregnant thought (cf. 1 Jn. 419). V. 21b means, "because the judges would have given me a verdict." Vv. 26f. furnish a rare allusion in this book to false worship as distinct from false conduct; sun-worship was as old in Judah as the seventh century; kiss—such gestures were familiar in Babylonian worship. In v. 29 Job almost rises to Mt. 544. No one has asked in vain even for meat, much less for bread (v. 31). All this makes 309f. the more outrageous. Like Adam (v. 33)—better, from or among men. Vv. 35–37 contain the final appeal to be judged. Signature, Hebrew tau (mark or cross=X); the text, if right, shows that Job thinks of himself as putting in a written plea of innocence. The absence of symmetry suggests some insertion to balance what appears now in v. 35c., literally, "and the document [?] (which) my adversary wrote." Adversary, literally, "man who contends with me," i.e., God, who, far more than the Friends, is Job's terrible opponent. But, if so, he here regards God's refusal to listen to him as based on the absence of a definite complaint. If he had the document, so confident is he of his power to answer it, that he would make a public display of it (upon my shoulder, v. 36) and then, like royalty come into court, he would give the triumphant explanation.

After this, the Friends could say nothing more, and, as it would seem (unless we regard the Elihu speeches as a part of the original work; see intro.), the author passed on to Jehovah's response to Job's summons.

CHAPTERS 32 TO 37: SPEECH OF ELIHU

On the critical questions connected with this speech, see introduction, section on "Composition of the Book."

CHAPTER XXXII

After his introduction by the author (vv. 1–5), Elihu speaks: "Your helplessness must be my excuse for speaking (vv. 6–12); but while you have nothing to say, I, young as I am, am full of ideas which must find utterance" (vv. 13–22).

In a few prose sentences Elihu is introduced formally as a person of some position, but his tone, beginning apologetically, is almost ludicrously self-important. The author, however (whether different from the author of the rest of the book or not), says nothing to show whether he agrees with his summary of Elihu's feelings in vv. 2, 3.

Righteous (v. 1)=in the right as before. Elihu is represented in v. 2 as akin to Job (Gen. 2221). Short as this prose introduction is, there are repetitions in it which mark it off from the prose of chs. 1, 2. V. 8a is to be explained by 8b; it is not age but the breath of God which gives wisdom. Man—Hebrew, "man in his weakness." Are we to gather from v. 11 that others also were listening to the preceding dialogue? Job is not so clever that God alone can answer him (vv. 13f.); "he has not yet argued with me" (!). It may be noted that the word for "spirit" (v. 18) also means "wind." The metaphor in v. 19 is one of physical discomfort. Refreshed (v. 20)=found relief. Respect (v. 21)=show partiality (3134 3419).

CHAPTERS 33 TO 35: DEFENSE OF GOD'S JUSTICE AGAINST JOB'S PRESUMPTUOUSNESS

Ch. 33. Elihu begs Job to hear him, a young man with matured ideas, patiently (vv. 1–7). As against Job's self-defense he argues that God sends visions and suffering to preserve man's life (vv. 8–22); thus God is graciously pleased to restore man, as at last man himself recognizes (vv. 23–33). Ch. 34. I appeal to others against Job's impiety in his complaint (vv. 1–9); God recompenses strictly and cannot be charged with injustice to his creatures (vv. 10–19); he justly exercises complete power over mankind (vv. 20–28); and in whatever he does we must acquiesce (vv. 29–37). Ch. 35. Man cannot effect or draw up bargains with God (vv. 1–9); as a matter of fact, men neglect him when they should rather humble themselves before him (vv. 10–16). In each section Elihu begins by quoting Job, but there is little originality in his answers; he is made (though perhaps unconsciously) to echo the arguments of the dialogue with little variation.

CHAPTER XXXIII

Evidences of God's Desire to Help Man. With v. 4 cf. 32⁸. Here the thought is: "I am but man; you can argue with me; I cannot terrify you as God may do." V. 9 misrepresents Job's attitude. Elihu has as little sympathy (vv. 10f.) for Job as have the Friends. God does not refuse to answer (vv. 13, 14), as Job has complained. With v. 15 cf. Eliphaz' vision in 41²⁴. V. 15b should perhaps read terrifies them with visions. The text of vv. 17, 18 is difficult: By the sword—better, through God's weapons, or into Sheol. The description in vv. 19f. would recall Job's own pains. Destroyers (v. 22)—apparently, destroying powers (cf. 2 Sam. 24¹⁶ 1 Cor. 10¹⁻¹³). If there be (v. 23)—probably, though there be; another heavenly visitor, interpreting God's ways to man, out of a thousand detached for this purpose; this angel (v. 24) then bids the angel of death release him, on payment of a ransom (his own confession of sin). With v. 26 cf. 22²⁷ (Eliphaz); the restored man then goes to the Temple (before men, v. 27), and there publicly recounts his experiences (cf. Ps. 27⁶). Restoreth should probably be proclaimeth.

CHAPTER XXXIV

The Exactness of God's Recompense. Wise, (v. 2)—either the Friends, or, more probably, others who are thought of as forming part of a larger group. With v. 7 cf. chs. 15, 16; but in v. 8 Elihu goes further than Eliphaz. V. 11b is, literally, "as is a man's path, so [God] makes it find him." God's recompense is exact. God can do no wrong (vv. 12f.) and he can never be called to account. Job had asserted the second, but had questioned the first; nor can the fact of God's power well be made, as Elihu argues, the ground of belief in his justice. With vv. 14, 15 cf. Ps. 104²⁹ Eccles. 12⁷. Injustice cannot continue in power (vv. 17f.); but can we condemn Him who combines justice with power, and who can say even to a king, ". . . who (v. 19) respecteth not . . . ?" V. 23—better, to appoint a time for that (cf. 93² 233⁴). V. 26 is, literally, "instead of the wicked, he striketh them in the place of beholders," i.e., in public; for instead of read he smiteth. Vv. 29-33 are a difficult and textually corrupt passage; the general sense appears to be (v. 29): "God does recompense, but (v. 31) you deny it, saying (v. 31b) you have suffered without sinning; what other plan (v. 33) do you propose? It is for you to say, and not for me." Until the end (v. 36)=until he could argue no more. Rebellion (v. 37)=transgression; a stronger word than that used for "sin." Clappeth, i.e., as a gesture of defiance toward God.

CHAPTER XXXV

Man's Complete Inability to Affect God. Do you think that you are vindicated (v. 3) by repeating that your goodness has done nothing for you? Elihu then sets out to show that goodness does "pay" (contrast the Prologue). Companions (v. 4)—here apparently the three Friends, who had not really answered Job. God is too high to be affected by your human acts (vv. 5-7; cf. Ps. 50¹²); these affect only men, who, when injured, may well appeal to God. But no one makes the right kind of appeal (vv. 10, 11). Men's cries are unheeded because they are vain (vv. 12, 13), i.e., misdirected and self-centered (cf. Jas. 4³); still less will you be answered (v. 14) when you openly disregard him; then, follow mg., or, read perhaps, keep silence before him. It is only because his wrath has not punished you (!) that you deny his real recompense of evil; i.e., you deny that goodness pays. In vanity (v. 16), i.e., "utters sheer folly."

CHAPTERS 36 AND 37: GOD'S PROVIDENTIAL DEALINGS WITH MEN

Ch. 36. Yet more, and not unimportant (vv. 1-4), God teaches all men by his appointment of their lot (vv. 5-11); he requites them justly, but uses their trouble to bring them to him, as he would have brought Job (vv. 12-17); let Job therefore be humble (vv. 18-21). God is above our criticism, as is shown by the beneficence and the terrors of creation (vv. 23-33). Ch. 37. Lightning, thunder, rain, snow and ice all serve the ends of his moral government (vv. 1-13); how can man teach the wielder of such enormous power, or even understand him? (Vv. 14-24.) In this last discourse, Elihu passes from God's government of human affairs to his conduct of the impressive processes of nature. In the first we can read his strict justice; the second forces us to confess that he is incomprehensible. We are reminded, now of the speeches of the Friends (especially chs. 11, 18), now of the address of Jehovah in the succeeding chapters. But nothing fresh is added (except perhaps in 36¹⁵), and neither the Friends nor Job have anything to say in reply.

CHAPTER XXXVI

1-15. Affliction Sent for Purposes of Warning. Afar (v. 3)—referring to the broad generalizations that follow. The modesty of tone in 326f. is now quite forgotten. V. 7a would come better after v. 6a; then the humiliated and wronged would be more clearly contrasted with kings on their thrones. Even the good apparently may have done wrong (v. 8), and so may need correction through their sufferings (cf. v. 15; and, for the perversion of the good, Ezek. 18). Unclean (v. 14)—properly, temple servants devoted to a life of (ritual) unchastity (cf. Deut. 23¹⁷).

16-23. Exhortation to Patient Submission. V. 16, like vv. 17f., is very hard to translate; the general sense perhaps is as in R.V., though note mg., ("out of the mouth of confinement"—a curious metaphor) or, possibly, "He was actually enticing thee"; v. 17, either "you are filled full of the just punishment on the wicked," or "you wickedly criticize God, hence." The first phrase of v. 18 is uncertain; the parallel with v. 18b is best preserved if wrath is understood of God's anger, "let it not entice you to mockery, nor be misled by your ransom-price, i.e., your sufferings." V. 19, "will either wealth suffice without distress," i.e., "to deliver from distress?" V. 20 is obscure: Why should he desire the night, in order that calamity might come either on nations or on himself?

24-33. God's Unsearchable Greatness. V. 27 contains an interesting reference to evaporation, to which there is no reference in Jehovah's address where rain is mentioned. V. 29 is apparently influenced by Psa. 18^{11f.}: his pavilion=the storm cloud. Spreadeth (v. 30), in the lightning-flashes. Why covereth?—perhaps, as in Psa. 18¹⁵, lays bare. V. 31 breaks the connection, and should perhaps be removed as a gloss. He seizes, as it were (v. 32a), handfuls of lightning and hurls them at his mark. In v. 33b the reference to the sensitiveness of cattle to a gathering storm is out of place here; better, kindling his anger in the storm.

CHAPTER XXXVII

Vv. 1-13 continue the description of God's greatness in 36²⁴⁻³³. In stormy weather, men cannot work, nor wild beasts hunt (vv. 7, 8). For chambers of the South (v. 9) cf. 90. But of the South is not in the Hebrew; chamber=storehouse of storm (cf. the cave of Aeolus, Odyssey, bk. x); for north read granaries. It (v. 12), i.e., the lightning. In v. 13, either omit or read curse for land.

Vv. 14-24 continue the exhortation in 36¹⁶⁻²³. In v. 17 the reference is to the warmth of the clothes felt during the sirocco, the burning wind from the south, and the stillness of the earth beneath the blasts. The skies are regarded as hammered into a rigid "firmament" or inverted bowl (v. 18). Darkness (v. 19), i.e., of our minds. Swallowed up (v. 20), as (if the text is right) he would be, should he argue with God. See not (v. 21), because of thunder clouds. Babylonian mythology thought of the north as the radiant home of the gods (v. 22). Light is always with God. He is beyond us (v. 23), but he will not pervert justice. Hence (v. 24) he is feared. The conclusion of Elihu's speech is obscure; but it suggests (in spite of 36⁴) one who is "willing to wound, but yet afraid to strike."

CHAPTERS 38¹ TO 42⁶: SPEECHES OF JEHOVAH AND JOB'S SUBMISSION

Jehovah breaks in "from the whirlwind" and answers Job; Job confesses himself unable to reply. In chs. 38 and 39, after a brief challenge to Job, Jehovah recounts the wonders of earth and sea, light and darkness and storm, the creatures of the wild and the war-horse, in each instance asking Job if he understands or has planned or created it. This is followed by a pointed question to Job (40²), who replies with submission (40³⁻⁵). Jehovah then makes a further challenge and passes into long descriptions of "behemoth" and "leviathan" (ch. 41). Job then (42¹⁻⁶) makes a further confession of his helplessness.

Jehovah's address, especially in chs. 38, 39, is impressive and majestic, but it raises two questions:

(1) How, in the mind of the author, is Job's position met? Job has called on God to state his charges against Job himself, on the ground of which Job has been made to suffer; to these Job was sure that he would be able to reply convincingly. But Jehovah makes no charges; instead he calls on Job to answer him and to consider the vastness of nature and his own insignificance; and then Job confesses that it is absurd for man to question God. This hardly "justifies the ways of God to man"; it does not explain why Job suffered. But if the author's main interest was in the problem of what a good man should do in deep suffering, it does seem to supply a definite answer; "he should remember the mighty sweep of God's power, the amazing variety of his creation, and so endure rather than question." In other words, the section appears to teach the answer that there is no real answer that will satisfy the mind; that the answer is one of faith, and that peace comes through recognizing this and holding on to God in the confidence that he knows how to manage the universe. Though this might not satisfy a Western philosopher, and though it comes short of the Buddhist teaching, "flee from the world of desire altogether," it is typical of much of Hebrew religious thought, which is anchored to the transcendence of God, and which comes to rest in contemplating his power rather than his attention to the desires of individual human beings (cf. p. 160). The passage, then, can take its place beside Psa. 104 (the adaptation of the whole world to the needs of the various creatures) and Mic. 6⁸ (as typical of the prophets) —man's part is to live a life of morality (Job 31) and humility (42:1-6).

(2) What is the purpose of the second address (chs. 40, 41)? The whole episode would end very effectively at 40⁵. But Jehovah is not content with Job's surrender. In 40⁶⁻¹⁴ he appears to ask for something more; and in the rest of chs. 40 and 41 we are reminded of ch. 39; but the descriptions are much longer (ch. 41, indeed, is wearisome) and there are none of the questions which make chs. 38 and 39 so vivid. Ch. 41 ends without any further appeal to Job, and most of Job's short speech in 42:1-6 is a repetition of what he and Jehovah had previously said. We may conjecture that there was originally only one speech and one reply, and that there have been additions and displacements. We may join the substance of 40⁶⁻¹⁴ to 40², and 42:1-6 (or parts of it) to Job's first reply in 40³⁻⁵, regarding the "behemoth" and "leviathan" sections as no part of the original poem. Or, it may be even simpler to regard the whole of 40^{6-42:6} as an amplification of the one speech and one reply in 39:1-40⁵, whether by the original author or by someone else.

CHAPTER XXXVIII

Job's Ignorance of the Mysteries of Inanimate Nature. "Answer me," says Jehovah, "and expound the mysteries (vv. 1-3) of the creation of the stable earth (vv. 4-11), the light and the darkness (vv. 12-21), rain, snow and ice (vv. 22-30), the heavenly bodies, lightnings, and clouds" (vv. 31-38).

Vv. 1-38 stress Job's ignorance of inanimate nature on earth and in heaven. It is suggestive, but not necessary to connect the whirlwind (v. 1) with Elihu's description of the gathering storm (37:1-8). Who? (V. 2.) Is this a direct reference to Job? But the words are hardly appropriate to chs. 29-31; better, to the substance of Job's earlier complaints, or, indeed, to chs. 32-37, the speeches of Elihu, if these are to be understood to be in their proper or original place. With v. 3 cf. Ezek. 21. 4^f. God as the architect of the world is a familiar figure in Hebrew poetry, but the phrases here are not necessarily intended to be taken literally. Sons of God (v. 7)—cf. 1⁶. There is no reference in v. 12 to the sun and moon; light and darkness are apparently thought of, as in Gen. 1³⁻⁵, as existing independently. V. 13 uses an original metaphor: the dawn seizes the vast coverlet of the surface of the earth and shakes the wicked out of their concealment in it. How different from the Greek picturesque figure of the "rosy-fingered one"! The metaphor of the garment (the earth's surface) appears in a similar form in the Babylonian creation epic. The sea (v. 16) was always a solemn and terrifying mystery to the Hebrews (cf. Psa. 104²⁵ 107²³ Jonah 2 Rev. 21¹). For gates (v. 17) suggesting impregnable power, cf. Mt. 16¹⁸. The irony of v. 21 echoes that of Job in 12². As in Psa. 104, each section of creation has its purpose (v. 23), though (v. 26) this may transcend mere human needs. With v. 31 cf. 9⁹ (note). Here in each case the names refer to constellations; Mazzaroth (v. 32; a plural) is quite uncertain. Inward parts . . . mind (v. 36)—the Hebrew words used here are otherwise unknown, but the R.V. translation is quite inappropriate to the context. Pour (v. 37)=tilt; like skin water-bottles, to empty them. Vv. 39-41: see under ch. 39.

CHAPTER XXXIX

Job's Similar Ignorance of Animate Nature.

From inanimate nature Jehovah turns to the animal creation. With ch. 39 should be taken 38³⁹⁻⁴¹. "Do you know the secrets of lions (38³⁹⁻⁴¹; see comment below), of wild goats (39:1-4), of the wild ass (vv. 5-8), of the wild ox (vv. 9-12), of the ostrich, stupid yet fearless (vv. 13-18), the high-mettled war-horse (vv. 19-25), the hawk or the eagle?" (Vv. 20-30.) Previously, the question has been, "Can you do what God does?" Now (in animated nature), "Can you control or teach the wild beasts?" Here the poem falls into stanzas of irregular length, each containing a vivid word-picture.

Hunt the prey (38³⁹), as God their maker does (cf. Psa. 104²¹). For raven (38⁴¹) read for him in the evening; the mention of a bird is inappropriate, and the Hebrew words for "raven" and "evening" are almost indistinguishable. These wild creatures are beyond the care or notice of man but not of God, who makes pregnancy easy for them (39:1-4). The Hebrew word for wild ass (v. 5) is quite distinct from that for "domestic ass," and vv. 5f. describe the contrast between the two. Wild ox (vv. 9f.); Hebrew, re'em; contrast sor, domestic ox; perhaps the aurochs. Even if he could be tamed, he could never be relied on (v. 12). The section beginning with v. 13 is not introduced by a question, like the rest, and seems out of place (between ox and horse); moreover, there is little suitability in the characteristics mentioned, stupidity and ferocity, while v. 13 is untranslatable. The mention of the horse in v. 18 connects this with the following section, and was perhaps the cause of the insertion of the short poem here. How that magnificent creature, the horse, throws man into the shade! (Vv. 19f.) Quivering mane, a guess, as is "thunder" (A.V.); though quite possibly right. Valley (v. 21), where chariots would naturally fight (cf. 1 Kings 20²⁸). In v. 24b, follow the mg. Some species of hawk are said to be migratory (v. 26).

CHAPTER XL

See above, introductory paragraph (2) to section 381—42⁶, for a suggested rearrangement. Jehovah: Can you answer me? (Vv. 1, 2.) Job: I am silent! (Vv. 3—5.) Jehovah: Then answer! Can you imitate my magnificence, in my rule over the proudest of mankind? (Vv. 6—14.) The marvel of Behemoth (vv. 15—24).

1—14. Jehovah's Challenge to Job. Job has been quite ready to speak, but he has learned his lesson (v. 5). Now that he is lying helpless, the irony that follows (vv. 6f.) is futile. "If you criticize, seize my power, and proceed to govern; then I will acknowledge your independence." Note that Jehovah is here made to pass from his justice to his power; cf. Elihu, 36²². As a divine argument, the passage is only tolerable if we regard (as perhaps the author regarded) Job's criticism of God as, under any circumstances, glaring impiety.

15—24. Behemoth. The Hebrew word behe-moth is plural, denoting, as the plural often does, size or strength. The beast here described is generally identified (from the terms of the description) with the hippopotamus, which, though now not found north of the second cataract, actually existed previously in lower Egypt and possibly in the Jordan Valley. The description of the monster's strength and habits is more leisurely than the descriptions in ch. 39, and exaggerated (vv. 17, 19). Mountains (v. 20)—at best, low hills near the river; lotus (v. 21)—a low scrub is meant, growing near the riverside; brook (v. 22), or "wady," which suggests, like v. 23, Palestine. No sudden rise in the water can disconcert him. Snare (v. 24), apparently the spike on which the bait was placed (cf. 1 Sam. 18²¹).

CHAPTER XLI

Leviathan. This word refers to various creatures in the O.T.; it seems to mean whale in Psa. 104²⁶; and dragon in Psa. 74¹⁴. In Job 38 it is mythological or metaphorical, and a mythological explanation has been suggested for this passage (as also for ch. 40); but probably what is meant here is the crocodile, familiar on the Nile and also, apparently (to judge from proper names), at one time in Palestine. But the turgidity of the style (cf. ch. 40) shows that it could not have been a familiar object to the writer of the chapter. The main ideas are the creature's unapproachableness (vv. 1—11), the strength of his body (vv. 12—18), the terror he inspires, and his scorn of those who would conquer him (vv. 19—34).

The crocodile, like the hippopotamus, could be and was captured (vv. 1, 2); crocodiles are generally wary and suspicious (v. 3), and, since they can procure abundance of food, will seldom attack a man. *Man might sport with a bird (v. 5); with "leviathan" only God can play (the rabbis imagined him doing so). Barbed irons (v. 7)=harpoons.

"If you should lay your hand . . . remember what a battle with him is like; you will not do it again!" (V. 8.) The hope of (v. 9), i.e., "to capture." Vv. 10b, 11 are obscure; perhaps intended as a boast in leviathan's mouth. In v. 12 the first person singular (as in v. 11) is strange. The reference in v. 13 is to scales and jaws. Sneezings (v. 18), i.e., spray breathed through his nostrils. In Egyptian hieroglyphics, the eye of the crocodile is the sign for dawn. Ointment (v. 31)—does this refer to odor? The crocodile possesses two sets of musk glands. V. 34a, probably should be read, with slight change, every high thing feareth him.

CHAPTER XLII

1—6. Job's Second Reply and Penitence. (But see on the whole passage, introduction to 381—42⁶ above.) V. 2 comes better after ch. 39 than chs. 40, 41. Vv. 3a and 4b are quoted from Jehovah's words in 382, ³ (cf. 407). Job has been speaking about God's nature, which he now knows (v. 3bc) to be beyond his comprehension. V. 4a, like 4b, if correct, is apparently put into the mouth of Jehovah, but has no point here (cf. 383 401) where the words are in place. Job had prayed to see God (23³), but how different is the actual effect of the vision! (V. 5.) It convinces him (and this is given as his last word) that even in his agony he has sinned in questioning God.

CHAPTER 427-16: THE EPILOGUE

The End of Job's Trials. This passage is on a distinctly lower level than the Prologue, in both style and thought. It points back to the dialogue, or to something like the dialogue; but the last clause of v. 7 (repeated in v. 8) does not fit either Jehovah's address to Job or Job's confession. Nor does it fit the Prologue, since the main interest of chs. 1, 2 in the Satan's question to Jehovah is not referred to. The whole conclusion—Job's last state better than the first!—is a very simple instance of what is known as poetic justice, accomplished by a deus ex machina. On the other hand, it may be said to satisfy, as far as it goes, the claims both of the Friends ("if a man is righteous, he will be delivered or rewarded at the last"), and of Job himself ("if God is just, he must vindicate me"). V. 8 describes a very large sacrifice; folly—the word which Job had used to his wife in 2¹⁰. Accepted (v. 9)—elsewhere,

"accept the face" means "receive into favor." The Hebrew construction of v. 10 suggests a break or contrast between vv. 9 and 10. Turned the captivity—the phrase is usual of Israel's restoration from exile. With v. 11 cf. 19^{13f}. Piece of money—the value could not have been large (cf. Gen. 33¹⁹). His possessions are doubled (v. 12); the number of children remains the same. The names of the daughters (v. 13), meaning respectively "dove" (?), "cassia," "horn of eye-paint," apparently are intended to suggest their beauty. Inheritance (v. 15)—cf. Num. 27; Job goes beyond the Hebrew custom. Job enjoyed length of life worthy of the patriarchal age (v. 16).

PSALMS I-LXXII

By PROFESSOR ELMER A. LESLIE

INTRODUCTION

(The present introduction covers the entire Psalter, and is by the author of the commentary on Ps. 1-72. For Ps. 73-150 see pp. 554-601).

Significance of the Psalms. In the book of Psalms we meet the religion of Israel at its greatest depth and its most passionate intensity. The psalmists fell heir to the profound insights and spiritual experiences of the prophets. These latter were Israel's intellectual and spiritual pioneers, blazing new paths to God and clearing new trails for human feet. The psalmists largely found ready at hand these insights. They took them up, lived their way into them experimentally, applied them to the life of individuals and of the community and linked them to the religious worship that centered in the Temple, all the while both deepening and intensifying them. The Psalter, representing as it does close to a thousand years of Israel's history, may be viewed as a transcript of the heart life of the Hebrew people. Coming from a vast variety of individuals who had learned both how to exult in unspeakable joy and to cry out unto God from the depths of inexpressible anguish, it is a mirror of the life of the soul, not of Israel merely, but of humanity. It is the noblest book of devotion possessed by men, and comes down to us enhanced by the reverence of centuries to which it has contributed both strength and light.

The Terms "Psalms" and "Psalter." The Psalter is the first book of the Kethubhim ("writings"), the third section of the Hebrew Bible (see art., The Formation of the O.T., pp. 95-7). It bears the title Tehillim ("praises"), yet only one of the psalms (145) is so designated. An earlier time called these poems Tephilloth ("prayers"; Ps. 72²⁰). The LXX uses the designation Psalmoi, the plural of a term meaning "a touching sharply," "a pulling or twanging with the fingers," which corresponds best with the term preferred in the titles, mizmor, or "melody." This term is used in the O.T. to designate only religious songs. It comes from a root meaning "to pluck" or "to pinch," which could thus be used of touching the strings with the fingers. In the Codex Alexandrinus the designation Psalterion, whence comes the term "psalter," is used. The word means primarily a stringed instrument, but by association of ideas it came to mean the songs sung to the accompaniment of the stringed instrument.

The Organization of the Psalter. The Hebrew Psalter is divided into five books, a division which is at least as early as the LXX. Each book closes with a doxology and the last Psalm (150) is itself a doxology to the entire Psalter. The divisions are as follows:

Book I. Psalms 1-41.

Book II. Psalms 42-72.

Book III. Psalms 73-89.

Book IV. Psalms 90-106.

Book V. Psalms 107-150.

Probably this fivefold division originated from viewing the Psalter as the counterpart of the Law, the response of the community to the summons of God in the Law (Kittel). "The Hebrews," says Epiphanius, "divided the Psalter into five books so that it would be another Pentateuch."

A careful study of these five divisions of the Psalter reveals the gradual amalgamation within these books of several originally separate collections. This view is supported by the following arguments: (1) Certain psalms in one collection are repeated in another with only slight changes (14=53; 40¹³⁻¹⁷=70; 57⁷⁻¹¹+60⁵⁻¹²=108). (2) Ps. 72²⁰ says "the prayers of David are ended"; yet we find many other psalms attributed to David in the succeeding books. Evidently, an early Davidic collection ended with Ps. 72. (3) Other individual collections are discernible: "of the Sons of Korah," 42-49, 84, 85, 87, 88; "of Asaph," 50, 73-83; Maskil psalms, cultic songs, viewed as the product of special divinely endowed insight (Mowinckel), 52-55; Miktām psalms, of atonement or expiation, 56-60; the Psalms of Ascents, 120-134; the Hallelujah Psalms, 111-113, 115-117, 146-150; cf. also 105-107. (4) In 1-41 the name of Jehovah for Israel's God appears 272 times; Elohim only 15. In 42-84 Elohim appears 208 times; Jehovah, 48. A comparison of Ps. 53 with 14 reveals that the editor of 53 has changed "Jehovah" to "Elohim." These facts are explained as follows: Ps. 1-41 is an early collection; Ps. 42-84 is a later collection in which the editor, working at a time when the sacred name of Israel's God was no longer pronounced because it was considered too sacred for pronunciation, substituted as far as possible Elohim for Jehovah.

Steps in the Formation of the Psalter. The recognition of these originally separate collections helps us to discern the steps in the formation of the Psalter. (See Gray, Critical Introduction to the O.T., p. 132, Charles Scribner's Sons, publishers):

1. The compilation of a Davidic collection with a doxology at the close, 3-41.

2. The compilation of a second Davidic collection with a doxology at the close, 51-72.

3. The compilation of a collection entitled, "of Asaph," probably a guild of Temple singers (Ezra 24¹) 50, 73-83. J. P. Peters suggests that this collection originally belonged to the sanctuary at Bethel.

4. The compilation of a collection entitled "of the Sons of Korah," likewise probably a guild of Temple singers (2 Chr. 20¹⁹), 42-49. Peters suggests that this collection originally belonged to the sanctuary at Dan.

5. The redaction of an Elohist Psalter, 42-83, out of psalms that were derived from the second, third, and fourth collections. The editor quite generally, but not consistently, substituted "Elohim" for "Jehovah."

6. The Elohist Psalter was enlarged by the addition of 84-89.

7. The compilation of a collection entitled "Songs of the Ascents," 120-134.

8. The compilation of 90-150 around these "Songs of the Ascents" and other similar collections.

W. R. Smith maintains that these steps finally culminated in three separate collections 1-41, 42-89, 90-150; which subsequently were redivided so as to make the Psalter conform with the five-fold division of the Law.

Psalms Literature in the Old Testament Before the Exile. We approach the psalms aright only when we attempt to see them in the context of the whole psalm literature, both canonical and uncanonical, that came from the soul of ancient Israel. In Ex. 15²¹, the song of Miriam, we have a fragment quite in the style of a psalm which probably comes from the time of Moses (cir. 1200 B.C.) In Judg. 5, the Song of Deborah, the earliest extant monument of Hebrew literature, dating from about 1150 B.C., we have a brilliant psalm of triumph, much in the style of a psalm, celebrating the victory of the Israelites under Deborah and Barak over the Canaanites under Sisera. 2 Sam. 23¹⁻⁷, which is quite similar to some of the psalms containing oracles, is possibly, as Sellin maintains, a product of early prophetic bands. The existence of this material outside the psalter, yet strikingly similar to it, suggests that psalmody in Israel has a long history that reaches back even behind the Davidic era.

The existence of psalms and references to psalmody in the pre-exilic prophets argues for the pre-exilic origin of many psalms. Gressmann calls these prophetic poems political psalms and believes they are largely fashioned upon the psalms of worship that were already in existence. Some of them are oracles concerning the future and were to be sung by the ideal community of the future. Such are Hos. 6¹⁻³ and 14^{1f}. Isa. 21¹⁻⁴ (paralleled in Micah 4¹⁻³), which may, however, come from the postexilic period, reminds us forcibly of Psa. 122, which is a summons to a pilgrimage to Jerusalem. Amos 6^{5, 6} is interpreted by Gressmann as referring not to the ordinary banquet songs but to sacred songs accompanying the sacrificial worship, i.e., songs like the psalms (see Simpson, The Psalmists, pp. 8f.); he believes that psalms are as old as sacrificial worship. Isa. 30²⁹ seems to refer to psalms used in Temple worship at the feasts by the pilgrims to Jerusalem. A psalm closes the first great section of Isaiah's prophecy (ch. 12).

Amos 5^{2, 3} is a national dirge or lamentation such as is frequently found in the Psalter, and such as must have been used in times of solemn national fast days (cf. Joel 18-14). Jer. 147⁹ offers a similar example; Jer. 16^{19, 20} and Jer. 17^{7, 8} are psalms, the latter serving as the pattern for the later psalm which forms the introduction to the Psalter. Hab. 3 is a psalm of a theophany very similar in parts to Psa. 18 and 97. Isa. 38¹⁰⁻²⁰, the psalm of Hezekiah, and that of Hannah, 1 Sam. 2¹⁰⁻¹¹, also have their counterparts in the Psalter.

Psalms Literature in Postexilic Judaism. Ezekiel's plan of the restored Temple had chambers for the singers (40⁴⁴) and thus suggests a developed Temple choir even before the Exile. The exiles knew Temple songs (Psa. 137^{3, 4}). In Deutero-Isaiah many psalms occur (Isa. 40¹²⁻³¹ 42¹⁰⁻¹² 44²³ 49¹³ 52⁹ 54¹⁰). Gressmann maintains that no prophet so resembled a psalmist as did the author of Isa. 40-55. Trito-Isaiah (Isa. 56-66) also contains several psalms (Isa. 61^{10, 11} 63^{7-64¹²} 66¹⁰⁻¹⁴). Jonah 2²⁻⁹ is a psalm inserted later into the original book of Jonah. Isa. 25^{1-26¹⁰}, originating in the early Greek period, is made up of hymns of thanksgiving. The Chronicler puts a psalm (a prayer) into the mouth of David (1 Chr. 29¹⁰⁻¹⁹) and prayers of lamentation and confession into the mouths of Ezra, Nehemiah, and the Levites (Ezra 9⁵⁻¹⁵ Neh. 15¹¹ 96-39).

Uncanonical Psalms. In still later, uncanonical, writings psalms are found. In Ecclus. 39:14b-35 (first quarter of second century B.C.) Jesus, son of Sirach, turns psalmist and in hymnic form sets forth his wisdom concerning creation. In 1 Maccabees (early first century B.C.) we have several lamentations (1 Macc. 125-28 28-12) and odes of praise (1 Macc. 31-9 to Judas, and 146-15 to Simon) quite in the style of the Psalter. In the Psalms of Solomon (middle of first century A.D.) we have psalms like those of the Psalter, which breathe the piety of the Pharisees. In the 42 Odes of Solomon (second century A.D.) we have Christian psalms resembling many in the Psalter which they attempt to imitate. Thus the psalms of the Psalter are but the most significant part of a psalm literature that dates from Mosaic times down to the second century after the opening of the Christian era.

Psalm Titles. One of the fascinating questions in the study of the Psalter is the interpretation of the superscriptions to the individual psalms. All but thirty-four of them bear titles, the exceptions being called by the Jews "orphans." These superscriptions, though not original with the psalm authors, go back to relatively ancient tradition. A comparison of the titles in the LXX with those in the Massoretic text shows that some of the terms were already unintelligible when this translation was made and that the superscriptions had not yet become fixed. Before any certainty can be achieved with regard to the significance of the titles we must understand the meaning of the technical terms used. And yet upon no question in the study of the Psalter is there more uncertainty than upon the meaning of many such terms. The recent researches of Sigmund Mowinckel (Psalmen Studien, I-VI, 1921-4) have opened the question afresh and are rich in suggestions concerning the use of the psalms in connection with the cult.

Suggestions Toward the Interpretation of Technical Terms in the Titles. The succeeding paragraphs present several of the most probable suggestions of Mowinckel. (1) Certain terms define the general or special character of the psalm. The term, mizmôr (3, etc.), ordinarily rendered "psalm," is a song accompanied by instrumental music. The term, shîr, "song," used alone only in 18 and 46, ordinarily designates profane as well as cultic songs, but in the Psalter, as might be expected, it is a designation of religious songs only. A whole group have the title, Shîr hamma'âlôth, ordinarily translated Psalms of Ascents (120-134). The word "ascents" refers to the festal procession of the ark which took place annually on New Year's Day, celebrating the accession of Jehovah to his throne. Miklâm (16, 56-60) is applied to songs suggesting the idea of atoning for or expiating sins; all such psalms are individual lamentations. Maskîl (32, 42 etc.) designates a song of worship accompanied by music, insofar as it is the product of special insight such as that of seer, prophet, priest, Temple poets and singers. Shiggâyôn (7), a term which probably came into the cult language of Israel through Canaan, is connected with the Assyrian lamentation psalm. It probably (cf. Hab. 3:1) has to do with the cultic acts which accompanied the singing of such songs. Tehillâ (145) means "hymn"; tephillâ (90, etc.) is the general word for "prayer," especially a prayer of petition.

(2) Other terms used in the title concern the purpose of the psalm: Lehōdhâ (100) means "for (an expression of) thanks," which probably accompanied the offering. Leannōth (88) means "for penitence," and was composed for use in the penitential phase of worship. Lehazkîr (38, 70) means that the psalm was used "for bringing sins to remembrance," the psalmist's own sin (Lev. 5:12) or the unrighteous acts of the enemy from which he is suffering. Le or 'al yedhāthān (39, 62, 77) means "for confession," i.e., a psalm of confessional and petitional content. The Chronicler misunderstood this title and attributed it to another Levitical guild of singers, along with those of Asaph, Heman, and Ethan. Le'ammēdh (60), "to teach," points to the revelation of Jehovah to a prophetically inspired worshiper (cf. the oracle of 60:6-9).

(3) A number of terms have to do with cultic acts or situations. Lamenacceah, found in fifty-five psalms, appears first in the title to Psa. 4. Ordinarily it is rendered "for the chief musician" or "for musical rendering" (Kittel). Mowinckel suggests that the root idea of the word is "to shine," and here means "to cause to shine," the object understood being "the face of Jehovah." Thus interpreted it would refer to such liturgical acts as would make Jehovah's countenance alight with mercy and gentleness so that he would hear and bless. If this interpretation is accepted, it might be paraphrased: "to put God into a gracious attitude."

'al yōnath elîm (LXX) rehoqim (56) does not refer to a melody to which the psalm is set. It means, rather, "concerning the dove for the far-away gods." The psalm is designated to be sung over the dove which symbolically carries away the guilt of the purified to the far-off gods. It is a sacrifice originally conceived as placating the evil spirits that were viewed as having caused the sickness or misfortune of the sufferer (cf. Lev. 1:14 56-10 16 and Zech. 5:11).

'al ayyeleth hashshahar (22), "concerning the hind of the dawn," refers to a cultic act, the sacrifice of a ewe, in connection with which the psalm was sung by the offerer or by the priests in his name. The sacrifice which was a sin-offering was brought at the first streak of dawn (cf. Job 15).

'al shōshannīm (45, 69), 'al shūshan edhāth (60), 'el shōshanmīm (80) are variants of the same title, which means "concerning the lilies of the ark" (Ex. 30³⁶ Num. 17¹⁰). It refers to the use of flowers in the sacrifice. According to the Mishna, those in festal procession (cf. Lev. 23⁴⁰) carried branches of palm, myrtle, and willows up to the Temple, and after the procession about the altar the branches were placed around it to bless it. So probably these flowers were laid down on or before the ark while the psalm was being rendered.

'al mahalath (53, 88), "concerning illness." Psalms thus designated had to do with the purification ritual after sickness, which was viewed as caused by enemies of Jehovah; 'al (LXX) 'hanēhīlōth (5) probably is a scribal error for the same phrase as the preceding, 'al 'alāmōth (46). The same consonants appear in the subscript to 48. The term refers to a cultic liturgical act of which the playing of the harp and singing constituted a part (cf. 1 Chr. 15²⁰⁻²²); furthermore, it is a technical designation of a certain part of the festal ritual of the great autumn festival celebrating Jehovah's accession to the throne. Mowinkel, following the LXX, renders it "concerning the hidden things" and connects it with the unveiling of the future through the prophets of the cult, which was accompanied by playing on the harp (cf. 2 Kings 31^{5f.}). 'al māt̄h labbēn (9), "against the death of the son (of the king)," may possibly refer to the placating of the powers conceived as threatening the death of the royal prince. 'al hashshēmīnīth (6, 12), "concerning the eighth," designates a cultic act accompanied by the harp. It is the last and decisive act in the ritual of purification, following which perhaps came the prophetic oracle. 'al haggītōth (LXX) (8, 81, 84), "over the winepresses." Thirtle connects the terms with the autumnal feast of booths. 'al tashēhēth (57-59, 75), "destroy not." Mowinkel, citing Isa. 65⁸, "Destroy it not, for a blessing is in it," connects it with a prayer liturgy of the congregation, "the vineyard of Jehovah," for protection and help.

(4) Finally, there are two designations that may be classed as musical references, one occurring in the titles, the other in the body of the psalms. (a) be and 'al neghēnōth (6, 54, 55, 67). This indicates that the cultic action designated by lamenaggeah, with which the phrase appears (see (3) above), was performed to the accompaniment of the harp. (b) A designation found in the body of the Psalms, not in the title, is higgāyōn selāh (91⁶). Higgāyōn is found alone in the text of Psa. 92³ and selāh elsewhere alone. Probably the words are identical or parallel in meaning. The word selāh, which means "lift up," is simply the direction to the worshipers at that point in the rendition of the psalm to "lift up" the cultic cry, "He endureth forever and ever" (cf. Aquila and Targum). It is to be classed, so far as the content of the cultic cry is concerned, with "Amen" and "Hallelujah."

The Psalms in Jewish Usage. The psalms give us some further evidence of their use in worship. Psa. 30 was used at the festival of the Dedication of the Temple. Psa. 92 was a song for the Sabbath day. Psa. 100 was used in connection with the thankoffering. From the LXX we learn that Psa. 24 was attached to Sunday, 48 to Monday, 94 to Wednesday (also, according to Theodoret, 101), 93 to Friday. Later Old Latin and Armenian translations attach 81 to Thursday. The LXX designates 29 for use on the last day of the Festival of Booths. The Mishna (Tamid VII, 4) names Psa. 82 for Tuesday. The Talmud gives further directions concerning individual psalms and groups of psalms.

Our study of the titles and of the date concerning Jewish usage leads us to the conclusion that originally the psalms were connected with the sacrificial worship. This argues for the high antiquity of Hebrew psalmody. When worship in Israel changed its center from the Temple to the synagogue, the psalms became a spiritual liturgy.

The Question of Davidic Authorship. The titles offer data concerning the authorship of the psalms. Seventy-three are attributed to David, twelve to Asaph, nine to the sons of Korah, two to Solomon, one to Heman the Ezrahite, one to Ethan the Ezrahite, and one to Moses. To each of these names is prefixed the preposition "of" or "belonging to," which originally may have designated the collection from which the psalm was taken rather than authorship. But when the historical notes to the "of David" psalms were added, a process still going on about 200 B.C., the phrase was interpreted as denoting authorship.

Now we know that David was a musician (1 Sam. 16^{14f.}), and that he wrote secular poetry (2 Sam. 11^{9f.} 33^{3f.}). He may therefore have written religious poetry. But the fact of Davidic authorship of any of the psalms cannot be maintained with absolute confidence. Gray has stated the matter accurately when he says, "There are psalms in the Psalter of which, if we may remove certain parts as later interpolations, a residuum remains of which it would be unjustifiable to assert that it was not written by David" (Critical Introduction to the O.T., p. 139, Charles Scribner's Sons, publishers). The authors of some of the psalms attributed to David represent the peaks of O.T. spiritual insight, which appears inconsistent with the far more primitive views held by the David of the historical books. Moreover, the language of some of the "Davidic" psalms shows the strong influence of the encroaching Aramaic, an evidence of post-exilic date.

The Dating of the Psalms. The intimate association of the psalms with the Temple worship as revealed in the Psalter, in the titles and in the Talmudic references, suggests the most probable view of the date of the Psalter. It is the hymn and prayer book of the second Temple. Many of the hymns are pre-exilic in origin, but in every case in their present arrangement they have been collected and edited for the post-exilic period. In the absence of practically all external evidence—the chronological notes in the titles are later editorial additions—the date of a psalm must be determined almost entirely upon the basis of internal evidence. Four principles guide us in this: (1) the historical allusions; (2) the diction and literary style; (3) the relation to writings of known date; (4) the character of the religious ideas. A number of psalms can best be explained as dating from as late a time as the Maccabæan era. The Psalms of Solomon are not included, so the Psalter must have been closed by the time these psalms were composed. The reference to Psa. 79:2 in 1 Macc. 7:16, 17 (about 100 B.C.) views that psalm as Holy Scripture, which suggests that the Psalter was closed late in the second century B.C. This view, which maintains the presence of early, even pre-Davidic elements in the Psalter, and likewise the presence of very late, even Maccabæan elements, makes the Psalter a transcript of the entire religious history of Israel.

The Poetry of the Psalms. The Hebrews, with their burning religious passion, their spirited nationalism, their strong imagination, were poetically gifted to a high degree. Their poetry, of which the psalms offer excellent examples, is not primarily that of conscious art but, rather, that of simple, childlike utterance from the heart. It was Lowth (1753) who discovered the fundamental principle of Hebrew poetry, namely parallelism, the correspondence of one verse or line with another. Various types of parallelism are discernible (for details see art., Poetic and Wisdom Literature, p. 155). (1) Synonymous, Psa. 114; (2) antithetical, Psa. 30:5; (3) synthetic or constructive, Psa. 197-10; (4) introverted, Psa. 308-10; (5) climactic, Psa. 121:1-4. Ordinary meter and rime are absent, but Hebrew poetry has rhythm, of which G. B. Gray distinguishes two types—"balancing rhythm," where in the two lines there is an equality in the number of stresses, and "echoing rhythm," where there are in the first line a greater number of stressed syllables, and a smaller number in the second.

Comparison with Babylonian and Egyptian Psalms. Hebrew poetry shares with Babylonian the two principles of parallelism and rhythm, the former being the more marked of the two. A flood of light has been poured upon the development of Hebrew psalmody through the Babylonian psalms. (See Gressmann, Alt-orientalische Texte zum Alten Testament, 2nd ed., 1926.) Among the most important of these are two prayers to the goddess Ishtar, a hymn to Sin the Moon-god, and a hymn to Bel. (See Barton, Archæology and the Bible, 4th ed., pp. 458-461.) While these reveal many points of contact with Hebrew psalms, the latter are far loftier and profounder in the consciousness of sin.

There are likewise many points of contact with Egyptian hymns, the two most famous being from about 1400 B.C., a hymn to the Sun-god, and a hymn in Praise of Aton. (See Barton, op. cit., pp. 462-466). While alive with deep feeling and religious insight, nevertheless the Egyptian poems lack the simple directness and deep passion of the Hebrew psalms. The relative antiquity of psalm literature among Israel's neighbors argues for an early development of psalmody in Israel.

The Classification of the Psalms. One question which meets the investigator of the psalms at every point has to do with the classification of the psalms. Several principles may be followed and all are illuminating. Barton (Religion of Israel, pp. 201f.), proceeding chiefly from various soul moods, divides them into ten groups: (1) Unregenerate hate; (2) hymns of war; (3) love for the law; (4) historical retrospects; (5) nature psalms; (6) Pharisaic spirit; (7) prayers for help; (8) reflective psalms; (9) expressions of trust; (10) progress in religious thinking.

McFadyen (Psalms in Modern Speech, pp. 246; 247), starting from a purely topical principle, suggestively divides them into the following groups: (1) Psalms of adoration; (2) psalms concerning Jehovah's universal reign; (3) psalms concerning the King; (4) psalms of reflection; (5) psalms of thanksgiving; (6) psalms in celebration of worship; (7) historical psalms; (8) imprecatory psalms; (9) penitential psalms; (10) psalms of petition; (11) alphabetic psalms.

The most illuminating principle of grouping, however, is that pursued by Staerk, Die Schriften des Alten Testaments, 2nd edit., by Kittel, Die Psalmen, and by Gunkel, Die Psalmen. They start from the use of the psalms in the worship of Israel. Staerk divides them as follows: The religious lyric, including hymns, cultic and individual; prayers of thanksgiving and of petition, both cultic and personal; and songs, spiritual and of the wisdom interest. The psalter furnishes but one illustration of the profane lyric (Psa. 45), and it has been adapted to religious use. Kittel groups them as follows: Public hymns of praise; individual hymns of praise; public prayers of thanksgiving; national prayers of petition; prayers for the king; individual prayers of petition; wisdom poems and spiritual songs. Gunkel distinguishes ten groups: (1) Hymns of praise; (2) hymns of Jehovah's accession to the throne; (3) national lamentations; (4) the king's psalms; (5) individual lamentations; (6) individual songs of thanksgiving; (7) smaller groups including blessings, curses, pilgrimage, victory and thanksgiving songs (all of these groups are lyrics); (8) prophetic poems; (9) wisdom poetry; (10) antiphonal poems and formal liturgies.

Religious Values for To-day in the Psalms. The prophets utter the mind of Israel concerning God. The psalmists utter the heart of Israel in experience with God. There is no body of devotional literature in the world comparable to the Psalms in expressing the reality, depth, and purity of religious experience. As Greece gave to the world sensitiveness to beauty and the stimulus to thought, as Rome contributed administration and law, so Israel's genius gave to humanity religion. And nowhere in the literature of Israel is this so apparent as in the Psalter. The two main directions in which it offers significant religious value for modern life are (1) in the idea of God it contains and (2) in the varieties of religious experience it portrays.

The Idea of God in the Psalter. Taking the psalms as a whole, they contain the conception of a majestic God. He is the Creator of the world. The heavens, the sun, moon and stars owe their being to him. Man too came to be through God's creative purpose. He is the summit of creation, made "but little lower than God." This whole area of creation is under the Creator's dominion. Nature reveals the very mind of God. The heavens declare his glory. The thunder is his voice. The recurring succession of the seasons, the passing of day into night, the mysterious productivity of the soil, the deepseated, instinctive processes of animal life—all utter the mind of God. He is all-powerful. He is all-knowing. He is everywhere present.

Moreover, this majestic God is the God of history. All human history moves toward a goal, the reign of God over all mankind, in all the earth. But this ultimate purpose of God is not viewed as achieved through the initiative and effort of men so much as through the direct effort and energy of God. To a unique degree this God of human history is the God of Israel's history. He created Israel and made himself known to her. He is the God of Moses and the Exodus, of Sinai and the wilderness, of the invasion and settlement of Canaan. And this God of Israel is the one sole God of the whole world, who uses Israel to reveal him to the far ends of the earth—a thought common also to the prophets.

Varieties of Religious Experience in the Psalter. The Psalter is the utterance of many individuals of different epochs and out of richly diversified situations. It is the deposit of the religious soul of Israel, conceived as a corporate unity. It is also the deposit of the religious experience of individual Israelites. Their names may not be known to us, but these heart utterances reveal a variety of mental and spiritual attitude that gives to the Psalter its universal quality. It becomes the mirror of the soul. There is no modern type of religious experience but what is mirrored forth, often in classic utterance, in the Psalms. Here is to be found upon every page the expression of confident trust in God. He is the psalmist's "light and salvation." With him one need not be afraid. The utterance of the mood of gratitude is a characteristic note. Here in utter sincerity is sounded the soul's sense of guilt and sin in all its ugliness and destructiveness. Fast upon this comes the heart's cry for pardon, cleansing and restoration, the hunger for new inner creation and renovation. Some few psalms introduce us to the student of the law who glories in this perfect revelation for the needs of life. Here too are reflective psalms, where some individual grapples with the problem of suffering, and at the climax of one of these there is given expression to a sense of fellowship with God so deep and rich as to illumine for modern men the nature of mystic union with God. Occasionally there blaze forth passionate indignation against men, and impatience with the seeming aloofness of God. These lower ground tones of the Psalter, however, but serve to lift into nobler clearness the more predominant moods of aspiration and inextinguishable hope, the exulting life of forgiveness, restoration, and triumph. At greater depths than can be said of any other book, the Psalms "find" us and give a vehicle of utterance for the diversified emotions and yearnings of humanity to-day.

PSALMS 1-72

PSALM 1. THE PSALM OF THE TWO WAYS

This psalm reminds us of the opening sentence of The Teaching of the Twelve Apostles: "There are two ways, one of Life, and one of Death, and there is a great difference between the two ways." The characterization of the righteous man as an earnest student of the Law, and the interest in retribution contained in the psalm, mark it as dating from the Greek period. It stands under the influence of the legalistic and wisdom tendencies in Judaism. It has no title. Probably it was intended by the final editor of the Psalter to serve as an introduction to the whole book, and it serves that purpose admirably. The psalmist sharply contrasts the two ways of life, interpreting them both with his eyes upon the ultimate fate of righteous and sinful men.

1-3. The Righteous Way. The psalm begins with an exclamation, literally translated, "Oh, the happiness of the man!" The career of the righteous man is first considered negatively. He has nothing to do with evil men. He, accordingly, escapes their influence, which is graphically described as a mastery by degrees. He who associates with evil men may first merely walk with them, but soon he stands where sinners congregate, and at length he sits with them as one of their scoffing company. Vv. 2 and 3 characterize the righteous man in positive terms and strike a fundamental note in the psalms. He is a zealous student of the law. Making use of the pictures of Jer. 17⁷, 8 and Ezek. 47¹² the author compares the righteous man to a tree planted on the bank of a stream with constant source of refreshment (cf. Rev. 22¹, 2) and consequent regular and dependable fruitage. Whatever he undertakes he "brings to a successful issue."

4-6. The Unrighteous Way. For v. 4a read with LXX Not so the wicked, not so. The description of the career of the unrighteous man is implied in the negative characterization of

v. 1, but here a graphic detail is added, taken from the familiar scenes of the threshing floor. As the grain is beaten out, the pursuing wind sweeps away the chaff from the wheat. Just as worthless and insubstantial as chaff are unrighteous men. Vv. 5 and 6 are eschatological and move in the prophetic ideas of the judgment that precedes the new age (cf. Mal. 3¹⁷⁻⁴²). In that judgment the wicked will go down to destruction. None such will be found among that sifted congregation of righteous men whose conduct Jehovah knows and values.

PSALM 2. JEHOVAH'S ORACLE TO THE KING

This psalm is of great poetical and dramatic power. It contains an oracle of Jehovah to a Judæan king from the mouth of the king himself, uttered at the festival celebrating his accession to the throne (cf. Gunkel, Die Psalmen, p. 5). It is this which determines the distinctive character of the psalm. It is best understood as pre-exilic, coming from a time when the nation was surrounded by powerful foes and national feeling ran high. The linguistic arguments for a late date (Duhm considers it Maccabæan) are not conclusive. The psalmist is at home in the eschatology of the prophets (vv. 1-3, 12b), including the world dominion of the Messianic king, expressed in the O. T. as early as Gen. 49¹⁰ (from the J. narrative; this poem, in its original form, may come from the tenth century B.C.). That which explains the oracle and gives the psalm its vibrant passion is the conviction that the king now ascending the throne is the Messianic ruler (cf. Isa. 11^{1f.}; so also Kittel, Die Psalmen, p. 12).

1-3. The Agitation of the Nations. With vivid prophetic style (cf. Isa. 22¹) the poet introduces the psalm with a query. Why this agitation? He answers his own question. The accession of a new king to the Judæan throne is the occasion of international excitement. Peoples hitherto submissive to Judah are plotting revolt. Their rulers are in secret conclave saying (literally), "Let us snap their bonds and fling off their fetters."

4-6. Jehovah Speaks to the Plotting Nations. In vivid contrast to the perturbed earthly rulers sitting in secret conference sits Jehovah, the sovereign God, exalted (cf. Isa. 6¹) above them, derisively laughing (in vivid anthropomorphism) at their cunning intrigues. At length (v. 5) his laughter is broken by angry, terror-striking words to the plotting kings: "As for me," in contrast to the puny kings, "I have installed [Assyrian, našaku] my king." Their efforts against Jehovah's anointed will be unavailing.

7-9. The King Discloses His Oracle. The king speaks. He tells of a divine oracle he has received. For the ruler's access to the divine revelation see 1 Sam. 10⁶ 1 Kings 3⁵ and especially that of the Messianic ruler, Isa. 11². The royal oracle contained a decree and a pledge. The decree is given through an ancient Oriental formula of adoption familiar in Babylonian law. (Gunkel, Die Psalmen, p. 7; also Driver in Simpson's The Psalmists.) The king upon his accession to the throne is accepted as Jehovah's son. From now on he will be dealt with by Jehovah as though he were his son. We recall at once also the oracle of Nathan to David (2 Sam. 7¹⁴). The baptismal oracle to Jesus (Mk. 1¹¹ and parallels) is reminiscent of this passage. The pledge follows (v. 8). Let the king but speak out his request and Jehovah pledges him participation in his world-wide sovereignty. As Jehovah's son he may assert Jehovah's dominion. This world domination is not conceived in the noble idealism of Isa. 19^{19f}. or of Mic. 4¹⁻³, but in terms reminiscent of ruthless Assyrian dominion (v. 9).

10-12. The Poet Appeals to the Plotting Kings. Let them be submissive to Jehovah. Kiss the son—a sign of submission in the Orient (cf. Isa. 49²³). Ashurbanipal records concerning his tributary kings: "Their tribute I received; they embraced my feet" (Barton, Archæology and the Bible, 3rd edit., p. 360). V. 12b implies that the day of Jehovah with its universal judgment is at hand. Safety lies only in submission to Jehovah and his king.

PSALM 3. MORNING CONFIDENCE AFTER REST AMID PERIL

1, 2. The Psalmist's Perilous Position. The psalmist is in the midst of grave peril, surrounded by enemies more numerous than he has ever known, deluged by discouraging, pessimistic comments over his situation from his friends (cf. Job 21¹⁻¹³).

3, 4. Past Experience of Jehovah's Protection. But thou (v. 3) is in contrast with the "many" of vv. 1, 2. Jehovah has been to him in other days a shield of protection (cf. Gen. 15¹), the supporter of his dignity, the restorer of his courage, and (v. 4) the answerer of his prayers. The tense of the verbs in v. 4 is frequentative: "As often as I call, he answers me" is what the verse suggests.

5, 6. Cheering Experience of Preceding Night. An experience just enjoyed (so Kittel) heightens his confidence. Amid the very perils and tenseness of the external situation described in vv. 1, 2 he had had a night of rest, undisturbed and refreshing. He awakened on the new day realizing that during the unconscious hours God had sustained him. He had learned the power of spiritual detachment through faith in God (cf. Harriet Beecher Stowe's hymn, "Still, still with Thee"). His confidence is enhanced. No multiplication of foes can daunt his courage (v. 6).

7, 8. A Brief Cry for Help. V. 7a is followed by an expression of conviction that the very countenances that have insulted him (cf. Job 16¹⁰), and the very teeth that have uttered cries of enmity (cf. on 58⁶) will be destroyed. (The tense used is what is commonly called the "prophetic" perfect or the perfect of "prophetic certainty.") Compare the note of triumph (v. 7) that closes the psalm with the note of lament that begins it. V. 8 is a later addition that attempts to adapt a purely individual experience to community use. The connection of the psalm with David as suggested in the title is not impossible, but v. 4b makes it improbable (see intro., section on "Titles of the Psalms," p. 511).

PSALM 4. A SUMMONS TO SELF-CONTROL AND TO WORSHIP

The Jewish community has fallen upon hard days (vv. 1, 6). The harvests are diminished (v. 7b), and the leading classes (see v. 2) have turned against Jehovah, and are hurling insults at the loyal. Many are perplexed and profoundly agitated. The period of Malachi and Isaiah 56-66, about 450 B.C., is the most likely time in which to date this psalm.

1. The Psalmist Appeals to God. In a well remembered experience in the past he has been helped. He now craves similar deliverance for himself and all the faithful. He speaks as a leader in the inner circle of loyal Jews.

2, 3. Address to the Disloyal Who are Insulting the Psalmist. Sons of men (v. 2) does not refer to humanity as contrasted with Deity, but means the distinguished citizens, property holders in distinction from the poor people (cf. Psa. 49²). These distinguished men are slandering his reputation (v. 2a), but are themselves living superficial, empty lives. Read v. 3a, following emendation suggested by Graetz based on Psa. 31²¹, Know ye, that Jehovah hath made wonderful unto me his kindness. In spite of the insults of distinguished fellow citizens he feels that his own life is a wonderful result of divine grace.

4, 5. The Psalmist Counsels the Loyal. Turning away from the indifferent with their empty lives to the inner circle of the loyal (cf. Mal. 3¹³⁻¹⁸), he summons them, in the very face of insult, to keep themselves in control. Translate v. 4 as follows, Be agitated [i.e., disturbed, provoked to wrath], but do not sin. Speak with your own heart upon your couch and be silent. They are counseled to keep their doubts and their insults to themselves. Instead of venting themselves in anger upon their insulters, he summons them to the practices of religion, particularly to those that centered in the sacrificial worship of the Temple (cf. Isa. 56¹⁻⁸ 60⁶). Sacrifices of righteousness—cf. Deut. 33¹⁹ and Ps. 51¹⁹. The conception is not spiritualized here. Actual sacrifice is meant.

6-8. The Psalmist's Utter Trust in God. He quotes the pathetic craving of the despairing and the skeptical for better times. Read v. 6a as a wish: Many are saying, Oh that we might see good—i.e., good times, contentment, happiness. V. 6b is a prayer in the diction of the ancient benediction in Num. 62⁴⁻²⁶. Swift upon the utterance of this prayer comes the confidence that God has heard. Some may complain and accuse but not the psalmist. In the very face of poor harvests and poverty he has experienced the richness of a joyful heart. In this confidence, this sense of security in God, the moment he lies down to rest he drops off into peaceful sleep.

PSALM 5. A MORNING PRAYER

This psalm is a lamentation of an individual suppliant. In origin it is closely associated with the Temple worship, as v. 3 clearly reveals; for it is a song sung in connection with the morning offering (cf. 2 Kings 320 Ezek. 46¹³). The psalmist, living amid arrogant, iniquitous fellow citizens, awaits a revelation of leadership from Jehovah, whose nearness the sacrifice guarantees. The atmosphere of strife between the righteous and wicked within the community is reflected in the prayer for the punishment of the wicked. The psalm probably dates from the middle of the fifth century B.C. and reflects the temper of Malachi and Isa. 56-66.

1-3. A Plea for Jehovah's Attention. The psalmist's plea is uttered in a morning prayer, accompanying his sacrifice; it is the prayer of a subject to his Sovereign (v. 2). In the morning will I order (v. 3). There is no object to the verb, but the term used is the customary word for the preparation of the offering (Gunkel).

4-7. Contrast Between the Arrogant Sinners and the Psalmist. The sinners are objects of Jehovah's hatred and destruction, but he is the recipient of the loving-kindness of God. He is conscious of an awesome sense of privilege in the worship of the Temple (v. 7; cf. 23^{6b} 27^{4b}). He is a devout believer in the efficacy of sacrificial worship. Evil (v. 4)—read with mg., the evil man (cf. 15¹).

8, 9. The Prayer. The presence of enemies in the community adds concreteness, passion, and intensity to his prayer. He prays to be led in Jehovah's own way and to have that way made straight, or "level," or "smooth" before him. Evidently, the flattering, treacherous counsel of his insidious watchers, the "enemies" of v. 8a, has made Jehovah's will uncertain. Note the vigorous comparison in v. 9c. Enter into that treacherous, open mouth of the deceitful, arrogant man, and you will find yourself in a sepulcher! Flatter—literally, "make smooth" or "slippery."

10-12. Prayer for Punishment upon the Sinful and Blessing Upon the Righteous. The psalm here passes from the individual to the social note. The psalmist's own experience leads him to wider generalizations. V. 10 reveals the vindictive temper of the Judaism of this period (cf. Ps. 64). The contrast between a curse upon the sinful and a blessing upon the righteous is frequent in the Psalter (cf. 71^{13, 14}). This psalm is an example of naïve self-consciousness of righteousness.

In v. 11 the psalmist prays that the loyal may live jubilant lives in the guardianship of God, their defender and protector. This note of joy is a characteristic contribution of the Psalter to religious experience.

PSALM 6. A SONG OF LAMENTATION

The psalmist is in physical distress (v. 2); he gets no rest but spends his nights in physical and mental pain (v. 6); death seems near (v. 5). But what intensifies the physical suffering which he evidently attributes to the disciplining hand of Jehovah (v. 1) is the anguish of spirit caused by the insults of his enemies (v. 7), the evildoers of the community (v. 8a). This anguish of spirit is the main theme of the psalm. The psalm probably comes from the late Persian period and reflects the inner struggles of the fifth century B.C. It has clearest contacts with 277¹⁴ and 143.

1-3. The Psalmist's Passionate Prayer for the Abatement of His Punishment. He offers no protest and denies no guilt. He discerns the connection between his suffering and his sin, but he throws himself upon the mercy of God (vv. 1, 2a). In v. 2b read with slight change of text (following Buhl), My bones have become old; his suffering is ageing his physique, and disturbing his soul (v. 3a).

4, 5. Petition for Recovery. He appeals to the deepest quality in God, his loving-kindness (cf. 57), as the basis for his petition. In v. 5a read, with LXX, For no one in death remembereth thee. His argument is "Save me so that thou wilt still have me to give thanks unto thee" (cf. the similar argument in 30⁹⁻¹² and 88¹¹). Sheol is the abode of the dead where all have a dim, shadowy existence.

6, 7. The Nature of His Suffering. With Oriental exaggeration the psalmist says he has wept so much that his bed dissolves in his tears (v. 6). He has become enfeebled (v. 7), but the chief cause of his suffering is the insults received from his enemies, the ungodly Jews in the community. In v. 7 read, with the versions, I have grown old, and with Cheyne, at the insult of my adversaries.

8-10. The Petition Suddenly Turns Into a Song of Triumph. No longer does he quail before evil men. Now he has been heard by Jehovah. Jehovah is on his side and will humiliate his enemies.

PSALM 7. REFUGE IN GOD FOR THE PERSECUTED

This is a psalm of lamentation of an individual. The psalmist is being bitterly and unjustly persecuted by enemies. He is being accused of infamous deeds and his life is being threatened. Kittel suggests that the psalmist is a high representative of the nation, whose personal affairs also concern the nation. This interpretation best accounts for the transition from the individual to the community at v. 7, and preserves the fundamental unity of the psalm. The psalm (v. 9b) shows familiarity with Jeremiah (11²⁰ 17¹⁰ 20¹²) and (vv. 7, 8) with the late prophetic eschatology; it probably dates from the early Greek period.

1, 2. Call to God for Help. The persecution is persistent and fierce.

3-5. A Solemn Protest. In passionate words the psalmist protests against the accusations brought by his enemy and declares his innocence. V. 4b is parallel in thought to v. 4a and should read And if I have oppressed those who for no cause are hostile to me, following suggestions from the ancient versions. Cf. Job 31^{5f}. for this whole section. Him that was at peace (v. 4)—read, with LXX, My friends. My glory (v. 5) = "My dignity," i.e., those in a covenant of peace with me.

6-9. Prayer for the World Judgment of Jehovah. His first petition is that against the outbursts of fury (plural) of his adversaries; but the psalmist is convinced that according to his own nature—i.e., by laws self-ordained—Jehovah will vindicate him. But swiftly the psalmist passes from the conception of Jehovah as his personal Judge to the vast eschatological conception of Jehovah as the Judge of the world, seated on high (so Buhl) above the nations (vv. 7, 8a; cf. Isa. 24²³ Dan. 7¹⁰ Rev. 4¹⁰). In v. 7b, for return thou read, with Gunkel and others, take thy seat. In v. 8b he returns to the thought of personal vindication by the righteous Judge who knows and judges the hearts of all men (cf. Jer. 11²⁰).

10-13. His Calm Certainty of God. He is sure of God's protection (v. 10), and of his permanent attitude of indignation toward the sinner (v. 11). V. 12a refers to God who holds ready and in reserve his judgment. Read surely or verily (an asseverative particle) he is whetting his sword. This carries on the thought of v. 11.

14-16. The Scene Shifts from God to the Wicked Man. V. 14 presents a vigorous figure. The wicked man is portrayed in the birth throes, bringing forth an evil deed. The gradual growth of the evil deed from its conception in the mind to its expression in an act is suggested. Vv. 15, 16 depict the suicidal result of evil (cf. 28⁴ Jer. 18²⁰ Prov. 26²⁷ Obad. v. 15b). The evil man falls into his own trap. Harm planned for others harms the schemer himself. Here is enunciated a profound moral principle (cf. Esther 7¹⁰).

17. The Vow. It is customary for a song of lamentation to close with a vow of gratitude and praise.

PSALM 8. "THE STARRY HEAVENS ABOVE, THE MORAL LAW WITHIN"

This psalm is one of the most majestic in the Psalter. It is a hymn of adoration beginning in the realm of nature but moving in brilliant and surprising transition to man. It is manifestly later than the priestly account of creation (Gen. 11-24a), upon which it is dependent (vv. 6-8). It, accordingly, dates from some period subsequent to 500 B.C. It is probably a night song used in connection with the nocturnal festivals of Israel (Kittel). The author had a deep and sensitive appreciation of the beauty of an Oriental night (vv. 1, 3).

1, 2. An Exclamation of Reverent Awe. The majesty of God fills the psalmist's mind. V. 1, excellent—literally, "wide," "spacious," "majestic"—a poetic word; upon the heavens suggests vividly the appearance of the stars upon the dark background of the sky. The sincere praise of Jehovah by infant babes is stronger than the scheming hostility of God's enemies.

3-5. "The Starry Heavens and the Moral Law." The heavens are conceived as the work of the strong, skillful, sensitive fingers of the Creative Artist. The psalmist is exalted by the thought of the vastness, the mystery, the variety manifest in the heavens. We are reminded of Dante's frequent reference to the beautiful stars, the word "stars" ending each section of The Divine Comedy.

In swift transition the psalmist passes from nature to man, first to man viewed in his seeming insignificance in comparison with the vastness of the natural universe. Why should God remember man or follow him with his providence? Son of man=man. Then in surprising contrast he sees man in his dignity. V. 5a may be translated literally, "Thou didst make him lack little of God." Man is like a king. Instinctively we recall the great dictum of Immanuel Kant: "Two things there are which, the oftener and the more steadfastly we consider them, fill the mind with an ever new and ever rising admiration and reverence: the starry heavens above, the moral law within."

6-9. The Consequent Dominion Given to Man. The creatures of earth, air, and sea God has placed under human dominion. The psalmist makes implicit reference to the priestly narrative of creation (cf. Gen. 1²⁶, 27). The psalm ends in deepened reverent wonder: v. 1 is repeated, but is now athrill with the total content of the psalm, hence enriched and deepened. Kittel considers vv. 1, 2 and 9 as sung by the choir; vv. 3-8 by a single voice.

PSALM 9. THE CERTAINTY OF JUDGMENT

Psa. 9 and 10 were originally one. They are so considered in several MSS. and in the LXX where 10=922-39. Psa. 10 has no title and the two psalms reveal a common use of language (cf. 9^{9b} and 10^{1b}, in times of trouble). Together they present the first example in the psalms of an acrostic, every other verse beginning with a different letter of the Hebrew alphabet, in successive order. Such poems are found likewise in Psa. 25, 34, 37, 111, 112, 119, 145 as well as in Lam. 1-4, Prov. 31¹⁰⁻³¹ and Nah. 1. The model for this type of artistic poem is found in Babylonian literature (Jeremias). In the case before us the acrostic is incomplete, Psa. 9 carrying it through k (d is omitted), and Psa. 10 presenting only l, g, r, s and t. It is possible to discern also n, ', and p, and Gunkel, through slight reconstruction of the text, restores the original acrostic almost completely. It comes from the late Persian period, from a time when the different types of psalms had begun to fuse into one another. This fusing accounts for the variety of emotion and is at the same time our basis for maintaining the unity of the original psalm. It reveals the tense party strife of late Judaism.

1, 2. An Individual Utters His Thanksgiving. The psalm opens in the form of a hymn. The "marvelous works of Jehovah" (v. 1b) is a favorite hymn theme in the psalter.

3, 4. The Particular Reason for His Thanks. The psalmist's enemies have been humiliated and condemned by Jehovah, the righteous Judge.

5-16. An Eschatological Hymn. The idea of Jehovah as the Judge of the individual provides the transition to the eschatological conception of Jehovah as the future Judge of all the nations. The verbs are prophetic perfects, suggesting that the psalmist views the future judgment as a certainty. It is possible that this psalm was used in the ritual of the Feast of Tabernacles where, as Mowinkel thinks, the enthronement of Jehovah over all humanity was symbolically celebrated (cf. T. H. Robinson in Simpson's The Psalmists, p. 91). These verses portray Jehovah as Judge and King of the world, dealing out destruction to the nations (Isa. 17¹²⁻¹⁴ 66^{15, 16} and cf. Psa. 68) and providing safety for his loyal worshippers (vv. 9, 10). In v. 11 read with mg. peoples. V. 12a, literally, "as exactor of blood he remembereth them." Into the eschatological hymn is inserted the individual note of petition (vv. 13-15). Jehovah's mercy to the humble (v. 12b) recalls the psalmist's own need of safety from Jehovah's hand. Note the contrast between the gates of death (v. 13c), a Babylonian conception (the grave was guarded by 7 or 14 gates, according to Babylonian legend), and the gates of Jerusalem (v. 14b).

17-20. The Psalmist's Certainty of the Judgment of Jehovah Upon the Nations. The thought continues that of vv. 5-16. See also the notes on Psa. 2.

1-11. A Lamentation Because of the Activities of the Godless. The psalmist gives vivid glimpses of the party strife in Judaism in the times of and preceding Nehemiah (see p. 461). Hostile, scheming, boasting, covetous, irreverent, prosperous (v. 5a, following Wellhausen), deceitful, treacherous men pounce upon the weak and overpower him. They maintain God does not see their deeds (v. 1).

12-16. A Passionate Plea—for the divine destruction of the wicked Jews and of the nations (with v. 16 cf. 91^{7f.}).

17, 18. A Prophetic Note. The meek in heart have access to the protection of God.

PSALM 11. REFUGE IN GOD FROM PURSUING ENEMIES

The psalmist is a leader of the loyal. In discussion with his friends, who give him cowardly counsel, he utters his confidence in

God. It is a distinctly individual psalm and reflects the period of party strife which forms the similar background of Psa. 3 and 4. In situation it reminds us forcibly of Neh. 6¹¹. In subject matter it has most in common with Psa. 64, 120, 140 and 142.

1, 2. Heroic Faith in the Face of Cowardly Counsel. His friends, knowing the ruthless pursuit of his enemies (v. 2) and the seeming impotence of righteous men in those degenerate times (v. 3) counsel him to "flutter to the hills like a bird" (v. 1c; cf. LXX). But he maintains that his refuge is not to be in cowardly flight but in Jehovah (cf. 27¹).

3-7. The Reality of God's Rule in the Moral Order. The contrast between a society in which the very foundations are broken down, and an abiding, supreme spiritual order with Jehovah in control is powerfully portrayed. His all-seeing eyes are watching men, testing the righteous (v. 5), and punishing the wicked (v. 6). The psalmist's pictures of the punishment which Jehovah's judgment brings root in scenes of volcanic eruption (cf. 18¹³ Isa. 30²⁷⁻³³). The upright shall behold his face (v. 7c). Probably this clause originally meant, as Gunkel suggests, "seeing the symbol of the God at the visit to the sanctuary." (We have examples of this in Babylonian and Egyptian literature; cf. also Ex. 23¹⁵ (E), Ex. 34^{23f} (J), Deut. 16¹⁶ (D), 1 Sam. 12² (Hannah), Isa. 11²). But this primitive expression comes to be filled with deep mystical content in the psalms (cf. 17¹⁵ 27⁴ 42²). The righteous have access to Jehovah's presence and the privilege of fellowship with him. The conception is not eschatological.

PSALM 12. A LITURGY OF LAMENTATION

The psalm dates from the post-exilic period. It reflects dark times, a generation where evil has the upper hand in the Jewish community, when loudmouthed deceitful flatterers are making hard the lot of humble, godly men (vv. 3-6a). There is a quotation (v. 5b) from a late chapter in Isaiah (33¹⁰). Gunkel (cf. also Peters) interprets the psalm as a liturgy: vv. 1-4 are uttered by the congregation; v. 5 is spoken by the priest; vv. 6-8 are the response of the congregation.

1, 2. A Cry to Jehovah for Help Against the Deceitful. Godly man and faithful are parallel terms. Wellhausen reads the abstract nouns "love" and "faithfulness."

3, 4. The Longing for the Destruction of the Deceitful. Read v. 3 as an earnest wish: May Jehovah cut off, etc. In v. 4a, following the LXX, read our tongue we will make mighty.

5. The Oracle From Jehovah. In response to the uttered longing of the congregation the priest utters the divine oracle assuring the worshipers of Jehovah's help (cf. 207 957).

6-8. The Answer of the Congregation to Jehovah's Oracle. Upon such words (v. 6)—in contrast to the words of the flatterers—Israel can depend. This verse is quite in the style of 18³⁰ 197¹. 119⁴⁰. In v. 7 the psalm rises into an expression of confidence which the priestly oracle has awakened. Now the faithful are not afraid among their godless contemporaries. It closes with a vivid picture of the proud self-consciousness of the latter, stalking about, unaware of Jehovah's promise to the faithful (v. 8). Read in v. 7, with LXX, thou wilt keep us, and with several MSS., thou wilt preserve us. Not the words of Jehovah, but his loyal ones are to be kept.

PSALM 13. CONFIDENT AMID DISTRESS

The psalmist is in profound inner distress (v. 2), so weak in body as to feel death to be near (v. 3). But intensifying his physical pain is his mental anguish, occasioned by the exulting taunts of the irreligious and especially by the seeming futility of his faith. We are clearly in the time of strife between the loyal worshipers of Jehovah and the worldly-minded skeptics of the Greek or the late Persian period (cf. Psa. 64).

1, 2. The Psalmist's Lamentation. He feels himself to be forgotten by Jehovah. Four times he starts his lamentation with the reproachful phrase, How long (cf. the identical phrase in Babylonian psalms, "How long will the Lord who sleeps still sleep." Quoted in Simpson, The Psalmists, p. 132). Read v. 2a, with Gunkel and Kittel, How long must I bear sorrow in my soul.

3, 4. His Petition for Health and Justification Before His Troubles. Read v. 3a, with Ehrlich, Consider my misery for Consider and answer me. The lightened or brightened eyes indicate the light of health and happiness (cf. 1 Sam. 14²⁷). The psalmist has no conception of immortality.

5, 6. His Trust and Praise. The psalm closes with an expression of confidence in God's "goodness," "kindness," "mercy," "love" (Hebrew hesed), that quality that is deepest in the prophetic conception of God. (The word is used frequently by Hosea.) The lamentation and the petition change to the mood of certainty of Jehovah's help which is expressed in a hymn of praise.

PSALM 14. RESPONSIBILITY FOR IRRELIGION IN THE COMMUNITY

This psalm dates from the Persian period

when degenerate priests were spiritual leaders in Israel. It mirrors the same situation that is reflected in Malachi. The psalmist, who is clearly a prophet in spirit, interprets the temper of his times as a practical atheism, and, as Gunkel's brilliant reconstruction has clearly shown, he attributes this lack of religion, as the prophets were accustomed to do, to the materialism of the priesthood. This psalm was originally identical with Ps. 53. A comparison of the two makes it possible to come closer to the original text, especially in vv. 5, 6, where we meet the greatest difficulties.

1-3. The Practical Atheism of the Psalmist's Day. The psalm begins in the manner of the Wisdom literature. The fool is the irreligious, churlish man, one who denies God and insults men, the opposite to "noble-minded" (cf. Isa. 32⁵). These verses are a prophetic invective and remind us of Jer. 5¹ and Isa. 59³⁻⁸. V. 2 furnishes a vivid anthropomorphic touch (literally, "leaned over and looked down"). God is pictured as hunting for men of insight or understanding, but as unsuccessful in his search.

4-6. The Prophetic Psalmist's Threat to the Priests. The text of this passage is very corrupt. The prophetically-minded psalmist is laying the responsibility for such an irreligious age at the door of the religious teachers of the time, the priesthood. The best approach to his meaning is through Hos. 4^{6-12a} Jer. 23¹¹ Ezek. 22²⁶ Mal. 21-9. These priests eat the shewbread in the Temple (v. 4b), but cause the people to err. Nor do they call upon Jehovah. But He whom the priesthood does not fear will become a cause of fear. The profane priesthood (cf. Jer. 23¹¹) will be humiliated (Jer. 22⁶), for God has rejected it (cf. Hos. 4⁶). The verses should be rendered most probably as follows, (chiefly following Gunkel):

4. "Have they no insight, who do iniquity,
Who cause my people to stumble?
They eat the bread of Jehovah,
They do not call upon his name.
5. Will he (Jehovah) not become a terror,
For God will scatter his bones.
6. The profane he will put to shame,
For God hath rejected him."

7. A Prayer for the Intervention of Jehovah. The irreligiousness of the times is called a captivity, i.e., of the spirit.

PSALM 15. WHAT JEHOVAH REQUIRES OF HIS WORSHIPERS

This psalm is a Temple liturgy performed at the door of the Jerusalem Temple. The worshipers ask the question, "Who can worship in the Temple?" The priest answers, reciting the requirements of God for his worshipers, and as the people enter the Temple he pronounces the promise of stability. Kittel thinks the mingling of prophetic and priestly elements points to the time of Deuteronomy as its date, but probably the verbal similarity of v. 5a with Lev. 25³⁷ (from the Code of Holiness) points to the early post-exilic period. Probably in earlier times the priests guarded the worship at the sanctuaries by such questions as, "Are you ceremonially clean?" (cf. 1 Sam. 21^{4f.}); "Have you brought the prescribed offerings?" (cf. Ex. 23¹⁵ Deut. 26^{1f.}). The activity of the prophets changed the character of the answers, but the questions must have been frequent in Israel, as certain references clearly show (cf. 243-6 Mic. 6⁶⁻⁸ Hag. 2¹¹ Zech. 74-6 Isa. 314-16).

1. The Worshipers' Question. What does Jehovah require of those who would worship him in the Jerusalem Temple?

2-5. The Answer of the Priest. Peters suggestively sees here a "Temple decalogue" and maintains that we have nowhere else in the O.T. so full a statement of the obligations of holiness that made up the virtues of Jehovah's worshipers (Psalms as Liturgies, p. 123).

2. (1) "He is honest and righteous in life.
(2) He is truthful to the core.
3. (3) He refrains from gossiping slander. (Literally, 'He does not foot (it) with his tongue.')
- (4) He does no harm to his friend.
(5) He does not insult his neighbor.
4. (6) He despises the man who has made himself odious (so LXX).
- (7) He honors those who fear Jehovah.
(8) He keeps his oath though he suffer for it.
5. (9) He does not loan money at interest (cf. Ex. 22²⁵ Deut. 23²⁰, 21 Lev. 25³⁵⁻³⁷).
- (10) He cannot be bribed to stand against the innocent man."

V. 5c contains the Priestly Promise: He who expresses these virtues has gained stability. The psalm describes a class of men "who for centuries, and in every rank of life, have been an honor and strength to their church and country."

PSALM 16. A MEDITATION OF TRUST IN TIMES OF IDOLATRY

This psalm is more a meditation than a hymn (Welch). The psalmist lives at a period when a vigorous tendency toward the worship of other gods was felt in Judaism. The atmosphere of Isa. 57^{3f.} and 65^{3f.}, from the Persian period shortly before Nehemiah, seems native to this psalm. He scorns these idolaters (v. 4), and trusts Jehovah utterly.

1, 2. A Prayer and a Confession of Faith. Jehovah is the psalmist's summum bonum.

3, 4. His Delight in the Loyal and His Scorn of the Worshipers of Other Gods. V. 3 is difficult. Read

"As for the holy"ones who are in the land

They are the glorious ones in whom is all my delight" (cf. Driver, Tenses, p. 268).

The psalmist will have nothing to do with idolaters. These men he will not sacrifice, pouring out their blood as though in a drink offering to their god; he will not even soil his lips with their names.

5-8. His Utter Trust in Jehovah. Having nothing in common with the idolatrous majority, he is not lonely. He has his portion in Jehovah. As a guest he has from his host's hand his cup. The lines (v. 6) that fix the boundaries of his lot inclose good "land" (heritage); his "land," however, is not material; it is Jehovah. Heart (v. 7, A.S.V.)—literally, "reins," i.e., conscience (cf. Job 41^{2f.}). V. 8 describes the practice of the presence of God (cf. 109^{3f.} 121^{5f.}).

9-11. The Psalmist's Exultant Joy in God. For my glory (v. 9) probably read, with Driver, literally, my liver=my emotions. Formerly v. 10 was understood as having reference to an after life (so Delitzsch). It is, however, to be interpreted in the same way as in. 91³ and 30³ (see comments on the two passages; cf. also H. W. Robinson, The Psalms, p. 57). God will not abandon him to death. Thine holy one, i.e., the psalmist himself will not be allowed to die. In v. 11 also the psalmist is thinking of this life. God alone can satisfy him with life that is life indeed. While there is no reference to immortality here, the emphasis on religious experience (cf. 73²⁵, 26) takes us a long step in that direction.

PSALM 17. RECTITUDE AND THE VISION OF GOD

This psalm reflects the same background as Psa. 16 and probably dates from the middle Persian period. It is a declaration of innocence. The psalmist is surrounded by insolent "men of the world" (v. 14), who are sleek and proud (v. 10), treacherous toward men of his spirit (vv. 9, 11), and who find their satisfaction in the earthly realm (v. 14). He, however, conscious of integrity (vv. 4, 5) and hoping for their destruction (v. 13), finds his satisfaction only in God (v. 15).

1-5. The Psalmist's Consciousness of Recti- tude. He is conscious of the scrutiny of God upon his thoughts, words, and deeds; no wrong has been found in his life.

6-8. His Prayer for Protection. His past experience in prayer (v. 6) now leads him to pray. Marvelous loving-kindness (v. 7a)—render make wonderful thy loving-kindness. Thy right hand—i.e., the place of safety. The apple of the eye—literally, "The pupil of the eye," a synonym of preciousness.

9-12. His Enemies Described. These verses present a vivid contrast to vv. 1-5. Round about him are enemies—unfeeling, proud, and treacherous. For their own fat (v. 10a) read their heart, and translate their heart they have closed, i.e., to pity. In v. 11 the psalmist changes to first person plural. He speaks for all the righteous.

13, 14. His Vindictive Prayer. He summons Jehovah to confront his enemies with destruction. Vv. 13c, 14 vividly climax the description of the psalmist's materialistic enemies. The text is difficult and may be best translated as follows:

13c. By thy sword, free my life from the wicked.

14. By thy hand, O Jehovah, from the men, From worldlings whose portion is (this) life.

Yea with thy treasure let their belly be filled.

Let (their) children be filled to excess.

Let them bequeath what they leave to their babes!

The words are spoken in bitter sarcasm. These insolent men are worldly in their interests. Let material blessings "satisfiate" them from generation to generation!

15. The Psalmist's Sole Satisfaction is God. In vigorous contrast to these men of the world who are sated with the material things of life, the psalmist has his satisfaction in the vision of God, i.e., in communion and fellowship with him. When I awake—Duhm interprets "from sleep," Cheyne and Kittel "from the sleep of death." This latter conception is late, the idea of resurrection being found clearly in only two passages in the O.T.—Isa. 26¹⁹ (cir. 340 B.C.) and Dan. 12² (cir. 167 B.C.). The key to correct interpretation is furnished by the LXX. Read When I gaze upon thy form (cf. Gunkel). The passage refers, not to the vision of God after death, but to the vision of God in this life; i.e., mystic fellowship with God is the psalmist's thought. This preserves the vivid contrast with the satisfaction in this life of the wicked. Thy form—gazing upon the form of God (an anthropomorphism) means enjoying fellowship with God (Gunkel, Cheyne).

PSALM 18. THE KING'S HYMN OF THANKSGIVING FOR VICTORY AND DOMINION

This psalm is found in another recension in 2 Sam. 22, where, however, the text is less perfectly preserved. Vv. 7-15 are very old, probably coming from the time of David or even from the same time as Judg. 5, the earliest extant piece of literature in the O.T. The rest of the psalm, while also pre-exilic, seems to have originated late in that period. The song was sung by the court singers to celebrate the victory and dominion of a Judæan king, possibly, as Kittel and Gunkel suggest, Josiah. We have examples of such royal psalms in Babylonia (Nebuchadrezzar), Assyria (Ashurbanipal), and Egypt (Ikhnaton).

1-3. A Hymn of Praise to Jehovah. Jehovah is described in vivid and familiar pictures in v. 2. He is rock, i.e., "crag," fortress, deliverer, rock (cf. Babylonian "god my mountain"), shield, horn of salvation (horn is a symbol of strength), high tower, i.e., "secure height."

4-6. The King's Need and his Cry to Jehovah. V. 4 may contain an implicit reference to Babylonian mythology. Floods of ungodliness—literally, "torrents of Belial," torrents of the land of no return, i.e., Sheol (Driver). Death is like a hunter, awaiting mankind with cords and snares.

7-15. The Revelation of Jehovah. Cf. 97^{ff}. Judg. 5⁴ Deut. 33² Isa. 30^{27f}. Hab. 3^{3f}. These verses, in imagery very ancient in Israel, describe the majestic and awesome appearance of Jehovah in earthquake, volcanic eruption, hail, thunder, and lightning. Gressmann, citing Ex. 19¹⁸ (J), maintains that Mount Sinai, to which Moses led the Israelites, was volcanic, and amid the terrors of volcanic eruption the majestic appearance of God was experienced. This ancient experience gave Israel its traditional imagery for describing great theophanies. V. 11 may be translated:

"He made darkness his hiding place round about him.

His thicket a gathering of waters."

V. 14 has a parallel in Babylonian literature; of Marduk it is said:

"The lightning he set before him,
With a burning flame was his body filled."

16-19. The King's Deliverance. He tells how Jehovah rescued him from his peril.

20-24. The Reason for His Deliverance. It is due entirely to the righteousness of the king. The language of this section is Deuteronomic, especially v. 22.

25-30. A General Confession of Faith in Jehovah's Dealing With Men. From Jehovah's dealings with him individually the psalmist passes on to the broader conception of Jehovah's dealings with mankind. Here we have a picture of individualism in retribution in a distinctly sub-Christian atmosphere. In v. 29a read For with thee I can crush a marauding band. Tried (v. 30), literally, "smelted."

31-42. A Hymn of Praise to Jehovah. The second major part of the psalm begins here. His success, his skill as a warrior, comes from Jehovah. Thy gentleness hath made me great (v. 35): another possible translation is, Thy condescension causeth me to increase.

43-45. The King's Increased Prestige. His victory assures him widened dominion.

46-50. A Concluding Hymn of Praise. The king is here seen to be of the house of David, i.e., Judæan. V. 50 is of Messianic import.

PSALM 19. REVELATION OF GOD IN NATURE AND IN THE LAW

This psalm is composed of two originally independent poems. (1) The Symphony of the Heavens (vv. 1-6). (2) A Hymn in Praise of the Law (vv. 7-14).

(1) The first poem has for background Babylonian mythology, as the allusions in vv. 5c, 6 clearly show. The Babylonians and Assyrians personified the natural bodies and forces. Perhaps it was during the reign of Manasseh (7th cent. B.C.) through the worship of Shamash the sun god, then introduced (2 Kings 21^{3f}), that such ideas found entrance into the background ideas of Israel (Gressmann). But these ideas merely provide a kind of poetic vehicle for the loftier and profounder thought of Israel. This is one of the most majestic and beautiful of the nature hymns in the Psalter.

1, 2. The Language of the Heavens. Through Plato we know of the celestial harmony of the spheres, probably of Oriental origin. The heavens are uttering a marvelous melody. The heavens declare—better, The heavens keep recounting and the firmament keeps revealing—the participles suggest continuous action. They have as their theme the glory of God, i.e., the majestic nature of God. One day utters it to the next, pouring it out, bubbling it forth in eager, spontaneous utterance. One night declares (a poetic word) to the next, the wisdom at the heart of the majesty.

3, 4. The Celestial Harmony of the Spheres. No human ear hears this marvelous melody, yet it reaches the far corners of the earth. In v. 4 for their line read their voice.

5, 6. A Hymn to the Sun. Primitive man saw in the ball of the sun a god. On a tablet of Nabu-apalidin (860 B.C.) Shamash, the sun god, is said to have a tabernacle in the sea.

He too was a bridegroom, and his bride, Aia, dwelt in that tabernacle. Shamash goes forth out of the sea and pursues his course, overcoming demons as he fights his way (Gressmann, The Psalmists, pp. 16f.). An echo of this Babylonian conception provides the figures of speech for the loftier Hebrew thought. The sun is great, but behind the sun is Jehovah. The sun reveals his majesty.

(2) The union of vv. 1-6 and vv. 7-14 into one psalm is probably due to similarity of theme: the revelation of God in nature and in the Law. The key to an understanding of these verses is the attitude of Judaism toward revealed religion. G. F. Moore has stated this with clear insight. "The corner-stone of Judaism is the idea of revealed religion. God has not only made himself known to men, but has declared to them his will for man's whole life. This revelation the Jews possess in their Holy Scriptures and in its complement, the unwritten Law. . . . (Note—The oral Law was revealed at Sinai no less than the written Law.) . . . There is no duty toward God or man which is not either expressly or by plain implication contained in this twofold revelation" (History of Religions, pp. 68f. Charles Scribner's Sons).

The conception generally held by Christians concerning the Law is built upon the views of Paul in Rom. 7^{14f.} and Gal. 3. These views, however, are not characteristic of normal Jewish feeling toward the Law. This psalm and Psa. 119, accordingly, provide a healthy supplement to what Schechter has suggestively called the "night of legalism," as life under law has ordinarily been interpreted. In these psalms, rightly understood, there is not monotonous repetition, but the joyous recall with infinite variation of the wonder and privilege Israel enjoys from Jehovah in the gift of the Law. The psalm dates from the days after the priestly Law had been accepted as the fundamental basis of Judaism some decades previous to the Greek period.

7-10. Praise of the Law. The Law is interpreted by six terms. Each illustrates some one aspect of this perfect revelation and each accomplishes some particular thing in the building of a godly life. Through paraphrase we shall make this clear:

(1) The Law conceived as the "teaching" or "instruction" of Jehovah is "complete," "entire" and "refreshes" the weary spirit (v. 7a).

(2) The Law viewed as giving testimony for Jehovah, a phrase characteristic of the priestly legislation, is "trustworthy," "dependable," and fills the "openminded" person with "wisdom" (v. 7b).

(3) The Law understood as the prescriptions of Jehovah for Israel is "equitable" and "just" and fills the "heart" with "joy" (v. 8a).

(4) The Law heeded as a set of commandments, a term characteristic of the Deuteronomistic legislation, is pure, i.e., without moral defilement, and "illuminates" with insight (v. 8b).

(5) The Law looked upon as an object of reverence has in it no power to "contaminate" or "render impure" and is "eternally valid" (v. 9a).

(6) The Law interpreted as a body of ordinances, i.e., judgments, decisions that later became precedents, is in "exact conformity" to justice, and conceived as a "unity" is righteous in its decrees (v. 9b). V. 10 refers to all the laws of Judaism—worth more than gold and sweet to the spiritual senses.

11-13. His Personal Application of the Law to His Life. He found through observing it "warning" from evil and "reward" for obedience. Conscientious as he is, he knows that he makes errors; moreover, inadvertently and unconsciously he may have become ceremonially unclean (cf. Lev. 52); he, therefore, prays for acquittal from such hidden guilt (cf. a similar Babylonian prayer in Simpson, The Psalmists, p. 158). Presumptuous sins (v. 13) = conscious sins of rebellion or pride. (Root idea, to "boil up" or "seethe".) This kind of sin ("with a high hand," Num. 15³⁰) alone is great transgression.

14. The Prayer of the Lover of the Law. As of old, the bringer of a sacrifice (Lev. 13 Isa. 567) hoped that it might be acceptable, so in this period, when the prayer had taken the place of the sacrifice (Gunkel) it is words and thoughts that are conceived as a living offering, unblemished and acceptable to Jehovah.

PSALM 20. A PRAYER FOR THE KING BEFORE BATTLE

The king is about to enter into battle (v. 1). At a day of prayer preceding the fray he has offered his sacrifice (v. 3), as was customary (cf. 1 Sam. 7⁹ 1 Kings 8^{44f.} 2 Chr. 14¹⁰), and has prayed for victory (v. 4). The psalm is a prayer for victory. For a similar psalm see 1441-11. We cannot discern which king is meant. It is from the late years of the Judean kingdom, therefore is pre-exilic and not Mesianic.

1-5. The Prayer for the King. This is sung to the king by the priestly choir. Let Jehovah whose residence is in Zion (v. 2) accept the king's sacrifice and grant him victory (v. 4). If the king returns triumphant they will celebrate the victory, giving credit to Jehovah (v. 5).

6-8. An Oracle of Victory. The psalm changes to the third person. These verses are in the prophetic perfect and are an answer in the mood of prophetic certainty to the prayer in vv. 1-5. Moreover, vv. 6-8, as v. 6 shows, are sung by a single voice. The oracle is simply the assurance, spoken under prophetic insight, that Jehovah, not mere military force, is with the king (vv. 6, 7) and will make him victorious. The enemy will "fall" but Jehovah's people will "stand firm." In v. 9 the choir repeats its petition. Read with LXX, Jehovah save the king. Answer us when we call.

PSALM 21. A SONG EXTOLLING THE KING

This is a psalm for the king, to celebrate his birthday (Gen. 40²⁰), or the anniversary of his accession to the throne (Hos. 75, Gunkel). He has been loyal to Jehovah (v. 8) and has been honored with material and spiritual blessings (vv. 3-7). He is also a mighty warrior. May he be victorious! Vv. 1-7 are sung concerning the king, by the Temple choir, and are a song of praise to Jehovah. Vv. 8-12 are sung to the king. The psalm comes from the period of the Judean kingdom, probably shortly before the Exile.

1-7. Gratitude for Jehovah's Blessings upon the King. Jehovah has "confronted" the king with blessings of goodness (v. 3). He has received, perhaps in an oracle, the guarantee of long life (v. 5); and he enjoys full security in God (v. 7).

8-12. The Voicing of Hopes for His Victories. The verbs do not express certainties but wishes; e.g., v. 8, May thy hand find out all thine enemies, etc. For in the time of thine anger (v. 9) read when thou appearest (cf. mg). They imagined a device (v. 11)—literally, "they hatched up a scheme."

13. A Concluding Vow. If Jehovah reveals his strength in the king's wars Israel will sing his praises.

Perhaps (cf. Kittel) vv. 1-7 were sung by the Temple choir; vv. 8-12 by a single prophetic voice; and v. 13 by all the people. Ps. 20 and 21 represent the same type of psalms (concerning the king) but are independent of one another.

PSALM 22. FROM FORSAKEN BY GOD TO TRIUMPH IN GOD

The author of this psalm is a poignant sufferer. His physical pain is keen (vv. 14-16), but is intensified by the hostility of the godless in the community (vv. 16-18). Rightly understood the psalm is a unity, the vow (v. 22) following naturally the lamentation of vv.

1-21 and introducing the song of praise, vv. 23-26, that climaxes in a majestic hymn, vv. 27-31. The allusions of v. 29 especially point to the time of Isa. 56-66, the middle of the fifth century B.C., as its probable date. This is the "Passion Psalm," made sacred to Christians by the use of its opening line by Jesus on the cross.

1, 2. The Psalmist Feels Forsaken by God. (Cf. Mk. 15³⁴ Mt. 27⁴⁶.) V. 1a is the only word spoken on the cross that is reported in the earliest tradition. It was uttered by Jesus in Aramaic. No quotation could have more fittingly interpreted the depth of his mental suffering, and its use illumines Jesus' familiarity with the Psalter, as the whole lamentation, especially vv. 13-18, is descriptive of anguish such as he endured.

3-5. His Appeal to History. Using Isaiah's great word for "God" (holy; cf. Isa. 6³), he suggests that God has his being, his very "dwelling," in the praises from his children (cf. 116¹⁵, literally, "Costly in the sight of the Lord is the death of his saints"). There is here an implicit argument for Jehovah's help. To keep the psalmist alive will mean another to praise Jehovah. The fathers were vindicated, not shamed, before their foes (vv. 4, 5).

6-11. He Contrasts His Own Shame With the Deliverance of the Fathers. Humiliated and despised, he suffers his enemies' gestures of contempt (v. 7) and sarcastic words (v. 8). Yet God has sustained him since birth (vv. 9-11). In v. 9b read Thou art he that maketh me to depend upon my mother's breasts.

12-18. His Treatment at Hostile Hands. His strong, vigorous enemies (v. 12; cf. Amos 4¹, where the prophet calls the sleek, selfish women of Samaria "cows of Bashan," the fertile pasture land of north Israel), with their cold, heartless staring, intensify his physical exhaustion until death seems near (vv. 14, 15). He feels like prey hunted down by dogs. With his hands and feet mutilated (so Duhm reads for pierced in v. 16c), with bones sticking out through the flesh (v. 17a), his hostile observers, in anticipation of his death, begin to divide up his belongings (v. 18). These verses gather up more than his own personal sufferings; the whole community is in his mind (vv. 12, 16).

19-21. His Cry for Deliverance. With vivid pictures of his peril he prays for deliverance. His foes are compared to pursuing dogs (cf. v. 16), lions, and wild oxen (v. 21). My darling (v. 20)—literally, "my only one," i.e., poetic for "my life" (see mg.).

22-26. His Vow and Song of Praise. When he was in the poignancy of his suffering he made vows (v. 25); which now, in the Temple, in the presence of the congregation and with profound gratitude, he pays in a sacrificial repast, for God has heard his cry (vv. 24, 26).

27-31. A Majestic Hymn. The psalmist's personal praise (vv. 22, 25) is lifted now into universal praise. This is similarly done in 69^{34f}. He pictures the nations as Jehovah's subjects (v. 28), worshiping at his sanctuary (v. 29a; cf. Isa. 66¹⁹⁻²³). Indeed, all humanity (v. 29) pay him homage, and one generation will bequeath to the next the heritage of his character (vv. 30, 31). Compare the praise of Ashur in the Assyrian account of creation (Simpson, The Psalmists, p. 155).

PSALM 23. JEHOVAH THE SHEPHERD OF THE GODFEARING INDIVIDUAL

The author of this priceless jewel of the Psalter has fallen heir to the great prophetic insights of Jer. 23¹⁻⁴ Ezek. 34 and Isa. 40¹¹, where Jehovah is represented as shepherd of Israel. Kings and officials were commonly so designated in Egypt, Babylonia, Israel, and Greece. But Israel with tenderest associations applied the term particularly to illumine the character of her God. The prophets, however, had not yet individualized the conception but applied it to Jehovah as leader of the nation. All the richness held in this national context the psalmist claims for himself. His clear dependence upon the prophets and the reference to the Temple (v. 6) show that the psalm cannot be Davidic. It is a product of the Persian period and came from a soul richly endowed with religious feeling.

1-3a. Jehovah as Shepherd Provider. The sheep whom Jehovah shepherds are conscious of no lack (v. 1). He provides the three things needed by sheep—pasturage, rest, and water. To find these together is not easy in Palestine. But the shepherd knows where to find the "fresh shoots of green grass" where he may let the sheep graze and lie down (v. 2a). He knows how to lead the flock along the current of the torrential mountain wadies, until he finds a clear, placid pool of still water, i.e., "waters of quietness," where the sheep may drink with comfort and safety (v. 2b), and find the refreshment that recreates and restores (v. 3a).

3b, 4. Jehovah as Shepherd Guide and Guardian. The shepherd leads his sheep in "right tracks" (v. 3b), in trails that lead somewhere, for the shepherd knows the paths over rocky highland and open valley, and his "reputation" (name) as a shepherd is at stake (v. 3b; cf. Jer. 14⁷ Ezek. 20⁹). When the sun is sinking and the deep shadows (in v. 4a read mg.) fall upon the valleys and gorges bringing peril of attack from wild animals or robbers, the sheep are not afraid. There is their guardian with his "club" (rod) heavily nailed at the end, and with his staff, with which he beats down leaves (Koran 20⁹) for his sheep. With such protection the sheep are made comfortable (v. 4b). Through such Palestinian pictures of ordinary daily life the psalmist portrays what Jehovah is to him personally in life's valleys and highlands. The imagery applies both to his physical and spiritual life. The shepherd care of God is grounded in his very nature. For his name's sake (v. 3b) means that God's honor is at stake in caring for his own (cf. Ezek. 36^{22f}).

5, 6. Jehovah as Host. The figure changes. Jehovah, the psalmist's host, spreads before him a table of bounty. The psalmist is an honored guest and (what gives the picture peculiar zest) his enemies, the insulting, ungodly Jews, are looking on as Jehovah treats him with Oriental courtesy (v. 5a). As in the ancient Egyptian custom, a lump of scented ointment is placed upon the heads of banquet guests (see 133², and cf. Blackman in Simpson, The Psalmists, p. 196), so Jehovah anoints his head (v. 5b). A cup of wine brim full is handed him. One senses the lifting tone of wonder and gratitude which rises to its climax. What he now enjoys is but prophetic of what he will enjoy his life long. Goodness and mercy, personified as angelic spirits, will ever "pursue" him, and—here with tender, heartfelt exaggeration—he will practically spend his days in the Temple, where God is peculiarly near (cf. 27⁴ 61⁴; also Anna in Lk. 23⁷). The Temple and its worship he views as the symbol of the favor of God.

PSALM 24. THE LITURGY OF JEHOVAH'S ENTRANCE INTO THE TEMPLE

This psalm is composed of three originally independent poems. Two of them, vv. 3-6 and 7-10, are concerned with entrance into the Temple. The two were brought together, prefaced by an ancient hymn, vv. 1, 2, and the whole constructed as a liturgy sung at the entrance of the ark into the Jerusalem Temple at the annual New Year's festival. Mowinkel connects it with the annual ritual of the enthronement of Jehovah (cf. Robinson's chapter, "Eschatology of the Psalmists," in Simpson, The Psalmists, p. 191). Vv. 1, 2 are very old and embody primitive cosmology; vv. 3-6 may be based upon Isa. 33¹⁴⁻¹⁶ (cf. also Psa. 15, with which it has close contact); these verses may date (so Kittel) from the century preceding the Exile. Vv. 7-10 are also pre-exilic: Jehovah is a god of war; the Temple gates are already ancient (v. 7); we are therefore centuries beyond David and Solomon.

1, 2. A Hymn Celebrating God the Creator. Jehovah's world dominion, a favorite theme of Hebrew hymns, rests upon his creatorship. V. 2 contains a reference to the ancient cosmology which held that under the earth there was an enormous mass of water (cf. Gen. 7:11 49:25 Ex. 20:4; see further, pp. 126–7). The Babylonians shared this view. But Jehovah has established the earth upon these chaotic floods, firm and enduring. The primitive cosmology here is subservient to the author's ethical theism.

3–6. A Liturgy of Entrance for Worshipers. This was rendered antiphonally. By the holy place is meant Jerusalem. The worshipers ask the question (v. 3), "Who can worship Jehovah in his Temple?" The answer is sung by the priestly choir (vv. 4–6). The requirements show the influence of the prophets (cf. the ancient answer in the Code of the Covenant, Ex. 23:1–4). They are purity of action and motive, "lifting the soul," i.e., setting the desire not upon falsehood in action, but upon God. Such a worshiper will be welcomed by God and allowed to draw near to receive his revelation.

7–10. The Entrance of the Ark into the Temple. The festal procession has reached the doors of the Temple. It is the ark of the covenant, the ancient symbol of Jehovah's presence, that is entering, the King of Glory, i.e., the "Majestic King." The choir outside the Temple calls upon the everlasting, i.e., ancient, Temple doors to open. The expression involves a majestic personification. From within a single voice challenges, "Who is the Majestic King?" The choir without answers, glorifying Jehovah as a god of war. We feel the splendor of this deposit out of the heroic days of Israel. Again the choir without calls upon the doors to open (v. 9), and the single voice within again challenges. Once more the choir without answers, now calling him by the ancient name, "Jehovah Sabaoth," which means, "Jehovah of hosts," and emphasizes the warlike character of Israel's God. The connection of the word glory points with certainty to the ark, which symbolized Jehovah's presence, especially in battle (cf. 1 Sam. 4:21f.). At the mention of his name, which the psalmist withholds until now (v. 10b), the gates open and the procession enters. This is one of the most majestic portions of the Psalter and retains an atmosphere of inexpressible grandeur.

PSALM 25. THE LIFT OF THE SOUL TO GOD

This psalm is an acrostic (cf. introductory notes to Ps. 9 and 10). With two slight emendations in v. 5c and v. 18a we have a perfect acrostic, every letter of the Hebrew alphabet being represented in twenty-one verses, the last, v. 22, being a liturgical addition. The psalm is late, revealing the influence of the great prophetic teachers and of the wisdom poetry (vv. 12–14 and 4b). The psalmist is in distress because of many enemies (vv. 2, 17, 19). But deeper than this is his sense of sin, which permeates the entire psalm. V. 7 recalls the sins of his youth; he is conscious that his iniquity is great (vv. 11b, 18b), and prays that "sinners" may be instructed in life's way (v. 8b). The alphabetic scheme somewhat binds him and makes it difficult to discern marked logical order in the arrangement of his thoughts.

1–7. An Utterance of Trust and Petition. The psalmist emphasizes as the basis of his petitions the ancient goodness of God revealed in history (vv. 6, 7).

8–15. The Character of God and His Gracious Dealings. He enumerates justice, loving-kindness and truth, i.e., loyalty—all prophetic characteristics—and considers the regard of Jehovah for his own honor as the ground of his request for forgiveness (cf. Ezek. 36:22f.).

16–21. His Petitions. He prays in his weakness and isolation (v. 16) for Jehovah's gracious comradeship. In v. 17 read, with slight change of verb, The straits of my heart enlarge. Note in v. 21 the poetic and beautiful personification of two prophetic qualities, integrity and uprightness—literally, "straightness."

22. A Liturgical Addition. The ending adapts this individual psalm to the uses of congregational worship. Peters considers it a litany for the celebration of a fast. The keen sense of sin expressed would well serve such a purpose.

PSALM 26. A DECLARATION OF INNOCENCY

The psalmist's life, in common with that of others, is in peril (v. 9). Some sickness or epidemic is removing men right and left (v. 9). For many death is what they deserve, for their lives are full of infamy and corruption of justice (v. 10). But not so with him. In sincere though exalted consciousness of superiority to them in conduct and character (vv. 4f.), he pleads with God for escape from the fate in store for them (v. 9). The psalm is a lamentation of the individual and, according to our standards, has a strong Pharisaic note of self-conscious righteousness. The psalmist, however, is heir to the inward self-scrutinizing religious experience of Jeremiah. His words come from a time when psalm-singing was at its best in Jewish worship (vv. 6–8).

1–3. He Opens His Integrity to the Scrutiny of God. He does not fear but welcomes God's inspection even to the dominant affections of his heart. He is here using the familiar and characteristic thoughts of Jer. 17¹⁰ and 20¹².

4, 5. The Superiority of His Character. In what strikes us as bold self-righteousness he makes claim to superiority in character over those whose peril he shares. We are reminded of the Pharisee's prayer, "God, I thank thee that I am not as the rest of men" (Lk. 18¹¹). H. Wheeler Robinson reminds us, however, that historical exegesis would have to recognize the validity of his claim (The Psalmists, p. 54). But the righteousness here referred to is chiefly negative.

6-8. His Regular Participation in Temple Worship. The tenses of the verbs in v. 6 are frequentative imperfects, to be rendered not as futures but as what one is accustomed to do, i.e., "Again and again I wash my hands in innocency." He mentions in vv. 6, 7 three acts of the ritual which accompanies the sacrifice (cf. Deut. 21¹⁻⁸ for a ritual used with the profession of innocency). Words and acts of ritual went together (cf. Gressmann, The Psalmists, pp. 11f.): (1) This symbolic washing of the hands (v. 6a) was probably the first act of the ritual. (2) The second act was walking around the altar (v. 6b; cf. 118^{27b}). Psa. 42⁴ also just suggests such a picture—a throng of worshippers in joyous exalted emotion moving in rhythmic steps about the altar, the central point in the sanctuary. (3) The third is the song of praise (v. 7a), which probably accompanied the procession. The subject of the song is a characteristic theme of Hebrew hymns, the "wonderful acts" of Jehovah. This vivid glimpse which the psalmist gives of himself at worship is closed with a beautiful heart utterance of love for the Temple (v. 8; cf. 27⁴ 84).

9-11. His Plea for Jehovah's Special Concern. Because of his superiority in character and his scrupulous participation in worship (vv. 9, 10), because of his integrity mentioned yet once again (v. 11, cf. v. 1) he pleads for a special treatment. They deserve nothing better but he does.

12. He Will Praise Jehovah for Deliverance. In anticipation of Jehovah's answer he feels secure. In this same place, again will he join the congregation in their praise of Jehovah. The peril of the Judaism of our psalmist's day was that it should exhaust itself in outer rites while lacking a deep inwardness of piety that trusts less in self and more in God. This limitation is evident throughout the psalm.

PSALM 27. FEARLESS TRUST IN GOD

This psalm is composed of two originally independent poems. (1) Jehovah the Highest

Good (vv. 1-6). (2) The Disowned Psalmist Cries unto God (vv. 7-14).

(1) The psalmist is one of the Dispersion, far away from Jerusalem, and his soul is filled with longing for the Temple worship (v. 4). It is his one prayer. Surrounded by enemies, faced by grave peril, which he compares to the attack of wild animals or the siege of an army (vv. 2, 3), he is not afraid. Trust in Jehovah has conquered his fear. Although he cannot worship in the Temple, he is sure of Jehovah's protection. It is one of the most precious of the songs of trust in the Psalter. It is both tender and majestic.

1-3. His Unconditional Confidence in God. Light, safety, place of refuge—all this is Jehovah to his life. His faith has cast out his dread.

4-6. His Greatest Desire—to live forever in the Temple (cf. 23⁶). Three things the Temple gives him: (1) The first, to behold the beauty, i.e., pleasantness, loveliness, delightfulness—all conceived as moral qualities—of Jehovah. This reminds us of a line in an Egyptian prayer to Amon: "Grant unto me, that mine eyes may see thy beauty." The psalmist is not thinking of an image of God but of those sacred symbols in the Temple that make God real and bring him near. (2) The second, to inquire, i.e., to seek, consider, reflect. To behold beauty is at least in part physical. To inquire is mental, brooding over the meaning and message of the visible symbols. Note the union of adoration and the spirit of inquiry—not mutually antagonistic, but the one providing the right atmosphere for the other. (3) The third, the assurance that Jehovah will keep him—furnish a place of shelter in dark days. He employs three vivid pictures of Jehovah's shelter:

He will hide him in his thicket.

He will conceal him in the covering of his tent.

He will lift him upon an inaccessible rock.

He rises from this thought to a greater one. He is far away from the Temple but now, in this faith which the recall of the Temple has awakened, he is superior to his enemies, beyond the reach of their evil intent. In some future day again the privilege of sacrifice and song shall be his!

(2) The spirit of vv. 7-14 differs somewhat from vv. 1-6, but the two sections are alike in the reality of their trust in God. The psalmist is in a trying position. Forsaken by his parents (v. 10), falsely accused and cruelly treated by his enemies (vv. 11b, 12), and feeling himself under the displeasure of God, he cries out to him in a passionate lamentation. Briggs inclines to a Maccabæan date because of v. 10, but there is no certain clue to the date of the psalm.

7-12. The Cry to God of a Heart in Misery. Gunkel emends v. 8, connecting it with v. 7b, the whole reading: "Have mercy upon me and answer me, my God, For my heart is distressed. Thy face, Jehovah, do I seek," connecting the last line with v. 9. Both Hebrews and Babylonians used the phrase "to seek the countenance of" with the meaning "to turn to" someone for aid (see 17¹⁵, and cf. the letter in the Tel-el-Amarna tablets where a provincial governor is seeking the help of the Egyptian king: "My lord, my god, my sun, what more do I seek? Forever do I seek the beautiful face of my lord the king." Quoted from Simpson, The Psalmists, p. 133). V. 9 derives its pathetic intensity from the following verse. His parents have forsaken him. (Read v. 10a mg.) Let not Jehovah do the same! Vv. 10f. give the conception of Jehovah adopting him as a son (cf. 27, where the expression is used of a king). Here it is applied to an ordinary individual. His enemies have made life's way anything but plain—i.e., level.

13, 14. The Certainty of Jehovah's Answer. Read v. 13 (following J. M. P. Smith), I believe that I shall see, etc. In v. 14 he summons his own heart to assert the attitude of waiting for Jehovah.

PSALM 28. THE HELP OF TRUST IN PERIL

In imminent peril of death (v. 1d) from deceitful, treacherous persecutors (v. 3), the psalmist pours out a passionate lamentation unto Jehovah. His prayer is heard and the psalm suddenly changes, at v. 6, from petition into serene gratitude. Vv. 8, 9 adapt a purely individual psalm for use in the king's Temple at Jerusalem. The psalm is pre-exilic, coming from the late years of the Judæan kingdom.

1, 2. The Psalmist's Cry to God. His address to God as my rock may be compared to the similar Babylonian address "great mountain," or "God my mountain" (cf. 182, notes). If help does not come, death at the hands of his persecuting enemies is certain. V. 2b is a valuable source for the posture in prayers of lamentation. The suppliant either stands or prostrates himself before the Temple and stretches out his hands toward the holy oracle, i.e., the holy of holies (cf. 44²⁰ 634 1 Tim. 28).

3-5. His Petition. He prays first for protection. Draw me not away (v. 3)—wicked men are threatening his life. He sees through their deceit and prays for escape from their plots. Mowinkel advances the novel theory that the workers of iniquity here and elsewhere in the psalms (especially 6, 26, 31, 35, 41-43, 51, 54, 63 and 120) are sorcerers, seeking by magic to accomplish their evil designs (cf. The Psalmists, p. 112). As for them, however (vv. 4, 5), let them have what they deserve (cf. 71⁶, notes). He stands under the influence of an emerging individualism in retribution, which indicates a time close to Jeremiah (cf. Jer. 31²⁹, 30).

6, 7. His Confession of Faith. The lament changes suddenly to eager praise. He is certain that his prayer has been heard and he has experienced the help of trust in God. A song replaces his cry of distress.

8, 9. A Petition for People and King. These verses are extraordinarily important. They are almost exactly like 61⁶, 7 63¹¹ 84⁹ (cf. also 1 Sam. 21¹⁰), and all these passages are to be studied together. They are additions adapting an individual psalm to use in the Temple at Jerusalem, which is the place where the king worships. They are here a prayer for the king (v. 8b) and the people (v. 9a). They prove the pre-exilic origin of such psalms, and are not to be interpreted as Messianic.

PSALM 29. THE VOICE OF JEHOVAH

Here is a nature psalm of marvelous descriptive and poetic power. The phrase qôl Yahweh, i.e., the "voice of Jehovah," seven times uttered, gives the impression of clap upon clap of thunder. Welch recalls Byron's, "From peak to peak the echoing crags among leaps the live thunder." The thunder is Jehovah's voice, not in anger but in awe-evoking, majestic power. The song is ancient, as its primitive color reveals. The idea of Jehovah as world King in this context is not late but a very early conception. The reference to Hermon as "Sirion" (v. 6b) according to the Phœnician usage, is evidence that it comes from the Northern Kingdom and so that it is earlier than 722 B.C.

The reference to far-away Kadesh (v. 8) recalls the experience of Moses at Sinai and the theophany in a storm (cf. Ex. 19¹⁹). The terror of the storm causes the hinds to give birth prematurely. In v. 9b the text is imperfect. Gunkel emends to read, "It freights the chamois with lightning." The Temple, the majestic structure and all its magnificent appointments, responds to Jehovah's voice in the unanimity of a single word, spoken in awed recognition of his grandeur—Glory! In his mighty, seemingly destructive voice they hear a gracious accent and discover a steadfast purpose in which there is no caprice. (Cf. Coleridge, Hymn Before Sunrise.)

1, 2. The Adoration of the Heavenly Court.

The sons of the mighty are summoned to ascribe—literally, “give”—their tribute of praise to Jehovah. The phrase marks the superhuman character of those addressed. It may be paraphrased, “Ye heavenly powers” (Welch, The Psalter, p. 16). Compare the similar conception in Babylonian thought:

“When thy word rings out in heaven, let the Igigi throw themselves down on their faces;

“When thy word rings out on earth, let the Anunnaki kiss the ground.”

The Igigi represent the stars, the gods of the upper world, and the Anunnaki, the gods of the lower world (G. R. Driver in Simpson, The Psalmists, p. 153). Note the ascending parallelism in v. 2a. Beauty of holiness (cf. A.S.V., “array”)—garbed as priestly ministers the heavenly powers are to worship Jehovah.

3-9. The Seven Claps of Thunder. Peters calls the whole psalm, “The Song of Seven Thunders.” Seven times occurs the staccato phrase, qôl Yahweh, the “voice of Jehovah.” The assonance in Hebrew is indescribably effective, and descriptive in extraordinary degree of seven successive thunderclaps. There is here suggested likewise a primitive sense of awe which the mysterious thunder always awakens in men’s hearts. No other physical phenomenon made so deep an impression upon the Hebrew heart as thunder. What the Babylonians attribute to Ramman and Adad, and the Hittites to Tesup, the Hebrews attribute to Jehovah. This shows the inevitable bent toward monotheism in Hebrew thought (cf. 1813 Isa. 3030 Jer. 2530 Amos 12, etc.). The psalmist pictures the effect of thunder upon (1) the sea and (2) the land; (3) in the animal world and (4) in the Temple. The waters—carries the atmosphere of the mythical primeval deeps (cf. 933, 4, where the language is figuratively used). There is a primitive grandeur in this conception. The lightning splits the strong Lebanon cedars. The mountains Lebanon and Hermon tremble from earthquake. How vivid the anthropomorphism! This is their happy dance at the voice of Jehovah (cf. 1144, 6). According to the poet’s conception the flashes of lightning are cloven into forks by the thunder.

10, 11. Jehovah King Over Israel. There is reference here again to the mythological conception of the subterranean deep over which Jehovah is master (cf. Gen. 17, etc.). The universalistic implications of the references to Jehovah’s relations to nature are not followed out. In the last verse the psalmist focuses his attention upon Israel, Jehovah’s people. All this majestic power, to which even all nature responds, is for Israel! It took the later thinkers to discover that it was for mankind.

PSALM 30. THANKSGIVING FOR RECOVERY FROM ILLNESS

The psalmist had been living in careless security, seemingly held in honor by Jehovah (vv. 6, 7). Then came the disillusioning experience of a serious illness in which he was at the doors of death (v. 3). In his dangerous condition he prayed for help (vv. 2, 8-10), and was restored to health (v. 1). In profound gratitude he celebrated a feast of thanksgiving (v. 11), the inner circle of the loyal participating with him (v. 4). He tells his experience in two parallel cycles (v. 1=11, 12; 2, 3=8-10; 4, 5=11, 12). The superscription which seems to connect the psalm with the feast celebrating the rededication of the Temple (Chislew 25, 165 B.C.; cf. 1 Macc. 452f.) may have been intended originally as a subscription to Psa. 29, which better suits the occasion. Psa. 30 dates from before the Maccabæan era.

1-3. His Restoration From Severe Illness. His restoration to health has stopped the rejoicings of his enemies who hoped he would die.

4, 5. He Summons the Loyal to Celebrate His Deliverance. The psalmist was a leader of the loyal. His restoration was an occasion of public significance. He invites the loyal to his thanksgiving feast.

He interpreted his sickness as caused by the anger of God, which, in turn, his sin had aroused. His experience led him to make a general observation which he expressed in such perfect form that it has become a classic proverb:

“In the evening weeping may lodge,

But in the morning there is a shout of joy”

(so read v. 5b). Compare the votive stela of the 19th dynasty of Egypt:

“The Lord of Thebes passeth not a whole day wroth,

His wrath is finished in a moment and nought is left” (Blackman in Simpson, The Psalmists, p. 186).

6, 7. His Careless Sense of Security. These verses describe his life before his sickness. He had stood high in the regard of men and seemingly in the regard of God. Then had come the disillusioning crash. In v. 7 for my honor read, with LXX and Syriac, my mountain.

8-10. His Argument With God for Recovery. He bases his petition upon the worth to God of human praise and testimony. His argument (cf. 65 11517) runs: “What do you gain by causing me to die? If I go down to the grave, there will be one less to utter your praises and tell others of loyalty to you.” The psalmist is keenly conscious of the social worth of testimony, the grateful utterance to others of what God has done for us (v. 9).

11, 12. His Tears Turned Into Joy. His prayer is answered and he is restored. He mentions no word concerning a thank-offering, but the reference of v. 11 to the joyous dance about the altar clearly presupposes it (cf. also v. 4a, where he summons others to participate in singing). V. 12 implies the absence of such praise had Jehovah allowed him to join the silent company of the dead.

PSALM 31. A CRY FROM A DISTRESSED SOUL

The psalmist is entangled (v. 4) in grave difficulties (v. 9). He is in keen physical suffering that has dragged on for years (v. 10) and death seems near (v. 22). He evidently had become physically repulsive to those who knew him well (v. 11; cf. Job 30⁹⁻³¹), and a butt of his enemies' derision. And, what is worse than derision, by some he was ignored (v. 12). Abandoned to loneliness, he called upon God and found relief (v. 22). Kittel's attempt to see in this individual lamentation a prayer liturgy ignores the personal color of the psalm. It is late, certainly after Jeremiah (cf. Jer. 20¹⁰ with v. 13); reminiscences of other psalms (e.g., 91 182 233 384 555) suggest a late period in post-exilic Judaism. See also his saints (v. 23), i.e., his pious ones.

1-8. Petitions for Help and Assertions of Trust. He bases his appeal upon Jehovah's own honor. V. 5 is made sacred through its quotation by Jesus on the cross (cf. Lk. 23⁴⁶); incidentally, a suggestion that this psalm was familiar to and loved by Jesus. His enemies were evidently idolaters (v. 6). Large place (v. 8) = "wide place," contrasted with adversities (v. 7) = "straits."

9-13. Lamentation From a Suffering Heart. In these verses are concentrated the circumstances that give rise to the passionate lament of a bursting heart. See introductory notes to the psalm.

14-18. Recovery for Him but Death for His Enemies! V. 15 is the source of Browning's familiar line in Rabbi Ben Ezra. What the wicked have desired for him, let happen to them! (V. 17.) Note (v. 18) the psalmist's sensitiveness to the lips, i.e., the "talk" of his enemies (cf. vv. 13, 20). His was a sensitive nature, akin to that of Jeremiah.

19-22. His Confession of Confidence. Between vv. 18 and 19, we are to infer, his prayer of vv. 1-8 has been answered. Note the vivid comparison in v. 21. In the onslaught of his difficulties he had felt like a besieged city.

23, 24. An Exhortation to the Loyal. This exhortation gains weight and concrete color through the experience of the psalmist. It is not a pious ejaculation but a stirring, personal testimony of the grace and judgment of God.

PSALM 32. THANKSGIVING FOR FORGIVENESS

The psalmist was in keen physical pain. He was becoming more and more exhausted (v. 3), and the very sap of life seemed to be drying up (v. 4). He knew it was because he had sinned, but for a time he refrained from confessing it. At length, driven to the acknowledgment of his sin (v. 5), he was forgiven and his life preserved (v. 7). In the spirit of the sages of Israel he turns instructor (vv. 8, 9). His experience has qualified him to be a spiritual guide of others. This wisdom atmosphere in the psalm is a clue to its date, which is the late post-exilic period (cf. p. 157b).

1, 2. Beatitudes of Forgiveness. Translate (cf. Ps. 1) as exclamations, Oh the happiness of him, etc. In these opening verses rings the thrilling note of personal experience. The psalmist can say, "I know." He uses four words for moral offense: transgression, sin, iniquity and guile, i.e., treachery.

3, 4. His Guilt Unacknowledged. When I kept silent—i.e., he did not confess his sin, and consequently felt heavy upon him the punishing hand of God. His sickness he interpreted as the definite result of God's displeasure. This direct relationship between guilt and physical suffering was one of the most deeply rooted dogmas of Judaism. The converse doctrine was also held that whoever experienced misfortune was guilty of some known or hidden sin. Against this dogma great spirits like the author of Job hurled the weight of their genius. The psalmist suggestively portrays an implicit contrast. Before God he exhibited silence, but inwardly his conscience was crying out in distress.

5. The Way to Health and Peace. At length the hard pressure of God's hand (cf. v. 4) won out and brought him to courageous repentance. Jehovah forgave him and (it is implied) he was delivered from his illness (cf. Prov. 28¹³).

6, 7. The Practical Lesson of His Experience. The psalmist becomes exhorter and with a reminiscence of Isa. 55⁶ he calls every one that is godly to prayer, evidently to the prayer of repentance. So will they escape the floods of misfortune into which the lack of the repentant spirit had brought him. In v. 7 he reverts to his own experience. Songs—literally, "ringing cries." Even when the spiritual experience of forgiveness (vv. 1, 2) is allowed to color these verses we sense a limitation in the psalmist's interest in forgiveness. It is too materialistic. He does not emphasize the painful memory of his sins, but rather lingers in the thought of escape from trouble (cf. v. 10). Nor does he call the sinners but the righteous to repentance (v. 6).

8, 9. The Psalmist Turns Sage. Note the change to the second person. In the manner of Proverbs he speaks to fiery youth and shows the influence of the wisdom temper in Judaism. The figures are not of stubbornness but of abounding energy that needs guidance.

10, 11. The Lot of the Godless and the Loyal. The limitation noted in vv. 6, 7 recurs here. The psalm ends in the mood of joy.

PSALM 33. THANKSGIVING FOR NATIONAL DELIVERANCE

This is a song of national deliverance. Noting reminiscences of Isaiah (cf. v. 17 with Isa. 31^{1f.}) and the atmosphere of marvelous deliverance (v. 10) that breathes through the psalm, Kittel inclines to connect it with Sennacherib's invasion in 701 B.C. (cf. Isa. 37^{36f.}) and views it as coming from one who had heard Isaiah and had learned from him, but had not grasped his deepest thought. However, the clear influence of the priestly account of creation (cf. v. 6 with Gen. 1⁶), the reminiscences of Deutero-Isaiah (cf. v. 11 with Isa. 40⁸ 46¹⁰), and other still later passages, make a post-exilic date practically certain. The psalm is tinged with views concerning divine speech and divine wisdom (v. 6) which consider them not merely as instruments but as agents in the process of creation (so Robinson in Simpson, The Psalmists, p. 30), a viewpoint fully developed in late Judaism, climaxing in Philo. The strong nationalism of the psalm, with Jewish self-consciousness running high (vv. 10, 12), points almost certainly to the Maccabæan period (Olshausen, Briggs), to some great victory that profoundly stirred the psalmist. The twenty-two verses seem built upon the existence of twenty-two letters in the alphabet, but do not form an acrostic.

1-3. Introduction to the Hymn. For the occasion celebrated no familiar song will suffice; so the Temple choir is called upon to sing a new song, probably this song written under the exalting influence of the very victory it celebrates.

4-9. The Word of Jehovah. This victory is no human achievement. Behind it was the creative word of Jehovah: (1) His word expresses his nature, which is "righteous," and "just" and "loyal." Literally, "the word of Jehovah is straight." (2) His word is creative. As at creation he said, "Let there be light" and "there was light," so now, what has happened is the awesome result of his word (vv. 8, 9). Only the strong instincts of monotheism could keep the word, thus conceived, unseparated from God's essence (cf. Jn. 1¹⁴, notes). V. 7a offers a vivid comparison. For as an heap read, with LXX, as in a skin. This makes the parallelism with v. 7b complete.

10-12. Deliverance from Heathen Enemies. Wellhausen rightly translates nations as heathen and at once we feel ourselves in the Maccabæan struggles against the Hellenizing Syrians. Render the verbs as perfects. Jehovah hath brought, etc., he hath made, etc. (v. 10). In a single remarkable victory for the Jews, Jehovah has shown himself again the God of Israel, his covenant people (v. 12).

13-19. The Eye of Jehovah. The thought of deliverance by Jehovah leads the psalmist to speak in meditative vein about the all-seeing eye of God, first (vv. 13-15), penetrating into the plotting hearts of Israel's enemies, and second (vv. 16-18), seeing the dire need of his people and coming (he, not horses or armies) to their help. In their imminent peril of defeat and death he comes to those who trust in him (cf. Isa. 7⁹ 28¹⁶). How much greater is the help of God than the help of horses and armies! He had learned of Isaiah (cf. 31^{1f.}) the might of trust in God.

20-22. An Utterance of Confidence and Hope. The deliverance which has stirred the psalmist's soul leads him to an abiding attitude of trust in the name (v. 21)—i.e., the nature, of God. The psalm rises to the note of benediction. It begins with a ringing cry. It ends (see mg.) in up-reaching waiting before God (v. 22). These verses are specially fitted for utterance in a hymn.

PSALM 34. THE TEACHING CONTENT OF A GREAT RELEASE

The psalmist had been in grave difficulties—in terrors (v. 4), straits (vv. 6, 17), and peril to life and limb (v. 20). He was not of the upper classes, but of the meek, "one of the poor, weak, and afflicted" in Israel (v. 2). He calls himself "this poor man" (v. 6). Yet—and the wonder of it is aglow in his heart—Jehovah had heard and delivered him! Released from his distress—what it was we do not know (Gunkel thinks illness)—he becomes evangelist, summoning his fellow Jews to experimental relationship with God (v. 8). His mood suddenly changes at v. 11 from evangelist to teacher and the psalm issues in a didactic poem quite in the style of Proverbs 1-9 and Ecclesiasticus. The psalm shows the influence of Isa. 56-66 (cf. v. 18 with Isa. 57¹⁵), and the didactic method of vv. 11f. points to the influence of the Wisdom literature. It probably comes from the times just preceding the beginnings of the Greek period, from the first half of the 4th century B.C. It is an alphabetic acrostic (cf. Psa. 9, etc.).

1-3. An Invitation to Praise. Out of a full heart overflowing with gratitude the psalmist invites others—the meek, i.e., the teachable and humble—to praise Jehovah with him. He knew the mutual enrichment and impetus that comes from common worship. With me and together are the strong words of v. 3.

4-7. His Experience of God. His experience he summarizes in a single verse; he sought and found God, and with it release from terror (v. 4). Then he expands it (vv. 5-7). Read v. 5 (following LXX and other ancient versions and MSS.) with Hitzig,

“Look unto me and be radiant
And your faces will not be ashamed.”

He himself is an example of what God can do. “If filled with a sense of shame,” he says, “look at me and remember God can do as much for you.” This makes easy and natural the transition to v. 6 where he carries the note of personal experience further and rises to a classic generalization (v. 7). Note the military figure. The religious man is protected by the unseen power of Jehovah.

8-10. The Psalmist Turns Evangelist. His own experience leads him to summon others to the laboratory test of relationship with God. His reason is chiefly a material one (v. 10b). The promise of v. 10b gains in vigor of contrast when in v. 10a instead of young lions we translate the word, which is Aramaic, “deniers of God.” While those who deny God suffer want, is his thought, the righteous are provided life’s necessities.

11-22. The Psalmist Turns Sage. The psalm at this point moves into the didactic temper and deals with the problem of retribution. The experience of the psalmist has given him the right to teach others, which he proceeds to do. The fear of Jehovah is equivalent to “religion” (v. 11). He uses the question and answer method, characteristic of the wise men. V. 12 asks the question, vv. 13f. answer it. The way to life or to the good is (1) negative, “desist from evil words and deeds,” for the Lord is against evil men (v. 16); (2) it is positive, “do good, devote yourself to peace”—the establishment of wholesome relations with all men and with God. Such men Jehovah “sees,” “hears” (v. 15) and “delivers” (v. 17). V. 18 is a reminiscence from Isa. 57¹⁵. Vv. 19-22 expound the view of retribution characteristic of Judaism: the exact proportion of punishment to guilt and of reward to virtue. It was against this dogma which had a throttle-hold upon Judaism far down into the N.T. period that the author of Job, a little later, battled with the creative vigor of his pioneering mind.

PSALM 35. A LAMENTATION FROM ONE OF THE “QUIET IN THE LAND”

The psalmist is a leader of the “quiet in the land” (v. 20b), the inner circle of peacemakers and patient followers of Jehovah. His cause (v. 27) is a matter of public concern. Surrounded by opponents (v. 1), pursued (v. 3), plotted against (v. 7) and even robbed (v. 10c), he utters his lamentation to Jehovah. When those now his enemies were his friends and ill, he had dealt with them as with his own people (vv. 13f.). But how differently they reciprocated! (V. 15.) He pleads for rescue from them and utters a vow of thanksgiving which upon deliverance he will pay in the Temple in the presence of the worshiping congregation (v. 18). The first cycle of his lamentation climaxes in this vow. At v. 19 begins a new cycle that parallels the first. Here the appeal is more directly for visible punishment upon his enemies (v. 26) and for visible evidences to the “quiet in the land” of his integrity. This second movement likewise closes with a vow (v. 28). The psalm shows reminiscences of other poems in the Psalter, having most contact with 55, 59, and 69. The psalm mirrors the background of Isa. 56-66 (460-445 B.C.).

1-8. A Passionate Prayer for Deliverance From His Enemies and for Judgment Upon Them. My soul, as so often in the psalms, means “my life.” Note, in vv. 5, 6, the two pictures showing the psalmist’s enemies in precipitate defeat—chaff before the wind, and as “pushed from behind” in dark and slippery places; in both cases behind them and hurrying them to destruction is the angel of God. Omit in a pit (v. 7).

9, 10. His Contemplated Joy at Release. Soul (v. 9) and all my bones (v. 10), i.e., the psalmist’s whole being, will rejoice.

11-17. His Treatment by His Enemies Contrasted with the Treatment He has Given His Enemies. Those now his enemies deal with him as with a clandestine malefactor (v. 16; cf. Job 30²⁵). In this section we are in closest contact with the similar portrayal in Job, for those who now are his enemies were once his friends (vv. 13, 14). Their attitude now reminds him of lions roaring as they leap upon their prey. In v. 16a read, with LXX, They tried me, they held me in derision. My darling (v. 17)—cf. 22²⁰, notes.

18. His Vow of Public Thanksgiving. If released, he will offer a thank-offering before the congregation in the Temple.

19-21. He Reverts to His Enemies’ Treatment of Him. Wink with the eye—in sly deceit. Quiet in the land—i.e., the peacemaking religiously-minded circle from which in large part came the Psalms (cf. Lk. 15-239).

22-26. His Final Appeal to God. Note vigorous contrast between Thou hast seen (v. 22) and our eye has seen (v. 21).

27, 28. A Prayer for Joyous Vindication before his followers and a restatement of his vow.

PSALM 36. THE TRIUMPHANT MIGHT OF THE GOODNESS OF GOD

The psalmist, in peril at the hands of evil men (v. 11), portrays the sinful heart of man as an evil spirit uttering to his innermost being an oracle (v. 1a). The content of the oracle is left a mystery, but the depravity it gradually accomplishes is brilliantly described (vv. 1b-4).

At v. 5 the psalm swings with dramatic abruptness from "the rise and progress of sin" (McFadyen) to the contemplation of the goodness, the kindness and the mercy of God alike in nature (vv. 5, 6) and in human life (vv. 7, 8). The meditation rises into prayer (vv. 10, 11) for the triumph of Jehovah's loving-kindness over the arrogance of the evil men (cf. vv. 1-7). The psalmist leaves us solemn and awe-struck in the presence of his vision—the forces of evil decisively and finally defeated (v. 12).

The psalm, in spite of the sharp break of thought at v. 5, is a unity. The first four verses are but a foil brilliantly used to form a background of moving darkness against which to picture the goodness of God. With splendid restraint vv. 11, 12 bring us back into the theme of vv. 1-4. V. 12 bears to vv. 1-4 and vv. 5-8 the relation of conclusion to minor and major premises. The psalm comes from post-exilic times; it was written in a period of party stress within Judaism.

1-4. The Progress of Evil in the Sinful Man's Heart. The progressive mastery of the "evil spirit" at work within the human heart is expounded: (1) The oracle it utters within his heart encourages him to believe his sin will not be found out. In v. 2a read with mg. It (i.e., sin) flattereth him in his eyes. (2) His words become deceitful and his actions careless (v. 3). (3) With deliberation he sets himself at sinful matters without revulsion (v. 4).

5-9. The Goodness of God. Here in five verses is one of the most beautiful hymns in the Psalter. Vv. 5, 6 deal with the goodness of God in the natural universe. Through figures of vastness—the wide expanse of the heavens and the immeasurable height of the skies, the rugged steadfastness of the mountains of God, and the unsoundable profundity of the mythical deep (in Babylonian doctrine "the deep sea" was considered the seat of wisdom)—the character qualities of God, his loving-kindness, his loyalty, his righteousness and his justice are suggested.

Vv. 7-9 deal with the goodness of God in the human world, but every blessing dealt with is spiritual and the atmosphere of personal experience is felt. Here is deep spiritual religion. This great God, so he feels, is for us—for us poor human beings—even the children of men. Note the beautiful metaphor of protection in v. 7b. The psalmist is a loyal worshiper in the Temple (v. 8) and prizes the sacrificial meal, i.e., fatness and drink as sacraments, symbols of a divine bliss which these help him to express. Where God is—for him primarily in the Temple—are life and light (cf. Num. 625, 26). What life and light he enjoys have their source in the heart of God—great and deep thoughts in Israel's religion at its best.

10-12. Jehovah's Triumph Over Evil. The psalmist prays that this goodness, this loving-kindness, may guard him against his arrogant enemies. There (v. 12)—i.e., in a vision that fills him and us with the mood of awe—he pictures the evil forces, which in vv. 1-4 were mustering into aggression, as utterly, finally and irretrievably defeated by the might of the character of God.

PSALM 37. GOD'S CARE OF THE LOYAL

This is an acrostic poem. It is one of the wisdom psalms, having closest contact with Psa. 49 and 73. It is full of exhortations and warnings, proverbs and promises. The speaker is an old man (v. 25) and in his observations one feels the weight of his mature experience (vv. 35f.). The subject of the psalm is the doctrine of retribution (cf. Jer. 121^f. Mal. 217), a characteristic theme in the late Wisdom literature (cf. Prov. 2419 Job 217^f. Eccl. 814). The author does not expect Jehovah to intervene, to strike down the wicked man. Contrast the psalms of lamentation. He believes that wickedness has no stability. It falls of itself. Moreover, the retribution of God is not conceived as taking place at the judgment. It, rather, is expressed from the standpoint of the righteous peasant who compares the permanency of his hold upon the ancestral soil (v. 11; cf. 2513) with the rapid, traceless vanishing of the wicked.

The author is dependent upon Job and has reminiscences of many psalms and proverbs, but his ideas do not improve upon the thoughts uttered by the three friends of Job. Kittel draws attention to the two limitations in his solution of his problem: He lacks the idea of an inner judgment not mirrored in outer circumstances, and also that of equalization of lot in after life. The poem is very late, possibly Maccabæan. Those who put it early (e.g., Davison, time of Hezekiah) ignore the connection with other late literature. Tertullian called this psalm "a mirror of Providence," and Luther called it "a garment for the godly with the inscription 'Here is the patience of the saints.'"

1-11. Admonitions for Periods of Stress and Strain. It is foolish to complain at the seeming prosperity of the wicked. The psalmist counsels the afflicted to wait and see what will happen. The prosperity of the wicked will not last, nor will his memory endure. V. 11 furnishes the source of Mt. 55. A quiet, unobtrusive religious optimism is expounded in this first section.

12-20. The Destiny of the Sinful. Evil is suicidal; it is self-destructing. Righteousness makes for permanency; but sinners are as transient as dry grass to which a match has been struck.

21-31. Jehovah's Considerate Care of the Faithful. The note of personal experience, in v. 25, is a welcome release from the typical and somewhat monotonous wisdom style of address. From youth to age his eye sweeps the horizon of the years. He has never seen righteous men abandoned nor their descendants beggars. In a land where beggars are numerous this takes on new color. V. 31 reveals the interest of the loyal in the Law. Religion is life under the Law.

32-40. Observation of the Retributive Principle. The prosperity of the sinful is but transient. The righteous man may suffer for the present but he will end his life in peace.

PSALM 38. THE PRAYER OF A PENITENT SUFFERER

This is a lamentation of an individual. The psalmist is very ill (v. 3), with a painful (vv. 2, 7) and loathsome (vv. 5a, 11) skin disease (vv. 3a, 7b). This illness he attributes to the discipline of Jehovah, which he has brought down upon himself by his sin (v. 4) and folly (v. 5b). His kinsmen consequently have abandoned him (v. 11) and have become his enemies (v. 12). Yet he does not retaliate in kind (vv. 13b, 14b) but turns a deaf ear to his critics and enemies (vv. 13a, 14a). In his loneliness he looks to God for relief (v. 15). He confesses his sin (v. 18) and, confident of an answer (v. 15b), closes with a petition for speedy help (v. 22). This psalm has many reminiscences of Job (see especially 19¹³⁻¹⁹) and of Jer. 4¹⁹ 20¹⁰. These facts, combined with the use of an Aramaic word in v. 3, point to a late date, probably shortly after 400 B.C. To consider it as "the complaint of the afflicted community" is to miss the intense individualism of the psalm. In the prayer book of the Church of England this is one of seven penitential psalms (the others being 6, 32, 51, 102, 130 and 143).

1-10. His Lamentation Over His Suffering. The psalmist attributes his intense pain to the arrows of God (cf. Job 6⁴ and Homer's Odyssey 7⁶⁴ 15⁴⁰² 17²⁵¹, 494). His condition reveals the way in which God shows indignation against sin. Vv. 5-10 describe his suffering more concretely. It reminds us of that of Job and the description points clearly to a burning skin disease which seemed to have its roots deep down within his body. His pain wrings from him groans (vv. 8, 9) and robs life of its joy (v. 10b).

11, 12. The Effect of His Condition on His Friends. His situation dissolves ties of friendship. Read, with Briggs, my lovers and my friends are at a distance from me (v. 11a). They (v. 12) refers to his lovers, friends and kinsmen. These have now turned against him.

13-20. How He Reacts to Their Treatment. He has no bitter words of condemnation against his enemies. He has nothing vindictive in his heart (vv. 13, 14). His refuge is in God (v. 15), and although he feels himself growing weaker under the strain (v. 17), God will not allow him to be humiliated before those who have treated him disloyally (v. 16). V. 18 connects with v. 15 in thought. His basis for hope in God is his confession of sin and his penitence before God, although he realizes that his attitude of doing what seemed good to him (v. 20b) made his enemies all the more aggressive (vv. 19, 20a).

21, 22. His Petition for Help. He is certain of being heard. Points of contact with this psalm are found in Babylonian psalms of penitence (for vv. 5, 6 see G. R. Driver in Simpson, The Psalmists, pp. 129, 135).

PSALM 39. THE TRANSIENCY AND FUTILITY OF HUMAN LIFE

The psalmist, wasting away under a severe illness (vv. 10, 11), due as he thinks to his sin (v. 8), is sorely tempted to impatient utterance in the presence of wicked men. But in spite of the hot fires of his soul's emotion (v. 3) he kept himself in control (v. 2) until his thoughts took definite shape. Then out of this experience comes the burden of the psalm, teaching uttered in meditative prayer—the transiency and futility of human life (vv. 4-6). He prays God for release (vv. 7-11) and recovery (vv. 12, 13). The psalm dates most likely from shortly after the writing of the book of Job, probably in the early fourth century B.C. It came from a creative psalmist of inner richness of spirit.

1-3. The Psalmist Keeping Himself in Control. Severely tried by his suffering and gloating enemies, he kept his mouth closed, refusing to utter words against the divine order. Contrast with Mal. 3^{14, 15} and Job. He is not tempted to speak wrongly against his enemies, but against God.

4-6. The Psalmist's Melancholy Resignation. These verses show this psalm to be transitional to the spirit discernible in Ecclesiastes (Balla). He stresses the two major thoughts of the psalm, the transiency of life (vv. 4, 5ab) and the futility of it (vv. 5c, 6). In v. 6 for in a vain show, read, with mg., as a shadow.

7-11. A Prayer for Release from Discipline. Here the personal note recurs. In confession of sin (v. 8) and in utter dependence upon God (v. 7) in his weakness, he prays for release from the harsh chastening he is experiencing.

12, 13. A Prayer for a Bit of Brightness Before Death. Man is a guest in the household of God, but is destined soon to depart. If he is to have any joy it must come to him during his brief sojourn. In v. 13 read, with mg., look away from me that I may brighten up. He seems to feel the persistent and sternly disciplinary eyes of God upon him. "Let God take his eyes off" is his prayer (v. 13), so that he may enjoy a brief respite before his death (cf. Job 7¹⁹ 10^{20f.} 14⁶).

PSALM 40. THE THANK-OFFERING JEHOVAH DESIRES

The psalmist, in imminent peril of death (v. 1), has been brought back to health. In gratitude he composes a new song of praise (v. 3), which he proceeds to sing (vv. 4-11). The main theme of the hymn (vv. 6-10) is that while Jehovah requires no sacrificial offering from him, he feels obligated to be a herald of God's goodness to the congregation. The hymn closes with a personal petition. Vv. 1-11 have fallen heir to the richest teaching of the prophets. They come from a period when the Law was at the center but when it was freely interpreted—after Ezra, in the fourth century B.C.

At v. 12 a new poem begins which originally had no connection with vv. 1-11. "The Magnificat is precipitated into the plaintive De profundis." Vv. 13-17 appear again in the Psalter as Psa. 70. They form a lamentation of an individual. Persecuted by enemies (vv. 14, 15) he seeks help for himself from Jehovah (vv. 13, 17) and comfort for the loyal (v. 16).

V. 12 is a later addition binding the two psalms into a liturgical composition. This second poem probably dates from before Nehemiah in the first half of the fifth century B.C.

1-3. The Psalmist Relates His Experience. From some situation where death seemed certain, he had been rescued after patient waiting. The underworld, i.e., the pit, is here conceived as a deep cistern (cf. 28¹ 30^{3, 9} 69^{2, 14}). From miry, slimy underfooting, so he pictures it, he has been set firmly upon a rock. The gratitude of deliverance finds utterance in a new song.

4-12. His Hymn of Praise. The hymn begins by praising God indirectly, through a beatitude for his loyal ones; then proceeds in a characteristic hymn theme to praise God for his wonderful works, also adding an element not so common—for his thoughts. Read, with mg., for v. 5c There is none to be compared unto thee. Note that he speaks not of thought but of separate single thoughts.

God requires not sacrifice and offering but heart gratitude (vv. 6-8). The psalmist uses four technical terms of the sacrificial system, sacrifice, meal offering, in which the worshipers participated, and whole burnt-offering and sin-offering. But he lines himself up with the great prophetic words of 1 Sam. 15²² Amos 5^{21f.} Hos. 6⁶ Isa. 1^{11f.} Mic. 6⁶⁻⁸ Jer. 7^{22f.} and similarly minded psalms (e.g., 50⁸⁻¹³ 51^{16f.} 69³¹; cf. Heb. 10⁵⁻⁷) in insisting that Jehovah does not require such sacrifice. This is the more significant when we note that he was living under the priestly law, i.e., the roll of the book (v. 7), where the sacrificial system was accepted as of central importance. We see that among many spiritually minded circles of the laity the spirit of the prophets still lived. They were able to read the Torah, the Law, with prophetic eyes (vv. 9, 10).

With this psalmist, what in earlier days would have merely accompanied a thank-offering takes the place of it. A hymn sung in connection with the thanksgiving offering becomes simply a spiritual song of thanksgiving, but, as was the case with that accompanying the sacrificial rite, he sings it in the great congregation of the Temple. He does not keep his praise to himself.

Lo, I am come (v. 7)—probably into the Temple. Read, with mg., for v. 7b, it is prescribed to me. He comes as did men of old to do the will of God, but this will is not legalistically conceived as the fulfillment of external prescriptions. The Torah he obeys is that expounded in Jer. 31^{31f.}, the inner prescriptions of the heart. With this section compare the Instruction of Merikere (Egyptian), "more acceptable (to the sun god) is one righteous of heart than the ox of one that worketh iniquity" (Blackman, in Simpson, The Psalmists, p. 190). The hymn (vv. 4-11) closes with a personal petition. V. 12 is a harmonistic verse joining the originally separate psalm of lamentation (vv. 13-17) to the foregoing psalm of thanksgiving. Vv. 1-11 deal with his iniquities; the lamentation deals with his enemies.

13-17. A Petition for Personal Deliverance and for Judgment Upon His Enemies. (Cf. Ps. 70.) The circle of the loyal (v. 16), seeing the destruction of the enemy, will praise Jehovah. With great pathos the psalmist reiterates his petition, and the psalm closes with the soul awaiting his urgently needed help.

PSALM 41. A HYMN OF THANKSGIVING FOR DELIVERANCE FROM ILLNESS

Beginning in a manner that shows the influence of the Wisdom teachers of Israel, the psalmist gratefully acknowledges Jehovah as the source of his deliverance from illness. Indulging in reminiscence, he recalls his treatment when ill, at the hands of his enemies and of his intimate friend (vv. 5-9), as well as his former prayer (vv. 4, 10) for relief and restoration to health. His prayer was answered and he recovered. The psalm is post-exilic, showing dependence upon Jeremiah and Job.

1-3. Jehovah the Source of His Recovery. After his recovery the psalmist seems to have meditated upon the question, "Who has a right to expect from Jehovah recovery from illness?" He is not satisfied with saying "he that confesses his sin" (v. 4b). He goes a step further. In addition to this it is "he that showeth consideration to the weak" (v. 1). In words characteristic of the sages in Israel he puts this thought into a beatitude at the very beginning of his psalm. It is Jehovah that kept him alive, when he was languishing upon his bed. The text of v. 3b is uncertain. Gunkel reads, "All his suffering thou turnest into strength."

4-10. His Lamentation Uttered in His Illness. Two things pained him most. First (v. 4b) his consciousness of sin, which he frankly confesses, without revealing its nature; second (v. 5), and this weighs yet more heavily upon him, the treachery and evil hopes of his enemies, who want him to die. They visit him with seeming interest, but are merely seeking information as to his physical condition, and even during the visit they are thinking what they can tell their comrades, secretly confiding to them and exulting over it, that he cannot recover (vv. 7, 8). The climax of this suffering comes when his own familiar friend, literally, "the man of my covenant," he who had eaten bread with him at his table, turned traitor (v. 9; cf. Jer. 12⁶ Job 19¹³⁻¹⁹). The passionate desire for requital is beneath the temper of the psalm as a whole.

11, 12. His Prayer Has Been Heard. His recovery and the failure of his enemies' hopes are proof of Jehovah's forgiveness. Forever he will have the privilege of worship before thy face—i.e., in the Temple.

13. The Doxology. Each book of the psalms closes with a doxology (see intro., section on "The Organization of the Psalter," p. 509b).

PSALM 42. LONGING FOR PILGRIMAGE TO THE SANCTUARY

Psa. 42 and 43 were originally a single poem. Psa. 43 has no superscription, and the refrain found in 42⁵, 11 43⁵ conclusively proves the essential oneness of the two psalms in thought and artistic construction. The psalmist is deeply depressed (cf. the refrain) and for some reason unable to make the pilgrimage to the sanctuary. This psalm was possibly a liturgy for the Feast of Ingathering (Ex. 23¹⁶), a feast of great merriment and one celebrated by a pilgrimage to a shrine. Peters believes that it was a festival hymn of the Dan temple. He thinks that with the ravaging of northern Israel by Tiglath-pileser IV in 734 B.C., some of the priests with their liturgies migrated to Shechem or Bethel, and in 722 B.C. from there to Jerusalem. Thus psalms originally used at local Jehovah sanctuaries got into the Temple Psalter. The date is probably toward the middle of the eighth century B.C.

1-5. Longing for the Sanctuary. The psalmist interprets his longing to worship God at the sanctuary under the picturesque simile of the thirst of the stag in summer (vv. 1-3). He seizes upon physical thirst and that of an animal that cannot hide it as the best figure through which to portray his passion for God. In such a pilgrimage he would find buttress and defense against his taunting enemies who have plagued him to tears. He recalls earlier pilgrimages when he used to lead the pilgrims in festal procession to the Temple (at Dan?), a boisterous, happy throng (v. 4). V. 5 contains the refrain. This is the finest, the most poetic, and the most spiritually rich refrain in the Psalter. It recurs in v. 11 and 43⁵. His higher self encourages his despondent self by hope of a future pilgrimage. Peters thinks v. 5 is the cry of confidence from the hard pressed people that Jehovah will yet help them.

6-11. Joyful Memories Contrasted with the Painful Present. The pilgrimage, in the psalmist's memory, has reached the sources of the Jordan at the foot of great Hermon. Mizar ("little") is the little hill by the spring of the Jordan, on which stood the Temple. "V. 7 is a vivid description of the impression made on the mind by the rushing torrents, with their roaring sound . . . especially impressive is the great fountain at Tel Kadi, the ancient Dan, where with a mighty roaring, as of a distant cataract, a river springs full-born from the ground . . . the water rushing out through its subterranean channels, the deep below crying out to the deep above, pouring forth in waves and billows in which the pilgrims bathe." (Peters, The Psalms as Liturgies, pp. 63, 277. The Macmillan Company, publishers.) Omit in the translation of v. 8 the first word, yet, which is not found in Hebrew. On the pilgrimage God's mercy cheers him by day and the pilgrim songs and prayers at night.

But from such happy memories he awakens with a jolt (vv. 9, 10), to utter a lamentation over the enemies' taunts that he and his fellow countrymen have no god who can protect them. Where is thy god?—here as in v. 3b a sneering challenge from boasting foes who see in their victory the downfall of the defeated enemies' gods. For the refrain in v. 11 see comment on v. 5.

PSALM 43. THE GOAL OF THE PILGRIMAGE

Vv. 1, 2 are an appeal for the decision, i.e., the judgment of God against the deceitful heathen enemies. In vv. 3, 4 the psalmist appeals for the personified spiritual forces of light and truth to lead him even as he had led others (see 424) to the sanctuary and the booths. (Even if the sanctuary were originally Dan—see on Psa. 42—the words were later interpreted as referring to Jerusalem.) There he will make his offering. The final refrain carries the atmosphere of triumphant expectancy.

PSALM 44. A NATIONAL SONG OF LAMENTATION

There is a great crisis on in Judaism (v. 9) and Israel seems abandoned by God. Interpreting hopefully God's past leadership of the nation (vv. 1-3), the psalmist appeals for his immediate help in the present crisis. The most likely background of the psalm is the Maccabean era. Kittel calls it the "Song of Lamentation of the Maccabees," and thinks the occasion of it was the slaughter of the Jews referred to in 1 Macc. 229-38.

1-3. God's Hand In Israel's Past. The psalter is alive with the sense of history and sees Jehovah's hand in every step of Israel's career. V. 1 pictures one generation telling to the oncoming generation of God's dealings with Israel in the past. What Israel achieved at the conquest (vv. 2, 3) was not due to her prowess but to God.

4-8. Confidence in God's Help in the Present Crisis. In his historical recall the psalmist takes hope. Not by military equipment (v. 6), or by the people's own strength, but from God will come victory. This is an attitude characteristic of the book of Daniel (cir. 167 B.C.).

9-16. Seemingly God Has Forsaken Israel. The lamentation begins here. Israel's armies are defeated (vv. 9, 10). Successive exiles have scattered her forces. In bitter sarcasm Jehovah is accused of selling Israel (to the Hellenizing Syrians) cheap (v. 12). She has no standing among the nations (vv. 13-16). This, since the time of Ezekiel (cf. ch. 36), was a sensitive point with the Jews.

17-22. Yet Israel Has Been Loyal to God. The psalmist is evidently in a desolate wilderness and a dark valley (v. 19). Israel's loyalty does not deserve such treatment (v. 21). V. 22 may be a reference to the severity of persecution by Antiochus Epiphanes, who ruthlessly attempted to Hellenize Judaism (see p. 755).

23-26. A Passionate Appeal for God's Help. V. 25 implies the situation mirrored in 1 Macc. 229-38. The basis of the appeal now is not Israel's self-respect among the nations but, rather, the nature of God.

PSALM 45. A SONG CELEBRATING A KING'S MARRIAGE

We have here a wedding song for a king. Sellin considers it a song celebrating the marriage of Jeroboam II with a foreign princess. Other suggestions offered are the marriage of Solomon with the daughter of Pharaoh, Ahab with Jezebel or Joram with Athaliah. The psalm is not Messianic but belongs to a group of psalms concerning the king. As to date we can be certain only that it is pre-exilic.

1. Prelude. The poet proposes to sing a song concerning the king. My heart overfloweth—the poet sings "the things of my making," i.e., his own poetic composition. In old English "maker" = poet.

2-9. Praise of the Groom. He begins with the king's "beauty" (v. 2) and grace—a mingling of favor, kindness, and elegance. Then (vv. 3-5) he praises him as warrior. Calling him to array himself for battle, he exclaims, Thy glory and thy majesty. In v. 4a read, with McFadyen, Good fortune attend thee as forth thou dost ride. He goes forth riding majestically upon his horse, fighting in behalf of (so read with mg.) loyalty, gentleness and righteousness. Terrible things refers to deeds arousing dread. V. 5 means "pierced to the heart are the king's enemies."

Translate v. 6 with G. R. Driver (Simpson, The Psalmists, p. 124), Thy throne is God forever and ever, i.e., thy throne is like God's throne. The king is addressed in hyperbole as God. We find a similar usage in the Babylonian "Epic of Creation" concerning Marduk. Kittel renders Thy throne, thou divine one, stands always and ever. The emendation of the text to read, "Thy throne will stand forever and ever" (Wellhausen) is not necessary. V. 7 asserts the king's right to rule. V. 8 describes the royal wedding garments and the instrumental music; and v. 8 refers to the foreign princesses, the attendants of the bride. At the king's right stands a foreign queen.

10-12. The Singer Counsels the Bride. She is to forget her own country and reverence her new husband, the king. Read v. 12, And the Tyrians shall come with a gift.

13-15. The Royal Bride Described. She is a foreign princess. We get a glimpse into the palace where she waits, dressed in golden bridal array. Soon, accompanied by the joyous young women of the bridal party, she will be led to her new home, an important part of the marriage ceremony in the East.

16, 17. Anticipation of the King's Fame. He is to have the forward look, his eye upon his posterity, building a name to endure through the generations.

PSALM 46. GOD OUR REFUGE AND STRENGTH

Various views are held concerning the interpretation of this great psalm. Briggs thinks it expresses the confidence of King Josiah amid the international commotion occasioned by the Scythian invasion. Wellhausen connects it with the revolution in the near East caused by the mastery of Alexander the Great. Cheyne and most expositors connect it with the invasion of Sennacherib in 701 B.C. Peters views it as originating in the northern sanctuary at Dan, the topography of which region it depicts. But the profoundest and most consistent interpretation is that of Gunkel, who views it as an eschatological hymn of Zion like Psa. 47 and 76. Our interpretation owes much to his masterly exegesis. This psalm stands under the profound influence of prophetic teaching concerning the end of the days. It reveals the depth of religious feeling and the power of inspiration that eschatological ideas contained for ancient Israel. It comes from a period after the greater prophets had done their work, probably shortly after the time of Deutero-Isaiah. This psalm gave rise to Luther's majestic hymn, "A Mighty Fortress Is Our God." It has been called "the sublime song of faith." The author moved not only in eschatological conceptions but also in the ideas of Gen. 15⁶ Isa. 7⁹ 30¹⁵ and Hab. 24. Possibly some historical incident gave occasion for it, but the whole burden of the psalm has to do with the awesome future—the time of the end.

1-3. The Expectation of Jehovah's Intervention. The pictures of the convulsions of nature are the conceptions largely inherited by the prophets and sketched by them to picture the terrible, final catastrophe which will precede the new era. The pictures are of volcano (read in v. 2a though the earth melt), earthquake (vv. 2b, 3b), and flood (v. 3a). It was expected, according to old Hebrew thought, that as at the time previous to creation there had been a chaotic mass of primeval waters which with roaring destructiveness were in control until Jehovah mastered them (cf. 89¹⁰ 104⁶⁻⁹ Job 38¹¹), so in the last days a new destructive flood would lift itself against Jehovah's creation (cf. Jer. 47²) as an overflowing scourge.

But in such a time Israel need not fear. God is our shelter and strength. The destructive waters cannot shake Him nor those whom he protects. Probably the refrain (vv. 7, 11) sung by the congregation has dropped out and should also appear after v. 3. Jehovah of hosts—this name re-echoes the early thought of Jehovah as God of war.

4-7. Jehovah's Victory and the New Era. V. 6 portrays the armies of the nations, i.e., heathendom, arrayed against Zion in final attack, raging in enmity and threatening (cf. Isa. 17¹²⁻¹⁴ Ezek. 38¹⁴⁻³⁹20). But the city need not fear, for in Jerusalem (Isa. 37³⁵) is Jehovah, and even at the darkest hour, "at the turning of the morning," Jehovah will reveal his mighty presence as of old (cf. Ex. 19¹⁸), the uproar will cease and the earth as in terror shall quake. Amid all the chaos and raging the one center of calm is Jerusalem, for Jehovah is there.

In graphic contrast to the seething, destructive waters of chaos the psalmist pictures other waters not destructive but productive, not terror-inspiring but peace-bringing—the waters of the ever increasing stream of Ezekiel's vision (ch. 47), flowing out from under the threshold of the Temple, bringing life and health wherever they flow. With awesome poetic power the psalmist awakens in this section the mysterium tremendum which Rudolf Otto calls the deepest element in religion.

8-11. The Result of Jehovah's Intervention. The battle of Jehovah with the raging nations is over. He has compelled and conquered the opposing powers of the world (cf. Isa. 59^{14b-20} 631-6). V. 8 summons Jehovah's people, protected in the final catastrophe by his power, to view the field of his victory. He is master of the earth. No combination of forces can ever conquer him. The implements of war are scrapped (cf. Isa. 21-4). God now ascends the throne of the universe and utters his summons to humanity: Be still (v. 10)—i.e., desist, refrain from all lack of confidence in me, from all enmity against me, recognize who I am! Jehovah! king over the nations, king over all the earth! The last refrain, in v. 11, is imbued with the atmosphere of triumph.

PSALM 47. THE ENTHRONEMENT OF JEHOVAH

This is a psalm, similar to Psa. 93, 95-100, celebrating the enthronement of Jehovah as king of the whole earth. It is an eschatological hymn with a liturgical character. In Babylonia on each New Year's Day there was a ritual in which the Babylonian king "took the hands of Bel." Likewise, on this day was recited the Babylonian epic of Creation, which interests us because in one of these "accession" psalms Jehovah's creation of the world is celebrated (see 955). Mowinkel has recently maintained (Psalmenstudien II, especially p. 31) that the accession of the Hebrew king was celebrated as an annual festival in the autumn, coinciding with the Feast of Booths. This gave the model for the psalms of Jehovah's accession which were used liturgically. The festival was celebrated on New Year's Day by a procession with the ark from some spot in Jerusalem to the Temple. While in part historical (cf. 2 Sam. 6:12f.) such a celebration is likewise eschatological in that it looks forward to the day when Israel's faith will be vindicated and Jehovah will be supreme. References in v. 5 (cf. Lev. 23:24 Num. 29:1) point to a date in the late fifth or early fourth century B.C., later than Isa. 56-66 and close to the compilation of the priestly code.

1-4. The Summons to Rejoicing Over the Enthronement of Jehovah. The jubilation accompanying the enthronement of an earthly monarch creates the conceptions for this (cf. 1 Kings 13:4, 39, Solomon; 2 Kings 11:12, Jehoshaphat). Jehovah is more than king over Israel, yet to Israel he has a unique relation (vv. 2b, 3, 4).

5-7. Jehovah's Accession to the Throne. Amid the popular acclaim of all, He ascends his throne to reign over all the earth, i.e., over humanity.

8, 9. The Unity of Humanity in God. All the nations are here viewed as, spiritually, the people of the God of Abraham. Here is a universalism lifted high above the prevailing nationalism. This psalmist had fed upon the ideals of the Second and Third Isaiahs (cf. Isa. 49:1-8 66:18).

PSALM 48. A PROCESSIONAL HYMN

This is a hymn sung by the congregation in the Temple (v. 9) at the beginning of the festal procession, probably at the Feast of the Passover. Those who participate have evidently come from a distance (v. 13), possibly the only time some of them will ever celebrate a festival at Jerusalem. The psalm is strongly colored with eschatological conceptions. It dates most likely from the late Persian period.

1-3. A Zion Hymn in Praise of Jerusalem. It is not the actual Jerusalem of which the psalmist sings, but the Jerusalem of prophetic hope (cf. Isa. 21-4), when it will be the center of the Messianic kingdom, which will include the whole earth. The sides of the north is probably in origin a mythical conception. The north is the abode of the gods. This ancient popular idea has been taken over and applied to Jerusalem.

4-7. The Final Attack of the Nations Upon Jerusalem and Her Supernatural Deliverance. This conception is familiar in eschatological ideas (cf. Ezek. 38, 39, Joel 3:1f.). Not by human warfare but by Jehovah's supernatural interference was Jerusalem saved. We do not have here the portrayal of an historical event, for Jerusalem's population had no share in it.

8. The Pilgrim's Wonder at Jerusalem. We sense here the awe of the pilgrim who at last finds himself in the beloved city of which he had been told so much. Now he has seen with his own eyes the eternal city.

9-11. The Festal Celebration. It included worship in the Temple, the singing of Jehovah's praise, and the free jollification of the city.

12-14. The Festal Procession. Perhaps the procession went around the city walls. At any rate, it went from place to place, recalling scenes having to do with David and Solomon, Josiah, Isaiah and Jeremiah. The pilgrims must note these things well. In their far-away homes they must tell to the children what they have seen. What God has been and done in the past gives confident expectation for his continued help.

PSALM 49. AN INTIMATION OF IMMORTALITY

This is not a hymn but a meditation (Welch, The Psalter, p. 78; cf. Psa. 16 and 90). The psalmist is perplexed by the problem of the prosperity of the wicked (vv. 5, 6). Regardless of their wealth they all go down to Sheol (v. 14) and never again see the light (v. 19b). But as for him, Jehovah will ransom him from Sheol's power and receive him to himself. We have here a fairly clear intimation of immortality. The psalm comes from one of the sages of Israel and has closest contact with Psa. 37 and 73. It is very late—probably from the Greek period. The text is very imperfect and at points needs reconstruction.

1-4. His Appeal for Attention. The psalmist would reach not only Israel, and not only the well-to-do, but humanity of all classes (vv. 1, 2). He has a message of wisdom for mankind and evidently believes in the stimulus of music to thought (v. 4). For v. 4b read I will open my perplexing question upon the lyre.

5, 6. The Problem Stated: Why Worry Over the Prosperity of the Wicked? Following Origen, v. 5 should be rendered, Why should I fear in the days of trouble when the iniquity of those persecuting me surrounds me? They that trust (v. 6), i.e., those persecuting me.

7-14. All Mankind Has the Same Fate. Read v. 7, Yet (this word implies a conclusion reached after a long process of thought) man surely cannot ransom himself; nor give to God his price. Man cannot buy perpetual life. Omit v. 8 as a later gloss and read v. 9a, that he should live always and ever.

Vv. 10-12 state that the wise and the stupid come to the same end—Death. In v. 11 read, with mg., Their graves are their houses forever, and v. 12a, But man in honor without discernment is, etc. A man who lacks insight, though he may have material splendor, perishes like a beast. Read v. 13a with mg., This is the way of them that are foolish; read v. 13b following J. M. P. Smith (The Religion of the Psalms, p. 119), And the path of those who delight in their own speech. In connection with v. 14 Cheyne (The Psalms, p. 138) quotes an Arabic poem: "And to-day they wander, a trembling herd, their herdsman Death." Read v. 14cd, following Buhl,

*"They go down with the upright to the grave
And their form is for wasting.
Sheol is their dwelling."*

15-20. The Abandonment of the Unrighteous Rich in Sheol but the Immortality of the Righteous. This is one of the very few places in the O.T. where is to be found a suggestion of a noble destiny beyond the grave for the individual (see p. 173). The psalmist speaks only of what he believes his own fate will be, in dramatic contrast to those whom he has been criticizing. He merely mentions his hope in v. 15, and it does not affect the rest of the psalm except by the sharpness and vigor which it puts into the contrast. Yet the climax of the psalm is here. He will not go down to Sheol but will be received by God (cf. 73²⁴). Jehovah will not allow him to come into Sheol's power. Gunkel considers this verse a late addition, but Duhm rightly sees in it a passage similar to Isa. 26¹⁹ and Dan. 12².

Read v. 18b, following Duhm and Gunkel, And praised it when it did well for itself.

PSALM 50. THE SACRIFICE GOD REQUIRES

The psalmist is a student of the prophets and in his psalm we find a type of thought and a manner of utterance that is characteristic of Israelite prophecy at its best. What he says concerning sacrifice connects him at once with the utterances in 1 Sam. 15^{22f}. Amos 5^{21f}. Hos. 6⁶ Isa. 1^{11f}. Mic. 6^{6f}. Jer. 7^{22f}. Yet while a student of the prophets he is likewise loyal to the Law, which he reads and obeys in the prophetic spirit. The psalm dates from the post-exilic period, probably the fifth century B.C., when the Deuteronomic Law was still supreme, and before the priestly code had been accepted as the basis of Jewish life and conduct. (See notes on 40⁴⁻¹².)

1-6. The Appearance of God. God in a revelation that affects the whole earth (vv. 1, 4) comes to scattered Israel to gather them together (v. 5) and judge his people. As the ancient poems (cf. Judg. 5^{4f}.) represented him as coming from Sinai, this psalm pictures him as coming from Jerusalem, but the old natural accompaniments of the theophany are present (cf. Ex. 19^{18, 19}).

7-15. God's Oracle Concerning Sacrifice. The oracle addressed to collective Israel opens in prophetic style. As to sacrifices, Israel is scrupulously faithful, but Jehovah does not desire sacrifice, for all the animals used in sacrifice already belong to him (vv. 8-13). What God wants is not the sacrifice of animals but of the heart in gratitude, in the payment of vows, and in prayer (vv. 14, 15a). Gunkel says that v. 15 summarizes in brief, powerful manner the life of the pious: need, call unto God, deliverance, and praise. The psalmist's emphasis on heart gratitude and prayer goes even beyond the prophetic teaching cited in the introduction.

16-23. Superficial Legalism. The wicked are severely (v. 22) condemned for their superficial confidence in the Law, which they disobey. Evidently he has in mind the Ten Words (cf. Ex. 20¹⁻²⁰, especially 14-16), as the summons in v. 7 also suggests (cf. Deut. 51⁶⁴). The psalm links together in the closing verse prophetic piety and piety under the Law.

PSALM 51. CRY OF A SOUL FOR CLEANSING AND PARDON

This penitence psalm is one of the deepest in the Psalter. The psalmist is heir to the prophets who interpreted religion chiefly as an inner heart experience. In origin it goes back to the early ritual of worship. A man sick (v. 8b), and accordingly feeling himself under the censure of Jehovah, goes to the priest at the sanctuary to be cleansed and pardoned. Using the ritual form, the words being accompanied by ritual acts, he would say, "Purge me with hyssop and I shall be clean" (v. 7a). He is profoundly depressed (v. 8a), for his life is in peril (v. 14a). His sense of sin in keenness and depth is unsurpassed in the Psalter. The poet lived after Isaiah (cf. Isa. 116-18), but before Haggai and Zechariah. His indebtedness to Jeremiah and Ezekiel marks the psalm as exilic or early post-exilic. Vv. 18, 19 are an editorial adaptation dating from the Judaism of the fifth century previous to Nehemiah.

1, 2. A Cry for Forgiveness. From the depths of his soul the psalmist cries for pardon. Three terms are used for sin and three for forgiveness. He prays that his transgressions may be blotted out, that his iniquities may be milled or treaded out (the method of washing) and that from his sin (root = to miss the mark) he may be pronounced clean. Cleanse (v. 2b)—originally a ritualistic, ceremonial term, which here has achieved moral significance.

3-6. The Psalmist's Confession. This confession, which expresses deep penitence, is the basis of his petition. His sense of sin stands ever at the center of his consciousness (v. 3b). This broad, central confession is deepened by the addition of two thoughts: (1) His sense of sin is so keen and deep that he views it as more than transgression against men. Gunkel (who in v. 14 instead of Deliver me from blood-guiltiness reads Deliver me from silence, i.e., of the underworld = death) maintains that the sin of which he is conscious is not sin against men but, rather, that of inadvertence and, therefore, against God (for the procedure in "unwitting" sin see Lev. 4, notes). But this interpretation does not sound the depths of the psalmist's consciousness of sin (cf. v. 3). To view all sin as, in the last analysis, sin against God is an evidence of moral inwardness and spiritual depth. His confession of this opens the way to pardon, justifying God in exerting his sovereign prerogative in pronouncing him, i.e., judging him, forgiven regardless of those who think he deserves differently (cf. v. 14). The connection between v. 4ab and v. 4cd is best brought out by supplying the thought that is hidden in the pregnant utterance of the psalmist: This confession of ultimate guilt before God I make so that God may be warranted (justified) in uttering the words (so LXX for "when thou speakest") of pardon—originally referring to the priestly pronouncement of cleansing and forgiveness following the worshiper's confession. It is a misunderstanding to interpret the meaning of the text to be that human sin was designed to bring into clear prominence the grace of God (cf. Rom. 34, 5).

(2) The second thought, supplementing the broad confession of v. 3, is that the psalmist as an individual is also implicated in the sin of the race (v. 5). Not "original sin" is maintained here, but a universal tendency toward sin (cf. Isa. 65). But in the psalmist's mind this does not excuse but deepens his guilt, for in v. 6 he utters another pregnant sentence like v. 4bc, which means, "I would not speak such words unless I felt it essential that my confession be without reservation, that it open to the scrutiny of God the innermost moral recesses of my nature." Inward parts, and hidden parts—literally, "covered," "concealed," "hidden" and "shut-up," "corked up." There is an utter sincerity and transparency in his confession, in which attitude of soul God instructs him. Gunkel's interpretation of an esoteric secret wisdom is not adequately based.

7-12. His Petition for Cleansing and Renewal. Vv. 7-9 are a prayer for cleansing. The references to hyssop and washing probably go back to ritual acts which were accompanied by pronouncements of the priests. Peters thinks we have the very words from the familiar language of the ritual. It concluded in cries of joy and praise (v. 8a). Hyssop is a shrublike herb with strong aromatic leaves to which ancient peoples ascribed purifying power. It was used to sprinkle the worshiper (cf. Lev. 144f. Num. 196, 18). Bones which thou hast broken (v. 8)—not to be taken literally but symbolically of his total crushed and despondent condition (cf. 35¹⁰ Isa. 38¹³).

Vv. 10-12 are a prayer for renewal. Using the term that recalls the marvel of God's creative act which called the world into being, he prays for a "new creation," a cleansed heart (heart = "the practical reason," Kittel), and the renewal of his former unwavering and confident disposition. Pardon is not enough. Something creative reaching the moral and spiritual aspects of life is essential. The author is the heir of the deep-ideas of Jer. 247 3133 and especially Ezek. 3625. A nobler conception of the Spirit of God as an abiding power for good in the individual life (v. 11) is not found elsewhere in the O.T. He seeks the renewal of his former joy of fellowship with God and an obliging and willing spirit (v. 12).

13-17. His Vow. If Jehovah will pardon and restore him, he will act as an evangelist for him. The speaker was in peril of violence from men who felt he deserved differently at the hand of God. He prays for deliverance from an act that would make its perpetrator guilty of murder. Released from his crushed condition, he will proclaim abroad what Jehovah has done for him (v. 14). Like the poet of Psa. 50 (especially 8-15), this psalmist (vv. 16, 17) represents the prophetic attitude toward sacrifice. Welch points out that the sacrificial system had to do with atonement for sins of inadvertence only and hence did not go deep enough to reach the psalmist's sense of sin, for he had sinned with knowledge and out of weakness of will. This was the fundamental limitation of the liturgies of Israel—their shallowness in dealing with the ultimate question of sin (cf. The Psalter, pp. 109f.). The sacrifices God requires are not burnt-offerings but humility of spirit (cf. Cheyne's references to the Jewish service for the Day of Atonement).

18, 19. An Editorial Adaptation. A later writer corrects the liberal prophetic teaching of the preceding verses by adapting the psalm for use in the second Temple, an institution which attached great significance to sacrificial worship. This addition comes from the time previous to the rebuilding of the wall by Nehemiah (v. 18). It is in fundamental clash with vv. 16, 17, but in harmony with Psa. 66¹³⁻¹⁵. "The use of such a psalm as the fifty-first alongside of the ritual it transcends and supersedes may remind us that the Temple worship, like all ritual, was really a framework of different spiritual values experienced by the differing worshippers" (H. W. Robinson in Simpson, The Psalmists, p. 62).

PSALM 52. THE FALL OF A RICH BOASTER.

This is a psalm of lamentation in the form of an address to him who is the occasion of the lament. The person addressed is one of the leaders of the proud materialists in the community. His perverse, boastful talk is what arouses the righteous indignation of the psalmist (vv. 2-4), who looks confidently forward to his destruction (v. 5).

1-4. His Boastful Evil Talk. Addressing the boaster in fine irony as a mighty man, the psalmist asks him why he behaves so proudly toward the loyal all the days (v. 1b; so Wellhausen following the Syriac). His sharp tongue is compared to a treacherous razor.

5-7. His Judgment at God's Hands, the Righteous Looking On. His seeming security is only apparent (v. 4). The verbs of v. 5 express petition, "May God destroy thee," etc. The terms are picturesque and suggestive. May God demolish thee, shatter thee, tear thee away without a tent, uproot thee (cf. Isaiah's vigorous reprimand to Shebna, 22¹⁶⁻¹⁹, which is very similar). The judgment of God is strengthened by the righteous looking on, who point to him and laugh tauntingly at him, recalling his irreverence and materialism. In v. 7a read with mg. stronghold for strength, and with Syriac and Targum read in his wealth for in his wickedness (v. 7c).

8, 9. The Contrasted Attitude of the Psalmist. In the court of the Temple flourished olive trees which were viewed as being under the special protection of God. Conscious of fresh, inner vitality, the psalmist compares himself to such trees. So certain is he of the future judgment upon this boastful leader that he views it as already accomplished and vows the singing of a song of thanksgiving among the loyal forever.

PSALM 53. MAN'S FOLLY AND WICKEDNESS

Psa. 53 is practically identical with Psa. 14. See notes and comments there.

PSALM 54. A PRAYER AGAINST INSOLENT FOES

This is a lamentation of an individual. The psalmist is in peril at the hands of insolent, godless men who are seeking his life (v. 3; cf. Psa. 64). But he trusts in God (v. 4) and hopes for their destruction at God's hands (vv. 6, 7). In certain anticipation of this (v. 7) he vows a freewill offering of thanksgiving (v. 6). The situation is similar to that of Psa. 64 and comes from the period of party strife in late Judaism.

1-3. The Psalmist's Petition for Help. He speaks of the name of God as having marvelous power (cf. Acts 36, 16 47, 12). He needs the divine help because he is hunted down by violent men (v. 3). Psa. 86¹⁴ practically parallels v. 3. From there restore (so also several MSS. and Targum) insolent men in place of strangers, or foreigners. The insolent are not Gentiles but godless Jews. Violent men, literally, "terror-striking" men.

4, 5. His Confidence in God. In vivid contrast to the godless his confidence is in God. He has others who are helping him but "among those who are supporting his life is the Lord." V. 5a is a wish. Translate May the evil fall back upon those insidiously watching me. Truth=loyalty. God's loyalty to the psalmist means extermination for his enemies.

6, 7. His Vow in Anticipation of Deliverance. The psalm issues in a vow. He will offer a freewill-offering (cf. Lev. 7^{11f.} 22^{17f.})—not a regular, specified sacrifice but a thank-offering brought voluntarily.

PSALM 55. TREACHERY AND THE SHATTERING OF FRIENDSHIP

This psalm combines two originally different poems, both being lamentations because of disloyalty. Because of this similarity of theme they were later brought together into a single psalm. The text is at many points imperfect, but the two poems can still be separated. The first is composed of vv. 1-18a, 22. This is a lamentation of an individual. Persecuted by enemies (v. 3) and in peril of death (vv. 4, 5) he longs for escape into the wilderness (vv. 6-9a). The evil remnant in the city is described (vv. 9-11). The deep pathos of the lamentation, however, appears in vv. 13, 14, where we learn that the leader of his enemies was once his familiar friend, with whom he had gone in festal procession into the Temple (cf. on 42⁴). He passionately prays for the destruction of his enemies, and utters his intention to petition persistently for help (vv. 16, 17). He concludes (v. 22) with a moving exhortation to his own soul. This psalm has closest contact with Psa. 42 and 120. Since Theodore of Mopsuestia, scholars have inclined to a Maccabean date for the poem, but Kittel maintains it might fully as well come from the time of Jeremiah. This part of the psalm is most likely post-exilic.

The second is composed of vv. 18b-21, 23, being evidently a fragment of a lamentation from a psalmist of the dispersion who while in northern Arabia, probably as a trader (?), had entered into a covenant with certain Arabian tribes (v. 19; see below), under whose protection he was sojourning. This covenant of peace (v. 20) they had ruthlessly broken and had, in fact, become his enemies. Although through smooth speech they still simulated friendship (v. 21), God, in whom the psalmist trusts, will destroy them.

1-5. The Psalmist's Lamentation Unto God. He is being so oppressed and so cruelly dealt with that he is overwhelmed with terror.

6-9a. A Lyric of Escape. Here is a tender bit of poetry quite different from the lament, having in it a beautiful imaginative touch. The persecution he is enduring is compared to a tempest—a storm of destructive speech. V. 9a belongs to the preceding, rather than the following verses. Read, following Gunkel's reconstruction:

"From the destructive storm of their throat,
From the torrent of their lips."

9b-11. The Wickedness Rampant in the City. A vivid portrayal of the wickedness of the city in which the various types of evil are personified. What city? Gunkel raises the question of a possible reference to a pagan city. Ewald and most moderns think of Jerusalem, which seems (cf. v. 14) most likely.

12-15. The Treachery of an Intimate Friend. The psalmist's plight is made the more pathetic in that the leader of his enemies is a former friend with whom he had been on most intimate terms, with whom he had shared the most sacred hours of festal celebration with thronging worshipers in the Temple (v. 14; cf. 41⁹, notes). This fact puts passion and intensity into his prayer for sudden destruction of his enemies.

16-18a, 22. A Concluding Utterance of Despondence Upon God. With v. 17 cf. Dan. 6¹⁰ for the prayer three times a day. Read v. 18a, with the LXX and following Wellhausen, he shall redeem. Speaking to his own soul the psalmist says, Cast upon Jehovah thy lot (v. 22), i.e., the care or anxiety of which he has been speaking.

18b-21. The Treachery of the Sons of the Desert. This difficult section does not refer to vv. 12-14. Clearly the text is corrupt and demands reconstruction. Read v. 18b, following mainly Gunkel's reconstruction of the text:

"For there are attacking me archers,
They have become opposed to me."

Ehrlich's brilliant conjecture is the key to the correct understanding of v. 19, an exceedingly difficult verse. With a slight change in the consonantal text he perceives here the names of Arabian clans which we find mentioned in the Pentateuch—the familiar "Ishmael," and "Jalam," a son of Esau (cf. Gen. 36⁵, 14, 18 and 1 Chr. 1³⁵), i.e., an Edomite clan (cf. also on 120⁵ for a reference to similar Arabian clans). Translate: "Ishmael and Jalam and the inhabitants (i.e., natives) of the East. He to whom there is no (such thing as) breach, i.e., of covenant" (cf. v. 20). The eponymous designation of these tribes is followed out by use of the singular, third person masculine pronouns in the following verses. These sons of the desert have turned traitor (v. 20). Outwardly friendly, they were actually treacherous.

23. Prayer for Destruction. This fragment ends with a passionate prayer for the destruction of the traitors and an assertion of the psalmist's trust in God.

PSALM 56. UNSWERVING FAITH IN GOD

This is a lamentation of an individual. The psalmist, who is of the Dispersion, has lived a wandering life (v. 8a), necessitated by his enemies (vv. 1, 2a, 6), who are figuratively portrayed as warriors (vv. 1b, 2b). But he trusts in God (v. 4), who is "for him" (v. 9b) and will put his enemies to rout (v. 9a). He vows thank-offerings in return for his deliverance from peril of death (vv. 12, 13). There is a beautiful refrain in v. 4 and vv. 10, 11. The psalm is probably from the early post-exilic period when the dispersion had set in. (The term "dispersion," or "diaspora," is used to describe the scattering of the Jews throughout the Near East, beginning with the Babylonian Exile of 597 and 586 B.C.; cf. pp. 847-9.)

1, 2. A Cry to God Because of Enemies. The psalmist's enemies are interpreted as warriors who swallow him—i.e., they are “crushing,” “trampling upon” him.

3, 4. Trust in the Day of Fear. In the hour when tempted to be afraid he trusts in God against whom mere flesh cannot prevail.

5-7. Lament Over the Activities of His Enemies. He proceeds to a more detailed account of his enemies' dealings with him. Translate v. 5a, All the day long they vex my affairs; read v. 6a, They spy out (Gunkel), they lie hidden. In the psalmist's cry to God for their defeat we see that his enemies are not Jews but foreigners (the peoples). Read v. 7a, For their iniquities weigh out to them, i.e., retribution (Ewald).

8-11. His Confidence in God's Concern. Because of the strenuous enmity which he has experienced he has been a wanderer but has not been absent from the concern of God. His tears have been treasured up in God's bottle, the record of them set down in God's book (cf. Job 19²³ Mal. 3¹⁶) i.e., his commemoration book. The Babylonians also shared the idea that man's deeds are written down by the gods. In v. 9b is expressed the crisp, concentrated summary of his confidence: God is for me. His faith has in it the ring of certainty. Vv. 10, 11 repeat the refrain of v. 4.

12, 13. The Payment of His Vows. When he experienced his difficulties he vowed thank-offerings in case of relief. Help has come and the payment of his vow is now his duty. Jehovah has intervened. His loyal one has been delivered from premature death.

PSALM 57. MY HEART IS FIXED

This psalm is closely connected with the preceding and probably comes from the same period and author. The psalmist is of the Diaspora (v. 9) and has sensed the meaning of Jeremiah's counsel to the Judæans in far-away Babylonia (Jer. 29¹²⁻¹⁴). He is passing through a storm of fiery, bitter enmity, expressed in sharp, biting speech that strikes to his very heart (v. 4). Yet he confidently trusts in God (vv. 2, 7), from whom he expects retribution upon his enemies. The psalm ends in a beautiful hymn of praise (vv. 7-11, which verses recur in 108¹⁻⁵). It is a song to be sung not in the Temple, but in the Diaspora among the nations.

1-6. A Cry for Mercy and the Psalmist's Trust in the Protection of God. He is enduring a “storm of ruin” (Cheyne). Until it passes he is under the protection of his God. His past experience leads him to present confidence in God, who accomplishes deliverance for him. V. 4 contains the psalmist's lamentation: His enemies are like lions, mad with rage, among whom he lies down to sleep in the atmosphere of constant peril of their sharp invective. From the harshness of human beings he rises to the hope of the ultimate universal sovereignty of God (v. 5; cf. 56⁴). Furthermore, he rejoices in the certainty of God's judgment upon his enemies (v. 6). Characteristic of many of the psalms is the thought of the self-destruction of evil (cf. 71⁶ 91⁶).

7-11. A Morning Hymn of Thanksgiving. The psalmist is asleep (cf. v. 4b), his lute and harp silent at his side. The slumber of night is upon nature. Then in gratitude the psalmist first awakens his own glory—the text should be changed so as to read “soul” (literally, “my liver,” i.e., the seat of emotion)—then his silent lute and harp (v. 8a), and finally the slumbering dawn, to sing Jehovah's praise in a morning hymn of thanksgiving. Read, with mg., v. 8b, I will awake the dawn. This beautiful poetic conception has achieved a rich variety of expression in English poetry. Milton, “Cheerly rouse the slumbering morn”; Shakespeare, “the gentle lark . . . wakes the morning”; Tennyson, “cold winds woke the gray-eyed morn.” The psalmist's determination to sing the praises of Jehovah springs not from the actual experience of the destruction of his enemies, for this is still in the future, nor simply from the conviction that his cry unto God has been heard, but rather, out of an abiding faith that has sustained him in the very experience of persecution. My heart is fixed—literally, firm, established, steadfast. Amid fears and subtle perils his heart remains steady through his confidence in God.

His hymn of praise is sung not among his fellow countrymen but away from the Temple among pagan peoples. This psalm has given courage and confidence to persecuted and scattered Judaism through the centuries. The recurring refrain in v. 11 brings the psalm to an exalted close.

PSALM 58. CORRUPTION OF JUSTICE IN THE EARTH

This is a lamentation of an individual. The psalmist is deeply concerned over the corruption of justice in the earth. His eye is upon the earthly rulers, who should be the dispensers of justice among men. But he addresses the heathen gods, whose instruments of evil these rulers are and under whose protection they stand (vv. 1, 2). He prays for the destruction of these malicious leaders (vv.

6-9) and asserts the vindication of the righteous and the triumph among the gods of the God who judges the earth. The psalm is later than Deutero-Isaiah; it probably comes from late Judaism. It has very close contact with Psalms 82.

1, 2. Address to the Gods. Read v. 1a with mg., O ye gods, instead of in silence, and construe ye sons of men as the object of judge. Instead of directly challenging the earthly rulers with the miscarriage of justice he addresses the gods, the guardian spirits of the rulers of the nations. Ultimately the corruption of justice among mankind is conceived as due to them, the real forces behind the present world disorder. Read v. 2b with Syriac (and Buhl), But nay, all of you judge in the earth in iniquity (see Eph. 6¹², notes).

3-5. The Malicious Behavior of the Wicked. The scene shifts. The psalmist now addresses the earthly puppets of these heathen gods. From birth their words, i.e., of judgment, have been like the poison of serpents so fierce that no charmer could soothe them (cf. 1403 Jer. 8¹⁷).

6-9. A Vindictive Prayer for Their Destruction. Graphic and vigorous symbols are employed to depict the longed-for destruction: Lions robbed of viciousness by broken teeth (v. 6), vanishing streams (v. 7a), withering grass (v. 7b; accepting the emendation suggested by Cheyne, "Let them be as grass that quickly withers"), snails that melt and pass away, a premature birth (v. 8b), plants cut down like thorns, and borne away in the storm before they had produced fruit (v. 9a; accepting the reading suggested by Gunkel, "Before they bear fruit may they be cut off as thorns. In wind may he sweep them away as nettles").

10, 11. The Vindication of the Righteous. These verses illustrate the vindictive temper of late Judaism. Mankind shall see in this judgment upon heathen leaders a reward of righteousness and an evidence of the supremacy of Jehovah over other gods. That judgeth—in Hebrew the plural form of the participle; possibly a relic carried over from the plural conception of deity. Where used of Jehovah the plural has a certain literary force which can be felt but not rendered in translation (Gen. 1²⁶).

PSALM 59. GOD IS MY HIGH TOWER

This is a psalm of lamentation. The psalmist is in the Diaspora and his enemies are Gentiles (v. 5), whose taunts and sharp speech create his problem (vv. 7, 12). The same vindictive spirit that moves the previous psalm is here found. He passionately beseeches God to destroy his enemies and thereby show the supremacy of Israel's God (v. 13). The sense of strain under which the psalmist lives is ominously suggested in the first refrain (v. 6, repeated in v. 14), and the relief of faith in hours of such strain is powerfully expressed in the second refrain (v. 9, repeated in v. 17). The psalmist probably writes from the post-exilic period, when the Diaspora had set in in full force.

1, 2. His Cry for Deliverance From Enemies. The psalmist is suffering persecution but he speaks with Oriental color. It is the speech of his enemies, not bodily peril at their hands, that disturbs him (cf. vv. 7, 12).

3-7. Their Activity Described and a Prayer for Their Destruction. His enemies are powerful and crafty (v. 3ab), and the psalmist is keenly conscious that he does not deserve such treatment; he has not sinned against them (vv. 3c, 4a). In the midst of his description he utters a passionate prayer for their punishment (vv. 4b, 5). He compares his enemies to hungry, prowling dogs moving around the city (v. 6). When they speak they belch forth sharp cutting words (v. 7). The city is probably not Jerusalem but a heathen city.

8-10. His Confidence in God. God will both protect him and accomplish the destruction of his enemies, which he desires. Read in v. 9, with LXX, some MSS., and v. 17, Unto thee, O my strength, will I sing praises. In v. 10 read As for my God, his mercy comes to meet me.

11-13. A Prayer for the Destruction of His Enemies. V. 11 seems to suggest that he wants their destruction to be gradual so that, as they are being destroyed, they may realize that Israel's God is supreme (cf. v. 13). It is again evident that it is the speech of his enemies that has disturbed him most. The prayer is passionate and vindictive.

14, 15. The Enemies Unaware of Their Certain Fate. With graphic poetic force he again pictures the enemy as before (v. 6), as ravenous, hungry dogs, wandering about the city seeking food. But now he does not fear.

16, 17. His Vow of a Morning Song of Thanksgiving. The psalm closes, as is frequently the case with such lamentations, with the pledge of a song of thanksgiving which he will sing at Jerusalem at the morning offering (v. 16), when release has come.

PSALM 60. ISRAEL'S ULTIMATE TRIUMPH

This psalm is a liturgy of national lamentation. The lamentation is in two parts, vv. 1-4 and vv. 10-12. Between these two parts of the lament is inserted a priestly or prophetic oracle (vv. 6-9). The lamentation leads us into the atmosphere of depression caused by reversals in war. Israel has had to flee before the foe (v. 4b, mg.). God seems to have forsaken the armies of Israel (v. 10). Yet without his help the enemy cannot be defeated (v. 11). The oracle is reassuring in tone, emphasizing Jehovah's ultimate control of territory once Israel's, but now in enemies' hands (vv. 6, 7), and his final masterful domination of Israel's enemies, ending in a challenge to the Israelite forces (v. 9). This oracle probably dates originally from an earlier period than the rest of the psalms, probably from the early exilic period (see on v. 7). But this early oracle has become a part of a later liturgy which best fits the Maccabean era. The psalm thus has closest connection with Psa. 44.

1-5. Public Lamentation and Petition. The reversals are compared, through characteristic classical eschatological symbols, with an earthquake (v. 2) and the forced drinking of the wine that causes reeling (v. 3b; cf. 116¹⁶⁵ Jer. 25¹⁵). Israel has been experiencing hard days, which are viewed as evidences of the angry disapproval of God. V. 4 is an expression of grim sarcasm. The banner of Israel given by Jehovah does not lead them to victory, but, rather, into flight. Read, with mg., for v. 4b, That they may flee from before the bow, i.e., of the enemy. In v. 5 the lament rises into petition. Let Jehovah reveal his helping power to Israel his beloved.

6-9. The Divine Oracle From the Temple. This was uttered by a priest or prophet who was seized by the certainty of Jehovah's triumph and that of his people. Shechem and Succoth (cf. Gen. 33¹⁷) are in the hands of foreigners. Gilead, Manasseh and Ephraim are Israel's legitimate possession, but at the present other powers are in control (v. 7). According to Jer. 49¹, in exilic times Ammon was in control of Gilead, but the certain regaining of this region was a firm conviction of exilic and even late post-exilic prophecy (cf. Jer. 50¹⁹ Mic. 7¹⁴ Zech. 10¹⁰). These sections will be recovered, and Judah will be the center of rule of the regained and reunited kingdom (cf. Gen. 49¹⁰—very early—and from later times, Zech. 9¹³). Moreover, the ancient and the persistent enemies of Israel—Moab, Edom, and Philistia—will be under the domination of Israel (v. 8). The casting of the shoe (v. 8b) is an Oriental symbol of possession and dominion (cf. Ruth 4^{7f.}); here it is also a symbol of contempt. In v. 8b read Over Philistia will I shout (cf. 108⁹ and Syriac).

The oracle ends in a challenge to the forces of Israel. God's mastery for Israel of the mentioned region is a future certainty. Israel is summoned to initiative, beginning at the point of tensest enmity, to bring God's control into Bozrah, the Edomite capital. The bequest of God awaits the conquest by Israel. This connection of v. 9 with the preceding rather than the succeeding verses gives finish and meaning to the oracle.

10-12. Lamentation Changes to Confidence. In spite of the heartening oracle the psalmist, unable to shake off present depression, laments that God goeth not forth with Israel's armies. Unless divine help comes, human forces are unavailing. Then at length comes the psalmist's rebirth of confidence. The priestly oracle has done its work. The psalmist goes forward inspired by the potent presence of his God who will make Israel victorious.

PSALM 61. A CRY TO GOD FROM AFAR

This is an individual lamentation. The psalmist is one of the Diaspora (v. 2a). Far away from the Temple that he loves (v. 4), amid enemies that cause his spirit to flag (v. 2), he utters his lamentation (v. 1), and prays for help (v. 2), and vows songs of gratitude to God which he is certain will be performed daily in the Temple. Into this typical lamentation of an individual are inserted two verses (6, 7) that turn the lament into a petition for the king. The king meant is an actual reigning monarch, which marks the psalm as certainly pre-exilic.

1, 2. A Far-Away Cry for Help. Ready to faint, because of his enemies, the psalmist cries unto God. The burden of his cry is v. 2b, which read, following LXX and Syriac, Lift me up upon a rock and set me down. The rock is a place of security above the assaults of the enemy.

3, 4. His Confidence in God. In the past he has found refuge in God. He now craves the security and protection of God's presence in the Temple. Read v. 4, I would dwell, etc., I would take refuge, etc.

5, 8. His Certainty of Being Heard Expressed in a Vow. While still fainting, he is sure of God's response, for God grants the request of those who fear him (v. 5, reading request for heritage). He vows perpetual praise to him, which vow, not on one occasion merely but daily, will be fulfilled.

6, 7. Petition for the Reigning King. Probably to adapt it to use in the king's Temple, a later poet inserted between vv. 5 and 8, which clearly belong together, this petition for the prolonged life of the king and for his protection at the hands of God through his loving-kindness and truth, conceived here as angelic spirits.

PSALM 62. CONFIDENCE IN GOD ALONE

This is a song of trust that begins with a lamentation and ends in an exhortation in the manner of the sages. The psalmist is conscious of weakness (v. 3), possibly illness, that is heightened by the ruthless and deceitful attacks of his enemies (v. 4). But with a quietude and resignation of soul that represents one of the noblest faith attitudes in the Psalter (vv. 1, 2, 5-7) he waits confidently for the help of God. At v. 8 the psalmist passes into the mood of the Wisdom literature in which he utters counsel based upon his own individual experience. The most probable date is the middle Persian period out of which came also the book of Job.

1, 2. The Psalmist's Soul in Quietude Before God. These verses form a strong refrain which recurs in slightly varied form in vv. 5, 6. They utter a profound expression of quiet, trustful resignation toward God, his "crag," his "salvation," his "secure high retreat," but with the tension of eager expectancy at its heart. Luther suggestively translates, My soul is silence, waiting all hushed for God.

3, 4. An Indignant Lamentation Directed to His Opponents. A man (v. 3)—most likely the psalmist himself. He feels weak and ready to fall like a swaying wall, like a "fence pushed in" from without. They are plotting to thrust him from his excellency (read dignity), openly friendly but inwardly his enemies. He uses a military figure to describe their actions.

5-7. His Silent Confidence in God. Repeating the refrain with which the psalm opens, and emphasizing out of his experience what God is to him, he turns sage and speaks to his nation.

8-12. The Psalmist Assumes the Rôle of Sage. This section shows how strongly the wisdom ideas penetrated into the circle of the psalmists (cf. on 37, 49^{1f.}). Probably some of the psalms come from the circle of the sages. The author's confidence in God, based on his own experience, now strengthened by a special revelation (see below), leads him to counsel constant trust in God as opposed to trust in mere human beings, mere men, who when put on the scales with vanity—literally, "a breath," i.e., nothing substantial—are outweighed even by that! Trust in God is also opposed to trust in wealth, or in those methods by which it is often secured. This counsel he grounds in the narrative of a personal revelation from God (v. 11). In the manner of Eliphaz in Job 41^{2f.}, he reports an oracle that had come to him twice from God. Not through dependence upon men but through trust in God can men find help. He alone in the final analysis has power. Yet it is power in its more tender aspect of loving-kindness that moves the psalmist to his statement of a dogma of orthodox Judaism, the exact correspondence of lot to desert (v. 12). It was against this dogma that the author of Job contended with keen insight into its limitations.

PSALM 63. THE THIRST OF THE SOUL FOR GOD

This is a song of trust. The psalmist is one of the circle of deeply religious men in Israel, to whom the Temple and its worship were but symbols and helps to a deep, spiritual worship (v. 2). He is passionately eager for fellowship with God (v. 1), the need for it intensified by the peril of death in which he stands because of pursuing enemies (vv. 9, 10). The psalm is really a confession of deep spiritual trust. In depth of religious insight it compares well with 367-9 73²⁵ and 94^{16f.}. The verse concerning the king (v. 11ab), which is a later addition, proves the pre-exilic origin of the psalm.

1-3. The Psalmist's Longing for Fellowship With God. Like 42¹, he uses the figure of physical thirst in a desert region to interpret his craving for God (cf. 143⁶). Coming with such craving to the sanctuary, through sacrifice, prayer, and meditation he looked upon, i.e., became conscious of God. To experience the kindness of God meant more to him than life itself.

4-8. The General Utterance of His Trust. His present soul-satisfying experience of God inspires him to sing perpetual songs of praise throughout his life. In the wakeful hours of the night God will be the theme of his meditation. In v. 7b for will I rejoice, read I shall dwell; v. 8a may be rendered, literally, My soul hath clung close to thee.

9-11. The Destruction of His Enemies. Here for the first time we see the fact that intensifies the psalmist's sense of need for God. He has enemies who are seeking his life. These will be destroyed by death (v. 9b); Sheol, the sword and dishonorable treatment of their dead bodies (exposed without burial to wild animals) will be their lot. In v. 11 read May the king rejoice, etc. This prayer for the king is a later addition (see on 61⁶, 7), intended to adapt the psalm to use in the king's Temple at Jerusalem (Gunkel).

PSALM 64. THE ULTIMATE DEFEAT OF EVIL

The psalmist, overwhelmed by fear of the enemies that are evidently very numerous (v. 2b, mg.), laments unto God and prays for his protection. He describes graphically the activities (vv. 3, 4), and imaginatively the words, of their scheming councils. But the psalmist confidently awaits their destruction at the hand of God, with its consequent effect upon the world. The psalm is similar to 5 and 10. The enemies are forces within Judaism. We cannot overestimate the influence in Judaism's dark hours of such faith in the ultimate defeat of evil and the sure triumph of righteousness as breathes in this psalm. It comes from the late Judaism when party strife was tense.

1, 2. Lamentation and Petition. Dread of the enemies that are about him in a "throng" (so v. 2b, mg.), plotting against him in secret, portrays the situation of the psalmist.

3-6. The Activities of his Enemies Described. Here, as in many similar instances, the chief point at which the enmity is felt is in defaming, slandering speech, which is graphically compared to sharp swords and poisoned arrows (v. 3; cf. 57⁵ Prov. 26^{18f.}) shot unexpectedly from ambush. Vv. 5, 6 picture the enemies concocting their plots, and the psalmist imaginatively represents their speech. The text of v. 6 is corrupt. Read v. 5c, with Syriac and Vulgate, Who shall see us? and, with Gunkel, v. 6a, And search out our secrets; the deception has succeeded; literally, "the device (is) well thought out." V. 6b should be interpreted as the psalmist's meditative reaction to such plotting on the part of his enemies. Read, following suggestions from Jer. 17⁹, where his reaction to his enemies is likewise the thought, Yea the bosom [i.e., of man] is incurable and the heart is deceitful.

7, 8. God's Victory Over the Enemies. Note the suggestive way in which the psalmist portrays their fate in terms of their activities. Their dealing returns upon them (cf. Obad. v. 15b). They had aimed arrows at him, God will shoot arrows at them. They had taken him unawares, God will treat them similarly. They had laid traps for his feet, God will cause them to stumble. Read v. 8a, He [God] shall cause them to stumble against their own tongue (cf. mg.). Their destruction shall be so terrible as to cause all who see it to "flee" in terror (cf. mg.).

9, 10. The Effect of the Defeat of the Evil Upon the World. In awe all men will recognize the retributive power of God. The righteous shall trust him all the more and shall triumph.

PSALM 65. A PSALM OF NATIONAL THANKSGIVING

A psalm of rare poetic and imaginative power. The author may have found his inspiration in a thanksgiving festival, probably after the relief from dearth. This festival itself may have been held in fulfillment of a vow, probably made at some such occasion as that described in Joel 2^{15f.} There is a distinct division discernible at v. 9; but Kittel rightly accepts the psalm as a unity, against Gunkel, who views it as originally two separate psalms. The psalmist's touches of universalism in vv. 2, 5, 8 and the implicit universalism of vv. 9-13 suggest a date after Deutero-Isaiah, probably in the early post-exilic period.

1-4. The Fulfillment of a Vow. The lines of the text need rearrangement, as Gunkel has seen. Read v. 1a, To Thee praise is fitting, O God in Zion. V. 2a, O thou who hearest prayer, connects in thought and meter with v. 1. For vv. 2b, 3, read Unto thee all flesh brings matters of iniquity (i.e., what has to do with humanity's sense of sin; cf. mg.). "Our transgressions have become too strong for us. Thou wilt propitiate them."

The thanksgiving festival for which the psalm was composed is itself the fulfillment of a vow (v. 1b), made in dark hours, perhaps of famine and failure of crops, a condition viewed as the result of sin (v. 3a). The forgiveness of God, suggested through the release from famine, is here not merely his gracious gift to Israel but evidently (see vv. 5b, 8) benefits all flesh, which, when compared with Gen. 6¹², means humanity as a whole. While only Israelites, the chosen people, can partake of the blessings of the Temple (cf. Psa. 15 and 24), all humanity may share in the grace of God. Kittel recalls in this connection the similar broad outlook toward the Gentiles in Mal. 1¹¹ (notes), that prayers, rites, etc., brought to the worship of other gods, if sincere, in the final analysis belong to Jehovah, the one true God, and are accepted by him.

5-8. Israel's God a God of Creative Power. These verses portray God in his grandeur, a God of marvelous acts that root in his righteous nature. This God, who has revealed himself as governor of Israel's history (v. 5a) and as lord of nature, master of mountain and sea, is also lord of humanity (v. 7b), his dominion reaching to all the ends of the earth and the far-away isles (so read v. 5d). Sunrise and sunset are the limits of his beneficent and happiness-creating control (v. 8). It is clear that this psalmist has grasped Deutero-Isaiah's conception of a universal God.

9-13. The Year Arrayed in Its Glory. Relief from the dearth of rain has come and with it evidence of the return of God's favor. The "heavenly stream," which is viewed as the source of rain, the river of God, has poured its waters upon the earth. God is the great Gardener (v. 10), "pressing down" (cf. mg.) the ridges, "smoothing out" the furrows with rain. The climax of the year is the period when the soil is producing. The psalmist pictures this as the year's beautiful "crown," placed upon it by God (v. 11a; cf. 103⁴). Wherever God, the great Gardener, walks across the garden of the earth there springs up fruitfulness.

The psalm ends with a beautiful poetic picture in which hills, pastures and valleys are personified:

"The hills gird themselves with rejoicing.
The pastures are clothed with green grass,
The valleys envelop themselves with corn.
Thus arrayed in festive garb they too utter their praise.
They shout for joy!
They sing!"

Kittel rightly exclaims in the presence of such marvelous imaginative pictures: "What a poet! What a Folksoul."

PSALM 66. THE PAYMENT OF A VOW

This psalm has two distinct parts, vv. 1-12 being a national song of thanksgiving, and vv. 13-20 a narrative of the payment of the vow of an individual. Because of this many have found here two separate psalms. Rightly conceived, however, vv. 1-12 are really preliminary to the main part of the psalm, vv. 13-20. The psalmist conceives what God has done for Israel as a nation and through Israel for humanity as a whole as giving a background of strength and color to his own experience of the divine grace. The clear detail of how the psalmist pays his vow (vv. 13-16) is instructive in high degree. The psalm stands clearly under the influence of Deutero-Isaiah. Vv. 1, 4, 5, 8 and the mingling of two divergent types of psalm material also point to a post-exilic date. Such a psalm reveals how the sense of history buttressed the religion of the individual in Israel.

1-4. The Earth Is Summoned to Praise Jehovah. The awesome deeds of God (v. 3) in Israel's history lead the nations of the world to come cringing unto him. This suggests the world-wide significance of Israel's history. The whole earth (v. 1) is accordingly invited to praise him (cf. Isa. 21-4 Zech. 8^{20f.}). The universalism of Deutero-Isaiah is here apparent, although on a somewhat lower plane.

5-7. God's Hand in Israel's History. What God does concerns all mankind (v. 5b), so the nations are summoned to recall what God has done for Israel at the Exodus, where in unique degree his hand was revealed (v. 6). For v. 6c read, with mg., There let us rejoice in him—i.e., the revelation of God's hand in Israel's ancient past is a basis for present joy; here is suggested the solidarity of Israel throughout the centuries, and implicitly, the solidarity of humanity. V. 7 presents a graphic picture of Israel's God in perpetual watch of the nations. With his eyes upon them, they dare not attack Israel.

8-12. A Renewed Summons to the Nations. Because God has been so wonderful to Israel, even the nations are to praise him. The pronouns of the first person plural (vv. 9f.) all refer to Israel. Israel has been tested by grave peril (v. 9), by trial (v. 10), by defeat and by extreme danger (v. 12ab), but God has brought the nation into "a place of liberty" (v. 12c; so read instead of wealthy).

13-20. The Payment of the Vow of an Individual. Welch shows how individual vows made in sickness or in seasons of great joy were paid at the sanctuary, frequently at one of the great festivals. In the presence of all the people, the community participating in the rite, the worshiper paid his vow, explaining through ritual words the meaning of his sacrifice (vv. 13, 14, 16). It may be that, as was the case in Babylonia and Egypt, such liturgies for the use of private individuals were retained by the priesthood and were handed out for the use of worshipers (see Welch's instructive discussion in The Psalter, pp. 67-80). Such occasions give rise to public testimony in Temple worship. Here the worshiper is evidently a prominent man, probably the leader of the congregation. Read v. 17b, with Syriac, And I exalted him with my tongue. Read v. 18, with mg.,

"If I had regarded iniquity in my heart,
The Lord would not have heard."

He was conscious of no sin when the vow was made. The psalm ends with a passionate ascription of praise.

PSALM 67. A HARVEST SONG OF THANKSGIVING

This is a national psalm of thanksgiving for the harvest. It was probably rendered by the Levitical choir at the feast of booths or Pentecost. The psalmist is imbued with the thought of Israel's mission as a light unto the nations (cf. Isa. 42⁶ 45²²). It probably comes from a time after Deutero-Isaiah, in the early post-exilic period. Through the temporal blessings the psalmist views the eternal goodness of God to Israel and to the world.

1-3. A Prayer for Blessing Upon Israel for the Sake of the World. Part of the famous priestly blessing of the sons of Aaron is quoted with change to first person (v. 1; cf. Num. 6^{24f.}). The significant purpose of this petition is that through the blessing of Israel the nations shall be led to a knowledge of Jehovah. This leads to a summons to the nations, in the style of an hymnic introduction, to praise God

(v. 3), which summons forms a vigorous and effective refrain.

4, 5. The Nation's Hymn of Praise. The subject of their hymn is the uprightness of God's government of the world. The refrain recurs in v. 5.

6, 7. Thanksgiving for the Harvest. In v. 6 we learn the special theme of the psalm—gratitude for the harvest. But this is viewed as but a material symbol of the goodness of God. V. 7 is a prayer. May the nations far and near, through observing God's material blessings to Israel, be led to worship him. Gunkel here restores the refrain, which would give finish and symmetry to the psalm.

PSALM 68. ISRAEL'S TRIUMPHAL ODE

Here is an ode of great literary and poetic power, preserved in a text very imperfect in detail, yet as a whole reasonably clear. It is a mistake to see any single triumph as its background. Rather is it a review of God's victories across the centuries with a consequent hope of his ultimate and complete triumph. With remarkable restraint the psalmist keeps this psalm vibrant with the atmosphere of the early national triumphs, leaving it to make its own impression, and to awaken, as it may, hope for the future. The psalmist is steeped in the ancient traditions and heroic literature of his race (e.g., Judg. 5, Deut. 33); likewise is he familiar with Deuteronomy and the late prophetic teaching (especially Second and Third Isaiah), by which he is deeply influenced. Peters (The Psalms as Liturgies), ignoring this, and interpreting the psalm as hinting at ideas later developed by Deuteronomy and the prophets, places it in the time of Jeroboam II, the middle of the eighth century. But we are safer, in the light of the eschatological features of the psalm and the reference to Egypt (cf. v. 31; Egypt maintained its independence against Persia 408–343 B.C.), to date it from the fourth century B.C.

1, 2. An Adaptation of the Ancient Ark Ritual. The psalmist, in his prayer for the help of God against Israel's foes, makes use of the ancient ritual of the ark found in Num. 10³⁵. The presence of the ark with Israel's forces meant the presence of God. So may he ever appear, bringing, wherever needed, destruction to the wicked, i.e., to the enemy.

3, 4. The Righteous Prepare for His Coming. The enemies that melt and perish before him form a foil for the righteous who, in a hymnic introduction, are invited to exult at his coming and prepare the way for him. There is reference here to Isa. 40³ 57¹⁴ 62¹⁰. Yah is the primitive form of God's personal name, which ordinarily has the form "Jehovah."

5, 6. The Pledge of Deliverance. This is the hymn introduced by vv. 3, 4. It celebrates Israel's deliverance from the bondage of Egypt. The rebellious were then the Amalekites and Edomites. The language is based upon Deuteronomy (cf. Deut. 10¹⁸⁻²²), and the atmosphere of the triumph of the Exodus is here implicit for the Israel of the psalmist's day and for the future.

7, 8. The Wilderness Journey. The psalmist adapts to his use the verses of the song of Deborah that deal with the theophany in which Jehovah comes from his ancient habitation to defeat the Canaanites (Judg. 5⁴ 5). The experience of history becomes a basis for permanent hope.

9, 10. God's Marvelous Provision for His People. The sacrifice that celebrates in worship Jehovah's triumph and which includes the feasting of the people in a way dramatizes the appearance of God and his provision of manna and quails in the desert. Peters (The Psalms as Liturgies) reads v. 9,

"With a rain of freewill offerings
Thou besprinklest thy heritage."

11–14. The Songs of Victory. At the Exodus (Ex. 15²¹) and at the triumphs of David (1 Sam. 18⁷) the women proclaimed the triumph in songs. So here we have the first lines (so Peters) of several triumph songs, which are sung by the women (v. 11b). Their theme is the triumph of God. V. 12 is a song celebrating the triumph of Barak over Sisera; v. 12b refers to Sisera's mother awaiting her son's return, laden with spoil (cf. Judg. 5³⁰); v. 13a is a taunt song against Reuben (Judg. 5¹⁶); v. 13bc is probably, as Ewald thinks, a fragment of an old song from "the Book of the Wars of Jehovah"; v. 14a is a fragment of a song of victory from the days of the conquest of Canaan; v. 14b refers to a region near Shechem (Judg. 9⁴⁸).

15, 16. Praise of Zion. The psalmist is sensitive to beauty. Great as is the "mountain of summits," the mountain of Bashan (probably also a reference to an ancient song; so Ewald), God's mountain, Zion, puts the beauty of Bashan to shame. This is one of the songs of Zion, which the exiles found difficult to sing "in a strange land" (cf. 137³).

17, 18. The Entrance of Jehovah into Zion. Israel is now at rest in Palestine. The conquest is past. V. 17 is an adaptation of the ancient ritual used as the ark was brought back from battle (cf. Num. 10³⁶). Now the forces of God are the thousands of his own people settled in Palestine. Jerusalem, the capital, and the place of Jehovah's abode, the new Sinai (read mg.), is supreme even after the Babylonian Exile (v. 18), and is the receiver of the tribute of the nations (cf. 76¹¹).

19-23. A Hymn Celebrating Jehovah in Salvation and Judgment. He is here celebrated as a burden-bearing and delivering God. He will deliver Israel from the fiery furnace (following a reading suggested by Lagarde) and from the depths of the sea—i.e., from fire and water—symbols of grave peril. But upon the enemies Israel may wreak its vengeance (v. 23).

24-27. The Festal Procession. These verses graphically portray the celebration of the triumph of the heavenly king in terms of that of a victorious monarch (v. 24). In the procession the Levitical singers are in the lead, followed by the maidens playing timbrels, and, bringing up the rear, the players of stringed instruments (v. 25). All are singing the praise song to God, the Lord, the fountain source of Israel. The procession celebrates no single triumph of Israel; the psalmist has in his imagination Israel's victories through the centuries. The little fighting clan of Benjamin (cf. Judg. 5¹⁴, the fighting cry, "After thee, Benjamin"), which furnished the first king of Israel, is mentioned side by side with Judah of early promise and of later prowess (cf. Gen. 49^{8f.}), along with the two heroic tribes, which in the song of Deborah are given place of honor, Zebulun and Naphthali. All march in the same triumphal procession. The psalmist thus looks across the centuries and pictures in his chambers of imagery a victorious procession.

28-31. The Ultimate Triumph of God. The imagination of the psalmist leaps from the contemplation of the past to the contemplation of the time of the end. The God who has thus been in Israel's history is now summoned to assert again his power. Read for vv. 28, 29a,

"Command, O God, thy strength,
That strength thou didst exercise for us
From thy Temple at Jerusalem."

He gazed into the final era when the kings of the nations shall worship Jehovah (cf. Isa. 49⁷). The enemies—the chief evidently being Egypt, wild beast of the reeds—portrayed here in apocalyptic fashion as animals (cf. Dan. 7¹⁻⁷, notes), will be destroyed (v. 30) and the once-enemy nations like Ethiopia will come to Jerusalem to worship (v. 31; cf. Isa. 19¹⁹⁻²⁵ Zech. 8²².)

32-35. The Kingdoms are Summoned to Praise. In anticipation of the ultimate triumph of Israel's God the nations are summoned even now to praise him (v. 32), in a majestic hymn of praise (vv. 33^{f.}), which is reminiscent of the ancient poem in Deut. 33.

Here again is implied a sense of a world-wide mediating task for Israel.

PSALM 69. UNMERITED SUFFERING FOR LOYALTY TO CONVICTIONS

The psalmist, a leader of the loyal, is near death's door (vv. 4b, 15c), which situation is made the more disturbing because it is to him direct evidence of God's disfavor (v. 26). Moreover, added to this is the overwhelming sense of disgrace in which he stands in the community (vv. 11, 12), and which shows itself in scornful and outspoken enmity (v. 4). But his zeal for God and the Temple remains constant and sincere. He prays for deliverance for himself and for judgment upon his enemies (vv. 14, 22^{f.}). Upon the evident reversal of his fortunes he utters a song of thanksgiving (vv. 30-32) and a hymn of praise (vv. 33, 34). The most probable period out of which the psalm came is the fifth century B.C.

1-4. The Psalmist's Lamentation. The psalmist is in deep distress, struggling, as it were, in waters beyond his depth, discouraged beyond expression with unanswered prayers, and enduring insult at the hands of enemies, numerous and powerful.

5, 6. He Acknowledges His Sin. He is keenly conscious of the influence of his example upon the loyal, who evidently look up to him as a leader. If he is not restored, the loyal will fall away into dishonor.

7-12. The Lamentation Renewed and Detailed. His disgrace in the public eye is really due to his loyalty to God (v. 7), consumed as he has been with a passion for the Temple and its worship (v. 9a). He has identified himself with God's cause. His out-and-out loyalty has made the brunt of the community's enmity against God fall upon him (v. 9b). His loyalty to the rites of his religion has awakened scornful gossip (v. 12) and made him the sport of the community (v. 11).

13-20a. His Prayer. In keen distress of body (v. 17) and soul (vv. 19, 20a) he prays for deliverance from death—for the mouth of the grave seems wide open toward him—but also for deliverance from his enemies (vv. 14b, 18), and for vindication before them (v. 19).

20bc, 21. His Treatment. He had a right to expect pity but found in its stead only abuse and merciless treatment (cf. Mt. 27³⁴, 48).

22-29. A Passionate Prayer for God's Retribution. These bitter words must be viewed in the illuminating light of v. 9b. His enemies were God's enemies, deserving of the divine destruction. Make their lives and their homes desolate! (Vv. 22-28.) For, not satisfied with the punishment from God which the psalmist is viewed as already suffering through his sickness, they add to this their persecution (v. 26). So let God add charge to charge against them (v. 27). Let their names be blotted out of the divine book (cf. Ex. 32³² Isa. 43 Dan. 12¹), i.e., let them die (v. 28). But let the psalmist be saved and restored (v. 29). Cf. also the Babylonian tablets of fate, the tablets of good and the tablets of evil, kept by Nabu, the scribe of the gods. The conception here found is the Hebrew counterpart of the Babylonian idea (cf. 87⁶ 139¹⁶).

30-32. His Song of Thanksgiving. Between the situations of vv. 29 and 30, his prayer has been answered. With a song in his heart, aware that the faith of the loyal has been steadied by his release (v. 32), he praises God. Not with sacrifice, but with song he worships, believing the latter more acceptable. This union of zeal for the Temple (v. 9) with the practical rejection of the sacrificial system is remarkable and links the psalm to the great prophetic utterances of the Psalter (cf. 40⁶ 50^{8f.} 51^{16f.}).

33, 34. His Hymn of Praise. The song of thanksgiving issues in a hymn where all creation is summoned to praise the God who answers prayer.

35, 36. A Liturgical Adaptation. In the form that reminds us of Isa. 44²⁶⁻²⁸ and 65⁹ we have here, as Kittel rightly sees, a liturgical addition. These verses lack the intense individualistic passion of the rest of the psalm.

PSALM 70. A PRAYER FOR DELIVERANCE AND JUDGMENT

This psalm = 40¹³⁻¹⁷, where see notes.

PSALM 71. ABANDON ME NOT IN OLD AGE

The psalmist is an elderly man (v. 9). From his birth he has been undergirded by God (v. 6), and from childhood has been under his instruction (v. 17). Now, old and weak, he is surrounded by adversaries who desire to do away with him (vv. 11, 20). In the confidence induced by a lifetime of experience he waits for God's deliverance. He is conscious of the gift of inspired utterance (v. 15) and his desire to live (v. 20) is only that all day long he may teach the younger generation (v. 18) the nature of God (v. 24). We feel ourselves to be amid the party strife of the Persian period, probably in the fifth century B.C. The psalm is not a community psalm but is the lamentation of an individual, as the corrected text of v. 20 reveals.

1-8. Confidence in God With Petition for Deliverance. Vv. 1-3 = 31^{1-3a}, where see notes. In v. 3a read rock of safety. The words whereunto I may continually resort = "to save me" in 31². This psalm suggests the habit of communion. His enemies are both unrighteous and ruthless. The psalmist, now an old man (v. 18), looks back (vv. 5b, 6) to the day of birth. Translate:

"By thee have I been supported (or braced) from birth.

From the womb of my mother thou didst draw me forth."

From that moment until the present God has "braced" him. Wonder—better, object of horror—as he is to some (v. 7), God is his refuge. This section comes to its climax in a song that is a burst of gratitude (v. 8). Translate All the day with thy beauty.

9-13. Lamentation and Petition. Here he reveals his condition. In failing strength due to his age (v. 9), surrounded by plotters against him (v. 10), who, because of his condition, consider him abandoned by God (v. 11), he prays for God not to "fling him off" now (vv. 9, 12). He prays for reversal of fortune upon his enemies (v. 13). Let them be humiliated.

14-16. A Burst of Praise. Still in his dire distress he waits for the relief of God in the spirit of praise. He recalls the mighty deeds of God in his life.

17-21. A Song of Thanksgiving. The psalmist claims inspiration for the teaching which he has hitherto done, probably in similar songs (v. 17b). He has been taught of God since childhood (v. 17a). Now, old and gray, he prays for God's presence in strength to be with him until he has taught the next generation (so with Syriac, "the coming generation," v. 18). He is impressed with the righteousness of God (v. 19) which has followed him throughout his life. He is confident of restoration to health from the very gates of death (vv. 20, 21). Read me for us, with mg., in v. 20 (so Duhm, Cheyne, Gunkel, following the versions).

22-24. His Vow. When help comes he will sing God's praises and speak untringly of his dealings. Then his enemies will be the humiliated party, and he will stand vindicated before them.

PSALM 72. A PRAYER FOR THE KING'S RIGHTEOUS AND PROSPEROUS REIGN

The psalmist, who is probably himself one of the poor in the nation (note the repeated references to the poor), prays that as a guiding principle God's justice may be granted the young (v. 1b) king. He wishes and confidently expects for him world-wide sovereignty (v. 8f.), national prosperity (v. 16) and perpetual fame (v. 17). The psalm portrays an ideal monarch and an ideal rule. It dates from the time of the Israelitish kings, and is pre-exilic. Kittel inclines to associate it with Josiah.

1-4. Prayer and Wishes for a Reign of Righteousness and Peace. The psalmist prays that the young king, the rightful heir, probably just beginning his reign, may be imbued with God's spirit of justice. A similar prayer addressed to Ashur is found in Assyrian literature. The future tenses of the verbs throughout the psalm should be changed to jussives (so mg.), expressing the wishes of the psalmist. The poor of the people (vv. 2, 4) are of special concern to him. The productivity of hillside and mountains is the natural accompaniment of a righteous reign.

5-7. His Enduring Reign. As is the case with Assyrian and Egyptian monarchs, a long reign is hoped for, in which the outstanding mark will be peaceful, gentle productivity.

8-11. The Extent of his Dominion. The psalmist wishes for him world-wide dominion (cf. 28 1843f.), extending from the Euphrates unto the extremities of the earth (v. 8). Desert tribes (v. 9), far-off kings from Spain, from islands in the Mediterranean, from South Arabia, from (probably) the coastlands of the Arabian sea (v. 10), commercial people of wealth and power will bring him tribute and pay him homage (v. 11).

12-14. The Reward of His Righteousness. Such sovereignty is granted him as a reward earned by his righteous rule, which recognizes the rights of the poor who otherwise would have no one to maintain their cause. In his sight even oppressed and powerless folk are of precious value. The verbs here are indicatives, not jussives.

15. The Reward From the Hearts of the Poor. Here is a sensitive and beautiful touch. These poor can do nothing of material significance for the king—this he does not need from them—yet may they continually pray for him! Probably the psalmist himself is of this class. V. 15a is a gloss which breaks the connection of vv. 14 and 15b. Similar attitudes of prayer for the king are found in Babylonian, Assyrian, and Egyptian literature.

16, 17. Resultant Rich Harvests and Enduring Fame. Read v. 16, following Gunkel:

"May there be plenty of corn in the earth,
On the top of the mountain may it wave,
Like Lebanon may its fruit flourish
And its sheaves as the herbage of the field."

May his reputation never fade!

18, 19. The Doxology. This closes the second book of the Psalter (cf. on 41¹³).

20. This verse is the subscription of a collection of "Prayers of David," which ended with Ps. 72.

PSALMS LXXIII-CL

BY PROFESSOR W. A. SHELTON

General Introduction. For the general introduction to the Psalter, see pp. 509f. The third book of Psalms (73-89) contains seventeen psalms: The first eleven are psalms of Asaph, while 84, 87, 88, and 95 are assigned to the Sons of Korah, 86 to David, 89 to Ethan, and 88 is assigned also to Heman. Asaph is said to have been one of the chief musicians of David, of whom there were three: Asaph, Heman and Ethan (cf. 1 Chr. 15¹⁶, 17 165, etc.). It is not to be thought that all of the psalms assigned to Asaph were written by him. Indeed, it is not necessary to hold that he wrote any of them. He was, rather, the one who organized and conducted choirs and orchestras and perhaps edited collections of hymns. He may have written some of them, set others to music, and merely readapted others. Some may have been dedicated to him and some composed by his guild. But his psalms are a type. They are distinguished by a prophetic note. God is a judge. He is presented as announcing a judgment in his own voice, as in Ps. 75 and others. The interpretation of the past for the purpose of teaching the proper conduct for the future is common in this collection. The oft-repeated figure of God as a Shepherd of his flock, and the use of Jacob and Joseph are characteristics of the Asaph psalms.

PSALM 73. THE SUFFERING OF THE RIGHTEOUS; THE PROSPERITY OF THE WICKED

The theme of this psalm is one that men can never escape (cf. Ps. 37, 49). It is the problem of Job. Why do the righteous suffer and the wicked remain prosperous? The psalm is divided into two parts: (1) The psalmist confesses his temptation and relates how nearly his faith has failed him (vv. 1-14). (2) He relates how he has come to see the error of his way and has come out victorious (vv. 15-28).

1. The Psalmist's Triumph. Surely, in spite of all that has been suffered, God is good, and only good, to Israel. To such as are pure in heart—a clean heart is the “open sesame” to the goodness of God.

2-9. The Psalmist's Danger. Here is the same situation in which Job found himself and, indeed, in which many saints have found themselves in every age. V. 2 states that the psalmist came near to apostasy; vv. 3-9 give the cause of his danger—the unbroken prosperity of the wicked. There are no bands in their death—the wicked seem to die well. They do not suffer as the saints suffer, even when facing the “last enemy.” Their strength is firm—calmly they go to death. Pride is as a chain about their neck—pride adorns them as a necklace and violence clothes them as a garment (cf. Job 29:14). Their eyes stand out with fatness—out of the grossness of their hearts comes their wickedness. Against the heavens (v. 9, mg.)—they would even speak against God. Their tongue walketh through the earth—they speak arrogantly.

10-12. The Evil Influence of the Prosperous Wicked. V. 10 probably means that the prosperous wicked gather many to their banners. The rich have many “hangers on.” How doth God know?—this is said by those deluded by the wicked. These are the wicked—i.e., the men the psalmist has just been describing. Because they are always at ease, they prosper. Nothing interferes with their prosperity (cf. Job 21:13).

13, 14. The Psalmist's Temptation. The psalmist says it is in vain that one lives a clean life; the other life pays better. I seek, he says, to meet the demands of righteousness, and for my pains I get only plagues and beatings, being chastened every morning.

15-17. Solution of the Psalmist's Problem. He is saying: “If I state the feelings of my heart with reference to these things, I shall be unfaithful to those whom I influence. I have no right to bring doubts to others. When I sought the solution to my problem, it was too painful to me. It was too hard to understand.” Until I went into the sanctuary of God. There is the place to solve all problems. There went young Isaiah (Isa. 61) when his king was dead or dying and his heart perplexed. Many have found the satisfying portion in times of deepest doubt in the house of the Lord. Considered their latter end. When in the midst of the services in God's house I thought with Him who sees the end from the beginning, I grasped the meaning of it all. Prosperity is but for a day and chastened character stands out brilliantly against the darkening skies of a day of reckoning. “Success,” says Victor Hugo, “is a very hideous thing and its resemblance to merit deceives men.”

18-20. The Ultimate Fate of the Wicked. When the veil is drawn aside the psalmist is astonished. Slippery places. A while ago it was the psalmist who thought he was in a slippery place. Now he sees clearly that it is the wicked even though he seem prosperous. Destruction, desolation, terrors—these are the heritage of those who prosper at the expense of right. Riches, palaces, plenty are no guarantee of happiness. These wicked are as one awaking from a dream; they find their prosperity nothing more than a mere phantasm. They only thought they were prosperous, whereas in reality they were poor and blind and wretched (cf. Job 20:4-11).

21, 22. The Psalmist's Confession. As a beast before thee. The word translated “beast” is the Hebrew word behemoth, which is translated in Job 40¹⁵ (mg.) as hippopotamus, the most stupid of all beasts. He is now down in the depths of humility.

23-26. The Saint's Permanent Fellowship with God. The psalmist contrasts his enjoyment of fellowship with God with his former outlook on life. Thou hast holden my right hand—the high God stoops to lead weak and foolish man. Thou shalt guide me with thy counsel—God will guide the one who puts his full trust in him. Afterward receive me to glory (v. 24b, cf. mg.). The question is: Does the psalmist have a conception of heaven as the N.T. writers had? Most modern scholars feel that “glory” here does not refer to the hereafter, but, rather, to that honor which stands in glad contrast over against the degradation which the writer felt when he was talking about the prosperity of the wicked. Just now he was as stupid as a behemoth, but since he has submitted himself to the leadership of God and realized his own inability, God will conduct him to high honor. However, the passage makes the impression, hard to get away from, that the eternal glory is meant.

V. 25 furnishes a grand climax. Whom have I in heaven but thee? and there is none upon earth that I desire beside thee. The psalmist begins with a wail of despair from the depths of spiritual depression; but out of it he comes, beginning with his going to the sanctuary of the Lord, and climbs to this stairway of spiritual attainment, where his confidence and faith overreach earth and sweep out into the heavens. God becomes his one great answer to all questions and the satisfaction of every desire. Heart and flesh shall fail, but God is sufficient for all of his needs.

27, 28. The Final Contrast Between the Wicked and the Righteous. The wicked whom I envied are marked for destruction, but the best thing for me is to draw near unto God.

Having achieved a spiritual triumph he has an inexhaustible theme for his songs of praise.

PSALM 74. GOD'S APPARENT INDIFFERENCE;
A PRAYER FOR VINDICATION

God seems altogether to have abandoned his people. Their Temple is destroyed, their synagogues burned, no prophet is in the land and the people have been humbled. Both here and in Psa. 79 the idea is emphasized that if God's people are humbled his own honor is also involved; he is humiliated along with them. The psalmist prays fervently for the return of God to his stricken people. He reminds him of his mercy in the past and his responsibility in the present and describes the awful havoc wrought by the enemy.

It is very difficult to fix the exact date of this psalm or the occasion which gave rise to it. Some hold with Kirkpatrick (Cambridge Bible, p. 440) that it originated in the Babylonian Exile, perhaps between 586 and 566 B.C. If this be true, then it was most surely adapted to express the feelings of later ages. The whole atmosphere and expression, however, would best be suited to the time of Antiochus Epiphanes, probably between 168 and 165 B.C.; that is, in the time between the edict of Antiochus in 168, requiring the Jews to worship the Olympian Jove, and the success of the Maccabean revolt in 165; during which period the Jews suffered the severest persecution of their whole experience (see pp. 192b, 755).

1-3. An Appeal to God. On Maschil (or Maskil) see p. 511b. Why hast thou cast us off forever?—the people cease to hope for better times; God seems permanently turned from them. Why doth thine anger smoke?—the figure is a severe one. God's anger is fierce. The smoke is the outward sign of the fire of his wrath. Moreover, it is against his sheep—the true shepherd loves his sheep. The picture is of the meek, harmless ones. God's anger appears to be beyond all reason. Thy congregation (v. 2)—i.e., the assembly of thy people or the nation itself. Purchased—brought out of Egypt and formed into a nation to be God's own heritage. Which thou hast redeemed—cf. the song of Moses (Ex. 15¹⁶, where the same word is used). The meaning is to set free by paying a ransom; it is often used for the deliverance of the children of Israel from Egyptian bondage (Ex. 66), as well as with reference to the Babylonian Exile. Thine inheritance—the peculiar people of God. Mount Zion—remember the congregation and also the Holy Mount where the congregation meets. In v. 3 for feet read, with LXX, hands; some suggest a change which would give eyes. Lift up your eyes to behold the utter ruin. But "lift up your feet" to come to look upon the ruin would not be illogical. The prayer is for God to come to the place of his ancient dwelling and behold the utter ruin of it. Perpetual—the ruin seems to be permanent. The enemy hath wrought all evil in the sanctuary. The writer is horrified at the sacrilege committed.

4-9. The Desecration of the Holy Precincts. The adversaries of God have roared. The sacred area was filled with heathen foes instead of faithful worshipers. Ensigns for signs—literally, "their signs as signs." The heathen signs and symbols now take the place of those of Jehovah. They are like woodcutters felling entire forests. Thicket of trees—the carved work of the Temple was wrought out as a forest of palm trees and open flowers (1 Kings 6²⁹); thus the ancient skilled workers constructed symbolic forests, and now these vandals are hewing them down.

In the building of the Temple there was heard not the sound of "hammer nor ax nor any tool of iron" (1 Kings 6⁷). Now the sound of hatchet and hammers was the sound of sacrilege. They have set thy sanctuary on fire (v. 7): this seems to indicate a complete destruction such as took place under Nebuchadrezzar (2 Kings 25⁹). V. 8 is a very important one, since synagogues did not originate until the Exile and probably did not come into Palestine until after the return. The first mention of them is here. The time when all of the synagogues were destroyed was after 168 B.C., by Antiochus Epiphanes. Our signs—the outward symbols of their religion. The Sabbath was no more kept, the sacrifices were not offered, there were no feasts as of old. Antiochus attempted to suppress all signs of the Jewish religion. No surer proof of religious decay can be found than the desecration of the symbols of religion, especially the Sabbath. No more any prophet—there was no prophet in the days of the Maccabees. Unhappy the people who have no holy man to lead them to God.

10, 11. Jehovah's Apparent Indifference. How long?—this expression appears often and always reflects the same state of mind; evidently, it was the conventional phrase by which the Jew poured forth his soul in times of extreme trial.

12-17. Past Manifestations of the Divine Mercy and Power. On second thought, the psalmist muses on the past goodness of God and takes courage in the wonderful acts of the great King in olden times. Salvation—literally, salvations or deliverances; many of them had been wrought for Israel by their King. Perhaps in his own good time he will visit his people again for good. Thou didst divide the sea

(v. 13; cf. mg.)—by the mighty power of Jehovah, the sea, i.e., the Red Sea, was divided at the time of the Exodus. Dragons—or “sea-monsters”; leviathan—the crocodile (Job 41¹, notes). Both terms may be used of mythical monsters which appear also in Babylonian literature and elsewhere in the O.T. If so, the author was hardly aware of the original usage; he uses the terms simply as symbols. God cuts in two the Red Sea and these other monsters, which represent Egypt and the Pharaoh and his army, who were left floating upon the waters of the sea. The Exodus is a favorite theme with the psalmists. To be meat (or food) to the people inhabiting the wilderness (v. 14b)—jackals and other animals. The bodies of the Egyptians washed up on the shores of the Red Sea were devoured by desert animals. God’s wonderful strength is shown also in his ability to bring water out of the rock, i.e., a spring, to dry up the Jordan or other perennial streams. God is the Governor of all nature and sets a bound for it. He orders days, nights, and seasons according to his will (vv. 16, 17).

18–23. An Appeal to God to Remember His Saints. In the light of past experiences the psalmist is convinced that Jehovah will look out for the darlings of his heart, his turtle-dove; that he will remember his covenant with his people and not forget the arrogant cry of the adversary.

PSALM 75. THE PRESENCE AND POWER OF JOHovah

A thanksgiving for a remarkable deliverance, probably in the recent past. The author is unknown. The time and occasion are uncertain. Some date it after the invasion of Sennacherib, king of Assyria (see 2 Kings 19), others, like Perowne, suggest the late Persian period. The psalm is lyrical, both in music and matter.

1. The Theme: Thanksgiving for a recent manifestation of the divine power. A suggested rendering for this verse is, “We give thanks unto thee, O God, we give thanks: and we call upon thy name: we recount thy wonderful acts.” Thy name is near. If this reading is retained, it means “thou art near”; the name of God means the character of God in expression.

2–5. The Divine Warning Against the Foes. I will judge—God has not abdicated his throne; in his own good time he will take his place on the judgment seat and his judgment will be in righteousness. Though the earth dissolve and pass away, there is a moral order that stands sure and steadfast. I said unto the arrogant: Is the reference to Rabshakeh, the chief captain of Sennacherib? (Cf. 2 Kings 19¹, 2.) Lift not up the horn— deal not proudly. It is the meek that “shall inherit the earth.”

6–8. Jehovah the Supreme Arbiter of Human Destiny. Lifting up—promotion. The north is the only direction not mentioned, it is thought by some because the Assyrian approached from the north. Help and exaltation cannot come from any direction; Jehovah alone can give it. Emptying the cup of judgment is a common figure. The wicked are forced to drain to the dregs the cup of their own iniquity (cf. Rev. 14^{9–11}, notes).

9, 10. A Vow of Praise. The psalmist declares his intention of ever singing the praises of Jehovah; v. 10 gives Jehovah’s answer to this vow of praise. I will cut off—Jehovah promises to destroy the wicked and to exalt the righteous. The wicked is the proud and arrogant enemy; the righteous are the psalmist and Israel which he represents.

PSALM 76. A PSALM OF VICTORY

The background of this psalm is furnished by a great historical event in which Jerusalem was delivered from some enemy, who was entirely overcome while most of his army was slaughtered. It sounds somewhat like the battle song of Deborah (Judg. 5). The occasion is probably identical with that reflected in Psa. 75.

1–3. Defeat of Israel’s Enemies. Judah . . . Israel—both kingdoms find God sufficient in battle. The psalm was certainly written after the division. Salem—the word means “peace.” Jerusalem means “city of peace.” The psalmist possibly intends to use the word peace to describe not only Jerusalem, but the condition of the people after the victory, as well. Zion—may refer to the same place as Salem. While Zion came in after times to mean the Temple mount, it was first used of the western hill, on which the original city of David was located. The weapons of war are broken and worthless before Jehovah. The psalm may refer to the defeat of Sennacherib (2 Kings 19³⁵).

4–6. Manifestation of the Divine Power. The mountains of prey—read, with mg., more than. Jehovah is more glorious than the high mountains, amid whose mysteries the daring hunter seeks his prey. The stout-hearted are spoiled, they have slept their sleep (v. 5)—defeat and death. Very poetical is the picture of death as an eternal sleep. The vivid description here is of the enemy (possibly the Assyrians) on the morning after the battle sleeping harmlessly and peacefully upon their broken arms, their hands impotent and unable to seize the weapons of war. Death has broken the strength of the mighty; the Hebrew patriot to-day walks among the slain, praising his God. Chariot and horse—how still they lie! But yesterday the horses were prancing and rearing, gnashing their teeth for the battle, ready in their fury to tread down the people of God; the chariots were rattling and thundering over the battlefield spreading dismay everywhere; but to-day they are silent and harmless.

7-9. The Irresistible Judgment of God. Who, in the face of this providence, can stand against God? He sweeps armies away with a breath. None is safe, save those who trust him. The seat of Jehovah is really in heaven, but his earthly dwelling place was in Jerusalem. He sits now as a mighty Judge and gives forth sentence upon those of earth who fight against his meek ones. The earth feared, and was still when God arose to judgment. What an awful time, when God marches forth to take his place upon the Judgment seat! The idea of the earth (v. 8b) entering into such experience is not confined to this passage. The evangelist tells that the earth expressed its sympathy when Jesus was crucified (cf. Mt. 27:45-52).

10-12. Praise of the Triumphant God. Surely, the wrath of man shall praise thee. How many times has this been demonstrated through the years! God is not the author of wrath, but when wrath is made manifest he is present, and the very works of Satan are sometimes turned into the glory of God. Vow and pay (v. 11)—let Israel now pay the vows she made to God in the time of peril. Many, when they face disaster, vow to give themselves or their time and property to God, but frequently they forget when the time of stress is over. Let everyone bring presents to him when no peril exists. Jehovah is the King of kings (v. 12).

PSALM 77. A WAIL OF SORROW WHEN FAITH IS SORELY TRIED

Both date and author are unknown. Apparently it comes from a time of great distress—possibly when Jerusalem was so seriously threatened by the Assyrians in the days of Hezekiah. The likeness to the Psalm of Habakkuk is striking (cf. Hab. 3).

1-3. I Will Cry and God Will Answer. There is something of the wail of Job in these verses. The force of the tenses in Hebrew is not quite clear. Probably v. 1 is to be regarded as an expression of confidence in spite of past disappointments (vv. 2, 3). Many seek the Lord only in the days of trouble, and it is good that we can turn to him in our calamities; but sometimes it seems as if prayers were not heard. My hand was stretched out—in prayer; should probably read my eye was poured out— in tears. Unrelieved sorrow—even the night brought no restful sleep. V. 3, describing a past experience, should probably be translated: When I would remember God, I was so disquieted that I could not; When I would complain [or muse in prayer] I was unable to do so.

4-9. Musings on the Divine Mercies in the Past. God will not let the psalmist sleep but holds his eyes open. Watching—or watchers = eyelids; guards of the eyes. Considered the days of old—“Sorrow’s crown of sorrow is remembering happier things” (Tennyson’s Locksley Hall). He remembers when he sang even in the night. Commune—to commune with your own heart is to meditate, and here also to mutter, as if the psalmist were humming some old song from the days of better fortune. In his musing he diligently sought to fathom the ways of God. Cast off forever? Is this condition permanent? Is his mercy spent? How long? Has he forgotten to be gracious? (Cf. Hab. 32, “In wrath remember mercy.”)

10-15. Jehovah’s Power and Mercy Manifested in His Dealings with Israel. What troubles the psalmist most is that God has changed (in v. 10b read mg.). He is not what he once was. God’s right hand was the hand with which he saved in the past (Ex. 15⁶). Whatever may be the situation now, in the past God has shown himself able and willing to help (vv. 11-20). The sons of Jacob and Joseph. Jacob was the father of all the patriarchs. Joseph himself directly founded no tribe but was the father of Ephraim and Manasseh, two powerful units of Israel; the meaning here is all the tribes. The reference is not only to the experiences of the Exodus but to the entire past history.

16-19. God’s Power Over Nature. A poem or a fragment of another psalm seems here blended with this one. This passage describes God revealing himself in the majesty of storm. Some see a reference to creation (cf. Psa. 29). The waters of the Mediterranean Sea have become troubled. Waves rise here and lash the shore. The storm clouds rise out of the Western sea. Sound (v. 17)—thunder; arrows—zig-zag lightning; lightnings lightened the world—sheet lightning. Thy way was in the sea—God governs the sea as well as the dry land.

20. Conclusion. Thou leddest thy people—expresses calm confidence in the final outcome of it all. As Jehovah led his people in the past so he will care now for those who put their trust in him.

PSALM 78. A PSALM OF TEACHING

A “wisdom” psalm. Its purpose is to instruct the present from the experiences of the past. It is impossible to fix a date with any degree of certainty. The Temple seems to be standing (cf. v. 69) and possibly the divided kingdom.

1-8. The Psalmist Recalls the Past as a Means of Teaching the Future. As we have received from our fathers the traditions of the past, so we must give them to our children and children's children (vv. 3, 4). This is a sacred duty, laid upon all parents according to the testimony (v. 5), the commandment, given to Israel long ago (cf. Ex. 102 1226, 27 Deut. 49, etc.). To obey these commandments is our only means of keeping faith with the fathers and preserving history for future religious education (v. 6). Thus successive generations may see how God dealt with his people. This knowledge will enable them to avoid the mistakes of the fathers and to maintain and intensify their own faith (vv. 7, 8).

9-31. Ephraim's Disobedience in Spite of the Divine Mercy. Ephraim did not trust God in battle. This was one of the disgraceful incidents in the traditions of the past. Ephraim represents Israel. The reference may be to a particular incident, or the words may be descriptive of the general cowardice or faithlessness of the people. Zaan (v. 12)—capital of the Hyksos, and near the land of Goshen, where they could see what God did for his people in the Exodus. The mighty works of God are described in detail in vv. 12-31. But the people sinned in spite of his marvelous works. Lust (v. 18)=appetite. A table in the wilderness—see on 235; God was angry but still fed them with the corn of heaven (vv. 20-24), and plenteously provided his people in the desert with food (vv. 25-28). He cared for them in spite of their apostasy. The wrath of God comes at unexpected moments; the very food which they demanded was the source of their ruin (vv. 29-31).

32-39. Superficial Repentance. They continued in sin (vv. 32, 33); but finally, in the midst of disaster they remembered him (v. 34). Rock . . . Redeemer (v. 35)—familiar terms for "Jehovah." But they worshiped him with their lips only; their hearts were far from him (vv. 36, 37). Covenant—i.e., a contract with God. In spite of the people's baseness, God, being full of compassion, often turned away from his anger; he dealt with them not according to justice, but mercy. Flesh (v. 39)=the frailty of human nature (cf. Ps. 103¹⁴).

40-56. The More God Showed His Mercy the More They Rebelled and Forsook Him. Over and over the same story of apostasy is told and retold, but ever God's mercy holds. These verses give a complete survey of events connected with the Exodus and the desert wanderings. The border of his sanctuary, to this mountain—Mount Zion, on which the Temple was built, and the promised land of Canaan.

57-64. The Divine Leadings During the Period of the Judges. Once again God does everything good for them in giving them Canaan as a home, but they rebelled and apostatized again. In their settled state they forsook him and built high places (altars for the practice of pagan rites; 2 Kings 23^{5f.}). Then God abandoned them to their enemies (vv. 60, 61). The ark, the symbol of his presence, was captured and he went out of the land with it (cf. 1 Sam. 4). Shiloh—where the ark had been located. No marriage song (v. 63)—no marriages were contracted because the young men had been taken away or killed. The priests were murdered and their widows made no lamentation. Can this be a reminiscence of the death of Hophni and Phineas and the death of the widow of Phineas on the news of her husband's death and the birth of Ichabod? (1 Sam. 412-22.)

65-72. Choice of Zion and of David. God seemed to them to be asleep (v. 65). In the time of Samuel vision was scarce. The figure of God awakening out of a sleep and suddenly realizing what was happening to his people, and then rushing out as a man stimulated by wine and smiting the army just leaving with the booty is a very vivid one. He rescued the tabernacle, but he selected for it a new location, namely, Zion in Judah, where he built his sanctuary. He also chose David his servant to be his king and the shepherd of his people (vv. 70, 71), and David, with the same skill which he had shown in feeding sheep and guiding them, guided Israel.

PSALM 79. LAMENT OVER THE DESTRUCTION OF JERUSALEM AND PRAYER FOR HELP

This psalm because of its theme naturally follows Ps. 78. It is a brief but magnificent plea for God's help marked by deep pathos and earnestness. The hopes of the long years have been suddenly shattered and the psalmist saturates his prayer with the deep welling up of protest and pleading with God to make good his promise and not to remember too vividly the people's misdoings. The background is similar to that of Ps. 74 (see introductory paragraph there with reference to possible date).

1-4. Sufferings Endured by the Psalmist and His People. The land has been invaded; Jerusalem is in ruins; the Temple is desecrated. The conditions may be those of the days of Antiochus Epiphanes. Heathen=nations (mg.). Inheritance=Palestine or the Holy City. The happenings are recent. The dead are still unburied; blood has been shed like water. This happened many times, but in the most horrible manner about 168 B.C. (see intro. to Ps. 74).

5-8. Prayer for Help. How long?—an oft-repeated phrase (cf. 74¹⁰, note). How long will God wait to relieve and avenge his people? Forever—seems out of place with “how long,” but it is an idiomatic expression often used this way. Pour out thy wrath—the ethics of v. 6 may not be as high as N.T. ethics; but the prayer is quite in harmony with many O.T. expressions. It is inspired not by a spirit of personal vengeance but of outraged piety. The heathen nations had utterly despised them and violated all they held sacred; thus they had proved themselves not only Israel’s enemies but also the foes of Jehovah. Jacob (v. 7)—for Judah is unusual. V. 8 contains the right kind of prayer; the psalmist confesses past sins but prays that God may not hold them against him. Prevent—old English for “go before,” or precede.

9-12. Prayer for Deliverance, to Protect the Honor of Jehovah. The glory of thy name. If the people’s sufferings will not move God, he should interfere to protect his own reputation. Where is thy God? The helplessness of his people justifies the suspicion that God has lost interest in them (v. 10; cf. 42³). Let him now show himself in vengeance. The sighing of the prisoner—those appointed to die; they appear to be condemned to death. A vivid picture of the condition of the psalmist and his countrymen. Surely they need help. V. 12 is similar to v. 6. The people conceive of the reproach of Israel as reproach heaped upon God himself; hence their plea—they have reproached thee.

13. Vow of Thanksgiving. If God will do these things for the sheep of his pasture, i.e., Israel, they will pledge him the sacrifice of thanksgiving.

PSALM 80. PRAYER FOR DELIVERANCE FROM CALAMITY

This psalm is of the same strain as Ps. 79; it is a plea for God to return once more unto his people and restore them to the favor that was once theirs. It may have had its origin in the Exile as a prayer for complete national restoration.

1-3. Prayer to the Shepherd of Israel. The term shepherd is a tender and appealing one. Joseph=Israel; recalling the experiences of the desert wanderings. Cherubim—the figure on either end of the ark of the covenant, between which was the mercy seat over which God was wont to appear (see on Gen. 32⁴). Ephraim and Manasseh were the sons of Joseph;

Benjamin was his younger brother; Rachel was the mother of both; sometimes Rachel appears as the mother of northern Israel. Us—a national prayer. National repentance deserves national restoration. Cause thy face to shine=restore thy favor (cf. Num. 62⁵).

4-7. How Long Will Israel Continue to be the Object of God’s Displeasure? How long wilt thou be angry?—literally, “How long wilt thou be fuming?” Against the prayer—the divine anger is so intense that even prayer is futile. The bitter punishment has given occasion for the scorn of their enemies (vv. 5, 6). Vv. 3, 7, 19 are refrains, praying for restoration.

8-13. God’s Former Care and the People’s Present Plight. The metaphor of a vine describes the nation brought out of Egypt and established in Palestine. Jehovah carefully prepared the soil and caused it to take deep root. It was a mighty vine and became in its spreading boughs like goodly cedars (v. 10). This vine spread from the sea=the Mediterranean Sea, to the River=the Euphrates (cf. 72⁸). But now God has broken down the hedges which protected it so that it is a prey to all that pass by (v. 12). The wild boar and other beasts of the woods devour it. This often happens in the vicinity of Mount Hermon (Tristram, Natural History of the Bible, p. 56; cf. Isa. 51-7).

14-19. Prayer for the Restoration of the Divine Favor. He who planted the vine should not go away to heaven and forget what he has done; he should at least look down from that high place and see what is happening to his vine and his vineyard. Fire (v. 16)—all this burning is due to God’s anger; though Israel is Jehovah’s son (v. 17). The restoration prayed for will furnish a new basis of praise and allegiance (vv. 18, 19).

PSALM 81. GOD’S DESIRE FOR ISRAEL SET AT NAUGHT

Some commentators hold that Ps. 81 consists of two originally independent psalms (vv. 1-5b and 5c-16). The first is interpreted as a festival summons, the second as a threat of punishment for disobedience. It is preferable, however, to accept the psalm as a unit, picturing God’s goodness and Israel’s waywardness. The date is uncertain; the Temple appears to be standing; some have dated it in the days of Josiah; others, however, place it after the Exile.

1-5b. Summons to Celebrate a Festival. Some think that v. 1 is addressed to the entire congregation; v. 2 to the Levites as the leaders of the Temple music; and v. 3 to the priests whose duty it was to blow the trumpets. V. 2 mentions the instruments with which the service was carried on: Timbrel—a tambourine or hand drum; harp . . . psallery—both stringed instruments; trumpet—Hebrew, shophar, the horn as distinguished from the metal trumpet. New moon—according to the Talmud the reference is to the new moon of the month Tisri; if so, the second part of the verse refers to the Feast of Tabernacles, which began on the full moon of the same month. This festival had been divinely appointed.

5c-10. Jehovah and Israel. I heard a language that I knew not. A difficult expression. Probably a new beginning should be made with these words. If so, Jehovah would be the speaker; and the reference would be to his hearing the voice of the Egyptians lording it over Israel. He then delivered the slaves from servitude (vv. 6, 7). Secret place of thunder—render I answered thee veiled in the thunder cloud—referring to thunder on Sinai. Waters of Meribah. Meribah means strife; the experiences at Meribah may have been commemorated by the pouring out of water at the Feast of Tabernacles, to remind the people of that long strife between a long-suffering God and an obstinate people (Ex. 177). Vv. 8-10 emphasize the sole deity of Jehovah and urge the people to put their full trust in him who delivered them from Egypt. Why do they starve now? Open thy mouth—God was good to Israel; they owed him their very existence, and he was always ready to supply their needs; he did so in the past; he is willing to do it now; but he can fill their mouths only if they open them.

11, 12. Israel's Stubbornness. In spite of the divine mercy Israel would have nothing to do with Jehovah. I let them go—God punishes his people by letting them go on until they realize that without him they can but meet disaster.

13-16. The Eternal Mercy of God. If Israel would turn to him he would bless them abundantly; he would drive back their enemies and would make them come cringing to his people. The picture of God here is the same as in the parable of the prodigal son: he ever longs for the return of his prodigal children. Finest of the wheat—literally, "fat of wheat." The final consummation would be that God would give his people the best, and out of the hardest experiences he would bring them honey and rich bread. How wonderful are the mercies of God!

PSALM 82. GOD THE JUDGE OF ALL HUMAN JUDGES

The date is uncertain. Unrighteousness was prevalent; but such a condition was not uncommon, and does not fix the date. The expression in v. 1, "he judgeth among the gods," has led some to believe that the psalm portrays a judgment scene in which Jehovah calls the gods of other nations before him to judgment; sternly he rebukes them for their partiality and misrule and exposes their futility. Others think the persons judged are rulers and magistrates in Israel, who in their representative positions stand for divine authority and rule. Still others think of the wicked rulers and governors of nations holding Israel in subjection. On the whole, the second interpretation appears to be the more probable. The theme is common in the prophets (cf. Amos 5¹⁰⁻¹⁵).

1-4. The Arraignment of the Unjust Judges. Congregation of God—an assembly called by God himself for a judicial session. Gods—not divine beings, but judges who administer divinely given laws and possess divinely bestowed authority. The charge is that they practice injustice and partiality; they are exhorted instead to give special consideration to the poor and needy (cf. Isa. 111-5).

5-7. Their Sentence. The judges are morally blind and incompetent; hence judgment must fall. Ye are gods—Jehovah exalted them highly; but now they must die like common men; they shall fall like other princes who failed in their trust.

8. The Judge of All the Earth. The trial is over; God alone stands out as a righteous Judge. The psalmist appeals to him to take possession of all the nations as their Sovereign and Judge.

PSALM 83. A PLEA FOR JUDGMENT UPON THE ENEMIES OF ISRAEL

It is very difficult to determine the probable time of this psalm, for no historical situation brings together at once all of the tribes and peoples mentioned here. Many scholars refer it to the time of Nehemiah, when every man's hand seemed against him in the rebuilding of the walls. Others think of the Maccabæan period.

The psalm falls naturally into two sections. (1) Vv. 1-8: the psalmist pleads with God not to sit by as an indifferent spectator and allow the enemy to close in from every side and utterly destroy the inheritance of Jehovah; (2) vv. 9-18: he prays God to humble the enemies as he has done in the past, that they may yield him homage, either voluntarily or by force.

1-4. Let God Speak and the Enemies Will Be Dispersed. It is God's silence and apparent indifference that allow the enemies to continue their attacks. The word tumult denotes an uproar, the noise of a great multitude.

Crafty counsel—there is a plot against Jehovah, for a plot against his people is a plot against him. Thy hidden ones—God's people whom he hides in the day of trouble. The plot is to blot out the very name and remembrance of Israel.

5-8. Enumeration of the Confederates Against Israel. The Edomites were the descendants of Esau, and inhabited the region southeast of the Dead Sea. Ishmaelites—Arab tribes of the desert. Moab—or Moabites, situated on the eastern side of the Dead Sea, north of Edom. Hagarenes—or "Hagrites," were from the Hauran, east of Gilead. Gebal—perhaps not the people used by Solomon from the old city of Byblos in Phœnicia, but, rather, a tribe of the Edomite mountains. Ammon—ancient and bitter enemy of Israel, east of the Jordan. Amalek—dwelt in the desert south of Beersheba, between the Arabah and the Mediterranean and extending into the Sinaitic Peninsula. From Tyre to Philistia includes the entire Mediterranean coast. Assyria—the Assyrians conquered northern Israel in 722 B.C. and after that colonized Israel with some of their own people, and it has been suggested that these—the forerunners of the Samaritans—may be meant. The children of Lot—i.e., Ammon and Moab. (For a fuller description of these names, see arts., Land of Palestine, pp. 53-8; Hebrew History, pp. 62-7).

9-18. Prayer for the Destruction of Israel's Enemies. The second part of the psalm is a prayer that the nations named may be dealt with as Jehovah has dealt with others in the past. Midian—whom Gideon subdued (Judg. 7, 8). Sisera—defeated by Deborah and Barak (Judg. 4, 5). Dung (v. 10)—the declaration is a contemptuous one. They became as fertilizer for the ground. Oreb and Zeeb—Midianite generals (Judg. 7²⁵); Zebah and Zalmunna—kings of Midian (Judg. 8^{5f.}). Who (v. 12)—refers to present enemies. God's habitations—or "pastures," the lands which he has given his people. Whirling dust (v. 13)—anything whirled away by the wind may be meant. Thomson (Land and the Book, p. 563) thinks the head of the wild artichoke is meant. This breaks off and goes whirling across the desert, something like our own Western tumble weed. Stubble—this word and the one above mean that they shall be nothing but drifting chaff. Make them as a mountain-side after a forest fire has swept up it. Let storms distress them. Let them be humiliated, that they may seek thee (vv. 14, 15). The prayer for punishment and destruction is in reality a prayer for the salvation of these people—that they may know Jehovah. Chastisement has for its primary object conversion.

PSALM 84. A PILGRIM PROCESSIONAL EXPRESSING LOVE FOR THE TEMPLE

The 84th psalm should be studied in connection with Peters' great book, The Psalms as Liturgies (The Macmillan Company). With Psa. 84 begins the Korah collection. This psalm is a companion to Psa. 42, 43. It reveals the same devotion to the Temple service, and contains many like expressions; it may come from the same author. Peters thinks it was at first intended to be sung at the Dan altar and later adapted for the Jerusalem Psalter (op. cit., p. 340). This psalm, probably written between the time of the fall of Samaria and the fall of Jerusalem (722-586 B.C.), is a pilgrim processional. The procession, according to Peters, begins on the western hill. This hill is higher than Mount Moriah, on which the Temple stood; so that the procession looking down from the western hill could see within the Temple area and behold the beauty of the buildings there.

The first stanza, vv. 1-4, ends with "Selah" (cf. p. 512). Peters thinks that the word was here used as a signal to stop the procession and "lift up" the censer. The second stanza, vv. 5-8, describes the route of the procession. The old Tyropæon valley was much deeper than it now is; and across it was a causeway. Across this the procession made its way down into the valley to the Pool of Siloam. This pool since Hezekiah's day has been supplied with water from the Virgin Spring, under the hill Gihon, through a tunnel called Silwan. The Pool of Siloam is a cistern and was once inside the walls of the ancient city. The spring furnishing water was outside the wall. This spring was tapped and its waters carried through this aqueduct, for five hundred eighty-three yards. The spring was then covered up from the enemy. Near the Pool of Siloam and about it were the graves of thousands; hence the name "the valley of Baca," or "Weeping." The eastern and western hills were connected by bridges, the remains of two of which have been discovered. From the Pool of Siloam the route would wind up the hill toward the Temple, over terraces or ramparts, until, after passing the king's house, the pilgrims found themselves at the gates of the Temple and finally inside. The first stanza, vv. 1-4, opens with a statement much like the refrains of the other stanzas, and this one has no other refrain. The third stanza, vv. 9-12, describes the blessedness of worshiping Jehovah in the sanctuary.

1-4. The Psalmist's Delight in the Temple. How amiable are thy tabernacles—the procession starts and looks down upon the beauty of the holy buildings. My soul longeth—the same cry is found in Ps. 42; the cry of the human heart in its deepest longings is universally the same. This cry indicates the pilgrim character of the psalm. The swallow—even now the swallows build their nests in the Haram es Sheriff, or Temple area. The psalmist envies them their place. Happy are those servitors of the Temple who have the privilege of living and laboring within the sacred precincts.

5-8. The Blessing and Strength of God. Peters translates v. 5, "Happy he whose strength is in thee! (They have crossed the causeway in the midst thereof.)" This would support the view that these verses describe the route of the procession; but the translation "in whose heart are the highways to Zion" is preferable. "They have made a well in the valley of weeping" (v. 6). The Pool of Siloam is in this ancient graveyard. Throughout the stanza, Peters, influenced by his view of the original purpose of the psalm, takes much liberty with the text. In most instances the Massoretic text is preferable, and the English translation expresses the thought acceptably.

9-12. Blessedness of Access to God. V. 9 contains a prayer for the king. Behold, O God our shield, and look upon the face of thine anointed are parallel clauses. Shield describes the king as does also anointed (cf. 89¹⁸). They chant this prayer as they pass the palace, standing next to the Temple on Mount Moriah. A day in thy courts is better than a thousand—intended for the king, to whom they are now singing; one day's service of God is better defense for the nation than an army. Thousand—a regiment, and so an army. "Better is one day given to the service of God, on the part of a ruler, than the organization of an army, for national defense." This interpretation suggests a helpful truth; but the thought which the passage suggests to the ordinary reader is equally inspiring. "I had rather be the humblest of the servitors of the temple of my God than to dwell where wickedness abounds." Sun and a shield (v. 11)—read, with a slight change in the text, a battlement and a shield; i.e., protection. Grace and glory—perhaps the sun gives grace, and the shield gives glory (?). This is one of the great promises: No good thing will he withhold from them that walk uprightly. Nothing that is really worth while will God withhold from his children. All good things come from God. He is the bountiful giver. Consequently, the man who puts his trust in Jehovah may well be called blessed.

PSALM 85. PRAYER FOR GOD'S MERCY UPON THE NATION

Mercies already received inspire the psalmist to pray for further manifestations of the divine favor (vv. 1-7) and to expect the complete fulfillment of his prayer in an ideal future (vv. 8-13). It may have been written after the return of the exiles during the days of Nehemiah and Ezra. Only a small group of Jews returned at this time and they had a hard time rebuilding the walls and the Temple because of the opposition of different peoples living about Jerusalem, as well as from their own people. The hard times will pass and the divine promises for the future will be realized.

1-3. Divine Mercies Already Experienced.

(1) Restoration from exile (v. 1); (2) forgiveness of sin (v. 2). The Exile came on account of their sins and the restoration because these sins had been forgiven. Thou hast taken away all thy wrath—the hand of God was heavy on Israel for her sins; the return was evidence that God had withdrawn his wrath and lifted his heavy hand.

4-7. Prayer that God May Entirely Restore Them.

If the return from exile is meant, then, like Joshua standing upon the borders of the promised land, but with it all to conquer, these exiles had been allowed by God to return to the land of their fathers; but Jerusalem lay in waste and the whole land was in ruin. Moreover, with only a little handful of people under Nehemiah, the task of rebuilding was apparently insuperable, unless God continued his favor by helping them in the undertaking and caused other exiles to return. Turn us = restore us. Draw out—i.e., prolong. Will not thou quicken us again—i.e., restore the national life according to the promises of the prophets. Let the streets of Jerusalem once more bustle with life and activity, and let the herds and flocks feed on the hills, and the women go down to draw water as in the years gone by. V. 7 sums up the petitions in an earnest prayer for salvation on the basis of the divine loving-kindness.

8-13. Jehovah's Response. The psalmist hears the divine answer that rich blessings will come to those who put their trust in him. I will hear—perhaps, "Let me hear what the Lord God will speak." In the restoration and the reviving God will once again speak, and I shall once again hear what he has to say. Communication is restored through forgiveness. Let them not turn again to folly—only through continued obedience to God's will can his good will be retained. Salvation is for them who fear God (v. 9). That glory may dwell in our land—Ezekiel (10¹⁸) saw the vision of the glory of Jehovah departing from the Temple. Now with the fear of God and his salvation restored, that glory may come and dwell here again. Glory—symbolic of the presence of God.

Vv. 10, 11 enumerate the divine attributes and human virtues which serve as the basis of a life of fellowship between God and man. Mercy and Truth, Righteousness and Peace—mercy on the part of God and truth on the part of man are the fundamentals of restoration. Truth springs out of the earth and righteousness looks down from heaven. Earth and heaven meet in man's redemption. Permanent peace can exist only on a foundation of righteousness. V. 12 promises that material prosperity will result from obedience to God. This is quite in harmony with the general teaching of the O.T.: If man does his part, God will certainly do his, which is to supply the needs of his worshipers. Righteousness opens a path for the righteous to walk in (v. 13).

PSALM 86. PSALM OF SUPPLICATION AND CONFIDENCE

A mosaic of fragments taken from other psalms (25–27, 40, 54, etc.) and O.T. books. Dependence on other psalms proves that this is a late one, certainly post-exilic; but there is nothing to determine its exact date. It is the only psalm in the third book which has the name David attached to it. The expression, "Psalm of David," probably means only that it is an "imitation" of the "Prayers of David" (cf. 72²⁰). The group bearing the title "Prayer" was formed of this psalm, Psa. 17, 102 and 142. This prayer seems personal rather than institutional. The word Adonai, "Lord," occurs seven times; the other side of this is the designation of the psalmist as "servant" and "son of thine handmaid."

1–5. Series of Petitions. With each petition the psalmist states some reason why it should be heard and answered. The first element in prayer is to confess our need: I am poor and needy (v. 1). I am godly—not a boast, but a plea that he belongs to those who are the special care of God. Thy servant—a title used of one addressing some august person. Show mercy for my importunity (Lk. 118). The psalmist's faith is based on God's willingness to forgive and show mercy (v. 5).

6–10. Jehovah the Psalmist's Only Hope. V. 7 seems to be a reflection of Psa. 77—"God is our refuge in time of trouble." Other gods are appealed to by the heathen, but they cannot hear or answer prayer, nor can they do the wonderful works of Jehovah (v. 8). V. 9 looks forward to the universal sway of the psalmist's God. V. 10 acknowledges God's incomparable greatness. God alone. There is no other God (cf. 72¹⁸ 77¹³ 83¹⁸).

11–17. Prayer for Deliverance and Promise of Gratitude. Teach me . . . unite my heart—teach me that my heart may not be divided;

that I may have singleness of purpose. For vv. 12, 13 cf. 91 50¹⁵, 23 57⁹, 10. The psalmist is in serious trouble (v. 14; cf. 54³); but he has every confidence in God (v. 15; cf. Ex. 34⁶). Let God give some sign of encouragement that will not only help the one pleading but will also serve notice on his enemies that God is mindful of him (v. 17).

PSALM 87. ZION THE METROPOLIS OF JEHOVAH'S KINGDOM

Follows closely on the proclamation of 86⁹. The franchise of the kingdom of God is conferred upon the proselytes as though it were theirs by right of birth. In this the psalm is unique. The most despised enemies of Israel are seen coming into this new kingdom and becoming its very sons. Thus the psalm sets forth the international character of the kingdom of God, as recognized even more strongly in the N.T. (cf. Gal. 4²⁶ Eph. 2¹², 19); it breathes the spirit of the "Servant Songs" in Isa. 40–53. While the psalm is assigned by many to the age of Hezekiah, it is probably a post-exilic production.

1–3. The Glory of Zion. The style of the hymn is abrupt and terse. V. 1 states the theme of the poem: Zion is a city founded by God himself. Gates=Jerusalem itself. Dwellings of Jacob—probably the other cities of Palestine, though some think of cities outside of Palestine in which the Jews of the Dispersion dwell. The psalm is probably a pilgrim song. Glorious things are spoken—by prophets of old and others. Even God has spoken great things concerning her.

4–6. Zion the Center of God's Kingdom. God now speaks in the first person. The nations of the outside world shall come to be enrolled as his children. Rahab=Egypt. Babylon—long the enemy of Israel. Philistia, Tyre (cf. 83⁷)—the minor nations along the seacoasts. Ethiopia—Cush, south of Egypt. This one was born there. Each and every one of the nations mentioned is by this decree recognized as the son of God, with all the rights and privileges of such sonship. Egypt, the world power of the south, Babylonia, the world power of the north and east, and both ever the enemy of Israel; Philistia, a frequent disturber of Israel's peace; Tyre, a Phœnician city which in the prosperity of her commerce and wealth had despised Israel; distant Ethiopia, famous for great warriors—all of these shall be brought before Israel in the holy capital, and it shall be said, this one and that one were born there, and by this edict they shall become citizens as though they had actually been born in Israel. It is God's purpose to reconcile all nations to himself. Zion shall then become the "Mother dear, Jerusalem" for all nations (v. 5). When Jehovah makes up his census he will write down the names of those who are born in her and those who have come in by the second birth (v. 6).

7. Universal Rejoicing. With rejoicing the children of Zion (v. 5) greet their mother. The verse may be rendered: "They that sing and they that dance shall say, 'All my springs are in thee'"—springs or fountains of salvation. All the good they enjoy comes from their mother, who in turn receives it from Jehovah.

PSALM 88. PRAYER FOR DELIVERANCE FROM DEATH

Called the saddest psalm in the Psalter. It may be a wail of Israel in Babylon; but in its present form it is a penitential psalm used liturgically. The Syriac Version prefaces this psalm by, "Concerning the people which was in Babylon."

1-8. Cry for Mercy. The psalmist pleads the intensity of his sufferings in the hope of arousing the divine pity. Sheol (v. 3)—the place of the departed; a gloomy place where the dead endure a sort of shadowy and uncertain existence. The psalmist is near death; by some he is already counted a dead man (v. 5). Like the slain—those slain in battle and buried in nameless graves. Whom thou rememberest no more—the dead are completely cut off from Jehovah. This is indeed a gloomy view of the future state. Lowest pit . . . dark places . . . deeps—all refer to Sheol and give some idea of the nature of the place. All thy waves (v. 7)—the torrents of affliction (cf. 427). In his affliction he was, like Job, forsaken by his friends.

9-12. The Importunity of Prayer. If God is thinking of helping him he must do it at once; his strength is failing; he will soon die, and with death he will pass from the control of Jehovah (see p. 173). Wilt thou show wonders to the dead? Vv. 10-12 express in various ways the thought that the person who enters Sheol is cut off from Jehovah; Jehovah cannot manifest his power in Sheol, nor can the dead sing his praises. If, therefore, Jehovah wants to help the psalmist he must do it before the latter dies. Land of forgetfulness—in Sheol one forgets and is forgotten.

13-18. The Psalmist will Continue to Rely Upon God. In the morning (v. 13)—the night passes and he still prays. Death has not actually overtaken him, and once again he spreads out his hands and lifts his voice to God. Perchance to-day he will be gracious. Why? (v. 14)—the eternal question. He prays and trusts where he cannot understand. From my youth up—must refer to an individual and not to the nation. He may have been afflicted with leprosy from his childhood. Thy fierce wrath—the fiery streams of thy wrath have gone over me. The figure is very intense. Thy terrors—a favorite word with Job. Like one caught by the tides, these terrors rise higher and higher each day to overwhelm him (v. 17). Read v. 18 Lover and friend as well as acquaintance slip away and darkness takes their place. The pathos of this psalm is remarkable. The whole reminds one constantly of Job. The psalmist comes to the end of his wail with no light on the difficulties which have confused him, but with one great outstanding victory. He has come to praise God though he seems utterly hostile to him. He has found that even if God is hostile, yet there is none other to pray to. God or nothing. And he decides to pray on though he cannot understand.

PSALM 89. BATTLE OF SKEPTICISM AND FAITH

The psalmist, dressing up his doubt with much praise, reminds God of his promises to David and his failure to carry them out. This certainly looks like a psalm of the Exile experience. The king seems to have been dethroned and a prisoner. The psalmist reminds God of his promises and his character and expresses astonishment, in view of these, that the king should be in such a state. If God is merciful and righteous, the present affliction cannot be the last word.

1-4. Loving-kindness and Faithfulness of Jehovah. I will sing of the mercies of the Lord—the mercy of the Lord is still the most amazing thing in heaven or earth. The faithfulness of Jehovah is the guarantee of his abiding mercy and of the carrying out of his promises. For I have said (v. 2)—I have come to this conclusion. Mercy and faithfulness are rooted in the depths and reach to the very heavens; these shall pass away but the attributes of God shall stand forever. In vv. 3, 4 Jehovah is the speaker. He sets forth his promise to David. I have made a covenant—a covenant established by Jehovah cannot be broken. Chosen—i.e., David. V. 4, giving the substance of the promise, is based on 2 Sam. 7:1-29, where God makes a covenant with David.

5-18. A Hymn of Praise. The power and faithfulness of Jehovah guarantee the fulfillment of his promises. The heavens—the whole celestial order. Who in the skies?—does he mean the sun, moon and other heavenly bodies, or does he mean the council of heaven itself? The psalmist must be excused for taking the "wings of the morning" and sweeping out into regions beyond mortal ken and singing of heavenly councils in the midst of which the incomparable God stands towering above them all. God of hosts (v. 8)—hosts of earth and of heaven. This heavenly host is often referred to in the O.T. (Gen. 32² 2 Kings 617; cf. Lk. 21³, etc.). Rulest the pride of the sea (v. 9). The sea, a symbol of unrest, was most terrible to the Hebrew. It was thought to be ruled by divine spirits, but Jehovah (Jah) was superior to them, as he proved at the Red Sea. Broken Rahab in pieces (v. 10)—refers to the utter annihilation of Egypt or, as some think, to the primeval monster which represented chaos and was overcome in the creation (cf. 87⁴ Gen. 1² Job 2612). North and south = all the world; Tabor and Hermon = east and west.

V. 14 offers a wonderful metaphor: God is sitting upon a throne whose foundations are righteousness and judgment; mercy and truth are his attendants. The throne of God is founded upon eternal and unshakable righteousness and justice; truth or faithfulness underlies that justice and assures it, while mercy (=loving-kindness) tempers justice (cf. on 8510). Happy is the people who have such a God (v. 15). In the light of thy countenance—means in his favor and by his grace. In thy name—i.e., in the divine character as revealed in God's dealings with men. The basis of their glory (v. 17) is the power of God; they may safely lean on him. Our horn shall be exalted—the figure of a victorious wild animal with head up. Our shield . . . our king—the king was appointed by God and was the defender of Israel. Holy One of Israel—a term often used by the prophets, especially by Isaiah, who may have coined the phrase (see p. 162); the very holiness of God insures the redemption of his people.

19-37. The Divine Promise to David. The reference to the king in v. 18 naturally suggests the covenant with David (cf. vv. 3, 4), which the psalmist outlines in detail. Thou spakest in vision—perhaps the time mentioned in 2 Sam. 71-29. To thy saints—read, with mg., saint; the reference is to Nathan or David. Laid help upon—David, a mighty hero, was chosen and empowered to help his people. This is also the thought of vv. 20, 21: David was called for the purpose of helping Israel, and Jehovah promised to strengthen him. Moreover, Jehovah promised to give him victory in battle and thus exalt him (vv. 23, 24). His left hand shall be upon the Western Sea and his right upon the Euphrates, which shall be the boundaries of the land.

The relationship between Jehovah and David was to be intimate; my father (v. 26)—cf. 27 2 Sam. 714. Firstborn—David would cry "My Father!" In answer God would make him his son, with all the rights and prerogatives of the firstborn. Mercy—or "loving-kindness." The endurance of that kingdom shall be as the days of heaven, where the day never ends; i.e., forever (v. 29). If his children forsake my law—which they did—they shall be punished; but even then Jehovah will remember this promise, will have mercy and exhibit that same faithfulness (vv. 30-33). His throne shall be as enduring as the sun and the moon (vv. 35-37).

38-45. Contrast Between the Divine Promises and the Present Reality. The psalmist now comes to contrast the present plight of the nation and its king with these promises to David. This is the point to which he has been leading up all of the time. Thou—the psalmist boldly charges God with breaking his promise (v. 38). Abhorred the covenant—Jehovah has acted as if he had never made a promise; he ruthlessly took the crown from the head of the successor of David and cast it to the ground. His treatment of the king has brought disaster to the nation (vv. 40, 41). Hedges are broken down so that strangers pass through the land of Palestine and help themselves, leaving it in utter ruin, since there is nothing to shield it. The enemy has been favored (v. 42); Jehovah has not helped the king in battle as he promised in v. 23 (v. 43). Days . . . shortened (v. 45)—he has become prematurely old. The reference is probably to Jehoiachin, who was not more than eighteen when he was dethroned (2 Kings 25²⁹).

46-51. Prayer for a Removal of the Contrast. In vv. 46, 47 the psalmist pleads with God to withdraw his wrath, and to remember the transitoriness of human life (cf. Ps. 90). What man is so strong that he shall not see death? Time is short and the best of men must die (v. 48). What is the use of afflicting him? Where are (v. 49)—what has become of all past expressions of loving-kindness and mercy and of the oath to David, described in the preceding verses? Reproach (vv. 50, 51)—while the king and the nation are sufferers, the reproach also affects God. He too is dishonored in the dishonoring of his people. V. 51 may refer to the humiliation of Jehoiachin as he was led in dishonor through the streets of Babylon with a jeering throng dogging his footsteps (2 Kings 2415, 16).

52. Closing Doxology. This verse does not belong to the psalm proper; it is rather a doxology for the entire Book III.

PSALM 90. JEHOVAH THE UNCHANGING THE REFUGE OF CHANGING MAN

Book IV of the Psalter consists of Ps. 90-106 (see intro., p. 509). Peters thinks this psalm was written during the so-called "Back to Moses" movement about 500 B.C.; others think of the death of Josiah, 609 or 608 B.C., as a suitable occasion. The sublimity and inspirational quality are entirely independent of its date. It inspired the great hymn, "O God Our Help in Ages Past."

1-6. God an Everlasting Refuge. Lord—Hebrew, Adonai; the title by which Jehovah is known as the ruler of the universe. Dwelling place—habitation, place of refuge; God is our home. In all generations—from generation to generation; i.e., at all times, forever. Mountains—thought to be the oldest of God's creation. Brought forth=begotten. Thou hast formed—literally, "didst travail in birth with." The writer places himself back in the primordial time and conceives of God travelling in the struggle to bring forth creation. The Spirit of God was brooding over the abyss (cf. Deut. 32¹⁸ Job 38⁸, 28, 29). Before all this took place, ere the "morning stars sang together and all the sons of God shouted for joy" (Job 38⁷), long ages before the beginning of creation, God was. He was and is (cf. Ex. 31⁴).

Not only the universe but man also is dependent entirely on God. Thou turnest man to destruction—or "dust" (v. 3; cf. mg.). Man in comparison with God is a thing of dust rapidly returning whence he came. Return—a call to a new generation to take the place of those so rapidly passing from the stage of action. A thousand years (v. 4)—another figure to impress upon the reader or hearer the eternal stretches of time in the mind of God as compared with man (cf. 2 Pet. 3⁸). A thousand year period when it is passing is but as the closing day, with all of its experiences fresh in mind. A watch in the night. In O.T. times the night was divided into three watches (Judg. 7¹⁹ 1 Sam. 11¹¹); the N.T. division into four (Mt. 14²⁵) is of Roman origin. What passes more quickly than the hours in which we sleep! A thousand years to God are but as a watch through which one has slept. To God there is neither yesterday nor to-morrow; he lives in the eternal present. Time is purely a human element and only the finite "Shapes the shadow, Time." Thou carriest them away as with a flood. The entire sentence is but a single Hebrew word; it emphasizes the suddenness of destruction. Sleep—either, they are as those who are asleep; or "they fall asleep," in the sleep of death. In v. 6 man is compared to grass which, indeed, groweth up with the morning dews; but in the heat of the day it is scorched and in the evening withers and becomes worthless.

7-12. Misery of a Life Spent Under Divine Displeasure. It is bad enough that life is brief and uncertain; it is worse to live it under the cloud of God's wrath, caused by human sin. We—the nation Israel. Troubled—or dismayed, because of divine judgments. Sins—the light of God's countenance usually expresses his favor, but here it is like the searching rays of the noonday sun, from which there is nothing hidden; the people's sin stands revealed before him. All our days are passed away—our brief day has turned, without value, toward the evening. It has been a day of wrath and there is no sign of light at evening time. A tale—literally a sound, or sigh (cf. mg.). The years pass as quickly as a sigh, which is an expression of weariness or sorrow.

The life of man is at best but brief (v. 10). Three score and ten, or even four score years, is the most that men can hope for, and few realize such an old age; but if they do, they must confess at the end that it has meant nothing but weariness and disappointment. Who knoweth the power of thine anger? (V. 11.) Who can know how long it will last and how to fear him so as to protect himself against God's fierceness toward sin? Since man is ignorant, God must help him. So teach us—give us that discernment which we lack, so that we may know how to secure the divine favor and good will.

13-17. Prayer for Restoration of the Divine Favor. Return (v. 13)—a prayer that God may change his attitude and show that he has forgiven. Let it repent thee—the change in God's attitude is called repentance. Once it was interpreted literally (cf. Gen. 6⁶); but here the thought is not that God would find himself mistaken or regretful, but, rather, that he would find it in his heart to have mercy, overlook the worthlessness of his people and forgive their sins. In the morning—as though they were in a state of night through all of their troubles; they pray for the approach of the dawn. Let the joy of the morning be proportionate to the sorrow of the long night (v. 15). Beauty (v. 17)—or "pleasantness"—the gracious kindness of Jehovah. Make the work of our hands worth while.

This is the funeral hymn of the ages and is well fitted for that service. It is in a minor key, but pathetically beautiful. There is a rhythm about it that reminds one of some mighty organ oratorio, sounding with solemn and measured tones. It needs, however, the radiant touch of the Christian hope.

PSALM 91. JEHOVAH THE SURE DEFENSE OF THOSE WHO TRUST IN HIM

In the view of many scholars this is a national psalm, but there are also good reasons for considering it a personal one. The best of these is the impression it makes on the reader. The exquisite beauty of it and the deep trust and confidence reflected in it seem to be too profound to be the expression of national hope; they sound like the welling up of a deep emotional spring within the individual soul. The Targum thinks of this psalm as a dialogue between David and Solomon. David speaks: "I will say of Jehovah . . . for he will deliver thee Solomon my son." Solomon answers: "For thou Jehovah art my refuge, in a lofty dwelling hast thou placed the abode of thy Majesty." The Lord of the world answered and said thus: "There shall no evil befall thee." The date of the psalm is uncertain; probably it is post-exilic. The rabbis suggested that since Moses wrote Psa. 90, he also wrote its antithesis in Psa. 91.

1, 2. The Theme of the Psalm: Jehovah a Secure Defense. The Hebrew of the first line is very brief. The word "happy" may have dropped out at the beginning. If it is restored, the line would read, Happy is the man who dwells in the secret place. The general sense is clear. The one who takes refuge in the secret hiding place, or the safe retreat of God, is both happy and secure. Almighty—Hebrew, Shaddai; this is the name used for God in Gen. 17, where it occurs as El Shaddai. The term Elyon—the most high—is used for "God" in Gen. 14¹⁹⁻²¹. Secret place=covert, i.e., under the protection of God Almighty. There none but God can find him; the enemy cannot locate him. Shadow of the Almighty. God is sometimes presented under the idea of a "Rock in a weary land," which gives shade to the weary traveler and protection; or the words may refer to the protection of the mother bird, a figure used later (v. 4). The one who dwells in the secret covert of the Most High shall become his abiding guest. V. 2 is the expression of complete confidence and trust.

3-8. God's Providential Care. Surely—there can be no doubt about it. Snares of the fowler—the trap of the huntsman, who seeks human prey. Noisome pestilence—since pestilence is mentioned in v. 6, many accept the reading of some of the ancient translations, "from the destroying word," i.e., slander and gossip. Pinions . . . wings—there is tenderness and intimacy in that expression (cf. Mt. 23³⁷). The picture is of a mother bird which gathers her young under her wings in time of danger. One who abides under the shadow of the Almighty need not fear sudden surprises by night or open attacks by day. Day and night are both alike to Him in whom we dwell (v. 5). Pestilence and destruction (or "plague") are set forth as stalking demons seeking human prey; these too are impotent to harm as long as the divine protection is ours. Thee (v. 7c). The emphasis is upon this word. Whatever may happen to others he who trusts in God is safe. The psalmist may have had in mind here the deliverance on that last night in Egypt when the destroying angel passed through, but the Hebrews under the care of God were exempt from destruction (cf. Ex. 12^{13, 27}).

9-16. Renewed Assurance of Divine Protection. The translation of v. 9 is somewhat uncertain. Some read For Jehovah is thine own refuge, the lofty One thy place of safety (cf. also mg.). The general thought, however, is clear; the psalmist describes again the safety of those who put their trust in Jehovah. The same theme is continued in v. 10. The psalmist once more reminds us of the basis of this confidence. Plague. Is it possible that trust in God will keep all physical plague away? Certainly it will keep away all spiritual evil. Jehovah will exercise a protecting care (vv. 11, 12). He shall give his angels charge over thee—cf. Ex. 23²⁰. All thy ways—the ways ordered by God for you, not those of your own choosing. The devil tempted Jesus by quoting this verse to him (Mt. 4⁶). Lion and adder—the adder was the cobra of Egypt which Cleopatra used to commit suicide.

In vv. 14-16 Jehovah speaks: He hath set his love upon me. Love begets love and responds to love. "We love him because he first loved us." God chooses any people to be his people who choose him to be their God. I will set him on high—out of the reach of his enemies and over them (cf. Esth. 6⁷⁻¹¹). Call . . . answer (v. 15)—he has stood the test. I will be with him in trouble—happy the man who has won such a place with God. "Can you trust God?" may give way to "Can God trust you?" Deliver . . . honor—not only saved, but saved to something and for something. With long life—this was the summum bonum of Israel's saints, to live long on the earth. Satisfy—I will make life worth living and allow him to live as long as he finds it worth while. My salvation—from every foe and every evil. This is the word that includes all that has gone before. Deliverance from the snare of the fowler, noisome pestilence, terror by night, arrow by day, pestilence of darkness and destruction of noonday, evil, plague, stones, lions, adders, trouble, and everything else. Thus salvation will be positive. Not only shall he be saved from all of these; but he will also be saved to a home in the Almighty, life in the midst of death, courage, the care of angels; he will be set on high, delivered, victorious, honored, satisfied.

PSALM 92. HYMN OF PRAISE FOR SOME GREAT NATIONAL DELIVERANCE

No author is suggested; it probably was written soon after the return from Exile. Its being set apart as a psalm for the Sabbath day is due to the fact that it glorifies the mighty works of Jehovah. The Sabbath was the day on which the works of creation were celebrated. The Targum gives this title, "A Psalm of praise and song which the first man uttered upon the day of the Sabbath."

1-3. The Joy of Praise and Thanksgiving. Give thanks. The most delightful occupation of man is to give thanks to God (v. 1). Sing praises—to make a joyful noise unto Jehovah. Morning . . . night—natural times for prayer and praise. See on 81² for the stringed instruments used in worship, the decachord, psaltery and the harp or lyre. Solemn sound = meditative.

4-8. The Sovereignty of Jehovah the Ground of Praise. Through thy work—thy working, or activity. Works—what the psalmist has in mind is the result of the divine workings, as he has observed them. God works his own way and brings forth the results in his own good time (v. 5). This the psalmist understands, but the brutish man . . . the fool (silly, v. 6) cannot see or understand the ways in which God works out his purpose. The wicked flourish for a time but soon are cut down (37^{35, 36}). A brutish man is like a brute and sees and feels as a brute. To satisfy himself in the lowest forms of life is his deepest concern. The grandeur and profundity of God's works are beyond his conception.

9-15. Evidences of the Divine Supremacy. These evidences consist in the fact that the righteous flourish, the wicked perish. My horn hast thou exalted—the frequent figure (89¹⁷) of the tossing of the head by a wild animal as indicative of strength and vigor. I am anointed with fresh oil—as on some festive occasion, so that the face shines and there is an air of joy. V. 11 sounds rather harsh, but is in harmony with many other O.T. passages. There is a seeming gloating over the suffering of the enemies of Israel. Flourish (v. 12)—this is a familiar figure of strength and glory. The palm in the East furnishes food, drink, fuel, building material, and shade; the cedar, stately, fragrant, beautiful and desired by kings for building purposes. Both are evergreen and live to a great old age. In v. 13 the psalmist may have had in mind the trees growing in the Temple area as they do to this day. There was a "house of the forest of Lebanon"; and the front porch of the temple of Solomon was a forest of columns representing trees (1 Kings 6³); and on the walls of the Temple were carved trees (1 Kings 6²⁹). In old age (v. 14)—the palm tree has been known to bear fruit at two hundred years of age. V. 15 is a final acclaim of confidence in Jehovah.

PSALM 93. THE MAJESTY OF JEHOVAH

Psa. 93-100, except 94 (and possibly 92 also), are sometimes called "Royal Psalms," because they all stress the sovereignty of Jehovah over Israel. This psalm has been called the "Prelude" to the entire group and should be studied in connection with the others. The LXX and the Talmud make this a Friday psalm, a psalm of the day before the Sabbath, or of the sixth day of creation, "when God peopled the world and began to reign over it." Reminiscent of this occasion and similar to it in significance was the restoration from exile, when God re-peopled his own land, and again began to reign over it. It is a psalm of thanksgiving, which probably comes from the early period of the restoration.

1, 2. The Eternal Sovereign is Jehovah. The Lord (Jehovah) reigneth—has proclaimed himself King. During the Exile the very foundations of the moral order seemed tottering, but now God has once more assumed his royal place and the world has again become orderly. Apparelled with majesty—the picture of Jehovah returning and assuming the throne, resplendent with glory and inspiring in power, restoring confidence by his very presence, is a very vivid one (cf. Isa. 61¹). Of old—Jehovah has always been king; he has only seemed to abdicate; his throne is eternal.

3, 4. The Powers of Earth Threaten Jehovah's Reign in Vain. Rivers at flood tide, oceans rising in the face of storms, thundering waters, and raging storms cannot shake the everlasting throne. Exile, persecution, and death may not destroy God's people. They can be destroyed only by themselves. In the midst of the storms and raging tumultuous waves rises the voice of God high above them all.

5. The Testimony of God is Sure. The divine testimony and the divine holiness answer all questions of doubt.

PSALM 94. PRAYER FOR VENGEANCE

Israel is greatly oppressed and prays that the righteous judgments of God be revealed upon all her enemies. The psalm seems to depend upon Psa. 73, and upon Job; but no definite period can be fixed for its origin.

1, 2. Vengeance Belongs to God and Not to Man. Appeal to God who has the power and right to punish. Lift up thyself—i.e., take the seat of judgment. He prays here for an assertion of the divine prerogative.

3-7. How Long Will Jehovah Keep Silent?

V. 3 expresses the cry of the ages—How long shall the wicked triumph? V. 4 pictures the insolence of the arrogant petty rulers. Prate=boast; arrogantly—they indulged in loud talk. They crush Jehovah's people by arrogance and extortion (v. 5). Thine heritage—i.e., Israel. V. 6 is a kind of proverbial expression for inhumanity and treachery: They are cruel to those who have no defense, they violate all good custom, they are inhospitable, even slay the sojourners, who are under the protection of the sacred law of hospitality; they show contempt for God himself. God of Jacob—they think of him as one among many gods, in no sense superior to the others.

8-11. Jehovah a God of Unique Power. The psalmist turns to those among his own people who think with the heathen that God is impotent. Brutish—the men who have lost the finer sensibilities (v. 8; cf. on 926). It is ridiculous to believe that the God who created the organs of sense does not possess them himself. He knows and will be able to judge wisely (v. 9). The psalmist looks even beyond Israel and sees that God is teaching all mankind. But if he teaches all men, is it not reasonable to suppose that he knows them, even their inmost thoughts? (Vv. 10, 11.)

12-15. Jehovah Ultimately Will Care for His Own. Happy are the victims of cruel oppression who wait upon God, for their time will surely come! It is an educational process. Chastenest (v. 12)—Israel is being divinely educated, and the teaching received will give Israel such an insight into God's ways that oppression will be endured calmly until the day of retribution. Unto righteousness (v. 15)—the administration of justice will be such that all good men will long for it and follow after it.

16-19. Israel Has No Helper but Jehovah. Who will rise up—no one but Jehovah. (Cf. Job 19:26-28.) The psalmist's experience confirms the hope of the aid of Jehovah (cf. Ps. 124). My foot slippeth (v. 18). He recalls that when he was about to stagger from the path of duty the loving kindness of God held him up; he gave himself up for lost but the divine love had hold of him all the time.

20-23. Deliverance of the Faithful; Destruction of the Tyrants. Throne of wickedness—temporarily wickedness may appear to triumph; but ultimately right and righteousness must prevail. High tower . . . refuge—place of protection and safety. Their own iniquity—God will cause their wickedness to return upon their own heads; while the innocent, whom they intended to destroy, will be delivered from their power.

PSALM 95. HUMILIATION OF BABYLON AND RESTORATION OF ISRAEL

Israel is solemnly warned that in spite of the divine goodness, if they provoke God as their fathers did in the wilderness, they can expect no more exemption from punishment than their fathers received.

This group of Psalms, 95-100, were probably arranged to be sung at the services in the second Temple, dedicated in 516 B.C. The title of Ps. 96 as given by the LXX is, "When the House was being built after the captivity"; and of Ps. 97, "When his land was being settled." They are liturgical and lyrical reflections of Isaiah 40-66. All the psalms in the group may have originated soon after the return from exile.

1, 2. Call to Worship. Rock—a frequent designation of God in the O.T. Presence—in the Temple; i.e., come before Jehovah himself. Thanksgiving—ever due to God; ingratitude is the worst of offenses, especially against God to whom we owe so much.

3-5. The Greatness of God. God is not to be compared with the impotent gods of the heathen. King—the kingship of Jehovah is the main thought in this collection of "Royal Psalms." The tremendous places of the earth, unexplored by man, are all under his control. From ocean's mysterious depths to the mystical heights of the mountains is the sweep of divine control (v. 4). He is king over nations and nature. The sea and the dry land belong to their Creator. The sea seemed most mysterious and by many Jews was supposed to be outside the realm of Jehovah, but the psalmist reminds us that God made and governs all.

6, 7. Second Call to Worship. Based on the relation of Jehovah to Israel. The psalmist speaks from personal experience—the individual worshiper in group worship. The sheep of his pasture—no more expressive term could have been used (see on Jn. 10:1-18).

8-11. Warning Against Obstinacy. It always leads to destruction. Harden—do not do as your father did at Meribah, and in the day of Massah in the wilderness (Ex. 17:1-7). He remembers God's patience and kindness in the wilderness and also the apostasy of the people when they sorely tried him. God was tried and found true by the children of Israel. Meribah="strife," Massah="temptation" (cf. mg.). The children of Israel were not only wandering literally, but also in the ways they knew were not right; hence God was angry and for forty years he was displeased with the erring people. He would not let them enter into rest— he could not allow them to enter the promised land; the people, by their own conduct, made it impossible for God to use them.

PSALM 96. PRAISE TO GOD THE RIGHTEOUS JUDGE

The LXX assigns this psalm to the time when the House was built after the captivity: and there is no reason to doubt that it originated soon after the return from exile.

1-3. Call to Universal Praise. A new song—the return from captivity called for a new song. The new Temple was to be a house of prayer for all peoples. The entire earth is called upon to join the glad voices of the returned exiles. This is an outburst of overflowing praise, free and spontaneous. Salvation from day to day—each new day demands fresh praise, for the divine expressions of love and mercy are daily renewed. Nations—all nations must know and love him. Tell to all the world the wonders of God's amazing love.

4-6. Jehovah's Worthiness to be Praised. It took a great God to deliver his children from captivity, and therefore his praises should be great. He is the incomparable God. The psalms in this collection continually refer to heathen gods as impotent and worthless, while Jehovah is very great. Honor, majesty, strength, and beauty are his characteristics. Honor and majesty, personified, wait upon him, while strength and beauty adorn his Temple.

7-9. The Whole Earth Exhorted to Acknowledge Jehovah. God is to be praised with our voices, with our substance, with lives of beauty and holiness. Beauty of holiness is ever the adornment of his saints; they need no other (cf. notes on 292).

10-13. Jehovah the God of All Nations. Say among the heathen: God hath proclaimed himself King over all. Jehovah reigns not over Israel only but over all the world. He is so gracious and glorious that all nature is joyous in its expressions (v. 11). When the kingship of Jehovah is universally established, the whole universe will be permeated with a spirit of joy. Therefore (v. 13) let all nature rejoice in the day of his coronation: he comes to establish righteousness in the earth. This note of universalism characterizes many psalms, and was a developed feature of Israel's religion (see art., Religion of Israel, pp. 171b, 848).

PSALM 97. JEHOVAH REIGNETH

One of the most prominent thoughts in this psalm is judgment, the judgment by which the Lord accomplishes his righteous reign. The psalm is not an original composition; there is hardly a phrase that has not been borrowed, but the borrowing and arranging have been done with consummate skill. The psalmist himself is deeply moved, and, drawing upon psalmists and prophets, he has constructed a "costly mosaic with marvelous skill." The author or compiler is unknown; the psalm probably belongs to the early post-exilic period.

1-3. Jehovah's Dominion. Jehovah has proclaimed himself king. Isles = coastlands; a favorite word in Isa. 40-66; all the islands and coastlands of the Mediterranean. The whole near East would have cause to rejoice in the establishment of righteous government. Though clouds and darkness, as at Sinai, enshroud him, yet righteousness and judgment, or justice, are the foundation of his kingdom, and his people need not fear him.

4-6. Manifestations of Jehovah's Power. Probably a reference to Sinaitic experiences. Thunder, lightning, earthquake—these are but the manifestations of his power. How impotent are the hills, which seem to us so majestic, in the presence of God, and how readily they give way before him (v. 5; cf. Mic. 1⁴). Heavens declare (v. 6)—all the wondrous works of God are but the silent testimonies of his power and glory (Psa. 81 19). All the people may see the story of his majesty and goodness in the heavens above and his glorious manifestations in the history of men.

7-12. Let Israel Trust in God Who is Supreme. Once again he turns to contrast idols of other nations with God (cf. 1 Sam. 51-5 1 Kings 1830-40 Isa. 4217 449-20). History and experience have shown Jehovah supreme. Zion—Jerusalem hears of the ruin of Babylon and is glad. For v. 9 see 8318—God stands supreme above them all. Therefore let Israel trust in him and serve him. Ye that love the Lord, hate evil—live up to your profession. Light is sown—it is daybreak for the righteous; there will be universal diffusion of light (v. 11). Consequently, the righteous may well rejoice in the Lord. His holy name—literally, "the memorial of his holiness." His name brings to mind what God is and does (v. 12).

PSALM 98. A HYMN OF PRAISE

As in Psa. 96, man and nature are here urged to praise God for the merciful deliverance of his children from captivity. The writer was familiar with the latter part of Isaiah, and the psalm must have been written soon after the return of the Jews from Babylonia.

1-3. Praise Jehovah for His Mercy Toward Israel. A new song—the entire earth is called upon to join the glad voices of the returned exiles. His right hand—his own might was sufficient. Jehovah's kingdom is being established (v. 2). Salvation—his power to deliver; righteousness—his fidelity to the covenant with Israel. The combination of the two terms is quite common in Isa. 40-55. All nations have seen that Jehovah is God. He has proclaimed and demonstrated his righteousness and truth to other nations by delivering Israel from exile.

4-6. Let the Whole Earth Worship God. Salute Jehovah as he assumes his seat upon his universal throne. Use the harp and all other kinds of music in praise of him. Use every means of giving him a great welcome at his coronation (see notes on Psa. 72).

7-9. Let all Nature Rejoice in Worship of the True God. Cf. 93³ Isa. 55¹², where the trees are said to clap their hands and the hills shout for joy. When God assumes his throne of judgment all nature will rejoice. He is worthy of praise, for he will judge in uprightness (v. 9).

PSALM 99. THE HOLINESS OF GOD'S GOVERNMENT

A call to worship Jehovah as the thrice holy God. The two subjects are the universality of Jehovah's rule and the righteous character of his government. Like the other psalms in the collection, this one comes from the early post-exilic period.

1-3. Joyous Utterance of the Wonderful Fact that Jehovah Reigns. Fear or respect for an earthly king is expected; how much more for the King of kings! Upon the cherubim—or "between"; on the mercy seat, the place of his earthly manifestation. Zion—the seat of his universal sovereignty on earth (v. 2). Terrible name (v. 3; cf. on 81³¹³, etc.)—let all the earth praise the majestic name of God, who is holy; the ineffable name expresses the divine character. The Jews came to have such a profound reverence for the name of God that they adopted a number of equivalents for it. After using the name or its equivalent, such as "the Most High," or "the Blessed One," they would add—as they still do—"blessed be He!"

4, 5. The Righteous Character of Jehovah's Reign. Loveth judgment—his mighty power never exerts itself tyrannically. This great and terrible King, so strong, loves justice and establishes equity, so that the righteous need not fear him. Praise God and humbly, meekly worship him, for he is holy (v. 5). In ancient times the ark was God's footstool; here probably the Temple is meant.

6-9. The Holiness of Jehovah's Reign. The psalmist remembers that three holy men called upon God: Moses, Aaron, and Samuel all interceded for others and God answered them (Ex. 32³⁰⁻³⁵ Num. 16⁴⁶⁻⁵⁰ 1 Sam. 7⁸, 9 12¹⁶⁻²⁴; cf. Jer. 15¹, "The Lord said, Though Moses and Samuel stood before me, yet my mind could not be toward this people"). Now he has relented, has heard their cry of intercession and has delivered the people from Babylon. V. 7 describes the manner in which God spoke to them—and they remembered. Tookest vengeance (v. 8)—God loved the sinner and hated his sin. The psalm closes (v. 9) with another call to worship the holy God.

PSALM 100. EXHORTATION TO THANK AND PRAISE JEHOVAH

A psalm intended from the beginning for public worship. In the second Temple it was used when the thank-offering was presented. It is the last in the collection of the "Royal Psalms" and, like the others, comes from early post-exilic times. It is the basis of "Old Hundred":

"All people that on earth do dwell Sing to the Lord with cheerful voice."

In the Praise of Jehovah All Mankind is to Regain Its Lost Unity. One essential element of worship is "joy" (vv. 1, 2). Worship also includes the "recognition of God" (v. 3); sheep of his pasture—a figure dear to the heart of an Easterner. Thanks in worship is like Temple incense (v. 4). We enter into his gates thanking him for his mercy and praise him when we are in his courts. We enter God's temple not because of duty but because we love him; remembering all his goodness to us, we enter his presence with praise and pleasure. V. 5 further describes the character of God. God is more than just—his mercy is everlasting, and all generations will know the truth of him. The amazing thing to them and us is that, after all of our backslidings and meanness, God takes us back and loves us still. "Old Hundred" seems to burst forth from the psalmist's heart, after the contemplation of Psa. 95-99, while thinking upon Israel and all her backslidings and her restoration by a merciful God to a new home and a new Temple. As a Shepherd, God brought back his sheep to the home pasture.

PSALM 101. PROFESSION OF UPRIGHTNESS

Called "David's Mirror for Rulers." It is used on the day of the coronation of English rulers. The origin of the psalm is uncertain. Some scholars accept the testimony of the title and interpret it as an expression of the high purpose which inspired David in his preparations for the transfer of the ark to the new capital. Others, however, assign it to a much later date, possibly as late as the Maccabæan period.

1-4. Preparation for the Coming of the Divine Guest. These verses may express David's longing for the ark to come to him, or the psalmist's longing for the individual presence of God. I will walk within my house with a perfect heart. The king would find difficulty in doing this; and if he is David, he most certainly did not live up to that vow. Royal palaces have often been places of intrigue and infidelity, but this ruler is cleaning house for the purpose of making Jehovah his guest. No ideal of baseness shall determine his path. Turn aside—he hates depraved things. They may tempt, but he will not entertain them.

5-8. Cleansing the Royal Household. The psalmist seems to be a ruler addressing himself to God; if so, he is very noble in his aspirations and ambitions. He first resolves to cleanse his own heart; but he goes further and determines to cleanse his court, as well, of evildoers, to put his house in order, so that Jehovah may be his guest. Moreover, he is always anxious to use only upright and honorable men in positions of trust.

PSALM 102. COMPLAINT AND PRAYER OF ONE WHO IS AFFLICTED

The psalm evidently reflects the late exilic period. Zion appears to be still in ruin, but the time of restoration is at hand (vv. 13, 14). The psalm appears to be dependent on Isa. 40-55 and several other psalms. The prayer is not only an individual petition; it is also a plea for the restoration of Israel and Zion.

1-11. Prayer for Speedy Deliverance. Vv. 1, 2 consist largely of phrases taken from other psalms. The suffering of the psalmist is intense. Smoke—a figure of transitoriness; burned—may refer to ravaging fever. In v. 5 the resemblance to Job is striking (1920). He compares himself to lonely birds, like the pelican and owl (v. 6). The pelican inhabits desolate places and the owl is called by the Arabs "mother of ruins." They are found in practically every ruin of the near East. I watch or "keep vigil" (v. 7)—i.e., I lie awake nights. Sparrow—probably some nocturnal bird, like the owl, which sits upon the housetops while the tired and sleepless victim tosses upon his bed, hearing these weird birds of the night. Mourning and tears are as familiar to him as food and drink (v. 9). Apparently God has lifted him up for the sole purpose of casting him down (v. 10). His life is like a shadow that declineth (v. 11)—at evening time the sun casts a long shadow, but the longer the shadow the sooner it is gone. Withering grass is a common symbol for transitoriness (Isa. 406-8).

12-22. Jehovah a Sure Pledge of Restoration. Heretofore the psalmist has described things as they are; now he turns to lift his eyes toward the horizon of hope and to contemplate the eternity of God as the sure pledge of final redemption and restoration. Time (v. 13)—the time set in God's own purposes for the restoration has arrived. V. 14 contains a pathetic appeal. Stones . . . dust—the people love the very ruins of Jerusalem. To this day the Jews wail daily at one of the city's ancient walls, kissing the stones and often beating their heads against them. The restoration of Zion will be the prelude to the conversion of the whole world (v. 15). Built up Zion—the restoration of his people will result in the rebuilding of Zion. Written (v. 18)—the wonderful works of Jehovah shall be recorded for all generations, and the new nation growing out of the restored people shall praise Jehovah. Here first in the Psalms occurs the expression thereafter so familiar, Praise Jehovah—Hebrew, Hallelujah. That is what the generations will say who read the records of what Jehovah is about to do (v. 19). Sighing (v. 20)—God is in heaven, but he looks to see and listens to hear the moaning of the prisoner and the "children of death" (cf. mg.), i.e., those in danger of death. Declare the name of the Lord (v. 21)—the conversion of the world is to be a conversion to Judaism; at Jerusalem, all men are to praise Jehovah. Gathered together (v. 22)—Israel and other nations; the final result will be the spiritual development of the people of God consisting of Hebrews and non-Hebrews (cf. Isa. 22-4 Mic. 41-5, notes).

23-28. The Unchangeableness of Jehovah Guarantees Deliverance From Present Distress. In v. 23 the psalmist returns to the present; its contrast with the future is striking. The future is glorious, the present evil; days are short, life fleeting and he may not live to see the good days to come. Midst of my days (v. 24)—prematurely; the contrast is between his own brief life and the eternal years of God. In vv. 25-27 God is compared with the age of the earth and the heavens. The most enduring things in the material universe pass away but God is from everlasting to everlasting; they grow old as a garment and are cast off, but God never wears out, he never goes out of style, and will abide forever (cf. Heb. 110-12, where these verses are quoted from the LXX and applied to Christ). The permanence of God guarantees the perpetuity of God's servants and their seed. They shall be re-established in his land forever (v. 28). Cf. Browning's line in Rabbi Ben Ezra: "Earth changes, but thy soul and God stand sure."

PSALM 103. HYMN OF THANKSGIVING
FOR GOD'S MERCIES

The hopes expressed in Psa. 102 have been realized; God has forgiven and restored his people; sorrow has been transformed into joy; now thanksgiving is in order. The psalmist exhorts all the world to join in giving thanks to the great and good Jehovah. As it stands the psalm has every appearance of a liturgical composition; it was probably used when the thank-offering was presented. Though ascribed to David, Aramaic characteristics of the language, dependence on Jeremiah, Isa. 40-66, and Job, as well as general matter and style, point to a post-exilic date.

1-5. Self-exhortation to Praise God. My soul=myself=my inner being. All the spiritual faculties and powers of self are summoned to praise God. Holy name=holy character, as shown in manifestations in history. Forget not (v. 2)—remember all that God has done for you. Count your blessings and praise God accordingly. The surcease from punishment is evidence of forgiveness (v. 3). Diseases—ailments, bodily, mental, and spiritual. God is the Great Physician, who can make men whole. He can snatch the sick man from the very jaws of death. From destruction—from the grave. God has redeemed the people from certain annihilation. Crowneth—a splendid metaphor. God's people are clothed with the garments of holiness and crowned with kindness and mercy (cf. Job 29¹⁴). Jehovah is the giver of every "good and perfect gift." Thy mouth (v. 5)=thy desire or appetite; possibly, "thy years" (cf. mg). The Targum interprets, "the days of old age." The translation "who adorns thee to the full with goodness" brings out more clearly the usual meaning of the words. God is the fountain of immortal youth. Like the eagle—some think of the phoenix bird. The myth of the phoenix supposes that the bird burns up at five hundred years of age and then springs full grown but young and free from its own ashes. The eagle also was supposed to renew its youth by soaring far upward and then plunging into the ocean. The plain meaning of the passage is that those who trust in Jehovah shall ever be strong and buoyant as the eagle (cf. Isa. 40³¹).

6-10. Jehovah Has Been Gracious to Israel in the Past. The general truth expressed in v. 6 has had a new and recent illustration in the deliverance from exile. Moses—God revealed his will to Moses in his Law and his doings to Israel in the Exodus (Ex. 33¹³), but also in subsequent events. Compassion (v. 8)—he has shown how great is his patience and sympathy. Over and over again he gave men still another chance. Plenteous in mercy—a very comforting expression. He will not always chide—he will not stay angry always. He must at times punish, but he will soon relent. After our sins (v. 10)—God does not deal with any of us according to our deserts, but, thank God, according to his plenteous mercy.

11-14. The Greatness of the Divine Mercy and Compassion. High above the earth (v. 11)—the description of the greatness of God's mercy bankrupts imagination. It is greater than the distance between earth and heaven. Them that fear him—true Israelites who maintain an attitude of reverence leading to obedience. Once more in v. 12 the psalmist tries to illustrate the mercy of God. East . . . west—the limits of the horizon, which meant much more to the man of the psalmist's day than to-day. How comforting is this thought to the penitent who has come to hate his sins with the deep loathing of an awakened sinner! V. 13 is one of the finest verses in the Bible. It deserves a place alongside of John 3¹⁶. The frailty of man is pleaded as a basis of God's pity (v. 14). Our frame—God remembers that he made man out of dust. He understands how much to put upon him, how much he can bear.

15-18. Man May Pull Away, But God's Mercy Endures Forever. In vv. 15, 16 is the familiar figure of grass to illustrate man's transitoriness. Man=mankind in general. Mankind moves like a swift river toward the sea of death. On the other hand (v. 17), God is eternal, and his mercy likewise never fails. Man may pass from the stage of action and another generation take his place—but the same God exercises the same mercy toward all the changing generations of men. Children are the inheritors of the grace vouchsafed to the fathers. All these promises belong to those who keep his covenant and remember his commandments to do them.

19-22. Universal Call to Praise. Hath established his throne (v. 19)—his throne is on high and his rule covers heaven and earth; he has proclaimed himself king over all, consequently all are urged to recognize his sovereignty and to praise him. Angels—heavenly beings are called upon to praise him; how much more man! (Cf. pp. 204-5.) Fulfil his word—the angels, full of might, are the messengers of God. Hosts (v. 21)=hosts of heaven; here, probably, the angelic hosts. Ministers—those who stand by his throne to do his pleasure (see on Zech. 4¹⁴). All the celestial hierarchy are called upon to swell the anthem of praise which the earthborn begin. His works (v. 22)—all creation is called upon to join the heavenly chorus. Then the psalmist returns to his starting point: Bless the Lord, O my soul!

PSALM 104. JEHOVAH'S CARE OVER ALL HIS WORKS

Another hymn of thanksgiving, similar in its spirit to Psa. 103. While nothing is known about authorship and date, some are inclined to ascribe it to the author of the preceding psalm. Attention is sometimes called to the similarity between this psalm and the hymn of praise composed in the fourteenth century B.C. by Ikhnaton of Egypt to his god Aton (Breasted, History of Egypt, pp. 371-376).

1-4. Greatness of Jehovah Revealed in Creation. God has clothed himself with the wondrous garments of nature. These are the manifestations of his honor and majesty. Light—light was the first thing created. God creates the light and wraps it about him as a beautiful garment. Light reveals while it conceals. Like a curtain—the sky is stretched out like a blue curtain dotted with bright stars. Waters—the waters “that were above the firmament” (Gen. 17). Here he lays the beams of his chambers, above the curtain of the sky. The clouds his chariots—God manifesting himself in a storm cloud is a familiar figure in the theophanic psalms (18, 29, Hab. 3). Winds his messengers—the great forces of nature are his agents. He makes use of them. The flaming fire—the lightning is his minister. On nature as God’s “garment” see the conception of Goethe, in Faust, of nature as a weaver:

“’Tis thus at the roaring loom of time I ply,
And weave for God the garment thou seest him by.”

5-9. The Formation of the Earth. The conditions of primeval chaos are here described, when the vast void was conceived as a liquid mass. If there were mountains, they had not yet appeared. We have here a remarkable description of God rebuking or driving back the waters. His thunder-voice frightens them and they hasten away. Mountains and valleys appear in the place he has prepared for them. He sets for them bounds that they should remain in their appointed places. The whole is a poetic parallel of Gen. 19, 10. (See pp. 126-7.)

10-18. Beautifying and Fructifying the Earth. Jehovah created springs in the valleys among the hills, so that the beasts may drink from them. The trees grow about these springs and the birds live and sing in them. The valleys are watered by streams, but the mountains are watered from heaven, i.e., by rainfall—from his upper chambers. The earth is watered, refreshed, fertilized and fed by the rains, springs, and streams which God has provided, and thus is made fruitful. Grass . . . cattle, herb . . . man—God produces crops which may serve as food for man and beast. God gives the increase to the efforts of man in the production of food, but grass grows spontaneously for the cattle. Grain, i.e., wheat and barley, wine and oil were the chief products of Canaan (see art., Palestine, p. 59b). The trees of the Lord (v. 16)—the forests do well without the care of man; these are the gardens of God. The stork rarely builds in trees but on houses; but when no houses are available the fir tree is her favorite place. The high hills for the goats, the rocks for the conies—each animal seems to have provided for it a home suitable to its habits.

19-23. The Functions of Sun and Moon. A poetic elaboration of Gen. 1, 17, 18. Moon for seasons—the word “month” is from the word “moon”; the beginning of the month was the new moon; the sun—makes its daily round; God orders the journeys of both. When the sun goes down darkness comes and the beasts of the forest have their time. The young lions seek their food from God. When the sun ariseth the beasts that belong to the night steal away to their dens. Man, who belongs to the day, now goes forth to his labor, and God, who never sleeps, watches over them all.

24-30. Further Marvels of the Divine Creation. The psalmist cries out in wonder at the complexity of God’s works and the wisdom exhibited in them all. Earth is full of the riches (mg., “creatures”) of God. From this exclamation he turns to the wonders revealed in the sea (vv. 25, 26), stretching out before the psalmist’s gaze, full of creeping things innumerable. The sea has always been full of the most alluring mysteries. It could feed, clothe, and fuel the whole world as well as form its great lines of travel and commerce; moreover, what unknown mines and mountain ranges, valleys, deep and broad plains, what fauna and flora must be there, beneath those mighty waters. Ships—stately and useful, with a sweep of freedom unknown on land. Leviathan—see on Job 41, 1-34. God is the great Householder; both land and sea animals seek their meat from him (vv. 27, 28); God gives life as well as food (v. 29). Day by day he gives them breath, and when he withdraws his sustaining influence they die and return to dust. When the present generation of animals die God’s Spirit creates others to take their place (v. 30; cf. on Gen. 63).

31-35. Concluding Prayer and Vows. Vv. 31, 32 contain a prayer for the continuance of these wonderful manifestations in nature. The psalmist vows that he will always praise God and think kindly of him even when he cannot understand (vv. 33, 34). V. 35 is a prayer for the elimination of all that mars the harmony of the universe. This psalm (cf. Psa. 103) begins and ends with Bless the Lord, O my soul! The psalmist then appends a single word in Hebrew, Hallelujah; which is translated, Praise ye the Lord! (But cf. introductory paragraph to Psa. 105.)

PSALM 105. HISTORICAL PSALM OF PRAISE AND ENCOURAGEMENT

The LXX places the word "Hallelujah" at the beginning of this psalm rather than at the end of Psa. 104. If this is correct—and it probably is—then Psa. 103, 104 begin and end with "Bless the Lord, O my soul," and Psa. 105, 106 begin and end with "Hallelujah." The two last mentioned psalms are closely related. Psa. 105 recapitulates the many ways in which Jehovah has proved his faithfulness to the covenant made with Abraham; Psa. 106, a penitential psalm, recites Israel's faithlessness and disobedience. Both psalms reflect conditions during the post-exilic period; they may be the work of one and the same author.

1-6. Summons to Proclaim Jehovah's Mighty Works for His People. Give thanks . . . call upon his name or "proclaim his name." God ever strove to teach Israel that her main business was to make known God to all the world (v. 1). Sing . . . talk—like a modern service, sing his praises and preach his gospel. Holy name=holy character (see on 99³ 103¹; cf. Acts 3⁶). Heart—inward joy, inspired by the consciousness of his presence. Strength (v. 4)—Jehovah is the source of all our power. "The power of a life, like the power of a stream, is in proportion to the altitude of its source." Face=favor. Remember (v. 5)—cf. on Deut. 8¹¹⁻²⁰. Israel had often forgotten. Marvelous works—at the time of the Exodus and later. Judgments of his mouth—on Pharaoh and others. Abraham . . . Jacob—Jacob was in reality the father of the race by whose name, Israel, they were called; but the Hebrews always traced their lineage back two steps further, to Abraham (cf. pp. 1155-6).

7-12. The Theme of the Psalm: Jehovah's Faithfulness. The Lord our God—"Jehovah" was the name applied to God as the God of Israel. Though he was the God of the whole earth, he bore a peculiar relationship to the Hebrews (Ex. 31^{3f.}). Covenant (v. 8)—he remembers his covenant, for it is a word of a thousand generations; i.e., it is timeless, eternal. "Heaven and earth shall pass away, but my word shall never pass away." He made his covenant with Abraham (Gen. 13¹⁴ 17² 21⁶, etc.), with Isaac (Gen. 26³) and with Jacob (28¹³). It would not be enough to say he made it with Abraham, for Abraham had several sons, nor with Isaac, for he had two sons. It was through a chosen line of descendants. God made this covenant with them when they were a feeble folk. When they went from Shechem Jacob said of his family, "we are few" (Gen. 34³⁰).

13-24. Jehovah's Protecting Care of the Patriarchs. God watched over them among the nations. Reproved kings for their sake—as Pharaoh on account of Abraham and Sarah (Gen. 12¹⁷; cf. also 20³). Anointed . . . prophets (v. 15)—the patriarchs are thought of as kings and prophets. A famine in the land—that is one of the commonest occurrences in that land. Famine gave God a chance to show his faithfulness. Staff of bread—sustaining food. Even before the famine started, God sent a man on ahead to prepare to keep them alive. Joseph, however, whom he sent for this purpose, he allowed to go to prison (v. 17). As Job could not understand the ways of God, so Joseph must have been astounded that God should have seemingly forsaken him utterly; but (vv. 19, 20) he waited God's time till his release came and God's purpose in allowing him to go to prison was revealed. God sometimes allows his children to go very low, that he may lift them on high (cf. Eph. 4⁹⁻¹¹). He lifted Joseph from prison to be ruler of rulers (vv. 21, 22; cf. Gen. 50²⁰). Israel=Jacob—cf. 59¹³ 78⁵ Isa. 49⁶. Ham=Egypt in Africa (v. 23). Increased . . . stronger—a slave people rose to such strength that it threatened the peace of the land.

25-36. Display of Jehovah's Power in Egypt. The enmity of Egypt furnished Jehovah special opportunity for the display of his power. He turned their heart (v. 25)—in the psalmist's conception, the hatred of Israel by Pharaoh was but another incident in the eternal purpose of God (cf. Ex. 4²¹ 10¹, etc.). Moses his servant—as he had sent Joseph earlier in his program. Aaron—curiously Aaron nowhere occurs in the story of the Exodus until he is an old man, when he goes out to meet Moses, who was already eighty years old. He has been held in reserve until called upon the stage for his part at the appointed time. His signs—or, the words of his signs. The plagues were proclaimed as signs warning Pharaoh not to stand in the way of God's sovereign will (v. 27). Darkness (v. 28)—the ninth plague is placed first here, perhaps because the people of Egypt worshiped the sun and Jehovah showed his supremacy when he shut out the face of their god. Vv. 28-36 enumerate the plagues recorded in detail in Ex. 7-12.

37-45. From the Exodus Through the Desert to Canaan. He brought them forth with silver and gold (Ex. 12³⁵, 36)—the ethics of this action has often been assailed and need not be defended. Probably the figure is of an army with the spoils of battle (which also cannot be defended according to Christian ethics), among whom none were faint or weary. The story of that last tragic night in Egypt and the dawn of the set day is thrillingly romantic and dramatic (cf. Ex. 12). Egypt was glad to get rid of them. Their presence had brought too much affliction and loss. Following the departure from Egypt Jehovah looked after the fugitives during the desert wanderings (vv. 39–43). Rock (v. 41)—at Rephidim. This must have been a very pleasant memory. Hot and thirsty in a land hopelessly desert, they receive refreshing water from the dry rock (Ex. 17^{1f.}); he also gave them bread (Ex. 16). Remembered (v. 42)—he did not forget his holy promise then, nor will he forget now. Joy . . . singing—as at the Red Sea (Ex. 15). The lands of the nations—he gave them Canaan, civilized with the labors of a thousand years. No other peoples have ever inherited an old civilization complete (v. 44). The purpose of all of God's blessings upon his people is that they may do his will (v. 45). Hallelujah—cf. on 104³⁵.

PSALM 106. ISRAEL'S INGRATITUDE AND DISOBEDIENCE

Though Jehovah always showed himself gracious, the people disregarded his goodness and rebelled against him. This psalm is a confession of the baseness of the people's conduct, followed by a brief prayer for the people's restoration. It may be by the same author as Psa. 105 (see introductory paragraph there).

1–5. Call to Praise Jehovah for His Unfailing Goodness. Calling attention to the continuous mercy of God reveals the more clearly the baseness of the people's sins as described in vv. 6f. Hallelujah—or Praise ye the Lord (v. 1)—some of the early translations consider this a part of the title, not a part of the psalm proper. Israel was to keep the ordinances of God—the reward was prosperity and victory. Vv. 4, 5 contain a personal prayer by the psalmist, that he may participate in the full restoration of his people.

6. Theme of the Psalm: Confession of Sin. The nation's history is dark in deeds of disobedience and general apostasy. The psalmist means to confess not only the sins of his own generation, but also those of the fathers. There is a deep sense of national solidarity.

7–12. Experience at the Red Sea. In the face of God's wonderful manifestations in Egypt the people showed unbelief at the first provocation; but in spite of it God gave them deliverance (vv. 7–11). Their faith was renewed (v. 12); but only for a little while.

13–15. Murmuring for Food. They praised for a while and then they ceased to trust God to take care of them. Lust—they murmured for water and food, all of which God supplied (Ex. 15^{22f.} 16^{2f.} 17^{2f.}); here the reference is to the lusting after flesh (Num. 11^{4f.}). God gave them what they were lusting for and then they "turned to loathing."

16–18. Jealousy of Moses and Aaron. Envied (v. 15)—the rebellion against Aaron and Moses was also rebellion against God. Vv. 17, 18 describes the punishment of the rebels (Num. 16^{31–35} Deut. 11⁶). But punishment did not heal the spiritual disease.

19–23. The Golden Calf. The incident is described in Ex. 32, Deut. 9^{8f.} They could not see God; they wanted an image that they could touch with their human hands. Changed their glory—i.e., Jehovah himself. They exchanged their glorious God for the image of a calf. God their saviour—had they remembered the many deliverances wrought by Jehovah they would not have turned so easily to a "calf." He would destroy them—over and over again they would have perished had it not been for Moses; Moses was their human saviour.

24–27. Cowardice on the Return of the Spies. After they had experienced so many blessings from Jehovah they might have believed that he would give them the promised land to possess. When they again showed lack of faith, Jehovah caused them to die in the wilderness and later scattered their descendants among nations.

28–31. Participation in Moabite Worship. By worshiping idols they brought destruction upon themselves (Num. 25). Phineas took God's part and fought against those who were sinning, and by this act of faith and fidelity, purchased unto himself an immortal name.

32, 33. The Sin at Meribah. Num. 20^{1–13} In this sin Moses became involved. Spake unadvisedly—the sin of Moses was impatience and want of faith (cf. Num. 20¹² Deut. 13⁷ 42^{1f.}).

34–46. Continued Disobedience After Entering Canaan. The whole history is a story of backsliding and coming back to God, only to backslide again; and, on the other side, repeated punishments for their wrong doing. Distress—when they were in distress because of their sins, they always came back to God for help, and as often as they came he pitied them and gave them another chance (v. 44); in spite of their rebellion, God remembered his covenant and showed mercy.

47. Closing Prayer. The climax and ending of the psalm. The confession has been made; God has been merciful again and again; let him show mercy once more by restoring the nation: "Gather us from among the nations, make us a people again."

48. The Doxology. This verse contains a doxology, taken from 1 Chr. 16³⁶, marking the close of Book IV. Cf. 89⁵² 105⁴⁵.

The division between Book IV and Book V seems to be arbitrary; originally the two books formed a single collection (Psa. 90–150; see introduction, p. 509b).

PSALM 107. A CALL TO THANKSGIVING

In this psalm (which begins Book V) there is a call to thank Jehovah for deliverance, yea, for many deliverances throughout Israel's entire history. It was meant originally for the recently returned exiles from Babylon; by recalling the manifold mercies of God they might be encouraged to rely upon him when things looked dark in their own day. It comes, therefore, from the early post-exilic period.

1-3. A Call to Give Thanks. First Reason: the Return. The redeemed of the Lord (v. 2)—in post-exilic literature these words usually refer to those delivered from exile in Babylonia; more rarely to deliverance from bondage in Egypt. Gathered—the Jews have ever been a people of dispersion, and there may have gathered in Jerusalem after the Exile Jews from every point of the compass. Cf. the gathering at Pentecost (Acts 25).

4-9. Deliverance of Travelers Lost in the Desert. Vv. 4-32 contain four pictures representing the goodness of God in rescuing people from extreme peril. The first is that of travelers lost in the desert. It is a vivid portrayal of a lost people—wandering in the desert between Egypt and Palestine, or between Palestine and Babylonia, more likely the former—recounting the mercy of God, how he led them through these troubles to a settled land and an inhabited city. This may be the experience of every soul lost from God. For such wonderful help men should ever praise Jehovah, especially those who had been the recipients of special grace (v. 8), such as are described in vv. 4-7. Here as in the similar passages, vv. 15, 21, 31, the exhortation is addressed to the persons whose rescue is described in the verses immediately preceding. God satisfies the hungry soul (v. 9). The reference is primarily to the satisfaction of the hungry desert travelers.

10-16. Second Reason for Thanksgiving: Jehovah Frees the Prisoner. Perhaps he has in mind the prisons of the Babylonian Exile. The exiles were, however, in no sense prisoners; they enjoyed almost as much freedom as had been theirs at home. The prison experiences are the results of disobedience to God (vv. 10-13); but when the prisoners cried unto him he saved them, as usual (v. 13); he released them from the prisons, even on the eve of execution (v. 14). Hence the exhortation to praise Jehovah for what he has done (cf. v. 8). Gates of brass—neither gates of brass nor bars of iron can keep Jehovah from releasing the prisoner.

17-22. Third Reason for Thanksgiving: Restoration from Sickness. A similar passage is found in Job 33:17-28—men are fools; they sin, only to be afflicted because of their sins. Abhorreth all manner of meat—their afflictions spoil their digestion; they come to the verge of death, but “out of the depths they cry,” and he saves them (vv. 18, 19). Sendeth his word—which possesses power to heal them; even though they are at the point of death (v. 20). For the refrain in v. 21 see on v. 8. To the praises of the lips are to be added sacrifices of thanksgiving—a thankful heart will inevitably be revealed with proper thank-offerings of our substance (cf. Mal. 3:8-10).

23-32. Fourth Reason for Thanksgiving: Rescue of Sailors Caught in a Storm. That do business—sea merchants. See the eloquent description of the great merchant fleets of Tyre in Ezek. 27. The works of the Lord—the sea impresses one with the greatness and majesty of Him who makes and governs it. The stormy wind—God creates the storm, which at sea is especially terrible (vv. 25-27); but when the sailor calls upon God, he hears and brings calm, gladness, and a safe haven. For the refrain in v. 31 see on v. 8. V. 32 contains an additional call to praise him, in the assembly and in the seat of the elders—the legislature. Let church and state join in praising God.

33-43. God's Providential Government of the World. From specific instances the psalmist turns to more general manifestations of the divine mercy and power. Under the hand of God the very earth shifts. Fertile lands may be turned into desert because of the sins of their inhabitants; on the other hand, desert places may be made fruitful and glorious (vv. 33-38). Trouble may, indeed, come; but Jehovah will be present to help and deliver; which will bring joy to the upright and disappointment to the wicked (vv. 39-42). Whoso is wise—the wise man can learn useful lessons from observing the providential acts of God (v. 43; cf. Hos. 14:9).

PSALM 108. A PRAYER FOR HELP AGAINST ISRAEL'S FOES

The material of this psalm is taken from 57:7-11 and 60:5-12. It is later than the component parts; in other words, though ascribed to David in the title, it is undoubtedly post-exilic in origin.

1-5. Resolution of Joyous Thanksgiving, Followed by Prayer. His will and purposes are steadfastly fixed to sing the divine praises. Some ancient translations read prepared. Awake, psaltery and harp—they have been silent through days of exile. I will awake right early—better, I will awake the dawn; I will sing before the sunrise. I will celebrate the dawn of our deliverance. Among the peoples (v. 3)—in contrast to the thought of 1374, “How shall we sing Jehovah’s song in a foreign land?” Now he proposes to sing boldly the praises of Jehovah in the midst of the nations who had seen both Israel’s downfall and deliverance. *Among the nations—*may indicate the composition of the psalm after the decree of Cyrus, but before the writer had returned. Above (read unto) the heavens (v. 4)—the greatness of God’s mercy is incomparable. As God’s mercy is high as the heavens, so praise to him should be just as high; and as God has given his people such wonderful evidence of his love and mercy, so his people should exalt him in their hearts and lives as well as with their mouths.

6-13. Prayer for Help and Expression of Assurance. Beloved—this term runs through the Bible; it is probably the forerunner of the technical term applied to a group or party in later Judaism—the “Hasidim.” In his holiness (v. 7)—the holy aspects of God’s character make it impossible for him to fail. God is the subject and the speaker. Shechem . . . Succoth—two cities connected with the history of Jacob, their father (Gen. 33¹⁷, 18 Josh. 13²⁷); the former represents the territory west of the Jordan; the latter, the territory east of the Jordan; similarly, Gilead and Manasseh represent the territory east of the Jordan and Judah and Ephraim that west of the river. Moab—proverbially proud, is compared to a basin for washing the feet. Edom is to be either a rubbish heap upon which cast off shoes are thrown, or a menial slave to whom the victorious warrior casts his dusty sandals. Philistia—over this most powerful of Israel’s enemies God will shout in victorious triumph.

Beginning with v. 10 we are led to believe that the preceding has been only a hope. It now takes the form of a prayer for its accomplishment. Fenced city . . . Edom—the strong city of Edom was Petra, the ancient capital, carved out of solid rock and almost entirely inaccessible. God alone can lead to such a victory (vv. 11-13) and he will surely do it.

PSALM 109. PRAYER FOR VENGEANCE

An “imprecatory” psalm. It opens with a prayer for help against merciless enemies; but when he thinks of the injustice which has been done to him as well as to others, he breaks out in bitter, uncontrolled denunciation. The psalm probably belongs to the post-exilic age.

1-5. Appeal for Help against Cruel Foes.

Hold not thy peace—the psalmist prays that God will break his silence, in the midst of the noisy clamor of enemies. He does not mince words about his enemies. While God is silent, their mouths are open and pouring forth lies, they hate him, and this hatred is not only without cause but is returning evil for good.

6-20. Passionate Prayer of Retribution. The particular enemy condemned seems to be an officer; a class that have almost always been oppressive in the East. The psalmist prays that an accuser or adversary should always stand at the right hand of this cruel oppressor. When he is judged—let the case always go against him (v. 7). His prayer turned into sin—when a wicked man prays to God, without true penitence, he is asking God to take the part of the wicked and thus subvert the whole moral order. His days be few—long life was the summum bonum to the Jews; hence a short life was a curse of God. Let his misdeeds fall even upon his family. Children vagabonds and beg—this is an awful curse, but quite in keeping with ancient Oriental thought. Desolate places=ruined houses; perhaps, “driven out of their ruined homes.”

Many read, v. 11, “Let a creditor ensnare all that he hath and foreigners plunder his labor.” Let none show him mercy and none show pity to his fatherless children (v. 12). Posterity be cut off—this was a serious matter to the Hebrew, for, if that happens, in one generation his name will be completely forgotten. In vv. 14, 15 a curse is asked even because of the sins of the parents. In the case of the psalmist’s enemy, may the ancient law (see Ex. 20⁵), according to which the sins of the fathers are to be visited on the children, be fully met.

The psalmist explains, in vv. 16-18, why he is asking such dire curses: the one cursed lacked mercy, persecuted the poor, and killed the broken in heart; he loved cursing, and therefore he is getting only what he fully deserved. He delighted not in blessing, and he is not to be blessed. He clothed himself also with cursing as with his garment. Therefore may cursing be his clothing and may it never get far away from him. Reward—there is ever an insistence that all this imprecation was deserved.

21-31. Prayer for Pity and Deliverance. The psalmist expects no help from his enemies; but God can and will have mercy on him. V. 22 is a confession; poor, needy, wounded within—heart wounds are the sorest of all. Shadow (v. 23)—see on 102¹¹; his strength is completely gone (vv. 24-26); there is no one to whom he can turn but God (v. 27). However, if God will bless, let the enemy curse all he will (v. 28). Once again, in v. 29, he implores God to bring his enemies to such shame and confusion that he will be completely vindicated in the eyes of all about; then he will praise Jehovah (v. 30); for when the poor comes up for judgment the accusers may be there with lying lips, but Jehovah will stand at the right hand to bless and deliver them (v. 31).

PSALM 110. THE VICTORIOUS KING

The psalmist here asserts that Jehovah will exalt his lord to a place "at his right hand," from which he will exercise dominion over the conquered nations. The psalm is therefore regarded as Messianic. It is of special interest because of the use made of it by Jesus (Mk. 12:35f. Mt. 22:41f. Lk. 20:41f.). In the title the psalm is ascribed to David, and there are those who believe that the words of Jesus make Davidic authorship certain. A closer study of Jesus' use, however, shows that the value of his argument is not affected by the question of authorship; which means that in this, as in all similar cases, the question must be determined on the basis of all the various kinds of evidence available; and on the basis of such evidence many modern commentators are inclined to date the psalm in the Maccabean age.

1-3. Jehovah's Decree Concerning the King. My lord—a title of respect and reverence. At my right hand—the place of honor, but more is implied, namely, that the king will share Jehovah's throne. Thine enemies thy footstool—it was an ancient custom for victorious kings to place their feet upon the necks of their conquered enemies—this indicates complete subjugation (cf. 108⁹). Rod of strength (v. 2)—read scepter (A.S.V. mg.); the scepter of power and authority is to be stretched out from Zion, the new capital. Offer themselves willingly (v. 3)—read The people are freewill offerings in the day of the army muster. Human agency is necessary to the accomplishment of divine tasks. In the beauties of holiness—read, with R.V. mg., in holy attire; probably connected with that which follows, Out of the womb of the morning thou hast the dew of thy youth. The first clause may refer to the holy mountains where the armies mustered; the morning was considered the mother of the dew. The general thought of the verses is that the new king will be strong, enjoying eternal youth, and will have the ready and enthusiastic co-operation of his subjects.

4. The Royal Ruler will Fill the Priestly Office. The ideal ruler will possess both priestly and kingly functions. This was true in the earliest days of Israel's history and again during the Maccabean period. After the order of Melchizedek—Melchizedek did not occupy the priestly office because of family relationship but, it is assumed, by divine appointment. Similarly, the Messianic priest-king might claim his priesthood on the basis of the immutable decree of God, who with solemn oath confirmed the appointment. He is to be such forever—this is no temporary assignment; continually he will exercise the prerogatives of a mediatorial priesthood. For the use made of this statement by the author of the Epistle to the Hebrews, see p. 1310. It should be noted that if the psalm comes from the Maccabean age, it reflects actual conditions in the Jewish community at the time: (1) Simon was the ecclesiastical as well as the civil head; (2) the Maccabees belonged to the priestly tribe of Levi.

5-7. The Priest-King's Victory. The scene is now upon the battlefield. Thy right hand—as chief support. Strike through kings—in the day of the judgment of the nations; nothing shall stand before him. In the great battle the king will not stop, but press on to glorious victory. This ruler is not a prince of peace, but a lord of war.

PSALM 111. THE POWER, GOODNESS AND RIGHTEOUSNESS OF JEHOVAH

This is the first of the "Hallel" songs (Psa. 111-118; sometimes, however, the designation is given only to Psa. 113-118). They are so called (1) because of the frequent use of the term Hallelujah=Praise ye Jehovah; and (2) because they are the "Praise Songs" used at the three great festivals of Passover, Pentecost and Tabernacles. This and Psa. 112 are acrostics, each having twenty-two lines, the number of letters in the Hebrew alphabet, and the successive lines beginning with successive letters. The two psalms are closely connected also in language and contents; though in Psa. 112 some of the expressions applied to God in Psa. 111 are applied to godly men (see comments). Both undoubtedly belong to the post-exilic period, but the dates cannot be determined more exactly.

1. Promise of Praise. Hallelujah—no part of the main structure of the psalm; it is simply a liturgical call to praise. I will give thanks unto the Lord with my whole heart—not alone with lips but from the depths of my innermost being will I praise him. The council of the upright—rather, in the intimate fellowship of the individual members of the group. Congregation—in the gatherings of those intimate friends in the house of God. The reference is to private prayer and public worship.

2-8. Grounds of Praise. There is every reason why the psalmist should praise God. The works of the Lord are great—he has wrought wonderfully for his people Israel and this is the ground of that great praise which is here proposed. Sought out—the works of God are manifest in their wondrous glory to all who have eyes to see. The saints of God seek to see his works and to delight in them. Honor . . . majesty—or “his work is honorable and glorious”; i.e., it expresses his great majesty. To be remembered—Jehovah has appointed ordinances and rituals that will remind all succeeding generations that the Lord is gracious and full of compassion (v. 4). Meat—literally, “prey” (v. 5, mg.). Possibly the expression means that Jehovah has snatched the prey from the mouth of their enemies and has given it to them for food. The word may be used simply for the purpose of securing the right letter for the acrostic. He is a covenant keeping God. Heritage of the nations—he made them inherit the land of Canaan, previously in possession of other nations. Truth and judgment (justice)—these are eternal attributes of God. V. 8 emphasizes the solidity with which the divine precepts and commandments are founded; they are resting upon truth and uprightness. These attributes of Jehovah are the sure proof that he will fulfill all of his promises and keep all of his covenants.

9, 10. Recapitulation of God's Mercies to His People. In contemplation of these wonderful works of God the psalmist breaks forth into animated exclamation: Holy and reverend is his name. The fear of the Lord is the beginning of wisdom. To fear Jehovah, i.e., to take an attitude of reverence toward him, is the beginning or the crown of all true wisdom (cf. Prov. 17 9¹⁰ Job 28). The praise of God will endure forever (v. 10). His wonderful works and mercies toward his people guarantee that men shall always praise him.

PSALM 112. THE PROSPERITY AND BLESSEDNESS OF GOD-FEARING MEN

The righteous character of the God-fearing man is a reflection of the character of God himself. On the contents, date, and relation to Psa. 111 see introductory paragraph to the latter psalm. There are no clearly marked divisions in the psalm. The characteristics of the God-fearing man are outlined; the rewards he receives from God are described; and the psalm closes with an announcement of the destruction of the wicked.

1-3. Blessed Is the God-Fearing Man. Such a man will want to do God's will; hence he studies his commandments (1¹, 2¹). His seed—his influence shall be so great that succeeding generations will be men of God and prosperous (contrast 109¹³). An upright man creates a condition in the midst of which upright children develop. In accordance with general O.T. thought, honor and wealth are promised and come to the upright man (cf. Isa. 53¹⁰, 11).

4-6. Reward of the Righteous. V. 4 describes the righteous man; he is gracious and compassionate. There ariseth light—the light of prosperity: Fortunate the man who has the will power to turn his emotions into action. Maintain his cause—better “manage his affairs;” the God-fearing man will manage his own business so as to hurt no one. His prosperity is not temporary, but permanent.

7-10. Permanence of the Righteous, Destruction of the Wicked. Afraid—the righteous man has no premonitions of impending evil. Fixed—or steadfast, which gives him calm confidence. His trust is in Jehovah, and his purpose fixed (v. 8); consequently he is sure that ultimately his enemies will be defeated. Dispersed—almsgiving shall be remembered forever. The wicked behold the works of the righteous and are angry because of the thwarting of their own evil plans (v. 10); and they will die disappointed.

PSALM 113. GRATITUDE FOR RESTORATION FROM EXILE

The first of the smaller group of “Hallel” psalms (113-118; see introductory note to Psa. 111). It is a call to praise Jehovah who, though exalted above the nations in heavenly glory, condescends to care for the weak and oppressed on earth. It is post-exilic in origin.

1-3. Call to Universal and Unceasing Praise. Servants—all true Israelites, ready to do Jehovah's will. Name—may mean either character, or manifestations of Jehovah, or Jehovah himself. The praise of Jehovah is to be universal (v. 3).

4-6. Ground of Praise: Jehovah's Majesty and Condescension. High above all (v. 4)—a picture of the majesty of Jehovah, enthroned in glory. Who is like (v. 5)—he is incomparable; there is no one like him. Humbleth himself—though enthroned in heaven Jehovah bows down to observe what is going on on the earth as well as in the heavens.

7-9. Jehovah's Condescension. Jehovah's interest in man and his doings has frequently shown itself. The poor—he concerns himself with earth's lowly, yea, with earth's lowliest; dunghill—a figure implying extreme degradation and misery. His concern is to lift up the needy. With princes (v. 8)—he takes those who trust him even from the dunghill and sets them with princes. Barren woman—he is kind even to the barren woman, so that she comes to know the joy of motherhood (cf. 1 Sam. 2¹⁻¹⁰).

PSALM 114. GOD'S DELIVERANCE OF ISRAEL FROM EGYPT

This psalm has been called a perfect poem, exquisite in form and marvelously artistic; its parallelism is faultless. It was used by Dante for his spirits on their way to Purgatory; at present it is widely used as a prayer for the dying. While it celebrates primarily the deliverance from Egypt, it was written after the return from Babylon as a celebration of Israel's second birth—the return from Babylon.

1, 2. The Exodus from Egypt. This marked Israel's birthday (Hos. 11¹). Out of Egypt—a favorite theme; they had been strangers in the midst of strange people. Judah . . . Israel—the whole nation. Sanctuary—the Temple in Jerusalem. Dominion—external and temporal power. The thought is not that Judah was especially sacred or that Israel stood pre-eminently for dominion; it is simply an attempt to complete the parallelism and to state that the whole life of Israel came under God's control.

3, 4. Obstacles Overcome. Jehovah cleared the way of all obstacles. Sea—the Red Sea is personified and represented as seeing the people, with Jehovah marching at their head, and frightened, fleeing from his awful presence. "Awestruck nature recognized and obeyed its Master's will." A little later the Jordan was driven back. The mountains are likewise represented as frightened animals running here and there. Perhaps the disturbances at Sinai are intended (Ex. 19:16-18; cf. Isa. 55:12).

5, 6. Why Did Nature Act Like This? The psalmist here pictures himself as standing back with those early fathers, watching the mighty spectacle and addressing the personified objects of nature. "What was the matter with you, Sea? What ailed you, Jordan? Ye mountains and hills, what were you doing?"

7, 8. The Irresistible Power of Jehovah. The psalmist now turns to the present once more. No wonder nature does these marvelous things. There is a reason: God has revealed himself in its presence. He made a flinty rock a fountain of water (Ex. 17:6). So shall he bring forth streams of blessing for his people.

PSALM 115. JEHOVAH AND IDOLS

The psalmist knows that the misfortunes of Israel have sometimes led their enemies to suggest that Jehovah was weak and incompetent, while their own gods were strong. This is not the case. Jehovah is far superior to the heathen gods who can do nothing for their worshipers. Let the people trust in him, and in his own good time he will bless them and deliver them. Apparently, the psalm reflects an experience of deep humiliation and a recent encounter with idols. It may look back to the Babylonian Exile. It is undoubtedly post-exilic.

1-3. Appeal to Jehovah to Deliver His People and Thus Vindicate Himself. Not unto us—the prayer is for the vindication of Israel, for the sake of Jehovah's good name. Where is now their God? The gods of the heathen were such gods as could be handled and seen and catalogued; the Hebrew God could be seen only in his works; but the treatment of his people raised questions regarding his reality and power. The psalmist answers boldly: Our God is in the heavens—he is not within the house in the form of wood or stone or even gold. He is spirit. He has done whatever he pleased to do and here about us is the evidence of his master workmanship.

4-8. Contrast between Jehovah and Heathen Gods. How different! Their idols—human built and in human likeness, they do not even have the human intellect. They have every physical attribute of the human being but are utterly impotent to use any of them (vv. 5-7). They that make them shall be like unto them—as the gods, so the men. We are no better than the gods we make and we rise no higher than our conception of the Deity.

9-13. Exhortation to Trust Jehovah. Trust—not in perishable gods (described above) but in the eternal. He is their help and their shield—transition to the third person on account of the antiphonal character. Probably the first line was sung by the precentor and the answer by the congregation. House of Aaron—vv. 9, 10, 11, form parallel appeals; the main characters are Israel, Aaron, and those that fear Jehovah. Each in turn is urged to trust in Jehovah. Note the narrowing process: the address is first to the whole nation, Israel; then to the priestly order, the sons of Aaron; then to the inner circle of the true devotees who fear Jehovah. Hath been mindful—Jehovah will answer such a prayer and such trust; he will bless Israel, Aaron, and the fearers of the Lord; which means that he will bless all who trust him. Small and great—all, without distinction. Rank and reputation mean nothing to him; trust means everything.

14-18. Prayers for Divine Blessings and Promise to Praise Jehovah. May Jehovah increase the little congregation who had returned to Palestine. Children—while a large family was ever a matter of rejoicing to the Hebrew, it was even more so now when their numbers had been so sadly depleted in the Exile. The optimistic trust in Jehovah is justified by the greatness of his power (v. 15).

He made heaven and earth, in contrast to the heathen idols who are powerless; they cannot even feel or smell or see. Now is the time to praise Jehovah (vv. 17, 18). The dead praise not the Lord—a thought frequently expressed that the dead in Sheol can no longer praise God (cf. 65⁸ 88¹⁰⁻¹² Eccl. 9¹⁰, etc.).

PSALM 116. THANKSGIVING FOR DELIVERANCE FROM IMMINENT DANGER OF DEATH

The psalmist has apparently been in extreme personal peril, from which he has been delivered by the grace of Jehovah. The recovery of Hezekiah has been suggested (Isa. 38), but there are many indications of a later date, and the psalm may express the deep gratitude of any saint for deliverance from some grave danger. The language, with its strong Aramaic coloring, favors a late post-exilic date. In the same direction points the dependence on other psalms.

1, 2. Answered Prayer Demands Loving Gratitude. I love—one could never love an impersonal God, but since he concerns himself with our welfare, we can love him. We love him because he first loved us.

3, 4. Prayer in Peril. Death and Sheol, the most dreaded enemies of man, are visualized as huntsmen lying in wait with snares and pulling the cords close about the necks of their victims, or driving them into a narrow valley whence there is no escape. Name=the character of Jehovah (cf. on 113¹⁻³).

5, 6. Revelation of God's Character. Jehovah not only hears, but he hears graciously, and mercifully. These are the amazing attributes of God. His sovereignty is a matter of course, and his justice all would expect, but grace and mercy for a sinful race are far more comforting (Ex. 34⁶). Preserveth the simple (v. 6)—how comforting that is! Earthly potentates are usually impatient with ignorance and weakness; not so God. The simple are the objects of his special care and sympathy. A proof that he preserveth the simple is that I was brought low and he helped me.

7-9. Self-Encouragement on the Basis of God's Mercy. Return unto thy rest, O my soul—cease taking anxious thought for the morrow, and rest in that blessed trust which walks with God in the night as well as in the light. Jehovah has delivered me from death, tears, and stumbling. Therefore since God has been so gracious to me, I, on my part, will walk before him, as his own, as long as I live.

10-14. Triumph of Faith and Thanksgiving. V. 10 begins a new section. Before, it was "I love," now, "I believe." The conception of this psalm is very high. Notice "love," "prayer," "grace," "mercy," "faith." I believe—better,

I believed; I never lost faith in the heavenly Father; I did lose faith in men (2 Cor. 4¹³). All men are a lie—Hebrew, "liars." In his extremity they probably forsook him as men frequently do, but God was faithful. The psalmist senses his obligation to God and inquires what task God will set him that he may show his appreciation of his goodness to him (v. 12). Cup of salvation (v. 13)=cup of blessing. Pay my vows—I will acknowledge my obligation and proclaim my gratitude. The psalmist had been in peril and had made vows as to what he would do if he got well (cf. 50¹⁴).

15-19. Jehovah's Care for His Beloved. God cares for his people while they walk in the land of the living, he hears their prayers, he heals their infirmities, and when they come to die he is not unmindful of them. Many have felt in the hour when death enters the home that God has forgotten; but it is not so; even then he cares and his dying saints are precious in his sight. No wonder martyrs have gone to their death with these words on their lips. Thy servant and the son of thine handmaid—not only a servant but one born in the house, and so of "the household of God." Thou hast loosed my bonds—of infirmity, and so purchased me with kindness and placed me in the bonds of love and gratitude forever. Sacrifice of thanksgiving—more precious to God than all other sacrifices. Gratitude expressed in loving deeds is the greatest of all virtues. In the presence of all his people—stress is laid on public thanksgiving (cf. 22²⁵ 66¹³).

PSALM 117. PSALM OF PRAISE

We get a glimpse here of the message of Deutero-Isaiah and of Jonah. The ultimate purpose of Jehovah in choosing Israel is that Israel may call all other nations to praise him. Its occasion may have been the celebration of some special deliverance, but more likely it is simply a clarion call to the universal praise of Jehovah. It is the shortest of the psalms.

All ye nations—this was a far reach for a Hebrew who was rather nationalistically inclined. Mercy is great—greater than their transgressions. Truth—mercy and truth are fundamental attributes of God.

PSALM 118. SONG OF PRAISE FOR DELIVERANCE

The last of the "Hallel" psalms (see intro. to Psa. 111), in which the spirit of jubilant thanksgiving finds fullest expression. It seems to celebrate some great deliverance; the people came together and formed a procession which marched to the Temple singing the praises of their deliverer. Various dates have been suggested. Some scholars think that it may have been written at the time the second Temple was built. Baethgen makes the definite assertion that it was sung for the first time at the Feast of Tabernacles in the year 444 B.C. Cheyne thinks of the time of Judas Maccabæus. There is much to be said in favor of the time of the rebuilding of the walls under Nehemiah (v. 25 occurs in the prayer of Nehemiah, Neh. 11¹).

1-4. Call to Praise. All Israel is urged to praise Jehovah because of his unfailing goodness. His mercy endureth forever—the same refrain runs through Psa. 136; it contains blessed promises, upon which men may always depend. Israel—the whole nation. House of Aaron=priests; let them take part in the great cry. Once again “the fearers of Jehovah” are named; perhaps “the saints.”

5-9. Israel Acknowledges Jehovah as Her Deliverer. Out of the “straitness” of Israel among her enemies, Jehovah has loosened her bands and widened her boundaries, till now the people feel free and secure round about. “If God be for us who can be against us?” (Rom. 8³¹.) On my side (v. 7)—there are those who help and those who hate, and since Jehovah takes the part of those who help, victory is certain. Trust in Jehovah is better than confidence in man (v. 8), or even confidence in kings or princes (v. 9).

10-14. Victory Through Jehovah. It was Jehovah’s help that enabled them to withstand hostile attacks. All nations compassed me about—Israel was sore beset by encompassing enemies. But such circumstances were common throughout Israel’s history. Like bees . . . as the fire of thorns (v. 12)—in great numbers and with destructive force. But no matter what they are, in the name of Jehovah triumph is assured. The onslaught against Israel was fierce but Jehovah helped and the enemy failed (v. 13). V. 14 reproduces some words from the Song of Moses after the crossing of the Red Sea, the great deliverance which was ever a theme of thanksgiving (cf. Ex. 15²).

15-18. Grateful Rejoicing. In grateful recognition of Jehovah’s help the people rejoice. While the procession is passing the booths of the pilgrims they shout for joy. V. 16 contains the words of the shout they give. Israel has been sore beset and nigh unto death; but with full assurance she cries out: “I shall not die but live; he has chastened me sore but has not given me over to death.”

19-24. Entrance into the Temple Courts. Vv. 19-21 represent the procession as reaching the gate and demanding entrance. The choir from within reminds the marchers without that it is the gate of the Lord, and that only the righteous may enter and praise Jehovah.

The stone which the builders rejected is become the head of the corner—the metaphor may have an historical background. There is a tradition of a time when, in the building of King Solomon’s Temple, a stone was found without seeming purpose and was thrown away; later it was discovered that the chief corner stone was lacking and the rejected stone fitted this most important place. Israel was rejected by her neighbors as a useless race, but they were found at last to possess the very elements upon which the structure of human society and salvation rested. So Jesus, despised and rejected of men, is found to be the chief corner stone of human salvation (Mk. 12^{10, 11} Lk. 20¹⁷ Acts 4¹¹ 1 Pet. 27). The Lord’s doing (v. 23)—this is the way the Lord does it, and we marvel at his miraculous power and amazing mercy. This is the day (v. 24)—this holiday which is being celebrated—God made it, preserved it; it is his, and we will celebrate it.

25-29. Vows and Prayers, Blessings and Praises. Save now—it is not enough to celebrate the victories of the past; the psalmist utters a prayer for carrying forward the work into the future. The procession enters the Temple and the priests cry this word of welcome and blessing (v. 26; cf. Mt. 21⁹). Hath given us light (v. 27)—the night of despair is over, and the morning of a new day dawns. The psalm ends as it begins.

PSALM 119. MEDITATIONS UPON THE LAW OF JEHOVAH

The psalm was never intended to be sung or chanted, but was probably recited by the Levitical reciters of the choir. There is in the psalm a noteworthy passion for the Law. “O how I love thy law” and similar expressions indicate the ardor with which the psalmist went about obeying the law. It was to him no irksome task, no driving duty, but a passionate privilege that brought joy and comfort to him.

The author seems saturated with the teachings of Deuteronomy. The arrangement is interesting. It is, like Psa. 111, 112, and others, an alphabetic acrostic. There are twenty-two stanzas, each headed by a letter of the alphabet; each stanza contains eight verses and each of these begins with the letter which stands at the head of the paragraph. Every one of these lines refers to the Law. The vocabulary is varied. The fact of so many words used for “Law”—there are ten of these: Law, Word, Saying, Commandment, Statutes, Ordinances, Precepts, Testimony, Way, Path—is remarkable. This psalm made a great impression upon the early Fathers. It has been called the alphabet of love. The great teaching of the psalm is that love and law are never in conflict. This psalm is a splendid proclamation of the majesty of the Law. To the psalmist the law is but the will of God and his method of expressing himself in the world. It is more than stern justice; it is a helpful path by which the upright may see his way. It suggests the close relationship between God and man. Throughout this, the longest chapter of the whole Bible, there is kept before the mind of the reader the personality of God. He is in the world which he made and is greater than the laws which he has promulgated and moves with majesty amid those laws. They are, in fact, the revelation of him (cf. pp. 163-4).

Date and authorship are unknown. Some have suggested the period of the exile, about 560 B.C., others, the time of Nehemiah, about 440 B.C., still others, the early Greek period, about 250 B.C. Undoubtedly it is a late postexilic production, when the Law had come to assume a position of authority; it reflects the emotions of a pious soul who found the Law a real means of grace. The exact date cannot be determined.

In this commentary it may be sufficient to give the substance of each paragraph; for a more detailed study larger commentaries may be consulted. (On the place of the Law in postexilic times, see intro. to Ezra-Nehemiah, pp. 455-7, and cf. pp. 169-70.

1-8. Aleph. The psalmist makes a statement about the beauty of loyal obedience to the Law and utters a determined prayer that God's Law may become the fixed rule of his life.

9-16. Beth. Youth may be clean and prosperous by loving the Law of Jehovah. It is a safeguard as well as a joy.

17-24. Gimel. Nothing better can ever be done, in time of persecution, than to observe the Law of Jehovah. It will always prove a comfort and strength.

25-32. Daleth. The psalmist is in trouble and bowed to the dust. In his difficulty he prays for strength to keep him steadfast in the observance of the statutes, precepts, word, truth, testimonies, and commandments of Jehovah.

33-40. He. This whole paragraph is a prayer that the psalmist may observe to do the Law of Jehovah.

41-48. Waw. He still prays that Jehovah will keep him strong to bear witness even before kings.

49-56. Zayin. Jehovah's Law has been adequate in the time of affliction and trial and has brought hope and joy.

57-64. Heth. Once again he proclaims his devotion to the Law of Jehovah.

65-72. Teth. Affliction is a schoolmaster to teach us the way of right; it is one expression of Jehovah's interest and love.

73-80. Yodh. Affliction is all right if it does not last too long. The psalmist prays for surcease from his own sufferings, that the righteous may be comforted and the wicked brought to shame.

81-88. Kaph. Jehovah tries him almost beyond endurance, but he will be faithful as he has been through all affliction to the present moment.

89-96. Lamed. The impregnable rock of Scripture, the eternal Law of Jehovah, which cannot be shaken, remains forever the hope and encouragement of the saints of God.

97-104. Mem. This stanza pours out the passionate devotion of the singer to Jehovah and his Law. It is one of the few paragraphs containing no petition (cf. vv. 161-168).

105-112. Nun. The Law of God is the guide of his footsteps, and he vows to keep it forever, whatever risks it may involve.

113-120. Samech. The psalmist contrasts his own situation with that of those who disobey the Law. He finds safety and inspiration in his own loyalty and love.

121-128. Ayin. Because he has kept the Law, he pleads that fact as a reason why Jehovah should deliver and recognize him; the faithlessness of others only increases his own love for the Law.

129-136. Pe. The beauty of the Law of Jehovah and its benefits. His eyes are weary with weeping because others fail to see in it what he sees and do not keep the Law of the Lord.

137-144. Sadhe. Jehovah's Law is righteous and pure, and therefore it challenges the deepest devotion and the highest reverence.

145-152. Koph. The psalmist unceasingly prays that he may be kept faithful to the Law, in the midst of people who disregard it. He wants the Law to be the supreme rule of his life.

153-160. Resh. He prays for deliverance and works in a kind of refrain beginning with the word Quicken:

"Quicken me according to thy word."
"Quicken me according to thine ordinances."
"Quicken me according to thy loving-kindness."

161-168. Shin. This stanza contains no petition (cf. vv. 97-104). The psalmist professes diligent observance of the Law and love for it.

169-176. Taw. A final outburst of determination to do the will of Jehovah and to delight in his law. A petition for Jehovah, in view of such fidelity, to seek his servant like a lost sheep.

PSALM 120. CRY FOR HELP AGAINST QUARRELSOME NEIGHBORS

Psa. 120-134 bear the title "Song of Ascents." This expression has received a variety of explanations. The most probable of these looks upon the psalms as a collection of "Pilgrim Psalms," used in connection with the pilgrimages to Jerusalem undertaken by pious Jews in Palestine and in the Diaspora. All of the pilgrim songs should be studied with the historical situation in mind: The pilgrims have come from afar, and they have had many hard experiences. They have traveled over robber-infested deserts, have been lost on the trackless wastes and buffeted by storms and hunger and thirst; many of them died on the way. The faithful Mohammedan to-day finds such difficulties on his way to Mecca and other shrines. All the psalms reflect conditions during the post-exilic period, chiefly in the days of Nehemiah.

If Psa. 120 is taken as reflecting the conditions in the post-exilic community, it may refer to the troublous days of Nehemiah, whose building enterprises were interfered with by the Samaritans. It may, however, be descriptive of experiences suffered by pilgrims from some distant land on their journey to Jerusalem. Liars misdirected them, robbers beset them; but when they cried to Jehovah, he delivered them.

1. Affirmation of Confidence in God. His experience has been that Jehovah answers prayer in the day of distress; hence he will trust him now.

2-4. Prayer for Deliverance from Unscrupulous Enemies and for Just Retribution. He prays that he may be personally innocent of those sins which he complains of in others, lying and slanderous words. What kind of punishment shall be meted out to the deceiver? (V. 3.) The retribution is described in terms suggested by the offense. Sharp arrows (v. 4)—the tongue, the deceitful tongue, has shot forth mighty arrows, piercing the vitals of those slandered by it (cf. Prov. 26¹⁸ Jer. 93, 8). It, in return, shall be pierced with real arrows (Jas. 32-10). Coals of juniper—or "broom" (mg.). His slander has kindled fires of strife; the compensation will be similar.

5-7. Lament over the Pitiful Condition of the Psalmist. Kedar—desert tribe of Ishmaelites. The names are used in a typical sense, like "Turks and Tartars," of cruel, blood-thirsty enemies. Peace—I seek to promote peace, but I dwell in the midst of a people who ever counsel war. The pilgrim psalmist is recounting the difficulties he has experienced in the course of the pilgrimage, but God has kept him faithful, and he comes with unsullied hands to the house of God.

PSALM 121. JEHOVAH THE PROTECTOR OF HIS PEOPLE

Israel has in all experiences the assurance that he who made heaven and earth will protect his own people. This, a pilgrim song may have been used by the pilgrims as the Temple mountain and the holy city came in view. The psalm is without clear divisions. The parallelism is climactic, succeeding lines being held together by the repetition of certain key words (see art., Poetic and Wisdom Literature, p. 154).

1, 2. Source of the Psalmist's Help. Unto the mountains—the Temple mountain and the mountains on which the city was built. May refer to the emotions aroused in the pilgrims by the first view of the holy city; or may express the determination to make a pilgrimage there. My help—the reference to the mountains might suggest that he is putting his trust in them. Not so! He depends entirely upon God. Made heaven and earth—he is powerful; therefore the psalmist need have no fear.

3, 4. The Power and Interest of Jehovah. The psalmist is perfectly safe. He that keepeth Israel shall neither slumber nor sleep. Not like Baal, of whom Elijah said on Mount Carmel, "Cry louder, perchance he sleepeth or is gone on a journey" (1 Kings 18²⁷). The ever-watchful eye of Jehovah watches over the destinies of his people.

5-8. Promise of Constant Care. A comforting thought. The divine care is described under various figures. Shade upon thy right hand—or south; the Jew faced the east. The sun is a constant peril to the traveler; but God may be "a rock in a weary land," under which the traveler may hide from the pitiless sun. The moon by night—the desert caravans move mostly by night. Thy going out and thy coming in. If it refers primarily to the pilgrimage, the meaning is "The Lord will be with the pilgrim when he starts on his pilgrimage and will bring him safely home again." It is, however, capable of a larger interpretation. The going out and the coming in may refer to all interests of human life. God preserves our going out across the threshold in the morning and our returning in the evening. He preserves the going out of youth from the home in the morning of life and its successful close. He preserves our coming into the world and will see to the crossing of the threshold into our Father's house eternal.

PSALM 122. A PILGRIM'S MEDITATION

As the pilgrim beholds the Temple he remembers the history of the city and its significance. He, therefore, prays for the continued prosperity and peace of city and Temple. The psalm is used to the present day by Russian pilgrims to Jerusalem. The ordinary Hebrew text ascribes the psalm to David; but some of the ancient versions name no author. Most modern scholars infer from the contents, historical allusions and linguistic peculiarities that the psalm is late, coming probably from the days of Nehemiah, soon after the city was rebuilt and its population settled.

1, 2. Expression of Joy that the Journey Is Ended, the City Reached, With a Visit to the Temple Imminent. Are standing—the perfect of experience. Some said, "Let us go." We came, and we are here at last, after years of longing and waiting; our feet are actually pressing the pavement of the holy city. What a glorious sight! What overpowering memories!

3-5. Impressions Made by the Sight of the City and Memories Called up. The pilgrim begins to look about him. He observes the structure of the city. It is his first visit. The city is compact—he is from some place where space is more liberal. The walls of Jerusalem at the present day are two and a half miles in circumference with a population inside the walls of about thirty-five thousand. Whither the tribes go up. From the time of David on Jerusalem was visited both as the political and the religious capital of Judæa as a testimony (see A.S.V. mg.) of fidelity to Jehovah. To give thanks. Often the visitors made their pilgrimage in payment of a vow, made in some time of stress or danger. Thrones of the house of David. The rulers administered justice; this was another reason why the tribes visited the city.

6-9. Prayer for the Peace and Welfare of the City. The memory of the past glory leads the psalmist to pray for the future welfare. Prosperity—true prosperity can be enjoyed only in a time of peace. He prays also for those who remain at home and are not privileged to make the journey. For the sake of the house of the Lord. The psalmist is interested in the holy city (1) because of the bond which binds him to the city as a member of the Jewish community; but (2) even more because it is the religious center, the dwelling place of his God (v. 9).

PSALM 123. THE EYE OF HOPE

A community prayer. In v. 1 the psalmist speaks as an individual, but in the succeeding verses, as he joins all the members of the community with himself in faith and prayer, he passes into the plural. The psalm is an expression of intense longing for the conscious presence of God in the time when men scoff and the soul is exceedingly sorrowful. There is no external evidence to indicate its date; it would fit into the age of Nehemiah.

1, 2. The Eye of Hope Turned Upward. In v. 1 the emphasis is on the word thee. There is something intensely personal about many of the expressions of the psalms, e. g., "Against thee, thee only have I sinned" (514). This is the place to which every suppliant must come before he can hope for a satisfactory answer. In the heavens—the petitioner ever looks up. God is on high, at least in the sense of ethical conception. Eyes of servants look unto their master—watching to catch the first move of command, in order instantly to obey and if possible to anticipate the master's wishes. So the devout psalmist looks unto the hand of his great master, ready to receive or give, but ever ready to obey. Until he have mercy—we do not pray for justice but for the abounding and ever enduring mercy of God.

3, 4. Urgent Plea of the Scorned and Despised People. There is no hope unless Jehovah is gracious and ready to help. We are exceedingly filled with contempt—heaped upon us by others, or contempt for others. In either case the petitioner is a subject of God's mercy. In all probability the former is meant. Scorning . . . contempt—of those that are at ease and proud. The soul of the writer is full; he can endure no more, and he is in danger of doing something that he ought not; therefore, he is begging for surcease from this condition.

PSALM 124. THANKSGIVING FOR RESCUE FROM ENEMIES

The pilgrims here sing of recent deliverances. As they remember the narrow escapes, and the many difficulties, and realize for themselves the dreams of a lifetime in the fact that they have actually arrived, at least have crossed the Jordan and are on their way up the steep ascents toward the sacred city, they ascribe all glory to God, who alone could have brought them safely thus far. This, however, may have been but an adaptation of an older psalm. Many think it was originally written to celebrate the deliverance from the Babylonian Exile; others connect it with the deliverance from enemies roundabout, such as Sanballat and Tobiah, at the rebuilding of the city walls under Nehemiah. Though in the Massoretic text the psalm is ascribed to David, contents and language favor a post-exilic date. Some of the early translations omit the reference to David. The central lesson of the psalm is that God is the only refuge in time of danger.

1-5. Unless Jehovah Had Taken the Part of the Singers Destruction Would Have Been

Certain. If it had not been the Lord—that is still the cry of the devout soul. God was on our side, therefore are we here to-day (cf. Neh. 420). When men rose up against us—this was frequently the case in the days of Nehemiah. Swallowed us up alive—gobbled us up as some wild beast of prey. Then would friend and loved one look and wait for our return, but we should never have been heard from. In vv. 4, 5 the figure changes to the waters. If the reference is primarily to the experiences of the pilgrims, the thought is that they had been delivered from robbers; now they have reached the margin of the desert and must cross swollen and bridgeless streams. If the reference is to the experiences of the post-exilic community, the waters represent more general dangers. Some see in the figure a veiled allusion to the creation story. The proud waters would then be the primeval ocean of chaos threatening to sweep everything back into utter oblivion.

6-8. Thanksgiving for Past Help, Confidence for the Future. The figure changes again. The enemy has laid for them a snare. This would be an apt description of the experience of Nehemiah. But the snare is broken and the prey is escaped (cf. 913). Jehovah himself, who made heaven and earth and has all power, is the only one to give adequate help.

PSALM 125. SECURITY OF GOD'S PEOPLE

We are to imagine bands of pilgrims crossing the river at Jericho and conducted up to Jerusalem by the Levites, and as they go up they sing of their adventures on the way. They have arrived on the Mount of Olives, or Mount Scopus, their eager eyes catch the first vision of the holy city, they utter a cry of admiration, and then fall to describing it and comparing it to the character of a faithful Israelite. Mountains ever played a great part in Israel's history—Sinai, Hor, Nebo, Olives, Ebal, Gerizim, Carmel, Gilboa, Tabor, Hermon, and Mount Zion, this last the most sacred of all. Mount Zion was the very center and symbol of Israel's religion and of her indissoluble solidarity. To it every devout Jew away from home looked when he prayed and to it each hoped some day to make a pilgrimage. What emotions must have stirred their hearts when first they came to look down upon the holy city from loftier heights, or when they gazed upon the mountains surrounding the hills upon which Jerusalem was situated. There is no definite indication of date. Kirkpatrick thinks of the time of Nehemiah, and suggests reading Neh. 6 in connection with this psalm. Undoubtedly the plot of Sanballat, Tobiah and Geshem would offer a most suitable occasion.

1, 2. Confidence of the True Israelites in Jehovah. They that trust in Jehovah are as Mount Zion—fixed, immovable, abiding forever (cf. Ps. 15). As the mountains are round about—all around Jerusalem are higher hills: east of the city is the Mount of Olives, southeast is the Hill of Offense (or Evil Counsel), on the north, Mount Scopus, and on the west the ground rises gradually to a higher plateau. Round about his people—like a mighty wall of mountains Jehovah shelters them. Evermore—these hills may pass away but Jehovah remains.

3-5. Protection for the Faithful, Destruction for Apostates. Confidence in Jehovah is not misplaced. Scepter of wickedness. Surely Jehovah will never again allow a foreigner to rule over the holy city. The righteous put not forth their hand unto iniquity. If foreign rule continued too long, the Jews might be tempted to amalgamate with other peoples, as Jews of the Northern Kingdom did in Samaria. Do good—show favor to the upright. But there can be only destruction for such as turn aside and sell out to the enemy, as some did in the time of Nehemiah and on many other occasions. Peace be upon Israel—a liturgical addition expressing a prayer.

PSALM 126. THANKSGIVING FOR PAST HELP; PRAYER FOR COMPLETION OF THE RESTORATION

The psalmist remembers the joy which came to him and his countrymen when the return from exile or the change in fortunes was experienced. The present, however, is disappointing, and, in confidence, he prays that Jehovah may bring the restoration to a glorious completion. There is no definite indication of date. It would fit in the troublesome period soon after the return in 537 B.C. or in the time of Ezra and Nehemiah nearly a century later.

1-3. Jehovah Has Already Done Marvelous Things. Captivity—the phrase might be translated as in the text, or as in A.S.V. "brought back those that returned" (cf. mg.), or "turned the fortunes"; i.e., restored prosperity; in any case the reference would be to the changes following the Babylonian Exile. Them that dream. It seemed too good to be true; they wondered if they were really awake (Lk. 2411). When the reality dawned upon them, they were full of joyous laughter and singing. In the beginning of the captivity they refused to sing (cf. Ps. 137). Now they can once again blend their voices in joyous song. Among the nations. Even other nations remarked that their God had done great things for them, and, indeed, say the singers, the Lord hath done great things for us and that is the reason we are glad.

4. Prayer for the Completion of the Restoration. V. 4 implies a background of disappointed hopes such as did come after the return. But the remembrance of past help leads to the confident prayer that Jehovah will help again. Streams in the south. The streams of the Negeb were dry in the summer, but winter rains brought plenty of water and made the people rejoice. "Our summer," says the psalmist, "has been long and very droughty. Let our fortunes hereafter be as the winter rains, refreshing and life giving."

5, 6. Expression of Faith in the Final Outcome. They that sow in tears shall reap in joy. "So it is ever in God's kingdom. Precisely those undertakings which at first seemed hopeless and were begun under pressing troubles end in achieving the greatest good." It has been thought that these verses refer to the poverty of the people who returned from exile and undertook the task of rebuilding the land and starting the crop rotation again when there was but enough grain to keep their children from hunger; nevertheless, in order that they might live another year, they divided the grain, and while the children cried for bread they scattered it in the ground that it might die and live again in an abundant harvest which would bring joy continued through the coming year. So the father sowed, watering the ground with his tears, but at harvest time he will come again with rejoicing, bringing his sheaves with him. (Cf. Hag. 11-11 215-19, notes.)

PSALM 127. UTTER DEPENDENCE UPON JEHOVAH

This psalm has been called the Hebrew "Cotter's Saturday Night"—and not unfittingly. Man's labor without God's blessing is disappointing; he bestows his blessing only upon those who love him; a large family is a special blessing from God, for it will bring respect and influence to the father. The ascription to Solomon in the title (cf. Psa. 72) is not found in most recensions of the LXX. It is probably an inference from v. 1, which was interpreted as referring to the building of the Temple; as a matter of fact, it refers to the building of any home or the setting up of any family. The psalm resembles others in the collection of Pilgrim Psalms and may reflect the same post-exilic conditions (cf. Hag. 14 Neh. 49f. 73, 4, etc.).

1, 2. Man's Dependence Upon God. There is no use to build unless you build unto God. Material building is all in vain unless great spiritual interests are housed therein. No use to watch a city unless Jehovah also keeps watch. There is no success without Jehovah. Nothing is fruitful in man's hands without God's sanction. The house is not the Temple, nor the city Jerusalem; house or home building and city watching represent samples of ordinary human undertakings. The most strenuous efforts are vain without God (v. 2). If you work with him, he gives all necessary things to you even "while you sleep." Sleep—better, with mg., in sleep. It has been suggested that the word Shena, "sleep," should be Selah, which would mark an interlude; then the verse would end: "For he giveth his beloved what is necessary." There is insufficient support for this suggestion. The verse is not to be interpreted as discouraging hard work—laziness is strongly condemned in the O.T., e.g., Prov. 69f. 3115, 27 (see p. 611); it means rather, that God's children should not spend all of their lives in the drudgery of accumulating material things, but take time for rest and social development. It is not enough to make a living, one must also live.

3-5. Children are God's Gift. The psalm is composite: this is the second half. Children are the joy and defense of their father—this is the theme. They are a heritage (v. 3b; expanded in Psa. 128). Children born in the father's young manhood (v. 4b) will be his protectors in his old age. The gate (v. 5c)—the place of council and judgment (cf. Isa. 2921 Amos 510, 12, 15). The father who has strong sons need not fear for his cause.

PSALM 128. THE FEAR OF GOD THE BEST BASIS OF A HAPPY FAMILY LIFE

This psalm is closely connected with the preceding. It presents the refreshing picture of a family contented and happy, prosperous and peaceful. One can almost see this happy farmer, returning at evening time from his fields of plenty to his home, where a happy loving family await him. Such homes form the bulwark of any nation. A happy family life has always been the glory and pride of the Hebrews. The psalmist knows that the fear of God is the best basis for it. The psalm may fall in the same period as Psa. 127. The scarcity of the population and the constant dangers from without presented grave problems. The psalmist offers a solution: Fear God, which will lead to a happy family life which, in turn, will mean prosperity for the state.

1-4. Domestic Happiness a Reward of Godiness. Feareth . . . walketh—happy is he who worships God and in whom this worship bears the fruit of right conduct. The labor of thy hands. Man must toil, but God will bless the labor of a righteous man; he shall be happy and prosperous, and the fruits of his toil shall not be taken from him by robbers. In addition to the necessities of life he will have what gives beauty, joy, and permanence. Vine—a symbol of gracefulness; fruitful—a large family of children; olive plants—a symbol of vigor and strength. Parenthood revealed the blessing of God; barrenness was considered a curse. Innermost parts—the women's quarters, farthest removed from the entrance. Surely the man who fears Jehovah shall thus be blessed.

5, 6. Prayers and Hope for the Welfare of the Community. These verses show that the psalm was used in public worship. May Jehovah continue to shower blessings upon the community, and may the people see and enjoy prosperity and peace forever. May there always be an abundance of pious men enjoying the blessings of a rich family life. Peace be upon Jerusalem—a separate liturgical benediction.

PSALM 129. PAST EXPERIENCE A GROUND OF HOPE FOR THE FUTURE

This is a psalm of the community. Israel has suffered severe affliction throughout her entire history, but has not been utterly destroyed because Jehovah was on her side. The good fortunes of her present enemies will be brief, because Jehovah will put them to shame. There is no definite indication of date. It seems closely related to Ps. 124, only here the hope that the enemies will be subdued is expressed with greater confidence. It may have been written at about the same period, with reference to the dangers threatening the community in the days of Nehemiah.

1-3. Israel's Past Afflictions and Deliverances. Israel has always had a hard time even back in the early days when they were in Egyptian bondage. Youth—see Hos. 11. Have not prevailed. This has been the experience of God's people in all ages; God always protects and delivers those who trust in him. The plowers plowed (v. 3)—a picture of extreme cruelty; the nation is pictured as thrown upon her face, while the enemy plowed deep long furrows upon her back, like the marks of the lashes on the back of a slave.

4. Jehovah Has Broken the Chains of the Oppressor. Jehovah has cut the bond of captivity, has separated his people from the enemy, and has put the enemy to shame. Righteous—loyal to the covenant made with his people in the beginning.

5-8. Hope for the Future. On the basis of past experience the psalmist offers a prayer that Jehovah will continue the work of protection and deliverance. Grass upon the housetop. In the East many of the small houses are covered with earth and frequently a roller is run over this sod roof to keep it compact, just as a roller is used on playing-fields in this country. If this is neglected, a sparse grass springs up but soon dies. Grass cannot successfully grow on a housetop; as this grass soon passes away, so let the enemies of Israel be. Reaper. Just as the mower and reaper of such grass will be empty handed, so may Jehovah let those who plot against Israel waste their time. They which go by—ordinarily passers by would shout good wishes to the reapers, and the reapers would shout back; but there will be nothing of that sort with the oppressors of Israel; they will be silent, for there will be no harvest.

PSALM 130. PSALM OF PENITENCE

We have in this psalm what seems to be the prayer of a representative Israelite, who offers a confession of sin and a petition for mercy not so much for himself as for the community. The most probable occasion is presented by the troubles through which the community passed in the days of Nehemiah (cf. Neh. 14-11 and the confession of Nehemiah in ch. 9).

1-4. Cry of Penitence from Depths of Trouble. The psalmist is in danger of being overwhelmed by the sea of trouble and cries out of the depths to Jehovah, who is a God of pardon. Penitent, he prays to God (v. 2). Shouldest mark iniquity (v. 3). If God marked every sin carefully, who could stand? There would be hope for no one. The only hope is in the divine forgiveness. One reason for worshipping God is his willingness to forgive.

5-8. Assured of the Divine Forgiveness Psalmist and People Can Afford to Wait. Wait—the expectancy of the soul; sometimes God requires waiting as discipline; hope is in the divine promises; it is harder to wait than to work. More than watchmen—the soul waits for God's answer more eagerly than the watchman waits for the dawn. The repetition indicates earnestness. O Israel, hope (v. 7)—a strong exhortation to Israel to join the psalmist in hope, in faith in God, who is merciful and will give pardon graciously and "life abundant." God will surely take away the calamities that are the result of Israel's wickedness, and even wickedness itself.

PSALM 131. CHILDLIKE TRUST IN JEHOVAH

Subdued by suffering, the psalmist confesses humility; he will be satisfied with whatever lot Jehovah chooses for him. He has come to Jehovah after the sufferings and disappointments of his life, like a tired subdued child, at the end of the day, who lays his head upon the mother's breast and leaves life's problems with her; so the psalmist trusts in Jehovah.

Most commentators regard it as a community psalm. The psalmist represents the best elements in the community, and for himself and them renounces all worldly aggrandizement for Israel (cf. v. 3). The ascription to David is not found in all the ancient versions. The title may have been added because it was thought that the psalm illustrated the spirit of David's life (cf. 2 Sam. 7^{21f.}). It comes probably from the same period as the psalms in whose midst it stands. The restoration had been pictured by the prophets in the most glowing colors; the reality fell short of the expectation. Many became discouraged but some high souls began to wonder if the hopes themselves might not have been misdirected. They were willing to trust God implicitly.

1, 2. A Haughty Heart Denied. Pride or arrogance has its seat in the heart and mind of man, it reveals itself in the countenance; it likes to move in the sphere of things beyond the arrogant man's ability. The verse breathes a spirit of humility. Stilled . . . quieted—before he resigned himself his whole being was troubled, full of passion and lofty ambition; but the victory has come. Says Perowne, "Two things are suggested here—the cost by which he gains this peace and the purity and unselfishness of the rest he gained."

3. Perfect Peace. In a spirit of contentment Israel may patiently wait for the development of God's purpose.

PSALM 132. PRAYER FOR JEHOVAH'S BLESSING UPON THE SANCTUARY FOR DAVID'S SAKE

Apparently written after the Exile, either in the days of Zerubbabel or of Nehemiah, probably the latter, for the purpose of encouraging the people by reciting how God had been merciful to David, their great hero. It is reminiscent of the bringing up of the ark from the house of Obed-Edom and placing it upon Mount Moriah. In those days it looked as if Jehovah had forgotten his people; and yet it was the beginning of the most glorious period in Israel's history. Though the present looks dark, Jehovah can remove the distress and once again bestow abundant blessing upon his sanctuary and the people. Cf. 42⁶, "I remember thee from the land of Jordan and the Hermons, from the hill Mizar." The psalmist remembers the Lord from the time of David and his doings then. The interpretation of the psalm presents considerable difficulty. Indeed, it becomes possible only if the dramatic principle underlying the arrangements is recognized. Different sections must be assigned to different speakers.

1, 2. Prayer to Remember the Pains David Took to Establish the Sanctuary. David was willing to undergo all manner of hardship. His affliction—the pains he took in preparing for the building of the house of the Lord, beginning with his bringing up of the ark. He swore. Not necessarily that he actually made a vow to build the house of the Lord, for which there is no historical authority, but, rather, that he determined to build the house and made great preparation. It may well be doubted whether Solomon could ever have built the house, had David not prepared the way.

3-5. Contents of the Oath Sworn by David. David is serious about the matter. Tabernacle of my house . . . bed. I will not rest in luxurious ease while God has no earthly dwelling place. In 2 Sam. 7¹ David proposes to build a house for Jehovah, but is forbidden by Nathan. David is conscience-stricken when he remembers that he lives in a house of cedar but Jehovah within curtains. V. 4 is a proverbial expression (cf. Prov. 64). A place. The ark was the symbol of the Divine Presence; hence the place intended for the ark was intended for Jehovah himself.

6, 7. The People's Hearty Cooperation. Israel entered enthusiastically upon the enterprise. We heard of it, i.e., the ark. Ephrathah. Elsewhere this is the name of Bethlehem or of the district in which Bethlehem is located (Gen. 35^{16, 19} Ruth 4¹¹ Mic. 5²). Here it is synonymous with Ephraim, the territory in which Shiloh was located (cf. 1 Sam. 11^{1f.}). They heard that the ark was in Shiloh; but when they sought it, it was no longer there, but in the field of the wood, i.e., Kiriath-Jearim (cf. mg.). The ark had a varied itinerary and the people are here represented as seeking it, making inquiries here and there, until it is found at Kiriath-Jearim (cf. 1 Sam. 7¹). V. 7 is a mutual exhortation to worship in the sanctuary David has proposed to build. Footstool. Since Jehovah is enthroned upon the Cherubim the ark is his footstool.

8-10. Prayer that Jehovah May Recognize These Efforts and Take Possession of the Sanctuary. Arise . . . thy resting place. This is the formula used when the ark was brought up. The symbol of the Divine Presence was the ark, and this was now to come up to the threshing floor of Araunah on Mount Moriah as its permanent resting place. The ark of thy strength—the strength of Israel derived from the presence of the ark (cf. 1 Sam. 4) and so from the presence of Jehovah himself. Priests—a separate priestly order was introduced in Israel later than David and Solomon. Saints—favored ones, namely, the Israelites. The idea of righteousness being a garment is common (Job 29¹⁴). Happy the people who have priests of righteousness and who, therefore, may shout or joy. David's sake (v. 10)—the basis of the prayer from the beginning (cf. v. 1). Turn not away the face—which would mean to deny the petition. Anointed—refers to the king or to anyone else who has a mission from Jehovah. Here the reference is to the petitioners, who are conscious of a divine mission.

11, 12. Recital of Jehovah's Oath to David.

This is the beginning of the divine answer contained in vv. 11-18. The Lord hath sworn. There is no record of an oath; we have here a poetical statement of the certainty of God's promise (cf. 2 Sam. 7); in truth—he made this promise to David, and he will surely fulfill it. The fruit of thy body—this is part of the content of the promise made to David. If his children will keep the law of Jehovah and observe to do his will, keeping his covenant, then the Davidic succession will be eternal. As long as they keep the law of Jehovah so long Jehovah will keep his promise, but whenever they break it the contract ends (cf. Heb. 8⁹).

13. Jehovah Has Chosen Zion as His Earthly Dwelling Place. This choice furnishes the basis for the oath in vv. 11, 12. Zion . . . for his habitation. The choice of Zion was made before the choice of David, and while the house of David may pass away because of disobedience, Zion may still have a chance if the successors of David, though not of the Davidic line, continue to be righteous.

14-18. Direct Reply of Jehovah. He will bless people and priests and restore the fortunes of the house of David. In Zion Jehovah will have a permanent resting place; his choice is made and he will abide by it (cf. v. 8). V. 15 promises that Jehovah will bless the people with material blessings. Prosperity will be upon the land when God shall come back to Zion. Satisfy her poor—Jehovah always gives special consideration to the poor and needy. V. 16 is similar to v. 9; there the prayer is that the priests may be clothed with righteousness; here the promise is that they will be clothed with salvation; i.e., they will become real channels of blessing for the worshipers, who then will have every reason to rejoice. The horn of David to bud (v. 17). His horn (symbol of power and vitality) has been cast down and is dead in the dust, but as in the valley of dry bones Jehovah made the dead to live, so the horn of David, entirely humbled, shall bud and be lifted on high. The promise that the sprout of David will come will be fulfilled (cf. Isa. 11 Jer. 23⁵ Zech. 3⁸, etc.). A lamp for mine anointed—a symbol of continuity: he will abide forever. Who? Either the promised sprout or the dynasty of David. Just as the priests of Jehovah are to be clothed with salvation and righteousness, so his enemies will be clothed with shame (v. 18). Himself—David as the personal representative of all his successors. Crown—or diadem, meaning not only the kingly crown, but also the glittering diadem of the priest. It may be that the expectation is, as in Psa. 110, that the ideal ruler will combine kingly and priestly functions.

PSALM 133. THE EXCELLENCE OF BROTHERLY UNITY

This beautiful psalm of brotherly love is ascribed to David; but the title is not found in some MSS. and in the most important ancient translations. The psalm may express Nehemiah's ideal for the post-exilic Jerusalem community; it may be a call for the returned exiles to come and dwell together in this new community with true fraternity. The opening word, "Behold," may suggest that the psalmist actually had before his eyes an instance of the blessings of brotherly concord. May the psalm reflect the enthusiasm of those who volunteered to dwell in Jerusalem in the days of Nehemiah? (Neh. 11².)

1. Brotherly Unity. Behold—such a community is the joy and pride of all who see. Good—inherently valuable and useful; pleasant—aesthetically pleasing, pleasant to look upon. Unity—this thought is implied, but the word is not in the Hebrew text.

2, 3. Blessings of Brotherly Love Illustrated. V. 2 illustrates the "good" and v. 3 the "pleasant" of v. 1. Precious oil—oil is the symbol of joy; sometimes the term "oil of gladness" is used. The psalmist thinks of the sacred oil with which the high priest was anointed. Aaron's beard. Aaron stands as the personification of high priesthood and the representative of the whole nation; the copious anointing which poured down over his garments symbolized the solidarity of the group represented. The dew of Hermon. The heavy dews of Hermon are proverbial. Dew is nature's compensation for her failure to give rain and symbolizes refreshment and quickening. Palestine was desolate as the desert, until the brethren came together in brotherly fellowship; then, like the dews of Hermon, they brought freshness and life and the resurrection of ideals. There—in Jerusalem, Jehovah decreed the blessing which would mean life and prosperity forever.

PSALM 134. GREETINGS OF THE NIGHT WATCHERS

A choir of pilgrims leaving the Temple for the night exhort priests and Levites to praise God. The latter respond with a benediction upon the worshipers. There is no definite indication of date or occasion. It may have been composed after the restoration of Temple worship under Nehemiah (1244-47).

1, 2. Call to Praise Jehovah. The call is made by a group of worshipers. Ye servants—not worshipers in general, but, as the next clause indicates, those who actually “serve” in the sanctuary; stand in—the regular term for priestly or Levitical ministrations was “stand before” (Deut. 10⁸). The Levitical singers were employed day and night in the Temple. As the people finish the evening worship they exhort priests and Levites to praise Jehovah as they minister in his name. For services at night cf. 1 Chr. 9³³. Lift up your hands—a gesture of prayer. The sanctuary, toward which the hands are extended, is the most holy place, the earthly dwelling place of Jehovah.

3. The Priestly Benediction in Response to the Call. The Lord bless thee—the priests call on Jehovah in the sanctuary to bless the people as they return to their homes. This is the last of the Pilgrim Psalms (120-134). It is in itself a sort of benediction, which forms an appropriate close to the entire collection.

PSALM 135.

PRaise OF JEHOVAH'S WONDERFUL WORKS; NOTHINGNESS OF HEATHEN IDOLS

The psalm is a collection of fragments from different parts of the O.T., skillfully put together to form an impressive hymn of praise. There is a careful survey of Jehovah's manifestations in nature and in history; these reveal his great power. The idols, on the other hand, are impotent; they can do nothing for themselves or their worshipers. Therefore let all Israel praise Jehovah. The psalm is, in a sense, an expansion of Psa. 134 (cf. also Neh. 94^{f.}). It is a post-exilic production, and evidently was intended for use in the services of the second Temple.

1-4. Call to Praise Jehovah. The call is addressed to the servants of the Lord—see on 134¹. Stand in the house—see on 134¹. Levites, priests, and the general worshipers are all urged to praise their God. He deserves such praise, because he is good—as shown in his choice of and care for Israel. Moreover, it is pleasant—it is delightful to sing the praises of Jehovah. The Lord hath chosen—based on Deut. 7⁶ or Ex. 19⁵; God's choosing of Israel for his own is ample reason for praise.

5-7. Jehovah's Power Manifested in Nature. He who has eyes to see may know the kind of God Jehovah is. Great . . . above all gods. Whatever may be thought of the existence of the gods of other nations, Jehovah was greater and more powerful than all the others. He is sovereign in every sphere; his work in heaven, earth and in the seas calls for praise. He is master of them all. V. 7 is taken almost verbatim from Jer. 10¹³.

8-12. Jehovah's Power Manifested in History—especially in the deliverance from Egypt, the guidance through the desert and the settlement in Canaan. Vv. 8, 9 describe manifestations of God's power in delivering his children from Egypt. Equally wonderful was his interference on their behalf during the desert wanderings, when he helped Israel to defeat her enemies; Sihon and Og were the most formidable (vv. 10, 11; cf. Num. 21^{21f.}, 33^{f.} Deut. 23^{of.} 31^{f.}). He then helped them to conquer Palestine, the land of promise, and established them there (v. 12).

13, 14. Jehovah the Eternal God Will Have Mercy on His People. V. 13 is based on Ex. 31⁵ (cf. 102¹²). Thy name—i.e., thy character (see on 75¹). This was the source of Moses' mission and the authority for his task; it is still the hope of Israel, for the name of Jehovah will endure forever. He will not forget the people who have cost him so much. His name is unchanged, his power unexhausted; therefore he cannot cast off his people; he must save them.

15-18. Jehovah Contrasted with Heathen Idols. These verses are taken with minor changes from 115⁴⁻⁸ (see notes there); v. 18 emphasizes the truth that we become molded in the likeness of our ideals; the object of our worship is the model by which we develop our characters.

19-21. New Summons to all Israel to Praise Jehovah. The threefold call of 115⁹⁻¹¹ 118²⁻⁴ is here expanded to include the house of Levi. Let all the people praise Jehovah.

PSALM 136. HYMN OF PRAISE

The psalm bears resemblance to Psa. 135, but here is added the refrain which forms the second part of each verse; the whole emphasis of the psalm is on this refrain. It is clearly a liturgical psalm; the first part of each verse may have been sung by the leader, with the response in the second part by the choir; or the first part by the Levites, the second part by the congregation (cf. Ezra 3¹¹ 2 Chr. 73, 6).

1-3. Call to Thanksgiving. Praise and thanksgiving are due to God, for he is good; again and again he forgives his wayward children. God of gods—he is far superior to any other being thought of as divine; he is also above kings and magistrates.

4-9. Jehovah the Creator. He has supreme power; he is not dependent upon any other force or power. Understanding—the heavens declare his glory, wisdom, and intelligence. Spread forth—the ancients thought that the earth was spread out and rested on an abyss of waters referred to as “the deep.” Lights— sun, moon and stars declare his glory (vv. 7-9; cf. Gen. 1¹⁶⁻¹⁸).

10-15. Jehovah the Saviour of Israel. As frequently, the experiences of the Exodus are mentioned as outstanding examples of God's care for his chosen people and his mercy toward them.

16-22. The Conquest of the Promised Land. The incidents here mentioned are frequently enumerated as evidences of God's interest and power (cf. 135¹⁰⁻¹⁴).

23-26. Jehovah the Saviour of Israel and the Upholder of All. Vv. 23, 24 may refer to the Babylonian Exile, described as low estate, and to the people's deliverance from it. In v. 25 the psalmist passes from the specific care of Israel to the universal fatherhood of God, which makes him the supporter of all life. The psalm closes with another exhortation to give thanks, this time to the God of the universe.

PSALM 137. A WAIL FROM THE EXILE

The psalm reflects the emotions of the exiles. Their hearts were sorrowful, so that they could not sing songs of Zion; but they were as loyal as ever—if not more so—to their God, to the holy city and to their old home. Their very loyalty to Jehovah makes them break forth in bitter denunciation of the nations responsible for their present plight, especially Edom and Babylon. The psalm is reminiscent of the opening days of the Exile; it may have been written soon after the capture of Jerusalem and the destruction of the Temple by Nebuchadrezzar, in 586 B.C. The reference to Jerusalem being destroyed impresses one as referring to something very recent. On the other hand, many modern writers hold that it was composed after the return in 537 B.C.

1-3. Sorrows of the Exile. The psalm reveals the triumph of spirit over matter, of a spiritual ideal over material possession. By the rivers—Euphrates and its canals, such as Chebar; possibly also the Tigris. Babylonia was a land of canals. Jerusalem was Jehovah's sanctuary and Palestine his home; in the thought of the exiles there could be no worship of him in any other land. Willows—there are still willow groves along the Euphrates amid the ruins of Babylon. Songs . . . mirth. The officers who had charge of them demanded that they sing their sacred songs as a matter of amusement. They had no heart for joyful music.

4-6. Loyalty to Jehovah and to the Sacred City. V. 4 emphasizes the impossibility of singing a song of Zion when they were away from Zion and Jehovah's land. If I forget thee. To sing Jehovah's songs to the Babylonians would be forgetting Jerusalem, and the psalmist prays that when he forgets Jerusalem he may forget how to play the harp at all. Rather than sing a sacred song for the captors, he would lose the gift of singing. Jerusalem to him was greater than anything in life (vv. 5, 6).

7-9. Prayer for Vengeance Upon the Enemies of the Chosen People. The Edomites had not only encouraged the destruction of Jerusalem but had actually helped the Babylonians in their cruel capture. The Edomites were cousins of the Hebrews, children of Esau; which made their crime the greater. Thinking of vengeance, the psalmist cries, Happy shall be the one who treats you as you have treated us; a consistent application of the law of retaliation. V. 9 amplifies v. 8. Thy little ones. Emphasis is on the word thy—even as you dashed our little ones against the stones. This is not Christian ethics; but it is what might be expected, in that period and in that situation, of persons who looked upon their own enemies as enemies of Jehovah, who by destroying them were threatening to destroy Jehovah religion. (See on Jer. 49⁷⁻²² Amos 1¹¹ Obad. vv. 10-14.)

PSALM 138. THANKSGIVING TO JEHOVAH FOR THE FULFILLMENT OF HIS PROMISES

An expression of the gratitude and confidence of the restored community. While the title ascribes the psalm to David, it has all the marks of a post-exilic production. A number of the MSS. of the LXX add "of Haggai and Zachariah," which would point to a post-exilic date. This view finds support in the theological ideas expressed or implied. For instance, the idea of the universality of Jehovah's dominion is post-exilic; and there are echoes of certain doctrines of Isa. 40-66.

1-3. Jehovah Has Manifested His Loving Kindness and His Faithfulness in the Fulfillment of His Promises to Israel. The psalmist's faith in God is not shaken by the power of the heathen world. I will give thee thanks with my whole heart—with whole-hearted praise. Before the gods. The psalmist lifts his voice in the midst of powerful nations trusting in many gods; these do not baffle him in the least. The Jew always looked toward the Temple when he prayed. Magnified thy word. God, by keeping his promise and fulfilling his word, is now exceeding all previous revelations of himself. Encourage me (v. 3). God not only answers prayer but gives great courage of conviction. The psalmist was in dire distress and cried unto Jehovah, who gave him strength of soul.

4-6. The Whole World Will Praise Jehovah Because of His Faithfulness. The nations and their kings will unite in praising Jehovah when they hear of his favor toward the Hebrews. The way God has dealt with his people brings more glory to his name than the world which he has made. Jehovah is not too exalted to be interested in the lowly. The highest proof of greatness is consideration for the lowly.

7, 8. Jehovah will Continue to Deliver Israel. New difficulties will come, but God will be near. In time of trouble he will take care of his suffering children and protect them from their enemies. V. 8 expresses a sublime confidence in the promises of God. Jehovah will carry out his purpose.

PSALM 139. THE EVER-ABIDING PRESENCE OF GOD

One of the grandest psalms in the entire collection, if not, indeed, the best of them all. Its tone is high, and its conception of the personal and highly spiritual nature of God rises to glorious heights. It has been called "the crown of the Psalter." It might be called "The Psalm of the Unavoidable God"; its main theme is "God Cares." He cares personally and individually. It is the O.T.'s highest conception of the relationship of God to the individual soul. Though it is so stated in the title the psalm cannot come from David: (1) The language is very late; it is not pure Hebrew but has many Aramaisms; (2) the thought is late; it resembles in this, as in the language, the book of Job; (3) the conception of God also points to a late date. The psalm is undoubtedly post-exilic.

1-6. God's Perfect Knowledge of the Psalmist. Jehovah knows all about me. He has searched me through and through and there is nothing about me unknown to him. God not only knows but he cares. *Thou—*emphatic. God considers the smallest experiences of my life. He knows the purposes of my mind even before they take thought form. *Thou searchest—*or "winnowest," "siftest," as wheat; *my path—*when I walk; *my lying down—*when I stop. He acquaints himself with all my ways. *Not a word in my tongue—*render, For when a word is not yet on my tongue, lo, thou knowest it altogether. Before a word is spoken, God understands what will be uttered. *Beset—*hemmed in as a city surrounded by an army; God has hemmed me in so I cannot escape him. Such knowledge is beyond human intellect (v. 6). I cannot attain unto it. The divine omniscience is inaccessible to human power. Humanity can stand in reverent wonder at its workings, but must ever be impotent to apply the canons of human reason to it.

7-12. God's Universal Presence. Jehovah is inescapable. *Thy presence—*literally, face. The face of God is ever before us. One cannot run away from God (cf. Jonah 1st). If I ascend to the dwelling place of God, as Enoch or Elijah; *Sheol—*if I descend into Sheol, which is the other extreme of the universe, I shall still face him. He is in heaven above and he goes down into Sheol. The wings of the morning. The dawn was described with the beautiful imagery of slowly spreading wings in the East, flying out over all the world and going down in the uttermost part of the Mediterranean. The wings of the dawn, the uttermost part of the sea, mean the whole sweep of the earth from east to west (vv. 9, 10). Darkness shall overwhelm me (v. 11). The religion of Jehovah was the only one whose God ruled the night as well as the day. Ikhnaton (Amenophis IV) of Egypt rose to a lofty height in his pantheistic conception, but his god was impotent during the night. But to Jehovah day and night are alike.

13-18. God Has Ordered the Psalmist's Entire Life. Many would transpose vv. 13 and 14, reading 14 first and making 13 the explanation of it. The thought in v. 13 is that God knows him because he created him; indeed, he knew him before the psalmist began to take form. *Possessed—*better, formed (cf. mg.). *Reins—*or, kidneys, the seat of passions and emotions. *Covered—*or, knit me together. Bones and sinews were knit together by the fingers of Jehovah. When the psalmist comes to consider his physiological composition, he bursts forth in praise to God for his workmanship. My frame (v. 15) = my skeleton, the frame work of my body. *Curiously wrought—*i.e., skillfully; the word means also embroidered with threads of many colors. Perhaps the psalmist thinks of the veins. *In the lowest parts of the earth—*here the womb. How could God do such skillful work in the hidden parts away from the light!

Mine imperfect substance (v. 16)—Jehovah's eyes were upon the undeveloped embryo, and he had a book in which were recorded all the members yet unformed. He had a plan by which the body was to be formed. Therefore How precious, etc. (v. 17)—God's thoughts for me are precious beyond expression and they are numberless. The word translated "precious" may mean also incomprehensible. If this translation is accepted the verse comes to suggest a contrast between God's thought of the psalmist and the latter's thought of God. *When I awake I am still with thee—*asleep or awake my thoughts are with God.

19-24. God Cannot Endure Wickedness; Neither will the Psalmist. This wonderful God must be intolerant of wicked men (many think this part of the psalm is a later addition). I hate. It is natural that one who loves God with the passion expressed in the foregoing would with the same intensity hate the sins which insult the God who is so good. These sins are connected, in the mind of the psalmist, with the sinners (v. 21); therefore he hates the sinners with the same fierce hatred. The psalmist closes with a prayer for himself that God may search his soul as he has searched and known his body and discover to him what is wrong and lead him in the way everlasting (vv. 23, 24)—the way leading to life and peace, the opposite of the way leading to ruin and an early death. (On the main thought of the psalm, see Francis Thompson, The Hound of Heaven.)

PSALM 140. PRAYER FOR PROTECTION AGAINST PERSECUTORS

Psalms 140–143 form a group generally thought to be late. These psalms seem inseparable; they are similar in theme, language, and form, and they are individual rather than national. The four psalms may be by the same author. The presence of the name David in the title may be due to the fact that at one time the psalms were a part of a Davidic collection. At any rate, dependence on other psalms, some of them late (e.g., 77), familiarity with Job and Proverbs, and other considerations, have convinced most scholars that the psalms came from the unsettled conditions of the post-exilic period.

1–3. Prayer for Deliverance from Unscrupulous Enemies. They are evil and violent (v. 1). The singulars are probably to be understood collectively; unless the psalmist wants to single out a particular individual, who is the leader in the plots. Gather themselves together—better, with mg., stir up wars. They are always trying to pick quarrels. Sharpened their tongue (v. 3)—they are deliberately planning to inflict a deadly wound by slander. Poison is on their lips.

4, 5. Repetition of Prayer for Deliverance. The psalmist prays again for deliverance from those who are determined to cause his downfall. Snare . . . cords . . . net . . . gins (v. 5). As the hunter traps his game, so they are trying to trap him. Four kinds of traps are named to show the variety and persistency of the attack.

6–8. Jehovah the Faithful Helper in Time of Need. The psalmist pleads the relationship he sustains to God, which entitles him to protection. Covered my head (v. 7)—God has protected him as a helmet does the head in battle; therefore he is confident in his prayer that the wicked enemies will be defeated and not exalted (cf. Eph. 6:10–17).

9–11. May Deserved Retribution Overtake the Evil Doers. The petitioner asks that the mischief they are trying to do him may recoil upon their own heads (v. 9). Burning coals . . . fire—he asks that the fate of Sodom overtake the offenders. His imprecation grows heated and fierce (v. 10). Moreover, he has faith in God that calamity will pursue the wicked and drive them to destruction.

12, 13. Destiny of the Righteous and the Wicked. The afflicted righteous man will be protected, and the cause of the poor championed (v. 12). Righteous . . . upright (v. 13)—the destruction of the wicked is the guarantee of happiness and security for the upright.

PSALM 141. PRAYER TO BE SAVED FROM SIN AND SINNERS

See introductory paragraph to Psa. 140. The psalmist presents his prayer as an “evening sacrifice.” The godless are now enjoying ease and prosperity; but he is confident that in the end right and righteousness will triumph. The destruction of the wicked will open the eyes of their followers and make them ready to heed the psalmist’s teaching.

1, 2. A Plea for an Immediate Answer to Prayer. The psalmist has already offered his prayer; may the answer come speedily. May his prayer go up to Jehovah as the smoke of incense goes up, at an evening sacrifice. The evening sacrifice or oblation, i.e., meal offering (Ex. 29:38–42), may be mentioned because the psalmist was in the habit of praying at that time.

3–5. Prayer for Strength to Resist Temptation. The psalmist prays that Jehovah will help him to say only the right thing. Keep the door of my lips is a prayer all need to offer. Incline not my heart (v. 4)—a prayer that he may not want to live the life of sensual ease, the wicked life. “Lead us not into temptation.” Reprove—a prayer that he may welcome reproof and guidance from the righteous, and turn away from the evil deeds of the wicked. The marginal reading of v. 5d is preferable, “for still is my prayer against thy wickedness.”

6, 7. Effect of the Judgment Upon the Wicked. When the leaders of the wicked have been thrown from the cliff and thus executed, then the followers will welcome the advice of the psalmist. Our bones—better, their; the words may refer to the bones of the judges who were executed. It must be admitted, however, that the interpretation of vv. 6, 7 is exceedingly difficult.

8–10. A Prayer of Confidence in God. The psalmist has put himself under Jehovah’s protection; and he makes this relationship the basis of his plea. V. 9 is a prayer to keep him from the sensual temptations with which the wicked are trying to entice him, and v. 10 a plea that the plots of the wicked may recoil upon themselves (cf. 7:15, 16 9:16 140:11).

PSALM 142. PRAYER FOR PERSONAL SAFETY

The psalmist is hard pressed. In Jehovah is the only basis of hope; he therefore turns to him for help, with the promise that he will express his gratitude and praise openly. For the ascription to David see introductory paragraph to Psa. 140. When the psalm had once come to be connected with David, it was easy to infer from the contents that it described the experience of David in the cave of Adullam (1 Sam. 22) or of En-gedi (1 Sam. 24).

1, 2. Jehovah Alone Can Give Relief to the Psalmist in His Distress. He prays aloud to Jehovah. His situation will not allow him to pray in silence; his emotions are too violent and his distress too intense. He will pour out (v. 2) his whole heart to God in complaint, even as one pours out a libation.

3, 4. Comfort of the Assurance that God Knows Him. He finds comfort in the thought that Jehovah knows all about him, even the perilous snares his enemies are laying for him; he pleads to Jehovah in his loneliness, for no man is near him or cares for his soul. Like one lost on a dark road, he looks fearfully around and finds himself still alone. Right hand—the place of a helper or champion. There was none to help.

5-7. Prayer for a Speedy Answer. In the midst of this lonely road, beset with snares, he cries unto Jehovah. He looked to the right hand and to the left, but there was none to help; then he looked up, for in Jehovah was his help; let him interfere (v. 6). Out of prison (v. 7)—may refer to a literal place of confinement, or may be understood figuratively of the depth of his distress. That I may give thanks—for the wonderful deliverance. Then the righteous will join in the psalm of thanksgiving at his release.

PSALM 143. A PENITENTIAL PSALM

The psalmist is afflicted, but he sees in his sufferings merited punishment for sin. He pleads not only for the removal of suffering but also for restoration of close fellowship with Jehovah, which will entitle him to the divine mercy and help. It probably comes from the same period as Psa. 140-142 (see introductory paragraph to Psa. 140) if not from the same author.

1, 2. Appeal for Merciful Consideration. Though feeling his unworthiness, the psalmist nevertheless pleads for a hearing with Jehovah (v. 1). He begins by pleading guilty (v. 2). He cannot stand trial, and his soul cries out "Unworthy" as he comes into the presence of Jehovah; he recognizes the necessity of mercy instead of justice (cf. Isa. 65).

3, 4. Despair at His Position. His case is bad. The persecutor has beaten him down to the very darkness of death. My spirit is overwhelmed— or my spirit fainteth; aware of his unworthiness he is paralyzed at the apparent hopelessness of his position.

5, 6. Past Experiences Cause Him to Yearn for New Manifestations of God. He remembers the past marvelous workings of God and prays for a fresh manifestation. I spread forth my hands (v. 6). The outward expression of the soul's passionate longing.

7-12. Prayer for the Guidance and Deliverance of the Psalmist and the Destruction of His Enemies. Unless the Lord looks down with immediate mercy, the psalmist feels himself ready to give up and sink into the pit of death (v. 7; the language here is borrowed from other psalms). In the darkness of despair he longs for the dawn of God's presence, bringing him guidance (v. 8). He takes refuge in Jehovah (v. 9), in the firm hope that he may hide him until the trouble is past; and that Jehovah will help him to conform his will to the divine will (v. 10). The assurance of the divine help brings about a quickening of the spirit: God will surely bring the soul out of trouble (v. 11). I am thy servant (v. 12)—therefore the psalmist has a right to expect the master's protection for himself and the master's punishment and destruction of all who seek to injure him (cf. Jn. 176-11).

PSALM 144. PRAISE FOR HELP RECEIVED; BLESSINGS RESULTING FROM THE DIVINE PROTECTION

The psalm seems to be a compilation of material taken from different psalms (e.g., 8, 18, 23, 29, 104) and possibly from some poem which has not been preserved. Though the title refers to David, the character of the psalm as a compilation makes a late date highly probable.

1, 2. Praise for Military Assistance. The psalmist gives praise to God who teaches his hands the skill of warfare. Fingers—possibly for the use of the bow. Though vv. 1, 2 refer to help in the time of war, the more gentle qualities of Jehovah are also remembered. Jehovah is kind, strong; in him we may live and view the landscape of realities; he is deliverer, protector, who makes the psalmist a successful ruler (Psa. 18).

3, 4. God's Goodness and Man's Insignificance. Jehovah is so wonderful—who is insignificant man, that God thinks about him? (Cf. 84.) Vanity—Hebrew, "breath," a figure describing the brief span of man's earthly pilgrimage (395, 11).

5-8. Prayer of the Manifestation of God's Power. The descriptions of 189 104³² and other passages are changed to prayers. The enemy is wicked. Right hand of falsehood—they take oaths which they do not mean to keep. God has shown himself powerful in the past; let him do so again, and there is no chance for the enemies to endure.

9-11. Promise of Eternal Gratitude; Renewal of Prayer. The psalmist is confident that the deliverance asked for will be granted. David may denote the typical ruler of Israel (v. 10). V. 11 contains a prayer for deliverance from the wicked enemies.

12-15. Prosperity of Israel Under the Protection of Jehovah. An independent poem, probably taken from a source which is no longer known. Vv. 13, 14 describe conditions in a nation whose God is Jehovah (v. 15). In such a nation young men and women will be strong, vigorous, and beautiful (v. 12). There will be abundant material prosperity; the enemies will be driven away, sons and daughters will grace the home, and the barns be full of provision (v. 13). After a successful harvest the oxen are laden with fruits and grain, and there will be no hostile attacks by any enemy. All these blessings will come from Jehovah who "is the source and sum of all true happiness, temporal and eternal." Happy indeed is the people whose God is Jehovah!

PSALM 145. PRAISE OF JEHOVAH FOR HIS WONDERFUL GOODNESS AND POWER

A collection of "Songs of Praise" (145-150) forms the close of the book of Psalms. Evidently all of them were composed for liturgical use; they are held together by similarity in thought and language and probably all come from the same period, namely, the days of Nehemiah. Psa. 145 is the only one in the entire book that is called "Praise," though the later Jews called the entire Psalter "Book of Praise." The marvelous beauty of Psa. 145 has inspired varied descriptions. It has been called "a noble doxology," "a bracelet, in which one beautiful bead is strung on after another, making a yet more beautiful whole." Its theme has been said to find expression in "Thine is the kingdom, the power and the glory, forever and ever." The speaker is Israel and the subject is the unspeakable majesty, goodness, greatness, providence, and love of God. There is a strong note of universalism running throughout. It is an alphabetic acrostic, each two line stanza beginning with a letter of the Hebrew alphabet in regular order.

1-3. Chorus of Praise. Israel announces the determination to praise Jehovah the eternal King (v. 1); forever and ever—Israel speaks with a consciousness of national immortality (v. 2). Jehovah is worthy of infinite praise; his greatness is beyond the goal of human search; man can never fully know it (v. 3).

4-11. Character of Jehovah Calling Forth His Praise. From one generation to another his praise shall go on; and yet it never will reach adequate expression, because the character and acts of Jehovah are beyond human comprehension. The glorious splendor of divine majesty shall be a continuous theme (v. 5). Men shall speak of his great strength, his mighty works and his weighty judgments (v. 6); they will also pour forth a perpetual stream of praise for his great goodness and righteousness (v. 7), his compassion and tender mercy (v. 8; cf. Ex. 34⁶). The good Father, whose goodness and mercy is unto all men, manifests these same attributes in nature (v. 9). "All thy works shall praise thy name—in earth and sky and sea" (v. 10; cf. 191⁻⁶). God's people will talk of his glory and power (v. 11).

13-17. Jehovah Desires to Make Known Himself, His Works, His Purpose. The purpose of his manifestations is to reveal his mighty acts to the children of men (cf. v. 12). God's rule cannot be measured by time; it is yesterday, to-day, and forever (v. 13; cf. Dan. 4³¹). One line of the acrostic seems lost here. Jehovah is the great comforter of the burdened heart and the helper of the fallen (v. 14). He is able to supply every need; he takes care of every creature; he is the great head of the house, the great provider for all the needs of his household, in due season (v. 15). Every living thing is satisfied from the bounty of Jehovah. When he opens his hand all of his household is satisfied (v. 16). God is holy (v. 17), eternally right and merciful.

18-21. Jehovah Ready to Hear and Answer Prayer. Jehovah will help any child that calls upon him sincerely, and he is ever near enough to hear (v. 18). When there is no response we have not called in truth; otherwise his righteousness, i.e., his loyalty, to the covenant relationship would surely bring an answer. Concerning vv. 19, 20, Kirkpatrick says: "Fear and love are the inseparable elements of true religion. Fear preserves love from degenerating into presumptuous familiarity; love prevents fear from being a servile and cringing dread" (Cambridge Bible, p. 817). V. 21 reiterates the resolution that the psalmist shall never cease to praise God, and he challenges all humanity to join in his praise.

PSALM 146. JEHOVAH THE ONE TRUE HELPER

Israel is warned against trusting in men; Jehovah alone can supply her need, and he is willing to do so. Therefore, let all sing his praise. This is the first of the five "Hallelujah" psalms with which the book closes. Psa. 146 has several points of contact with Psa. 145 (see introductory paragraph there).

1, 2. Exhortation and Promise to Praise Jehovah. V. 1 contains a call to worship, in the spirit of Psa. 103. V. 2 expresses an absolute commitment of self to God (cf. 104³²).

3, 4. Warning Against Putting Trust in Men. There is no need to trust in princes or any other man, for they return to the earth from whence they came, and their purposes with them. The grave levels every caste and iron out every difference of social standing; pauper and prince lie down together, inheritor of six feet of sod. God alone abides and retains his power.

5-10. From the Helplessness of Man to the Power of Jehovah. The psalmist contrasts the hopelessness of trust in man with the hope born of trust in God (v. 5); also the weakness of man with the might of the Creator who made heaven and earth (v. 6). This powerful God is also good (v. 7), as he has revealed again and again in the history of Israel and in his dealings with men in general (cf. 103⁶ 107⁹). With this verse and v. 8 compare also Mt. 11¹⁻⁶. Strangers (v. 9)—better, "sojourners"; i.e., resident aliens who have no right of citizenship; for these and all others who need his help he cares, but he destroys the wicked. His reign is not transitory as is that of earthly kings, but eternal (v. 10).

PSALM 147. PRAISE FOR RESTORATION, PROVIDENCE AND PROSPERITY

The psalm falls quite naturally into three parts (vv. 1-6, 7-11, 12-20), each one beginning with a call to praise. The three outstanding themes are (1) the goodness of God to Israel; (2) his beneficent care for all nature; (3) his moral government of the universe. Like the other psalms in the group it may come from the days of Nehemiah; "it is not an improbable conjecture that it was composed for the festival of the dedication of the walls of Jerusalem celebrated by Nehemiah (12²⁷⁻⁴³)."

1-6. Praise of Jehovah as the Restorer of Israel, the Ruler of the World. V. 1 includes what may be regarded as the title, a call to praise and the statement that it is pleasing and satisfying to worship Jehovah. Doth build up (v. 2)—it is a continuous process; Jehovah is constantly rebuilding Jerusalem and gathering his people who have long been outcasts (cf. 51¹⁸). The loving-kindness of God exhibits itself in the restoration of his people and their healing (v. 3; cf. Isa. 61^{1f.}). Number . . . names (v. 4). The God who knows the number and names of the stars will have no special difficulty in finding all his people. He is mighty, powerful, and there is no limit to his understanding (v. 5). He numbers the stars, but who can tell his wisdom? The power and love of God are manifested in his moral government of the world (v. 6).

7-11. Praise of Jehovah as the Beneficent Lord of Creation. The psalmist, contemplating the works of God, bursts into a new exhortation to praise him. Jehovah's marvelous works are shown in the mystery of rainfall and the growth of grass (v. 8). Further evidences of the divine beneficence are seen in the care of dumb animals and helpless birds (v. 9); the raven's cry goes not unheeded. Jehovah delights not in physical strength but in reverent trustfulness (v. 10). Horse refers to warfare; swiftness of foot was necessary to the warrior. Jehovah is not dependent on armies. In reality he is not on the side of the strongest military forces, as has been said, but with those who put their trust in him. He takes delight in spiritual rather than physical strength. Hope in mercy. Divine mercy is a source of permanent strength.

12-20. Praise of Jehovah as the Giver of Peace and Prosperity. Jerusalem is personified and called upon to praise Jehovah. Jehovah has established Jerusalem; it is his name that has made her glorious (v. 13); it is he, and he alone, who is the giver of peace and plenty (v. 14). Commandment . . . word (v. 15)—God's word is personified; it is sent forth as a swift runner (107²⁰; cf. Isa. 55^{10, 11}). Snow and frost are not altogether rare in Palestine and Jerusalem; but it is always a matter of wonder when a blanket of snow bedecks the earth with glory, and frost reveals much of nature's beauty (v. 16). Ice=hail; it is compared to morsels of bread scattered to the birds (v. 17). Just as he sends these things, so he also causes their disappearance (v. 18). The word of Jehovah, which is operative in nature, has taken in Israel a special form, the revelation of the divine law (v. 19). This is the unique privilege of Israel, for he has not revealed himself like that to any other nation.

PSALM 148. A UNIVERSAL HYMN OF PRAISE

Israel, rejoicing in her restoration, summons all nature, heavenly and earthly, to join in praise to the God who made them. Evidently, the psalmist thinks that the history of Israel has a significance for the whole world (see introductory paragraph to Psa. 145).

1-6. Call to the Heavens to Praise Their Creator. The call is universal. Heavens . . . height—perhaps the stars and moon. Let all the heavenly bodies praise Jehovah. Angels . . . hosts—the hosts are the troops of angels. Vv. 1, 2 call upon heavenly beings and heavenly bodies to join in the anthem of praise. Sun, moon . . . stars of light—are called upon to add their glad acclaim of praise (cf. Psa. 19). Heavens of heavens (v. 4)—not a plurality of heavens; the later Jews thought of either three or seven heavens—"the highest heavens" (cf. "Song of Songs," "King of Kings," etc.). Waters . . . above the heavens—cf. 104³ Gen. 1.6, 7 and notes. The earth was supposed to be surrounded by water. God commanded, and they were created (v. 5). The conception is that of Gen. 1; God said the word, and heaven and earth were made. Thus, because God made them, he is entitled to their praise. Established . . . made a decree (v. 6). God has made the heavens and the earth, and they are given fixed laws which they cannot transgress; these laws are nothing more than the expressions of the divine will.

7-13. Call to the Earth to Praise Its Creator.

The creatures of the earth should praise God. Dragons, and all deeps—the sea monsters of Gen. 1.21; these inhabitants of the sea with the sea itself. All that is in the sea is called upon to praise God; thus Israel, who feared the sea, is reminded that God governs the sea as well as the land. How beautiful is the thought (v. 8) that even the storms raging about us are but divine messengers. Lightning, hail, snow, vapor, and stormy wind are all doing God's will and are fulfilling his word. The summons in vv. 9-12 includes mountains, trees, beasts, creeping things, flying fowl, men, kings, princes, men and maidens old and young. All these, without distinction of caste or station, are called upon to praise God, catching the spirit of the general outburst of adoration. Let all of them praise him whose name is excellent and whose glory is above the heavens.

14. Israel Has Special Reason for Praising Jehovah. He has exalted the horn of his people—has restored their dignity and power. A people near unto him—the Hebrew people were his chosen ones and his saints.

PSALM 149. SONG OF TRIUMPH

The first part of the psalm is a summons to praise Jehovah. The latter part is cruelly vindictive. It has been argued and possibly with some degree of reason, that it was written for the rededication of the Temple under the Maccabees in 165 B.C. or even after the capture of Acra in 142 B.C. In its vindictiveness it resembles the book of Esther, which comes from the same late period. It is doubtful, however, that the arguments for such a late date are conclusive. It is more probable that this psalm, like the others in the group, originated in the days of Nehemiah.

1-5. Israel Summoned to Praise Jehovah. The reason is twofold: (1) He is the "maker" of Israel; (2) he is her "restorer" to dignity and power. New song—new blessings demand new songs of praise. Saints=Hasidim. If the psalm is Maccabæan, the reference is probably to the Hasideans mentioned in the books of Maccabees (1 Macc. 2.42). But if it comes from the age of Nehemiah, the entire faithful community is addressed. In him that made him—Jehovah made them a nation and now restores that nation. The celebration is accompanied by a religious dance and instrumental music; timbrel—a hand drum (v. 3).

Taketh pleasure in his people—always, but especially in deliverance from national danger his favor is once more vouchsafed to them. Will beautify—or "adorn." The word "adorn" is often used of restoration, yet there is also another beautiful figure which often occurs, namely, the adornment of righteousness. The former is preferable here. Salvation—mg., "victory"; it denotes prosperity and general welfare as well as the restoration from exile (v. 4). Let Israel exult in the honor which God has put upon them. Sing upon their beds—in the East one lies down behind barred doors and with watchmen. When the Lord has wrought victory, the security is so great that the people may make a joyful noise upon their beds; there will be no danger of sudden attack and no need of silence and secrecy.

6-9. Triumph Over all the Nations and Their Destruction. The high praise of God is to be in their mouths, while a two-edged sword (or "devouring sword") is to be in their hands (cf. Neh. 4.16-18). While the mouth praises God, the hand is to wield a sword that will speak just as convincingly. Vengeance . . . punishments. The restored Israelites are to be the instruments in the hands of God to chastise the nations that will not hear or that have thought to destroy God's people. The Messianic nation here is bringing all other nations under subjection (v. 8); kings and nobles will be overcome; the victory is to be complete. The judgment written (v. 9)—judgment upon hostile nations is one of the favorite themes of the prophets. This honor—translate, "honor shall that be to all his saints." The complete defeat of the enemies brings honor to God's own people.

PSALM 150. AN EXPRESSION OF HIGHEST JOY

This mighty burst of praise is a fit ending to the book which above all other books of the Bible expresses the whole range of human experience: Love, Life, Joy, Sorrow, Disappointment, Sin, Repentance, Comfort, Condemnation, Imprecation—every sort of human frailty and faith. But at last, when the whole question has been gone over and the conclusion of the whole matter is reached, there is the highest reason for praising God with the whole being and for shouting forth his praise with this trumpetlike song. The answer to all questions and all conditions of life and experience is: "Praise Jehovah; Hallelujah."

Praise God—Hebrew, El, the God of power; sanctuary=heaven, the abode of God; firmament—the foundation of his sanctuary, for God's dwelling is above the firmament. Mighty acts . . . excellent greatness—manifested in his dealings with men, in personal experience and in nature. Trumpet . . . psaltery . . . harp—praise him with all of the instruments which can be used (v. 3). Other instruments to be used in the ritual of worship are mentioned in vv. 4, 5. The picture is of a great holy day of spiritual exultation, when all of the choirs will join in songs of praise; first in heaven, or the sanctuary of God set upon the mighty firmament of the skies, where angels sing; then in the earthly temple, either with the voice of nature, which ever praises God, or with the instruments devised by the cunning hand of man, for this very purpose. Choir, orchestra and congregation are called into this mighty oratorio that wells up from earth and challenges the heavens until the psalmist, in a great finale, cries out, "Let everything that hath breath praise the Lord."

PROVERBS

By PROFESSOR EARLE B. CROSS

Objective and Method of Treatment. In preparing this interpretation of the book of Proverbs the author has tried to keep in mind the things which touch ground common to our modern life and the ancient Hebrew world. He has sought to discover what in Proverbs is of worth, and interest to the present age. To do this he has not followed the usual commentary method, but has grouped together significant blocks of proverbs and has given them a connected-topical treatment. A large part of Proverbs of little meaning for present day thought and life has been ignored in deliberately focusing on the old book the spotlight of what modern youth is thinking, in order to set forth in relief such part of its contents as has a vital message for to-day.

Literature: For those who desire to make a more detailed study of the book and who, therefore, wish to consult more comprehensive works on Proverbs, there are available the following helps: Toy, Proverbs (International Critical Commentary); Horton, Proverbs (Expositor's Bible); Elmslie, Studies in Life from Jewish Proverbs; Genung, The Hebrew Literature of Wisdom; Kent, The Wise Men of Ancient Israel and Their Proverbs; Kent and Burrows, Proverbs and Didactic Poems (Student's Old Testament).

I. APPRECIATION OF PROVERBS AS LITERATURE

Characteristics of Hebrew Poetry. The Hebrew poets seem to have been little concerned with a careful meter such as marks the classic Greek and Latin, or much of English poetry. The natural stress of the voice gives a rhythm which satisfied the Hebrew, and this suffers little in the process of translation. (See art., Poetic and Wisdom Literature, pp. 154; cf. also pp. 23, 341f.) Most of the lines in Proverbs are three stress lines, such as in 101, 2:

"A wise son | maketh | a glad father:
But a foolish son | is the heaviness | of his mother.
Treasures of wickedness | profit | nothing;
But righteousness | delivereth | from death."

A second feature peculiar to Hebrew poetry is the rhyming of the thought. In the lines quoted above, the second of each couplet gives the obverse of thought in relation to the first. This balance of lines give a pleasing effect. Frequently, the second line of a couplet will repeat the thought of the first, but in a variance of words, as in 120:

"Wisdom crieth aloud in the street;
She uttereth her voice in the broad places."

Less often, the second line extends the thought of the first by presenting a conclusion or sequence of idea, as in 110:

"My son, if sinners entice thee, Consent thou not."

The couplet is by no means the only grouping of lines in Hebrew poetry. Triads of lines are common, quatrains also, and groups of five, six, or seven lines. The more numerous the lines in a group, however, the more likelihood that subordinate divisions of the thought will appear (see p. 155). Couplets predominate in Proverbs 101-221⁶. In the other parts of the book, a variety of groupings will be found.

Longer Poems in Proverbs. A sonnet—to borrow English terminology which does not exactly fit—a sonnet of interesting form occurs in Prov. 66-11.

"Go to the ant, thou sluggard;
Consider her ways and be wise:
Which having no chief,
Overseer, or ruler,
Provideth her meat in the summer,
And gathereth her food in the harvest.
How long wilt thou sleep, O sluggard?
When wilt thou arise out of thy sleep?
A little sleep!
A little slumber!
A little folding of the hands to sleep!
So shall thy Poverty come as a robber,
And thy Want as an armed man."

See the sluggard nod off into sleep! "A little sleep!" Bobs his head onto his breast. "A little slumber!" Again he nods. The next line suggests the snuggling of his body down into a more comfortable posture for a sound sleep, whereupon those two ruffians, Poverty and Want, burst upon the scene to strip the sluggard and leave him to rags and hunger. With a different prefatory setting this same refrain appears in 24³⁰⁻³⁴. The teacher with imagination and dramatic instinct will know how to fix by pantomime the lesson of these lines upon the minds of children.

Another kindred poem is found in 23²⁹⁻³⁵, in which the imagination sensitive to the dramatic may discover a dialogue. A drunkard complains at implied slurs of his friend, speaking in tones which would sound forth injured innocence were they not maudlin, and broken by an occasional hiccup:

"Who hath woes?
Who hath sorrow?
Who hath contentions?
Who hath complainings?
Who hath wounds without cause?
Who hath redness of eyes?" (23²⁹)

His sober friend responds, as the second person of the pronouns indicates in the answer to the questions, but to no avail (23³⁰⁻³⁴). In alcoholic glee, the drunkard hails the drowning of his woes in the coma of his cups, as the variance in pronouns again indicates:

"They have stricken me, and I was not hurt!
They have beaten me, and I felt it not!
When shall I awake? I will seek it yet again."

The italicized words of our English versions in the first line of v. 35 are not in the Hebrew, but they do indicate that our translators recognized the drunkard as the speaker. A reader trained to express the proper inflection, tone color, and touch, can render the lines with adequate depiction of the ridiculous sot, unreasonable, enslaved by appetite, and glorying in the very insensibility which is his doom.

Imaginative Language and Figures of Speech. Imaginative language characterizes the Hebrew, as it does all other poesies. Simile, metaphor, allusion, metonymy challenge the best thought of the reader. As the writers seek to incite youth to the search of wisdom, they write:

"If thou seek her as silver,
And search for her as for hid treasures" (24⁴).

If we may define wisdom for the moment as the expression in conduct of divine ideals for human life, we realize that in the simile cited the poet has chosen a figure embodying the chief rival of wisdom in human affairs—wealth. He would set his disciple to pursuing wisdom with all the zest with which the average youth was chasing the almighty shekel. He would have him, to use the amplified form in which a greater poet rendered the same figure, "go and sell all that he possessed, and buy the field in which wisdom lies hidden." The stupendous modern expeditions for the salvaging of sunken treasure ships may serve as illustrations commensurate with the superb modern apparatus for the acquiring of wisdom which is available for the willing disciple. Let the mind dwell on such figures in the Proverbs and the aptness, the stimulating suggestiveness of their art will quicken every alert mind.

Another couplet from Proverbs we cite, which appears in more ample form in Jesus' usage:

"When the whirlwind passeth, the wicked is no more:
But the righteous is an everlasting foundation" (10²⁵; cf. Mt. 7²⁵⁻²⁷).

In this metaphor, profoundly true to life, wherein neither good nor bad can escape devastating storms, the superior worth of the righteous appears in his foundation upon which courage and faith may rebuild.

Imaginative expansion of the figures of speech in Proverbs is not only a fascinating process but also a profitable study. The point of illustration is not always obvious, however, for it is often obscured by faulty translation, or by the archaic nature of the allusion, when the text itself is not garbled. The more extensive commentaries will be of service in such cases. We venture to cite one instance, in which the pith of the lesson is obscured by the translation into English of the Hebrew word "taste" as "discretion." We hold to "taste" in precisely our usage of that word in the simile in 11²²:

"As a jewel of gold in a swine's snout,
So is a fair woman which is without taste."

Here is posed a bulk of bestiality dangling a ludicrous atom of beauty. In like manner does charm, physical or spiritual, dwindle to nothing against the coarse material reality of a lack of taste, be it in dress, manners, conversation, or religion. This taste may be in large measure a natural gift, but Proverbs is concerned throughout in depicting it as a matter of cultivation through self-discipline. (See below, section III.)

In some senses the ninth chapter of Proverbs is the climax of the book. The form of the poem is unique, fashioned upon the model of an arch. Stands Mistress Wisdom as the one pillar (vv. 1-6), Mistress Folly as the other (vv. 13-18). The arch contains couplets on the worth of discipline and a capstone on Wisdom:

"The fear of the Lord is the beginning of wisdom;
And the knowledge of the Holy One is understanding" (v. 10).

Without this arch and its capstone, the poet could not have set forth Mistress Wisdom over against Mistress Folly with confidence that the reader would detect the superior worth of the former. The style of the two pillars is worthy of note. Mistress Wisdom works with zeal and purpose. She builds a mansion, proportioned to seven pillars. She prepares a banquet, with invitations to which she sends forth her maidens. Mistress Folly, on the other hand, talks much—but does nothing. She sits idly at her door by the wayside. She has no disciples, and is unheeded by most that pass. The poet deftly indicates that Wisdom and Folly may not be easily distinguished at the first, when he places in the mouth of each the identical words of invitation:

“Whoso is simple let him turn in hither:
As for him that is void of understanding, she saith to him . . .” (94, 16)

What each says then follows. Wisdom, e.g., says that she has a simple feast of life and understanding. Folly has stolen waters, and promises of bread, which are made futile by death.

Proverbs is by no means the least of those works which have placed the O.T. upon a high pedestal in the hall of the world's great literature.

II. THE PLACE OF PROVERBS IN HEBREW HISTORY

Literary History. The book of Proverbs is a summary of the best contributions of Hebrew wise men from the earliest times to the days of the restoration following the return from exile in the fifth century. It is the last edition of a work which grew with the passing years. Many of the hundreds who doubtless contributed to its contents spoke words such as had pertinence to their own times only, so that they have been eliminated from the editions of succeeding generations. As we now have it, the book presents a nucleus of such ancient material as was consonant with the ideas of those writers who put forth this latest summary of wisdom on the eve of the closing of the canon of sacred writings, after which nothing more could find its way into the Scriptures. Kindred writings exist, which did not find recognition as Scripture, such as “Ecclesiasticus,” or the “Wisdom of Jesus ben Sirach.” (See art., Intertestamental Literature, p. 196b.)

Solomonic Authorship. Tradition attributes Proverbs to Solomon, as the editorial notation in 1¹ reveals. If Solomon was the author, we must date the book five centuries earlier than the date required by manifest facts. Solomon is referred to again in 10¹, and also in 25¹. The latter verse is, “These also are proverbs of Solomon, which the men of Hezekiah king of Judah copied out.” Where had these proverbs been during the two centuries which separate the days of Solomon from Hezekiah? In any case, the last two chapters of the book are not to be ascribed to Solomon, for they are headed respectively, “The words of Agur the son of Jakeh, the oracle,” and “The words of king Lemuel; the oracle which his mother taught him” (30¹ 31¹). To the extent of these two chapters at least the book is composite. The ascription of the book to Solomon was probably due to the original impulse which that famous king gave to wisdom. The mass of such literature which grew up in later generations was attributed to him by proxy, even as the psalms are largely attributed to David and the writings of the Law to Moses.

This theory is strengthened when one considers how different the contents of the book are from what one would expect of Solomon's writings. A description in Kings states: “God gave Solomon wisdom and understanding exceeding much . . . And he spake three thousand proverbs; and his songs were a thousand and five. And he spake of trees, from the cedar that is in Lebanon even unto the hyssop that springeth out of the wall: he spake also of beasts, and of fowl, and of creeping things, and of fishes . . .” (1 Kings 4^{29f.}).

The first twenty-nine chapters of the book contain but 850 verses in all, so that we can hardly claim to be in possession of more than a fragment of the 3,000 proverbs of Solomon, not to mention the 1,005 songs. After Kings has led us to expect a rather exclusive use of illustrations from animate nature, we are surprised to find in Proverbs but 38 verses of this type, 29 referring to animals, birds, or insects, with no reference to fish, and nine mentioning vegetable objects. Furthermore, the predominance of such nature proverbs among the 64 verses of the last two chapters of the book, where 13 are found, sets these chapters forth as more truly characteristic of the Solomon whom Kings describes than is the main portion of the book. Yet, as we have seen, these chapters are definitely assigned to writers other than Solomon. If Kings is right concerning the nature of Solomon's proverbs, then the book of Proverbs contains little from his hand. It is barely possible that the bulk of Solomon's work has been lost, and that only such material remains as is least like what Kings describes. This idea has but to be stated to be rejected.

The references to kings which are found in Proverbs (16¹⁴ 19¹² 20² 25³) have been cited by some as being so derogatory of the honor and majesty of monarchs that Solomon would hardly have written them. Let the student consider these references for himself, however, and he will be inclined to turn the argument about to support Solomon's authorship.

Characteristic Ideas of Proverbs: Their Bearing on the Date. The more cogent evidence for locating the book of Proverbs somewhere in the period following the Exile appears when one takes into account the attitude which is revealed in the book with regard to such outstanding ideas as the concept of God, the status of woman, and the social entity. In the stream of developing thought and social relations the position which Proverbs holds is such as to confirm the theory that it is to be dated in the later years of Hebrew history.

(1) Conception of God. Consider the evidence with regard to the idea of God in Proverbs. The fundamental conception of God for the writers of Proverbs is his creative power (31⁹, 20). The surging primeval deeps were broken up and disposed as seas through the creative might of God; and the cool dew of evening slaking the thirst of vegetation is a gift of the same creative power. There is a similarity between the imagery in an outstanding passage of Proverbs (8²²⁻³¹) and the language of certain passages in the later chapters of the book of Isaiah (40¹², 21^f. 44²⁴ 45¹¹^f.) and in the book of Job (9⁵^f. 26⁷^f. 38⁴^f.). Both of these latter sections of the Bible are products of the latest periods of Hebrew history. Can such a conception of God have been portrayed in the days of the early monarchy by Solomon?

David, the father of Solomon, thought of God as confined to Hebrew territory (1 Sam. 26¹⁹). It was not till the time of the writing prophets that there began to appear an idea of God as God of all the earth. In Amos (see 9⁷) the idea is hardly more than a query. (Amos 4¹³ 5⁸, 9 9⁶ are generally regarded as marginal annotations from the hands of writers of a date following the Exile.) In any case, Amos did not come upon the scene until nearly two centuries after Solomon's time. Amos and his successors were responsible for the building of that splendid theology in which there came to flower at length the conception of God as sole Deity and Creator as well as Controller of earth. Proverbs appears to exist in a realm of thought where this conception of God has deep root. It is a book relatively late in Hebrew history. (See art., O.T. Conception of God, pp. 161-3.)

(2) Status of Woman. In the early days of the monarchy, polygamy prevailed. Certainly, all the kings of Israel and Judah had large harems, and the harem of Solomon himself has become proverbial. A fair inference from the privilege of the king might be drawn to the effect that the man of lesser rank might have the same right to a harem limited only by his ability to provide therefor. Elkanah, father of Samuel, had two wives (1 Sam. 1¹, 2). Even more definite evidence comes from the legal enactments of successive periods. Deuteronomy in the seventh century recognizes the right of a man to have at least two wives (Deut. 21¹⁵). Nowhere is there any law prohibiting polygamy. Yet in the later codes of the Priestly document of the Hexateuch, dating from the Exile, there is no repetition of such a clause as that which appears in Deuteronomy, countenancing polygamy. The probability is that any book produced before the Exile would reveal traces of plurality of wives, if there were any reference at all to marriage or the family.

The book of Proverbs, however, seems to assume monogamy as the type of marriage. Several passages refer to the family and woman's place in life (12⁴ 18²² 19¹⁴ 21⁹ 25²⁴). In each case the sentiment is more monogamous than polygamous. Again, in the somewhat stilted alphabetical acrostic in praise of the ideal woman (31¹⁰⁻³¹), the wife appears as household manager. There is no reference to rival wives, or subordinate wives. The reasonable inference from the passage is that the dominance of one woman after this fashion in a household implies monogamy. Furthermore, in the discussion of sexual evil the implications, insofar as they bear upon the form of the family, seem to support the contention that monogamy was the type (see especially 5¹⁸, 19). There are no passages which require one to postulate a polygamous background. Such facts support the theory that Proverbs is a product of the period following the Exile.

(3) The Social Entity. Through the early years of Hebrew life the entity of social interest is the nation, or the family. In nomad life, the individual exists only as one of a group. Apart from his group he can hardly win food from the hand of nature, even if he can protect himself from the ravages of his fellow men. This nomadic influence persisted with the Hebrews into their settled life in Canaan. The story of Achan illustrates the close-knit life of members of a group in that the entire group paid the penalty of death with Achan for his violation of the ban against taking booty in the attack on Jericho (Josh. 7). The earlier prophets directed their sermons to the nation. Even Jeremiah and Ezekiel, to whom credit is usually given for the discovery of the individual, preach largely to the nation as such.

It is, therefore, striking to find in the book of Proverbs no reference at all to the national entity. The words "Israel" and "Judah," or "nation," which are the commonplace of the O.T. with the exception of Job, are conspicuous by their absence. It is difficult in the face of this fact to regard either Job or Proverbs as the product of a writer of the days prior to the Exile, unless we premise some peculiar spirit in the wise men as such which led them to stress the individual rather than the group. The Dispersion was just such a cataclysm as would tend to emphasize the individual and obliterate the group in the welter of deportations and wide dissemination of the nation throughout the known world.

(4) Linguistic Characteristics. The linguistic evidence, which may be found in detail in more extended commentaries, reveals many late-word usages in the Hebrew of Proverbs. Aramaic words are of frequent occurrence with a few words of possible Arabic origin. One word occurs which may have been borrowed from the Greek, although the borrowing may have been in the opposite direction after all, by the Greek from some Semitic source kindred with the Hebrew. On general grounds of language and style, Proverbs obviously ranges with Job and Ecclesiastes, and the evidence which places these books in the period following the Exile, will necessarily weigh in favor of dating Proverbs there as well.

III. THE COUNSEL OF PROVERBS

Outline of Book. The book of Proverbs naturally divides itself into six parts, two of which might be further subdivided into two parts each. These divisions are indicated in the book itself by captions at the several points of distinction. We outline the contents thus:

1. Prologue, whose chief theme is "The Praise of Wisdom" (chs. 1-9).
2. Disconnected aphorisms on various themes, chiefly emphasizing the superior worth of wisdom and moral conduct, and largely in the form of couplets. (101-2216). Caption: "The proverbs of Solomon." 2217-2422 may be considered part of this section, since there is no specific caption (cf., however, the exhortation, "hear the words of the wise," in 2217); quatrains prevail here instead of couplets and there are some longer stanzas on particular themes, e.g., the drunkard (2329-35).
3. A brief section of no especial distinction aside from the caption: "These also are sayings of the wise" (2423-34).

4. A collection of aphorisms of a variety of forms and on various themes (251-2927). Caption: "These also are proverbs of Solomon, which the men of Hezekiah, king of Judah, copied out."
5. Varied material, largely numerical riddles (301-33). Caption: "The words of Agur the son of Jakeh; the oracle."
6. Two poems on the king's duty (311-9) and the worthy woman (3110-31). Caption: "The words of king Lemuel; the oracle which his mother taught him." The poem on the worthy woman might be distinguished as an anonymous poem from the words of king Lemuel and be considered a closing section for the entire book.

Principal Theme: The Worth of Wisdom.

The dominant theme of the book of Proverbs is the superior worth of wisdom. In the usage of the book wisdom includes moral conduct as well as knowledge. The writers do not set forth the precise content of wisdom, but confine themselves to general exhortations to seek out and secure this priceless treasure. They personify both wisdom and folly as women. Wisdom first appears in person in the open square before the city gates, where were wont to assemble the elders of the people for counsel and for judgment (120f.). There is a dramatic quality in her appeal for a following. At first she proffers the untutored her spirit and the knowledge of her teaching (123). A pause ensues during which the imagination can readily picture the scoffer and the fool, to whom the appeal has been addressed (122), turning away in complacent scorn. Whereupon Wisdom continues, "Because I have called, and ye refused . . . I will mock when your fear cometh, when your fear cometh as a storm, and your calamity cometh as a whirlwind" (124-27). Another pause, storm-filled, follows these words, as the destruction of fools sweeps by. When the dust has settled, Wisdom speaks no longer to the scornful, for they have perished. The shifting of pronouns in reference to the scoffers from "you" and "your" to "they" and "their" supports this inference. The chapter then concludes with a masterly contrast between fools, quieted at last in death, and Wisdom's followers, dwelling "securely . . . without fear of evil."

Again, Wisdom appears in the open square to persuade men of the worth of her incomparable riches (ch. 8). Her origin is with God, and she is set against all evil of whatever hue. Wisdom is the basis of government, the producer of abundant wealth, the ancient creative power working with God in the framing of the habitable earth. " 'All they that hate me love death,' for I am the creative principle of life," she would say.

The third appearance of Wisdom in personification follows in the ninth chapter after a fashion which we have described above. This is possibly the supreme point of the entire book; certainly, it is the climax of the prologue.

Personification of Folly. The opposite of wisdom is also personified in the prologue in the figure of Mistress Folly, or in the words of the English versions, "The foolish woman" (9¹³). The seventh chapter also is a personification of Folly in colors of an adulteress, secretly enticing the callow to their doom. This chapter is usually taken as a description of a lewd woman; but certain facts seem to warrant a broader interpretation. The proximity of the personifications of Wisdom (ch. 8; 9¹⁻⁶) and of Folly (9¹³⁻¹⁸) about which there can be no two opinions, suggests that ch. 7 also may be taken as figurative. Furthermore, there is significant similarity between this chapter and the personification of Folly in the last verses of the ninth chapter. The one who is tempted is in each case "simple" and "void of understanding" (7⁷ 9¹⁶). Not only is the woman in each passage described as "clamorous" (7¹¹ 9¹³), but the furtive manner of the seduction is alike, though tersely depicted in the one case and amplified in brilliant but horrid detail in the other. The concluding lines of each of the three chapters which contain these personifications (7, 8, 9) are practically identical. This, again, lends color to the idea that ch. 7 as well as the others contains a personification. The art by which the author chose the adulteress with all her wiles and seductive glamour for the figure of Folly, is apt and significant, for is not lewdness the epitome of folly? The moral sense of the poet prompted him to the choice, as it guided him also in painting the whole picture, not omitting the yawning pit and death at the end of the wanton fling.

Sexual Vice. This seventh chapter remains a graphic warning against sexual vice, even while it is regarded as an imaginative depiction of the worthlessness of folly. Beside this seventh chapter, the fifth also and the sixth, from the twentieth verse on, are built upon this theme—the deadliness of sexual sins. The point of view throughout is that of the man. It is women who are painted as the seducers, and a moral menace. This limited point of view is due to the fact that women were probably not in the educational scheme of those days at all; hence the address is always to the man's angle of vision. Nevertheless, now that we have grown to a broader educational program in which both sexes are equally prominent, the lesson of this ancient book is still pertinent. The terms for the feminine may be read in place of the masculine without greatly disturbing the picture, and without vitiating in the least the moral ideal which is set up. Evidently, the writers of Proverbs regarded sins of sex as the most deadly. At least, they gave greater space to denunciation of them than to warnings against any other type of sin.

Perils of the Moral Life. Ch. 6 epitomizes the writers' idea of perils to the moral life—sexual sins are denounced at length (6²⁰⁻³⁵), going bond for a person (6¹⁻⁵), laziness (6⁶⁻¹¹), and general perversity (6¹²⁻¹⁵). Tucked away in the midst is a numerical riddle answering the query, "What are the six or seven chief abominations of God?" The answer is, "Haughty eyes, a lying tongue, and hands that shed innocent blood; an heart that deviseth wicked imaginations, feet that be swift in running to mischief; a false witness that uttereth lies, and he that soweth discord among brethren" (6¹⁷⁻¹⁹). The moral ideal and prudent counsel herein contained are as sound for this twentieth century as for the generation which read them first.

The Wise Man's Program of Religious Education. Proverbs begins with what might be called an ancient program of religious education (12-6). Its several clauses are worthy of study.

(1) To know wisdom and understanding. The word "wisdom" has been taken rightly to be the most comprehensive term for the intellectual interests of the Hebrews. Wisdom (chokhmah) is, however, superior to mere knowledge (da'ath), for it includes not only the significance of the latter term but also the expression of that knowledge in conduct, ethical and religious. Wisdom is the knowledge of how best to conduct oneself in God's world and action consistent with such knowledge. Coupled with wisdom in this first clause of the program is "instruction" (musar). A better translation would be "discipline." While it refers largely to the process by which teachers and advisers correct the seeker after wisdom, it involves also self-discipline. As a later clause indicates (15), discipline is indispensable throughout life.

(2) To discern the words of understanding is the second clause of the program. In the Hebrew there is a tautology which our translators have sought to avoid. We incline to believe that the authors deliberately wrote "to understand the words of understanding." The Hebrew root (bi'yn) indicates an active effort to see through things, to get at the root of matters. One might well paraphrase the clause, therefore, "to understand the vocabulary of life's fundamentals."

(3) The program further proposes to receive instruction in wise dealing, in righteousness and judgment and equity. "Wise dealing," or, better, "wise conduct," is interpreted in the three terms which follow. The first of the three words, "righteousness" in the English, suggests the vertical plane, connoting the upreach after the divine which is an integral element of wisdom in Hebrew thought. "Uprightness" might preserve the color of the word best in a translation. The last word in the triad, "equity" in the English, means "straight-forwardness," if one cares to observe the color of the original. The word suggests straight and narrow paths amid human affairs. The central word, rendered "judgment" in the English, is mishpat in Hebrew. Jeremiah used this word in a novel sense to convey almost the meaning which our modern word "religion" includes (Jer. 87, "ordinance" in R.V., "law" in A.S.V.). Again, in the superb Servant Songs the word flowers into the same meaning, "religion" (Isa. 42:1-3 49:4, "judgment" in R.V., "justice" in A.S.V.). The new significance which was given to the word mishpat during the Exile must have been familiar to the authors of the prologue of Proverbs, and we incline to believe that in this program of the first chapter it should be translated "religion." "Wise conduct," then, is interpreted as "uprightness, religion, and righteousness." As the Hebrew often arranges his items, the middle word is of most significance, like the capstone of an arch; religion is therefore seen to be the predominant factor in moral conduct.

(4) Young and old have a part in the program. We can best set forth our interpretation of the lines dealing with youth by a fresh rendering,

"To give shrewdness to the untutored,
To the young man knowledge and thoughtfulness" (14).

Maturity also is included in the scheme of the wise. Those who have had instruction can never cease to add to their store of learning, and even the "man of understanding" may still have ideals of accomplishment in striving to attain unto "sound counsels" (15). The figure in the background of this last phrase in the Hebrew comes from life on the sea. "Sound counsels" is a secondary meaning, quite adequate, but not as vivid as "handling the ropes."

(5) Finally, the program looks to the grasp of literary forms and their significance, so that the difficult allusions and figures of speech in the presentation of truth may not be unappreciated. The word rendered "proverb" seems to cover the whole field of poesy, as a study of its usage in the Hebrew reveals.

"To understand poesy, and parables,
The words of the wise, and their figurative style" (16).

Thus the whole program stands—the mastery of life's fundamentals through discipline; the attainment of moral conduct; the development of intelligence in youth and the perfection of wisdom in the mature; the appreciation of the noble forms which truth assumes. Here are the elements of philosophy, ethics, and aesthetics in this simple program, whereby it must be approved as culturally sound.

Religion in Proverbs. To the casual reader the book of Proverbs may seem to be less religious in tone than most of the other books in the O.T. Practical precepts, appeals to moral conduct, and aphorisms little related to religion are the gist of the work. These are the flower cluster. The great calyx which holds the many blossoms together is not much seen; but the major premise of the book is religious, witness what might be called the text of it all:

"The fear of the Lord is the beginning (or, the chiefest part) of wisdom" (17).

Even beneath such lines as 20:29

"The glory of young men is their strength;
And the beauty of old men is the hoary head," lies this major premise, as a kindred aphorism suggests,

"The fear of the Lord prolongeth days:
But the years of the wicked shall be shortened" (10:27).

Thus the religious sanction must be kept in mind throughout, for it is everywhere like unseen roots from which the individual proverbs spring up. The prologue itself also gives ample evidence of the religious sentiments of the authors and their regard for God as the source and purveyor of wisdom, and the guardian of moral conduct (26:8 35:12, 21-26, 31-34 61:6-19).

IV. PROVERBS SPEAKS TO THE TWENTIETH CENTURY

The modern reader requires some classification of the material in Proverbs, particularly in the tenth and following chapters. (See the classification in Kent, The Wise Men of Israel and Their Proverbs). In the space at our disposal, disregarding irrelevant material, we shall hew to a single line, namely, the answers which Proverbs has to give to the problems of modern youth in their later adolescence. As we cannot afford space for discussion of problems of text, we shall consider only those passages which are fairly clear in meaning. (For a critical discussion of the book see Toy, Proverbs, in the International Critical Commentary.) The problems of modern youth may be summarized in four or five spheres—recreation, sex life and the home, economic activities, and cultural life.

Recreation. Modern youth asks in regard to recreation, "What is play? What is wasting time? Is amusement wrong and in what proportion? Is recreation contrary to religion? Is it improper to join in amusements with the opposite sex? How can one gain a right conscience on amusements? How can one find an interest in life?"

(1) Play. Proverbs has little to give directly in solution of these problems, for recreation had not come to the fore in those ancient days. Feasts and banquets on occasion, religious celebrations, impromptu matches of strength and skill such as are common to men who must keep fit for war—these appear in the records of the Hebrews. Children played their games of make-believe weddings, funerals, and the like; and no doubt games were invented by mature folk in their hours of relaxation. The nature of this recreation, however, was not such as to raise any very serious problems; nor was play of such prominence in the social order that it would be considered at length by those who were meditating upon moral and spiritual life.

(2) Seriousness of Life. The writers of Proverbs felt the seriousness of life, its burdens and its woes (14¹³). But theirs is by no means a pessimistic outlook. They maintain a sane balance. Though life may be hard, yet Proverbs is in favor of a genial, joyous attitude of mind (15^{13, 15}). Play or recreation is a means for bringing joy and cheer into life, taking the mind out of its cloying rut and giving it new vigor. As such the book would seem to approve recreation. Yet all of life cannot be play. A man requires the bread and other staples of life besides honied sweets (25¹⁶). As to what proportion of life's program should be recreation, Proverbs would throw the burden of decision upon each individual. Wisdom is not a stereotyped body of knowledge or advice. Every man must work his own soil and grow his own crop; the wise man is one who has trained his mind to discern between good and evil, to seek after an ideal and an objective such as God in his perfection might set up for him. As a man must learn to control his appetites, so he must control his time and energies, must arrange his life's program in accord with the highest good, and so avoid the retching and painful surfeit of eating too much sweet (25¹⁶).

Riotous living is not recreation in the true sense of the word. It leads to all sorts of social strife. One must seek suitable recreation in some other mode (17¹).

(3) Helpful Recreation. Recreation should not encroach upon life's serious business (21¹⁷). Proverbs opposes a stern front to laziness. Life develops through hard labor; the energetic man has the approval of the wise. Consistently, therefore, they would set limits upon recreation in life's program. There must be a definite objective in life for the wise man in contrast with a fool who simply enjoys life, who has his fling (15²¹). Would not the writers of Proverbs hold that recreation should serve life's objective? Health of body, soundness of mind, speedy co-ordinations of mind and body—these are indispensable. Such recreation as contributes to these ends furthers the attainment of life's objective.

(4) Harmful Recreation. Youth must be alert to avoid perils in such recreation as has proven the downfall of others. The book of human experience is wide open; the wise will read and heed. There is deadly play; as there is also healthful recreation (16²⁵). Recreation should be in accord with wisdom. Perhaps no single verse is of more import on this matter than 10²³:

"It is as sport to a fool to do wickedness:

And so is wisdom to a man of understanding."

The modern attempt to guide youth into constructive programs of recreation away from destructive and noxious mischief is in line with this. The ideals of fair play and sportsmanlike conduct which mark modern playing fields are one with the ancient spirit which the social order found to be good and upon which the Hebrews set their seal of approval.

Sex Life and the Home. In the sphere of sex life and the home, modern youth is asking such questions as these: Is sex appeal indecent? Why monogamy instead of polygamy? Is there harm in sexual intercourse outside of marriage? How can one control his passions? How does love differ from passion? Is woman the equal of man? What is a home? What is due honor to parents? Many of these questions which are of acute import to modern youth were not central in the world in which Proverbs was born. For one thing, marriage came much earlier than that it does now on the average. The requirements of modern life prolong the period of training, and youth cannot assume the responsibilities of matrimony for nearly a decade later than the Hebrew boy and girl did. This delay in the normal expression of sex life in marriage has given rise to grave problems of control of this master passion. Yet the basic principles of a well-ordered sex life are discoverable in Proverbs.

(1) Sex Appeal. Is sex appeal indecent? Not in its normal and proper satisfactions, Proverbs would say, as the hunger for bread is normal even though gluttony is to be abhorred (23²⁰, 21). The union of the sexes is a holy thing (18²²). The physical relationship of husband and wife is recognized as a fundamental good, quite as frankly as we are coming to regard it to-day (51⁸, 19). The harlot and adulteress are denounced, and by implication the fools who are led astray by them are also scored (53-13 61-5, 20-35 74-27 2214 2327, 28 293 30²⁰).

(2) Standard of Marriage. The standard of marriage in Proverbs is clearly monogamy. The writers do not argue the case, however, even though the earlier centuries of their people's history had been marked by the practice of polygamy. Their method seems to have been to state the conclusions to which by experience the social order had arrived, namely that monogamy was the ideal of marriage, and leave it to the individual to thresh out for himself the supporting arguments. Modern youth has a wealth of literature to peruse on this and kindred problems, in which he will find the wiser moderns supporting the conclusion of Proverbs.

(3) Sexual Intercourse. Is there harm in sexual intercourse outside of marriage? Proverbs is unequivocal in its affirmation of the perils in sexual promiscuity. Death is the penalty (see passages cited above). Possibly the writers have in mind the ancient penalty which their people had prescribed for adultery as a legal provision; more probably the perils of disease are intended (51¹), and the jealous vengeance of a wronged husband (62^{9f}). Modern sociology agrees with the conclusions of Proverbs. Promiscuity in sexual relations exposes one to diseases of a most deadly nature, disrupts social bonds, and creates fatal antagonisms. Probably the writers of Proverbs had not come to appreciate the most deadly peril in promiscuity which modern writers find, in the breakdown of moral character and loss of the finer capacities of the emotional nature. Sexual life must be controlled and regulated not only before marriage but within wedlock. If Proverbs does not specifically teach this, yet self-discipline and control are keywords of the book.

Proverbs has no specific answer to the problem of sexual control, for early marriages prevented the rise of this question in large measure. (For modern discussion see Exner, Rational Sex Life for Men; Royden, Sex and Common Sense; Gray, Men, Women, and God).

(4) Equality of Woman. Is woman the equal of man? Proverbs is written from the male point of view, for its age was adjusted to male supremacy. The book expresses a higher regard for women, however, than any earlier period of Hebrew history had produced. Monogamy is assumed to be the normal order of marriage for one thing, and woman is highly exalted in her wifehood (18²² 1914). These appreciative passages offset the repeated denunciations of garrulity in women which mark Proverbs (21⁹, 19 25²⁴ 2715). The worthy woman is praised in no measured terms (12⁴ 3110-31); but our English translations have rather perverted the significance of these passages by rendering a Hebrew word as "virtuous" which is best translated "good." Not only skill in management of a household colors the picture of the worthy woman, but social and moral, if not intellectual, abilities as well (31²⁵, 26). If Proverbs does not rise to the standard of our modern era in which woman is finding emancipation from the age-long conceit that man was her master, it should not be forgotten that in the interval between the writing of Proverbs and our own time the world has been profoundly affected by the teaching of the greatest Hebrew of all, Jesus.

(5) Home. In answer to the question, What is a home? the book of Proverbs supplies food for thought. Home is a kinship group centered about a father and a mother, inclusive of children and the aged of a former generation as well (17⁶). The coherence of the group is mutual respect and honor (17⁶ 19²⁶ 20²⁰ 2322 2824 3011, 17). One of the prime objectives of a home is the development of worthy children. The home is a place of discipline and moral education (131, 24 1918 22⁶, 15 2915, 17). Possibly Proverbs emphasizes the rod and chastisement more than many exponents of modern education would approve; nevertheless such rigorous discipline is better than the foolish renunciation by parents of all attempt to control the child on the principle of letting him "express his natural self." Discipline remains a cardinal principle of character education.

(6) Children and Parents. The supreme joy of parents is found in worthy children (101 1520 1721, 25 2324-26 287). In their turn children are blessed in the worth of their parents (207). Home is a preparatory school for life, a culture center for wisdom, which we have defined in an earlier chapter.

Proverbs subscribes to the ancient law which demanded honor for father and mother. Paul interpreted the word "honor" by "obey"

(Eph. 6¹, 2), and in this he was following Proverbs, which uses the word "hearken" in the sense of "obey," thereby strengthening the requirement of the more ancient Decalogue of Moses (13¹ 23²²). The mother is included in the demand for respect and honor. The claims of parents upon children for honor and respect are still valid, ignored though they may be by such as Proverbs would call fools (19²⁶ 20²⁰ 28²⁴ 30¹¹⁻¹⁴, 17). Changes in social custom and in the substance of human knowledge were not as stupendously rapid in those days as they are in our time, yet parents were doubtless "out of date" to their children then as they often are now. Proverbs maintains rightly that one important social bond is respect of youth for age.

Economic Activities. What is success? By what means can it be achieved? Is the making of a fortune a proper objective of life? Is not the policy of "number one first" indispensable? Is "honesty the best policy"? Do wealth and success inevitably attend a moral man? Is there a place for the "Golden Rule" in business? Such are the queries which modern youth is asking as to the sphere of economics.

(1) Success. What is success? Not riches alone (23⁴, 5), but wisdom (16¹⁶) and a good name (22¹). After all, neither wealth nor poverty is the criterion of life, but one should aim to win the favor of God (22²⁴). God's favor is upon those who try to do right (11²⁰ 12² 16⁷, 20 21³). Success is difficult of definition, but Proverbs emphasizes diligence and hard work in so many passages that obviously the writers regard the lazy man as doomed to failure (10⁴, 5, 26 12¹¹, 24, 27 13⁴, 11 14⁴, 23 16¹⁶ 18⁹ 19¹⁵ 20⁴, 13 21⁵, 25 22²⁹ 24³⁰⁻³⁴ 27²³⁻²⁷ 28¹⁰). Generosity, good will, and unselfishness are also qualities which make for success (11²⁴⁻²⁶ 13⁷ 22⁹).

(2) Fortune. Is the making of a fortune a proper objective in life? In answering this question one has to consider what Proverbs has to say with regard to riches as compared with poverty; and in doing this we shall come across the answer to other questions in the list—"Is not the policy of number one first indispensable? Is honesty the best policy? Do wealth and success inevitably attend the moral man?" Riches bring power (22⁷); they add to the number of one's friends (14²⁰ 19⁴, 7); wealth gives a sense of security and self-confidence (10¹⁵ 18¹¹). Yet in a time of peril it is a man's integrity, after all, that saves him (11⁴). Riches may ransom a man, but a poor man has no cause to fear the threats of kidnappers (13⁸). A man may become hardened by wealth (18²³). To get rich quickly is perilous (13¹¹; LXX and Vulgate read "in haste" for "by vanity"); it is often accomplished at great risk to one's moral character (28²⁰), and probably wealth thus won will soon be lost (28²²). To get rich dishonestly is abominable to God (11¹ 16¹¹ 20¹⁰, 23). Poverty is no cause for shame (16⁸ 17^{5a} 19¹), for it may be merely the result of injustices suffered (13²³). Riches must be coupled with moral character and righteous conduct to be of value in the world (10², 16 11¹⁸, 28 13²², 25 14³¹ 15⁶, 25, 27 [for gifts read bribes] 16⁸ 19¹).

(3) The Golden Rule. There remains the question, Is there a place for the Golden Rule in business? The answer rests upon the decision which one makes as to the ultimate objective of business. Proverbs sets up not simply wealth as the aim of economic life, but moral character must be inviolate as wealth is secured. In this we discover Proverbs to be one with Jesus, and the elements of his masterly summary of life's method in the Golden Rule are written in the work of the wise men three centuries before his day.

Cultural Life: (1) Personal Aspect. The problems of cultural life are in the main of two trends—the one personal and the other social. In the personal aspect appear such questions as: What is education and how can culture be secured? What is goodness? Why be good? Is goodness always blessed and prospered? What is the meaning of life? Is there a future life? What is religion? Is there a God? Of what value are religious exercises, prayer, etc.?

(1) Appreciation of Values. Culture involves appreciation of moral (12³ 23¹⁵⁻¹⁹ 29¹⁸, 24), æsthetic (11²²), and spiritual (15^{33a} 21³⁰) values. The expression of this appreciation in conduct is assumed to follow in the manifestation of such virtues as those which we are about to enumerate. There is no evidence that the writers of Proverbs thought of such practical training as the modern educational program involves. Yet they deemed culture to be the result of rigorous discipline and self-correction (10¹⁷ 12¹, 15 15⁵, 31, 32 17¹⁰ 22⁶ 23¹³, 14), by observation (17²⁴ 19²⁵ 20¹²), and by endless effort (15¹⁴, 21, 28 16¹⁶ 29²⁰). Culture is not a commodity that may be bought (17¹⁶).

(2) Goodness. What is goodness? We may note here the virtues and admirable qualities of life which Proverbs exalts; they form a list which compares favorably with those of Paul in the N.T. We find humility (11² 15^{33b} 16⁵ 18¹² 22⁴ 25¹⁴ 27² 29²³); various types of self-control (14¹⁷, 29 16³² 17²⁷, 28 18¹³ 19¹¹ 20¹ 25²⁸); veracity (10¹⁰ 12²² 13⁵ 16⁶ 19²² 20¹⁷); kindness (11¹⁷ 12¹⁰ 16⁶ 19²² 21²¹); generosity (11²⁵ 21²⁶ 22⁹ 28²⁵); diligent activity (15¹⁶) 221³ 261³-16); good cheer (151³ 172²); justice (211⁵); and fidelity (251³). All of these references will be found to be illuminating as to the moral ideals of Proverbs.

(3) Why Be Good? The questions, Why be good? and Is goodness always blessed and prospered? may be taken together. In a measure this problem has been considered under the caption of economic activities. The book declares that wickedness leads to disaster, whereas moral conduct has the favor of God (103⁰ 113, 6, 8, 19, 20, 31 121³, 21 136 192³ 225, 12 281⁸, 25, 26 291). The writers probably would allow that specific instances may seem to contradict this general assertion, but that, taking life as a whole and in the long run, the balance is greatly on the side of goodness. One essential difference between goodness and evil lies in the power of recuperation which the good man has in the common lot of humanity to suffer in storms and calamity (102⁵ 241⁵, 16).

(4) Meaning of Life. What is the meaning of life? Proverbs traces life's significance primarily to God. Life is the reward of one who reverences God (192³ 224). The translations render "reverence" as "fear," but it is fear in the sense of awe which is intended. Reverence is a fountain of life (142⁷), and prolongs life (102⁷). Life has also a moral content (111⁹ 122⁸ 212¹), and intelligence is an indispensable factor therein (101⁷ 131⁴, read mg.; 152⁴, read, with LXX, Ways of life are the thoughts of the wise, that he may turn away from Sheol and be saved; 162²). The writers are usually concerned with this mundane sphere, and not with a hypothetical future life. As to the fact of an existence after what we call death, Proverbs says nothing clearly. The time had not yet come when such a doctrine should be shaped to serve as a corrective of the apparent injustices of this world. (See art., Religion of Israel, p. 173, and cf. p. 210.) The writers of Proverbs believed that this present life has its compensations (113¹), and especially noted the superb stability and recuperative powers of a good man as against a bad (102⁵ 241⁶, 17). Many passages in our English texts would seem to indicate a belief in a future life, but a careful study of the Hebrew text makes clear that the writers are thinking rather of this present life and its prolongation in this world by moral conduct (122⁸ 131⁴ 152⁴ 224; cf. also 102⁵, 27, and see Toy's notes on these passages).

(5) God. As to whether there is a God, Proverbs never indicates a doubt. In a masterly passage we read that the rich may lose their need of God and the poor may think that God has forgotten them (307⁻⁹), yet God still exists, supreme in wisdom (213⁰), and ruler over all (161, 2, 9 202⁴ 213¹) as the disposal of lots indicates (163³ 192¹). Even kings are in his power (21¹). God made mankind, and has his purpose for them (164 201² 222). He tests men (173 212), and defends and cherishes those that take his way (102⁹ 122, 22 142⁶ 158, 9, 29 165 181⁰ 221² 282⁵ 292⁵ 305, 6). Nothing escapes his observation (153, 11 202⁷—instead of belly read soul in the sense of "inner being.")

(6) Religion. Since the writers believe in God, they had a religion even though there may not be the equivalent of our modern word "religion" in the book (see discussion on p. 608b). The phrase which comes nearest to it is "the fear of the Lord." This reverence for God is a source of confidence and life (142⁶, 27 cf. 153³). Trust in God is also involved in religion (162⁰ 282^{5b} 292^{5b}). Practical righteousness, furthermore, is a prime element in religion, to which ritual is secondary in the minds of the writers of Proverbs (158 213, 27). Prayer also is a religious privilege, available for those whose conduct is righteous (108, 29 289).

Cultural Life: (2) Social Aspect. In connection with his group such questions arise in the mind of modern youth as: What is friendship or brotherhood? Does a man's group have a right to control him? Is charity a virtue? Is race antagonism natural and inevitable? War? Social cleavages?

(1) Friendship. Friendship, according to Proverbs, is a social bond far stronger than blood kinship (182⁴—a necessary textual correction in the first line, noted in Toy, gives the reading, "There are friends for mere companionship"—271^{0c}). Friendship develops character (271⁷). Poverty is a severe test of friendship; it may alienate fair-weather friends (194, 7). Wisdom counsels to beware of friends who are sponges (194, 6). On the other hand, remember that friendship is not merely an anchor to windward. Work out your own salvation (271^{0b}—Toy indicates that the lines in 271⁰ are not properly parts of a single sentence, but disconnected lines dealing with the same theme; each is to be taken by itself). Friendship lies deeper in the being than professions in words; loud declarations of friendship may even cast doubt on the sincerity of the tie (271⁴).

Friendship appears to be an important theme in the estimation of our writers, if we may judge by the scope of their lines. They give counsel as to the preservation of friendship. Beware of gossip about your friends (162⁸ 179); some slander may injure them in your sight. Old tried friends deserve your loyalty (271^{0a}). Avoid friendship with an irascible man (22^{24, 25}). True friends overlook occasions for quarrel (17⁹; cf. 10¹² 16²⁸). Let not friendship become so close that it becomes wearisome (25¹⁷).

(2) Brotherly Kindness. The spirit of brotherly kindness pervades the book. Charity is exalted as one of the chief social virtues (11^{25, 26} 14³¹ 21²⁶ 22⁹ 28^{3, 27}). Social cleavages are recognized as existent, particularly between the rich and the poor; but the writers' sympathies are with the oppressed and poor (16¹⁹ 17⁵ 22², 16 29¹³ 30¹⁰⁻¹⁴). The spirit of Proverbs rises to superb heights in its ideal of love toward one's fellow men, even toward enemies (17¹³ 20²² 24^{17, 18, 29} 25^{21, 22}). The verse last cited has become a commonplace wherever the Bible is known by reason of its vigorous imagery (see Mt. 5³⁸⁻⁴⁵ and Rom. 12¹⁹⁻²¹, notes). The most poignant suffering that a vengeful man's hand might work upon his enemy could not as swiftly touch the citadel of his hostility and capture it as the satisfaction of the enemy's needs. Love and kindness toward an enemy are the most satisfactory kind of vengeance. Social frictions are deplored. Strife is termed the conduct of fools (20³).

(3) War and Peace. While war and the more extended frictions of the social order, the strife of nation with nation, are not in the direct line of their vision, yet the writers of Proverbs have laid down the basic principles which point the way to peace and comity. War had not been outlawed (20¹⁸ 24⁶). That a nation should have a conscience, however, and should study its march in the world to conform its steps to wisdom even as the individual is advised to do—this appears to have been the mind of the sages (14³⁴). It is not beyond possibility to say that they would have approved the extension of their advice for individuals to the broader sphere of national relationships.

(4) Government. The book recognizes the authority of social control as this is expressed in government. Monarchy was the typical order of those days. The right of the king to rule is unquestioned, but even the king is subordinate to God on high (21¹ 29²⁶—"justice" is preferable to "judgment"). Revolutions are frowned upon as social upheavals (24^{21, 22}). Like Paul, they would say that constituted authorities are of God (Rom. 13¹); revolution that is violent and destructive is often fatal even to the revolvers. The way of amelioration of conditions lies in working within constituted channels of appeal for reform. A king must be righteous and a follower of wisdom (16¹² 20²⁸ 28¹⁵ 29⁴ mg. 14). The virtues which should adorn the common man are the true crown of royalty.

(5) Practice of Wisdom. Our modern life is not ordered like that of the ancient world in which this book took form; but the basic principles of life by which the solution of moral problems may be achieved now, as then, are written upon the pages of this work. Wisdom is not a body of knowledge, nor a book of rules. It is an achievement through the discipline of an intellectual struggle. As one learns to play a game only by playing it, so with all helps of books and teachers, after all, a man learns wisdom by practicing it. "We learn to do by doing."

"Blessed is the man that heareth me,
Watching daily at my gates,
Waiting at the posts of my doors.
For whoso findeth me findeth life,
And shall obtain favor of the Lord.
But he that misseth me wrongeth his own soul:
All they that hate me love death" (8³⁴⁻³⁶).

ECCLESIASTES

By PROFESSOR GEORGE L. ROBINSON

INTRODUCTION

Title. The name "Ecclesiastes," which comes to us from the Septuagint Version through the Latin Vulgate, means, literally, "a member of an assembly." It was doubtless intended to express in Greek the equivalent of the Hebrew name Kohleleth, i.e., "master of an assembly" (cf. the similar phrase in Eccl. 12¹¹). In form the term Kohleleth is a feminine participle, and is closely related to the noun "kahal," meaning "an open assembly," or an assembly which embraces what is "under the sun." Hence, as Kuhn has recently suggested, there may be embedded in the very title of the book the idea of a revelation which is only partial, the author knowing more than he is willing, or even able, to tell. The Targums hint of this deeper interpretation.

Author and Date. The author of Kohleleth was a Hebrew philosopher, or Wisdom-sage, who lived probably quite late in Jewish history and endeavored to impersonate King Solomon. He writes as a theistic-agnostic, giving in his book a bit of his own biography. Both his language and his ideas point to the late Persian, or, more probably, to the Greek period, prior to the Maccabean uprising. He could not have been Solomon himself; for he tells us that he was, not is, king in Jerusalem (1¹²), that the government is bad, that the king is despotic, the judges are corrupt (3¹⁶), oppression reigns (4¹⁻³), bribery is rife (5⁸), everything is crooked (1⁵), and that society in general is in a deplorable state. Living in the midst of such conditions, Kohleleth pours forth one long drawn out and bitter lament of pain and disappointment, because there was no escape from present misery either in this life or in that to come. The author's allusions to local conditions, however, are all so general and indefinite, that it is impossible to date his book with absolute certainty, but it is reasonable to conclude, from the hints we have, that it was not composed until long after the Exile, probably shortly before 200 B.C., as the author of the apocryphal book of Ecclesiasticus seems to have known Ecclesiastes (see Eccl. 8¹³ and Eccl. 1¹³, etc.; cf. pp. 196-7).

Purpose. Kohleleth's obvious aim was to state rather than to solve the difficulties of life. Living amid confusing civil and social conditions, his one chief object seems to have been to discover the true value of life: Is life worth living? What profit, or net gain, can be expected? What is man's highest happiness? What is the summum bonum, the advantage, the surplus, the profit of all? Cui bono?

The author employs three synonyms to express the idea of profit, or net-gain: yithron, used six times (1³ 2¹¹ 3⁹ 5⁹, 16 10¹⁰), kishron, used once (5¹¹), and yother, used twice (6^{8,11}). This particular concept is obviously the key-thought of his whole book; his estimate of life taking, as in Job 19, 10, the form of a "profit-and-loss" account. Such an idea was wholly germane to any discussion of Hokhma, or "Wisdom"; for, to the Hebrew mind, "Wisdom" was a matter of economic concern, wisdom and profit being closely allied. Ecclesiastes is pre-eminently a book of wisdom (cf. 7¹¹, 12 8¹ 9¹⁶, 18 10¹⁰).

Contents. Though the book is particularly difficult to analyze, yet one general idea, with something of an inherent dramatic element running through it, dominates the whole. As the late G. B. Gray observed, "It resembles Job more than Proverbs, and is fundamentally the work of a single writer devoted to a single theme." For, though different voices are constantly being heard in it, the book is no mere anthology or collection of separate and unrelated thoughts. Rather the author catalogues his varied moods of pessimism, hedonism, sophism, and faith; his method being that of an inductive philosopher who explores every possible field of knowledge before he draws his conclusion. In all, he makes some four separate quests for the summum bonum, or real profit, in life.

1. The quest of wisdom, practical wisdom; or as we might say, "sociology" (1¹²⁻¹⁸). Like the good Arabian Khalif Haroun al-Raschid, he studies, first hand and in a practical way, the common miseries of men of all classes, and he discovers with tragic anguish of soul that crooked things cannot be made straight, and that in much wisdom is much grief (1¹⁵⁻¹⁸)—apart from God!

2. The quest of pleasure (2¹⁻¹¹). Kohleleth in pain and disappointment turns from wisdom, or sociology, to pleasure and enjoyment; very much as Goethe's Faust, who, having failed to solve life's riddles by study, plunges deep in delights, that he may thus "still the burning thirst of passionate desire." Not, however, as a vulgar sensualist indulging himself in every excess, but as Solomon, building for his own enjoyment beautiful palaces, and surrounding himself with lavish luxuries, singers, servants, etc., all that royal wealth could buy. But, alas! pleasure and opulent ease bring him, as wisdom did, only pain and disappointment—apart from God!

3. The quest of labor and riches (218-612).

Koheleth next devotes himself to labor and money-making. Surely honest toil, he thinks, ought to bring satisfaction; for was not labor ordained in the Garden of Eden before the fall? But in this quest also he is again woefully disappointed; and for manifold reasons: (a) the uncertainty of having a wise successor to inherit his fortune (218-23); (b) one's lot in life, which is wholly in the hands of an all-powerful and arbitrary God (31-15); (c) injustice in the law courts (316-22); (d) oppression, and no comforter (41-3); (e) competition (44-6); (f) the fact that money, after all, fails to satisfy (47-512); (g) that hoarded wealth is often lost through speculation and bad investments (513-17); (h) but especially the fact that a rich man is sometimes denied by Providence the power to enjoy his possessions (61-12). And so, in view of all these obstacles and discouragements, he at last gives up the quest of obtaining happiness through riches, declaring, as in the cases of wisdom and pleasure, that all is vanity and a striving after wind, endeavoring to win any real profit through the acquisition of money—apart from God!

4. The quest of fame (71-118). "A good name is better than precious ointment" (71).

This quest Koheleth does not develop, or pursue, as we might expect; yet he does realize and comment on the emptiness of human praise (75), and discourses at great length on the relative values of wisdom and folly; e.g., wisdom censures, while folly flatters (75-7); wisdom is patient, i.e., is independent of public sentiment, folly feeds on what people think and say, and is therefore proud (78-10); wisdom is a defense (711-14); wisdom avoids extremes (715-18); wisdom is strength (719-22), and is exceedingly rare even in men, but entirely wanting in women (723-29); wisdom is patriotic (81-9); wisdom often goes unrewarded (810-96); wisdom works joyfully (97-10); wisdom, indeed, is often the victim of time and chance (911, 12), and is soon forgotten (913-16), loving peace, while folly loves war (917-104); yet wisdom is often triumphant (105-7); wisdom, accordingly, is "profitable to direct" (103-11), and speaks graciously, whereas folly talks foolishly (1012-15); in short, wisdom is the attribute of kings (1016-20), penetrates the future, encourages faith, and gives true perspective to life (111-8). Apart from God wisdom is impossible!

Koheleth's Philosophy of Life. Throughout the book Koheleth is obsessed with certain convictions which are forced upon him by his own experience and observation. One is that "all is vanity," i.e., human endeavor is absolutely without result. There is no net gain or surplus possible, anywhere. Another is that there is nothing better than to eat and drink and enjoy life as its blessings come and go, for this is man's divinely appointed portion; but the power to do even this is from God. A third is that there is no progress in the world, no evolution possible. All things move in a circle accomplishing nothing. There is nothing new under the sun; and nothing can be transmitted by one generation, or by one individual, to another. Still another postulate of his philosophy is that death ends all. Yet man's spirit is forever striving to transcend its earthly sphere. Accordingly, Koheleth yearns for the continuation of life, for immortality, that he may reap the rewards and conserve the gains of right living here. But, though he ardently longs for immortality, he does not actually discover it until near the very end of his struggle; when he finally exults in the revelation that, while the dust returns to earth as it was, the spirit shall return unto God who gave it (127); cf., however, v. 8, which makes it clear that v. 7 brings no real satisfaction to the author; the context suggests that the author has in mind, not individual immortality, but reabsorption—the body to the earth, the spirit to God—which means the disappearance of the individual. No wonder he considers this also "vanity". Kuhn, indeed, finds repeated hints of immortality throughout the book (cf. 317 612 812f. 121-8, 14); but his interpretation is hardly justified by the language itself, by the immediate context and by the general thought of the book.

Unity. According to some scholars, few books have been edited and redacted, revised and supplemented, as often and as much as the book of Ecclesiastes. The grounds for thinking so are the apparent contradictions and anachronisms (some not as real as supposed) which are patent to every thoughtful reader. Yet it must be acknowledged that the modern idea of redacting and re-editing has, in the case of Ecclesiastes, been considerably overworked. While there are doubtless some interpolations and possible dislocations in the original Hebrew text of the book, it surely is not necessary to find so many different editors, as some allege, to account for them. As Barton wisely observes, "When a modern man realizes how many different conceptions and moods he himself can entertain, he finds fewer authors in a book like Koheleth." Many different theories have been advanced to account for the facts. Burrows has recently suggested that Ecclesiastes "may have originated, like some of the prophetic books, in a disciple's notes of his master's sayings." This, he thinks, would account for "the lack of orderly arrangement, the frequent recurrence of similar ideas, and the presence here and there of epigrammatic remarks having no direct connection with what precedes or what follows them." But whether this be so or not, the author was neither a cogent reasoner in the modern sense on the one hand, nor a conceited agnostic on the other; neither was he a cynic, nor a reformer, a Stoic, an Epicurean, a Buddhist, nor a scoffing unbeliever; but he was a frank and sincere interpreter of his own personal doubts, and he exhausted every possible experiment at his disposal to solve his difficulties. After all is said, the book of Ecclesiastes is a self-consistent exposition of common everyday skepticism, honestly presented and confessed, and just as sincerely and frankly answered and refuted in the light of an unswerving faith in God. Koheleth himself must have been a mature and experienced man.

Value. Primarily, the book of Ecclesiastes attempts a new theodicy, a new view of God's providence. To Koheleth, as to all other Hebrew sages of antiquity, "Wisdom" meant the recognition of God's world-plan for the individual and for society; and he answers the question, Is life worth living? by pointing to the Sovereign-God, urging young people to remember him while still in youth, and commending all men to fear him and keep his commandments. Koheleth was a child of his time; a voice crying in the night. But by crying he prepared the way for Christianity by showing the need of it. Had he known "Christ and the power of his resurrection," as Paul did, instead of crying, "Vanity of vanities, all is vanity," he would have shouted, "Value of values, all is of value in the light of Him who brought life and immortality to light!" The permanent value of Ecclesiastes, accordingly, consists in this: Koheleth faced one of the great questions of life, namely, Is life worth living? It is a question which still haunts the great majority of the human race, and one which cannot be answered except in terms of a reverent faith in an all-wise and all-loving God.

CHAPTER I

1. The Title. The Preacher—debater, or orator; all possible English equivalents of the Hebrew name Koheleth, which is, of course, a suggestive term coined by the author for the occasion (see intro., section on "Title," and cf. 112 727 128-10).

2-11. The Introduction. Announcing the Preacher's main inquiry or chief concern, namely, Is life worth living when there is no profit, or net gain, and there is no remembrance of one after death? Vanity of vanities, all is vanity. Thus Koheleth opens his so-called "symphony of pessimism," repeating these melancholy words like a knell, some forty times in all. What he means is that life is empty and without profit—apart from God! There is no new thing under the sun (v. 9). The phrase "under the sun" occurs some twenty-five times. Life is a weary monotony, an endless treadmill! New discoveries are but rediscoveries (v. 10; cf. 315). Man's spirit transcends his sphere. Koheleth's soul longs for immortality (v. 11).

12-18. The Quest for Wisdom. Koheleth first seeks through wisdom for the summum bonum, or highest happiness. The author here impersonates Solomon, who, as a rich king, possessed the necessary resources to investigate and experiment, to travel far and to exhaust all possible sources of wisdom. By wisdom he means practical wisdom, especially God's plan for each individual life: "God's world-plan," or Providence. In ancient Israel there grew up a class of Hokhma, or "Wisdom" writers known as "the wise" (Jer. 1818), alongside the priests and prophets, who as philosophers cared almost nothing for the ritual of the former, and quite as little for the distinctively national ideals of the latter, but who interpreted life from the human point of view, and accordingly are sometimes spoken of as "the Humanists of Israel" (see art., Poetic and Wisdom Literature, p. 157). But Koheleth in his search for practical wisdom found that crooked things could not be made straight—apart from God, and that all his searchings were but vanity and a striving after wind. This last phrase, "a striving after wind," is a very strong expression, occurring seven times in the book (11⁴ 21¹, 17, 26 44, 6 69), and signifying, literally, "a feeding on wind," hence a disappointing desire. In v. 16 there is an obvious anachronism, inasmuch as David alone preceded Solomon as king in Jerusalem. Koheleth finds it difficult to impersonate King Solomon (cf. 27. 9). In 21² he gives it up altogether, dropping the mask of royalty which he had assumed at the beginning (11²). His pathetic wail in v. 18 over his failure in not finding happiness in the investigation of "wisdom" reminds one of the Arabic proverb, "A wise man is never happy." Cf. Matthew Arnold's lines on Goethe:

"And he was happy, if to know
Causes of things, and far below
His feet to see the lurid flow
Of terror, and insane distress,
And headlong fate, be happiness."

CHAPTER II

1-11. Koheleth's Second Quest—through pleasure. Turning from wisdom to wine, the Sage plunges into all sorts of sensuous delights; not, however, as a vulgar sensualist. In v. 2 there is a touch of Buddhism, which teaches that if men would avoid disappointment and pain they must crucify their inordinate desires. Like Solomon, Koheleth built for himself beautiful palaces and secured concubines and servants very many, but his satisfaction was only superficial and temporary; for when he took an inventory of all his joys and pleasures derived from this source, all was emptiness, and there was no surplus or net gain in reserve. And so pleasure, like wisdom, failed utterly to satisfy—apart from God!

12-17. Wisdom and Pleasure. Koheleth pauses before making a third experiment to compare wisdom and pleasure; and he finds that while the one excels the other as far as light excelleth darkness, yet one event happeneth to them all, namely, there is no remembrance forever (v. 16). Both are equally a disappointment—apart from God! And so he concludes, "I hated life, because all was emptiness and a feeding upon wind." Life's compensations were altogether inadequate; the preacher's soul still yearned for something higher.

CHAPTERS 218 TO 612: KOHELETH'S QUEST FOR HAPPINESS THROUGH WORK AND WEALTH

Since God ordained labor in the Garden of Eden before the fall, surely labor, Koheleth reasons, ought to yield happiness and satisfaction worth while. But alas, he finds that even labor and riches fail to secure genuine happiness, for various reasons:

18-26. The Uncertainty of Having a Wise and Worthy Successor. This is the first of eight obstacles to happiness. In view of this uncertainty the author recommends the sober enjoyment of life while it lasts. From the ancient Hebrew point of view, there was nothing foreign or Epicurean in such an attitude, but rather the general and accepted dictum of Hebrew monotheism (cf. Jer. 22¹⁵). Material and physical enjoyments may be fleeting, but they are nevertheless real, and they are the gifts of God. Koheleth reiterates this teaching (cf. 31³ 518^f. 81⁵ 97); for who can enjoy himself apart from God? (V. 25, mg., LXX reading.) V. 26 is regarded by some as wholly "discordant" with and as "totally opposed" to the other teachings of the book; but Koheleth ought surely to be allowed to discriminate between a moral life and one that is not!

CHAPTER III

1-15. Hopelessness of Struggle Against an Arbitrary God. A second obstacle in the way of obtaining happiness through labor and money-making is the fact that one's lot in life is wholly in the hands of an arbitrary God. This section, consisting of fourteen couplets, teaches that business success depends upon whether the times are propitious, and that only God can make them so. Everything is transient and temporary; what profit, therefore, in laboring for gain! God has even set the world in man's heart, so that man cannot find out the work that God hath done from the beginning even to the end (v. 11). The word olam, here translated "world," is used in later Hebrew in the senses of both "cosmos" and "eternity"; elsewhere in Ecclesiastes it is employed in the latter sense only, and so it seems preferable to render it as "eternity" here, as is done in the text of A.S.V. (cf. R.V. mg.). The author's aim was probably to set "eternity" over against "time" (the word "time" occurring some thirty times in the book). In v. 12 the thought of doing good is to be understood in the sense of enjoying life! And in v. 13 the idea of food and drink as "the gift of God" is anything but Epicurean! Being a reverent theist (v. 14), Koheleth found in God's unchanging purpose sufficient warrant to trust him.

16-22. Injustice in the Law Courts. The third obstacle to obtaining satisfaction and happiness through labor and riches was injustice in the law courts: in the place of judg- ment, wickedness was there. This was true probably of both church and state. Some reject v. 17 as a later interpolation, on the ground that the original author never regards God as vindicating the godly; but it is better to allow that future retribution was one of the fundamental teachings of Koheleth (812, 13; cf. 1214). God at least disciplines men to prove them, and to show that they themselves are but as beasts; both men and beasts alike being victims of chance (v. 19, mg.). Besides, all go unto one place; or, in the language of Lucretius, "Nature is the womb and tomb of all." There are other passages in Ecclesiastes, like these, which seem to intimate that Koheleth had lost completely all hope of immortality; but other O.T. saints did so too (Psa. 49:12, 20). He does not explicitly deny that man's spirit may go upward; he only doubts it. In the end his skepticism on this point seems to vanish (127); but the substitute proves equally disappointing, as before.

CHAPTER IV

1-3. Oppression. This is a fourth obstacle to thwart him in his quest. And they had no comforter. This so aroused Koheleth's feelings of compassion that, like the suffering patriarch (Job 31:1-16), he praised the dead which are already dead more than the living which are yet alive; yea, better than them both, as Cicero and Sophocles also felt, is it never to have been (cf. 63 71).

4-6. Competition. A fifth obstacle is competition and envy—envy being but another form of oppression, for it can be as inhuman as tyranny. But inasmuch as the business man cannot altogether retire from the field, let him shun the rivalries and jealousies of the struggling business world; and, "having food and raiment, let him therewith be content."

7-16. Disappointment in Riches. The fact that riches do not satisfy is the sixth obstacle to Koheleth's struggle for satisfaction through wealth. The miser is never satisfied (48; cf. 510); in vv. 9-12, on the other hand, by means of a series of proverbial sayings, Koheleth shows the profitable advantages of business partnership. The school of Epicurus emphasized a similar type of friendship; but there are no distinct proofs of dependence of the one upon the other. This section closes with the familiar and oft-quoted maxim, a threefold cord is not quickly broken. This maxim, of course, should not be forced to refer either to the Trinity or to Paul's celebrated trilogy of faith, hope, and love (cf. 1 Cor. 13:13). The continuation and conclusion of this section of the argument is found in 510-12, separated from these verses by a series of unrelated and miscellaneous utterances.

Verses 13-16 seem to point to some definite historical person, like Alexander Balas, or Ptolemy Epiphanes, who as youths rose up and usurped their thrones. Moffatt's translation of this section is most suggestive; its moral being that usurpation and anarchy avail nothing, inasmuch as even royal treasures are fleeting.

CHAPTER V

1-12. Miscellaneous Injunctions. In vv. 1-7 rash vowing and sham religion are condemned; because God is in heaven, and therefore transcendent, and it is impossible to bribe him. In attempting to bribe God by rash vow-making, the lips involve the whole body in sin; and an apology to the priest, or Temple-recorder, will be expected. Rather, he says, fear thou God; this being the second of a series of six references to "fear" in the book (cf. 314 57 718 812, 13 1213). To Hebrew wise men, "the fear of God" was the portico of "wisdom" (cf. Prov. 17).

In vv. 8, 9, Koheleth encourages patriotism by exhorting his readers to trust in Providence, despite the fact that government officials, one rank above another, all accept bribes and are guilty of oppression; because, says he, there is one higher than the high who regardeth, and there be higher than they (referring to the king). In v. 9, he probably means that "it is in every way an advantage to a land to have a king devoted to the cultivation of the soil," as McFadyen translates it.

13-20. Unfortunate Investments. Koheleth's seventh obstacle to finding happiness through the acquisition of wealth is that large fortunes are often squandered through unfortunate investment and foolish speculation, causing bitter regrets. Better be less ambitious, and enjoy what you already have. To enjoy present good, indeed, is the gift of God (v. 19; cf. 313 1 Tim. 6:17). He who thus lives has less to guard, and he will not brood over the brevity of life (cf. Prov. 15:15). "The miser is the Devil's dupe."

CHAPTER VI

Inability to Enjoy Riches. The eighth and last obstacle which seriously confronted Koheleth in his search for the summum bonum, through labor and wealth, is the fact that a rich man is sometimes denied by Providence the power to enjoy his riches. The strain and stress of obtaining them robs him of his ability to enjoy them (cf. 222, 23). If a man beget an hundred children, and lives, cramped and un- happy, and dies without friends, an untimely birth is better than he. It is suggested that Koheleth here may refer to Artaxerxes II (Mnemon), king of Persia, 405–358 B.C., who is said to have had more than one hundred and fifteen sons, one of whom was Artaxerxes III (Ochus), who, after reigning twenty years, was assassinated and his body thrown to the cats. The burials of Jezebel and of Jehoiakim were likewise tragic (cf. 2 Kings 9³⁵ Jer. 22¹⁹). What advantage have such? asks Koheleth; and he answers, Better is the sight of the eyes than the wandering of the desire (v. 9); in other words, “A bird in the hand is worth two in the bush.” Moreover, mortal man cannot cope with the fixed decrees of his Maker, but lives hemmed in by fixed and inexorable rules, and his fate is sealed in advance. Here Koheleth borders closely on sheer fatalism, but Isaiah and Paul also approximate this philosophy of determinism (cf. Isa. 45⁹ Rom. 9²⁰).

And so he concludes his long, vain search for happiness and profit along the line of labor and money-making by confessing, with pathos, that man’s days of labor and toil are after all but a shadow, because there is no hereafter. So sorely disappointed is he that he seems again to abandon, temporarily at least, all hope of immortality.

CHAPTERS 7¹ TO 11⁸: KOHELETH’S QUEST FOR HAPPINESS THROUGH FAME

While the principal thought of the section is as indicated in the heading, various other matters are touched upon; especially are there repeated glorifications of wisdom and descriptions of the folly of wickedness.

CHAPTER VII

Fame—Wisdom—Folly—Wickedness. He begins, A good name is better than precious ointment; punning on the Hebrew shem, “name,” and shemen, “ointment.” Plumptre, trying to reproduce in English the Hebrew paronomasia, translates, “A good name is better than good nard!” Koheleth adds, And the day of death than the day of one’s birth. Herodotus tells of certain Thracians who were accustomed to meet and bewail a child’s birth because of the woes and sorrows which it faced in life, while they buried their dead with joy and gladness, because they were at last set free from evils. This practice can be traced back also to primitive Buddhist custom. Koheleth continues, It is better to go to the house of mourning, than to go to the house of feasting. Surely, one who speaks thus is no vulgar sensualist, no Epicurean. Jewish mournings lasted from seven to thirty days, affording ample opportunity for reflection on death. Sorrow is better than laughter: an aphorism which finds a reflection in the Greek proverb, “To suffer is to learn.” For as the crackling of thorns under a pot, so is the laughter of the fool. Here again the author puns, this time on the Hebrew words sirim, “thorns,” and sir, “pot”; the play upon words has been expressed in English thus, “as the crackling of nettles under a kettle!” In v. 10 a sentimental question, characteristic of old men, as to why the former days were better than these is discouraged. The ancient Greeks and Romans, like the Chinese, used to ask the same foolish question. In v. 22 Koheleth appeals to conscience (though the word “conscience” never actually occurs in the O.T.) when he affirms, oftentimes also thine own heart knoweth. In v. 28 he voices the ancient Oriental opinion of women (cf. 1 Cor. 7²⁷ 11⁸, 9); it was left for Jesus to give woman her true place. But even our author encourages honorable marriage as a source of happiness (9⁹).

CHAPTER VIII

Obedience to Rulers—Inequalities of Life. V. 2 is regarded by many as a hint of the date of the book: keep the king’s command, and that in regard of the oath of God. It is supposed to point to the case of Ptolemy Soter (332–285 B.C.), who carried into Egypt large numbers of Jewish captives and bound them by solid oaths of fealty. V. 8 warns the readers that there is no discharge in the war against death. V. 10 describes how wicked men are often buried in great pomp; whereas good men are even excluded from the Holy City, and soon entirely forgotten. Vv. 12 and 13 are by some deleted from the original text of Koheleth, because they emphasize the fear of God; but it seems somewhat arbitrary to excise all such passages (cf. 3¹⁴ 5⁷ 7¹⁸ 12¹³).

CHAPTER IX

Mystery of God’s Doings—Uncertainties of Life—Superiority of Wisdom. In ch. 9 the author reverts to the thought of death. He says, All things come alike to all; e.g., earthquakes, tempests, pestilences, and the like; just so death, which sweeps away all distinctions. Neither have they any more a reward; for the memory of them is forgotten. There is evidently an intended assonance here between the Hebrew word seker, “reward,” of the first clause, and the Hebrew word zeker, “memory,” of the second. Oblivion following death was to Koheleth the tragedy of life (cf. 1¹¹ 2¹⁶). Consciously or unconsciously he shared the pagan conception of “hope”; which, according to the myth associated with "Pandora's Box," was the last article to fly out, and of all the contents of that mystic chest it was the most disappointing of all—the acme of vanity! According to v. 6, even the three strongest and most vehement passions of man—love, hatred, and envy—are all destined to be hushed in the silence of the grave.

Still, says Koheleth, though death is the only fixed outlook man has, he should enjoy sensation and sunshine while they last. Therefore, live joyfully with the wife whom thou lovest all the days of the life of thy vanity, and, whatsoever thy hand findeth to do, do it with thy might; thus he lauds quiet home life, and encourages honest toil. His allusion to Sheol, "the grave," in v. 10, is his only reference to the place of the departed in the book. Continuing his induction, he finds that the race is not to the swift, alluding possibly to the contests of the Greeks; but the Greeks were not the only people of antiquity who possessed runners (cf. 2 Sam. 18¹⁹⁻²³). And he also finds that time and chance happeneth to them all; "chance" being employed here in the sense of misfortune, or of "occurrence," as in 1 Kings 5⁴. Man can no more foresee his own fate than fishes caught in a net can anticipate their doom. In vv. 13-16 the author seems to have in mind some definite historical event such as the siege of Dor (1 Macc. 15), or, possibly, of Abel (2 Sam. 20¹⁵⁻²²).

CHAPTER X

Wisdom—Charity—Industry. In v. 2, when the author affirms that A wise man's heart is at his right hand, but a fool's heart at his left, he does not intend to teach that there is a physiological difference in the bodies of fools and of wise men; he rather refers to their conduct. The Romans, however, seem to have accepted such a view, taking the language literally, for they called left-handed deeds "sinister" (cf. Mt. 25³¹⁻⁴⁶). In v. 3 Koheleth tells us that the fool fancies everybody he meets is a fool too; while in v. 4 he advises any one who has offended his superior not to retaliate, or resign, but to defer to him, on the principle that "the least said is soonest mended." "Blessed are the meek!" His mention of horses in v. 7, according to Grieve, is an indication of late authorship; but Solomon is said to have had "forty thousand stalls of horses" (1 Kings 4²⁶; cf. 2 Chr. 9²⁵). Graetz imagines that Koheleth's reference to servants upon horses points to the reign of Herod the Great as the time of composition; but, as Barth observes, "almost any period of Oriental history must have afforded such examples."

In his continued praise of "Wisdom," our author declares that wisdom is profitable to direct both the woodsman to sharpen his blunt ax, and the snake charmer to avoid being bitten (v. 11); wisdom furnishes foresight. "Success depends upon foresight," says an ancient proverb. Fools, on the other hand, multiply words, their verbosity being the measure of their capacity. Ask a fool, for example, the way to the city, and his wordy, verbose, round-about directions will only confuse you. With true patriotism, Koheleth adds that a country is to be pitied when its king is a servant, or a usurper. Alexander Balas and Herod the Great are only two of many of ignoble birth. Feasting and wine-bibbing bring revelry; money squandered is the cause of both. Curse not the king, even a bad ruler; for "walls have ears" and "treason will out!"

CHAPTER XI

Generosity and its Reward. An enigmatical word of counsel, teaching benevolence: Cast thy bread upon the waters. Whether Koheleth had in mind the grain ships sent out from Alexandria to Rome and elsewhere in search of markets, or the custom in Egypt of sowing seeds upon the waters of irrigation, it is impossible to say, but he probably intended to teach benevolence. The added advice in v. 2 confirms this interpretation: Give a portion to seven, yea, even to eight; i.e., Do not restrict your gifts to a selected few, for you don't know how soon you will need charity yourself. As the fixed and inexorable laws of nature encourage faith in the farmer, so they ought to encourage faith in the deeper things of God. In the chemical laboratory of the American University at Cairo a Moslem student woke up one day to the fact that, if like causes in nature always produce like effects, then Allah cannot be fickle and capricious after all, but trustworthy; his discovery in science completely revolutionized his theology.

In v. 7 Koheleth divests himself of his accustomed pessimism, and begins to recognize the supreme joy in just living. For he now sees that the days of darkness are sent in order to make men reflect. For vv. 9, 10, see under 121-8.

CHAPTER XII

1-8. Remembrance of God in Youth. (Including also 11⁹, 10.) The book closes with a characteristic answer to Koheleth's oft-repeated inquiry, What profit is there in life? He proffers two noteworthy suggestions, namely, to rejoice (11⁹), and to remember (121). In 11⁹, 10, he advises to make the most of youth, through a joyful use of all that youth affords, but to do so conscious of a final reckoning; in 12¹⁻⁸ he advises to remember also the Creator in youth, before the storms of life overtake and all appetite for God vanishes because of the infirmities of old age. The latter section is highly allegorical and symbolic. To the Oriental such figures and symbols spoke with far more naturalness and force than they do to us.

Vv. 1, 2 describe a sirocco, or a hurricane. Vv. 3-7 describe the gradual breaking down of the physical body, and the inevitable effects of senility. The house probably refers to the physical body; the keepers of the house are the hands, which often shake and tremble in old age; the grinders are the teeth, which become fewer as the years pass; while those that look out of the windows are the eyes, which frequently grow dim toward the end of life. The doors in the street are the ears, which often lose their keenness in riper years; and the daughters of music are the failing vocal cords of those who sing. The almond tree may hint at the appearance of gray hair; and the grasshopper may symbolize any trifling weight which to old people seems heavy; while the caperberry probably suggests an artificial stimulant to failing appetite. In a similar manner the silver cord may refer to the spinal cord; the golden bowl, to the skull or cranium; the pitcher, to the heart; and the wheel broken at the cistern, to the prostate gland, or other abdominal parts, which so frequently give way during failing years. And then follows the climax of the whole book, which was a new revelation to Koheleth; not that the dust returns to the earth was new, but that the spirit returns unto God who gave it. At last Koheleth has discovered immortality in God. Like Job, he won the victory of faith (Job 19²⁵). After a long life of struggle and doubt he has been given a new revelation, and it seizes hold upon him. Yet still he wails, Vanity of vanities, all is vanity, probably because all earthly gains and achievements, profits and emoluments (apart from God) are empty and disappointing. (But see intro., section on "Koheleth's Philosophy of Life," p. 615, for a more probable interpretation.)

9-14. Some Closing Exhortations. Vv. 9-14 are by many regarded as an editorial postscript to the book; while others, like W. P. Paterson, regard them as "very probably genuine." It is certainly strange that an author should speak of himself in the third person, and commend his own literary ability and wisdom, as is done in vv. 9-12. On the other hand, it has been suggested that vv. 13, 14 contain the only worthy conclusion to the whole argument. Koheleth, like Bacon, was an inductive philosopher. Having finished his inductions and investigations, he lifts up his voice, as it were, and announces: This is the end of the matter; all hath been heard; fear God and keep his commandments; for this is the whole duty of man (v. 13). These words are something more than an "orthodox conclusion," added by those who wished to secure for the book an entrance into the canon of Scripture; they constitute the principal teaching of the book—"the wisdom of God" par excellence. The word duty, which is printed in italics (because it has no Hebrew equivalent), can well be sacrificed for one that is far more characteristic of the entire book, namely, "profit," which, as we have seen, occurs in different synonyms some nine times. "Fear God and keep his commandments," says Koheleth, "for this is the whole profit of man!"

For God shall bring every work into judgment. This last sentence of the book contains the clearest statement concerning judgment in the O.T. According to Koheleth, life is an apprenticeship, one long, but not endless, discipline. To fear God, therefore, and keep his commandments is the very essence of the divine discipline, and the only way to wisdom and immortality. Let a young man remember his Creator in youth, and he will naturally continue to fear God and keep his commandments all through life, and when he dies his spirit will return unto God who gave it. On the other hand, as Thomas Fuller remarks, "Short preparation will not fit us for so long a journey."

THE SONG OF SONGS

BY PROFESSOR ROBERT H. PFEIFFER

INTRODUCTION

General Character. The Song of Songs is a poem or a collection of poems depicting, with enchanting imagery, consummate literary skill, and a rare appreciation of nature's charms, the thrilling anticipation, the rapturous delights, and the exquisite torments of two lovers. Its theme is the love between a man and a woman, blooming in the meadows and vineyards of Palestine at the coming of spring, described with a fullness of detail and a naïve and spontaneous freedom of expression that are truly Oriental. This superb composition found a place in the sacred canon through an allegorical interpretation of the book on the part of Akiba and other rabbis living at the end of the first century A.D., although at that very time irreverent young people, not able to appreciate any hidden meaning, were singing it "as a kind of secular song" (Tosephta Sanhedrin, xii).

The Allegorical Interpretation. Only by detecting a deeper meaning under the plain sense of the book could it be classed as sacred scripture. The Jews at least as early as 90 A.D. saw in it an allegory of the love between Jehovah and Israel (cf. 4 Ezra 5²⁴, 26), an interpretation fully developed in Targum and Midrash and adopted substantially by Augustine and Luther. In a Christian form (the love of Christ for the church) this view was presented by Hippolytus, Cyprian, and, in more recent times, Hengstenberg (cf. the chapter headings in the A.V.). More numerous are the Christian interpreters who see in Canticles (name derived from the Latin) not an allegory of the Old or of the New Covenant, but of the mystical relation of the individual soul with God or with Jesus Christ (Origen, Theodoret, Bernard, Madame Guyon). In our own day the religious interpretation has reappeared in an entirely new form: the book is said to be a pagan litany used in the worship of Osiris (N. du Jassy) or of Tammuz (Adonis) and Ishtar (Astarte) (W. Erbt, T. J. Meek); this view is criticized by N. Schmidt in the Journal of the American Oriental Society, vol. xlv, pp. 154f.

The Literal Interpretation. Theodore of Mopsuestia (+429 A.D.) was the first writer to protest against the allegorical interpretation; and although he and others agreeing with him in later centuries were declared heretics, the literal interpretation has now become prevalent. Modern interpreters adopting the historical point of view regard the book either as a drama or as a collection of lyrics dealing with human love. Origen (about 300 A.D.) defined it as "a nuptial poem composed in dramatic form"; and since Jacobi (1771) the work has been fully dramatized in many conflicting ways by Staudlin, Umbreit, Ewald, Boettcher, Delitzsch, Hitzig, Renan, Stickel, Oettli, Bruston, Driver, A. Harper, L. Cicognani, Adeney. A close examination of these attempts reveals the inherent weakness of the dramatic theory (for details see Eiselen, The Psalms and Other Sacred Writings, ch. 6).

The simplest and most natural interpretation, which is adopted here, is that Canticles is an anthology of love lyrics rather than a single poem, a collection of songs which Herder (who in 1778 first presented this view) aptly compared to a string of pearls (cf. pp. 19-20). Wetzstein (1873), after observing the wedding festivities among Syrian peasants, came to the conclusion that our book consisted of nuptial songs: for seven days after the wedding the bridegroom and the bride are enthroned as king and queen (cf. 3¹¹); their charms are praised in extravagant terms; dances and sports are carried on before them, and the bride herself occasionally gives a short dance to display her queenly attire. This alluring interpretation was accepted by Stade, and fully developed by Budde, who was followed by Kautzsch, Siegfried, Cheyne, Jastrow, Bewer, and many others. It has been confirmed by the publication of Syrian and Arabic wedding songs, and by a comparison with ancient Egyptian and Assyrian love poems (a catalogue of the latter has recently been found; it is translated by Meek in the Journal of Biblical Literature, vol. xliii, pp. 245f., and by Barton, Archæology and the Bible, 4th edition).

It should be noted, however, that the book is not a haphazard collection, for there are throughout the song suggestions of a certain literary unity. Whatever the origin or original form of the individual songs may have been, they were probably worked over and put in their present form by one editor, whose aim was "to present a ritual to be used in the wedding ceremonies that would be both noble and chaste . . . While they do not adequately present the sanctity and beauty inherent in our modern ideal of marriage—for that ideal was unknown to the East—they do extol nobly and exquisitely the sanctity and beauty of true love between man and woman. Nowhere in literature has this divine passion been more beautifully described than in the words which the bride addresses to her husband as she enters his home, thereby making complete the marriage relation:

‘Love is as strong as death;
Jealousy is as irresistible as Sheol;
Its flames are flames of fire,
A very flame of Jehovah.
Many waters cannot quench love,
Nor can floods drown it.’”

Date of Composition. If we admit that the book is a collection of folk songs recited at rural weddings, it is clear that they must have circulated orally long before they were published in written form or collected in an anthology. It is not unlikely that some of the material embodied in the book existed in pre-exilic times when Hebrew was still the vernacular. If in some form the songs were not older than the editor who published them, they would not have been in Hebrew. However, the presence of Aramaisms compels us, on linguistic grounds, to date the existing collection not earlier than 250 B.C., when Aramaic was the spoken language. Without attempting to distinguish the original songs and the editorial matter, as Jastrow does, we must admit that there are glosses (e.g., the word “bride,” my bride in R.V., 49-12 51) and marginal interpolations (according to Cornill: 29a 48 83, 4, 13, 14).

Literature: Griffis, The Lily Among Thorns; Haupt, The Book of Canticles; Jastrow, The Song of Songs; Eiselen, The Psalms and Other Sacred Writings; Martin, Proverbs, Ecclesiastes and Song of Solomon (New Century Bible).

CHAPTER I

1. The Title. This editorial superscription characterizes the book as the most beautiful of the songs of Solomon, who was, according to 1 Kings 4³², the author of one thousand and five songs. On the real date of the book see the introduction.

CHAPTER 12-8: SONGS OF THE BRIDE LONGING FOR HER BRIDEGROOM

2-4. Love's Yearning. The joys of love are associated, in Oriental fashion, with wine (4¹⁰ 7⁹) “which cheereth God and man”

(Judg. 9¹³) and fragrant perfumes which “rejoice the heart” (Prov. 27⁹). The maiden pictures herself as the chosen one of a glorious monarch (the rustic husband), beloved by his (imaginary) women of the harem (cf. Psa. 45^{14f.}). With slight emendations we should probably read Kiss me with the kisses of thy mouth. . . . Bring me, O King, into thy chambers.

5, 6. An Apology. Forestalling a criticism of the fair ladies of the harem (daughters of Jerusalem), the peasant girl explains that she is sunburnt because her brothers sent her to keep their vineyards at harvest time. She is dark like the tents woven by the Bedouin (Kedar, a son of Ishmael, Gen. 25¹³, is the poetical name of the Arabian nomads) out of goat's hair, but beautiful like the draperies of Solomon's palace. Brothers were, in the ancient East, the protectors of their sisters (Gen. 24 and 34; 2 Sam. 13) and had much authority over them. The heat in the vineyards was so intense that watchers made themselves booths (Isa. 18; cf. Job 27¹⁸). Keeping their vineyard, she could not watch her own, i.e., safeguard her fresh complexion.

7, 8. The Rendezvous. The scenery shifts from the dream world of the royal harem in Jerusalem to the bride's familiar environment. The shepherdess asks her lover where he pastures his flock; he suggests that she follow the tracks of the sheep. She addresses him as thou whom my soul loveth (31-4); he calls her the fairest among women (5⁹ 6¹). My soul is a Semitic idiom meaning “I myself” (cf. Lk. 12¹⁹). In the heat of noontime (cf. Gen. 31⁴⁰) the sheep rested in the shade of trees (Virgil, Georgics iii, 328-335). One that is veiled: the Versions render, by inverting the order of the first two Hebrew consonants, one that wanders (cf. mg.). Where she dreaded to be seen, wandering in search of him, is just where she will find him.

CHAPTERS 1⁹ TO 27: BRIDE AND GROOM PRAISE EACH OTHER

9-11. The Bridegroom Sings the Beauty of the Bride. He compares her to a noble mare; her jewelry is like the trappings of a royal steed. Such a comparison was not offensive to the ancients and was used by Theocritus, Anacreon, and Horace (Homer, Iliad xxii, 21-24, compared Achilles to a winning race horse). Amos (4¹), however, is by no means complimentary when he addresses the ladies of Samaria as “ye kine of Bashan” (cf. Jer. 22^{3f.}). The kings of Egypt (“Pharaoh” in Egyptian means “great house”) were famous for their horses (Gen. 41⁴³ Ex. 15⁴, 21, etc.); in Egypt and in Babylonia horses were unknown until 2,000 B.C.; although horses were known in Canaan at the time of the Exodus (cf. Judg. 522) the Israelites did not use them before Solomon (1 Kings 426 1026). The maiden had pendants in the form of coins hanging down from the head on the forehead and on the cheeks; on Hebrew jewelry see Isa. 316f.

12-14. The Reply of the Bride. She compares the charm of her beloved to the fragrance of sweet-smelling spices: steeds and chariots appeal to the man (vv. 9-11), perfumes to the woman. Spikenard is a perfume of great price (Mk. 143-5) obtained from Palestinian herbs (413f.); Horace calls it Assyrian nard, Tibullus calls it Syrian nard. Myrrh is an aromatic gum resin obtained by incision of a shrub growing in Arabia. The maiden carries the thought of her beloved in her heart just as she wore on her bosom a bag of myrrh. Henna-flowers are Palestinian (see Josephus, Wars of the Jews, iv, 8.3) and have clusters of yellowish blossoms; a toilet water is prepared from the leaves and roots. En-Gedi is a luxuriant oasis west of the Dead Sea.

15-17. A Duet of the Lovers. (Continued in 21-3.) The bride sings 116,17 21. 3; the bridegroom sings 115 22. Thine eyes are as doves seems to have been added from 41. The words of vv. 16b, 17 can be understood literally of the couch of fresh grass out in the cedar forest, or imaginatively of the luxurious bed, fragrant like green grass from perfumes sprinkled on it (Prov. 717), in the renowned "house of the forest of Lebanon" of King Solomon (1 Kings 72). The meaning of the Hebrew word translated rafters is unknown. Sharon is the maritime plain between Caesarea and Joppa (Isa. 339 352 6510). The lily was a wild red flower admired by Jesus (Mt. 628-30 Lk. 12271.) for its gorgeous beauty.

CHAPTER II

1-3. With becoming modesty the bride compares herself to common wild blossoms, but the bridegroom turns her words into a compliment by contrasting the lily with the thistles; not to be outdone, she likens him to the apple tree, and longs for its cool shadow and its pleasant fruit, an allusion to the protection and joys of matrimony.

4-7. The Banquet; a Song of the Bride. The description of the feast in the house of wine over whose door hung the sign Love is an allegory of the delights of love. The playful adjuration in v. 7 (a sort of refrain appearing again in 35 84) by graceful wild animals may be compared with the humorous oaths of Socrates "by the dog" or "by the goose."

CHAPTERS 28 TO 35: REMINISCENCES OF THE BRIDE

8-17. A Serenade in the Springtime. Once upon a time, when she was retiring for the night, her beloved sang before her house a song of spring and of love. To his invitation to follow him she modestly requested him to return in the morning. (1) 8, 9. The arrival of the youth. His haste is pictured with poetical exaggeration (cf. 2 Sam. 218). In v. 9 we should probably read I looked out of the windows, I glanced through the lattice (cf. Judg. 528). (2) 10-15. The song of the youth. This is the only instance in which direct speech is introduced in the book. This song is a delightful description of the coming of spring and reveals a delicate feeling for the charms of nature. Winter and rain are synonymous terms, for there are really only two seasons in Palestine: the dry (April-September) and the rainy season (October-March). The signs of spring are the singing of birds and the budding of plants. The turtle (turtle-dove) is a migratory bird (Jer. 87) whose return is a sign of spring. The vines in blossom are not very fragrant; perhaps we should read (with 713) "the mandrakes give forth their fragrance." The maiden, invisible behind the lattice, is compared to a dove in inaccessible places (Jer. 4916 Obad. v. 3; cf. Jer. 4828 Ezek. 716); she is called my dove as in 52 69 (cf. 115 41 512). V. 15 introduces the one disturbing element in this idyllic picture of spring: the foxes that gnaw at the vines in bloom (cf. v. 13), a parallel to the ancient fable of the fox and the green grapes. (3) 16, 17. The song of the maiden. In v. 16 (=63) she speaks to herself; in v. 17 to her beloved. She tells him to come back swiftly at dawn. The meaningless mountains of Bethor should probably be read, after the parallel verses (46 814), "mountains of spices."

CHAPTER III

1-5. A Dream of the Bride. Missing her beloved when she awoke at night, she searched for him in the city until she found him (cf. 52-8). While going about in the dark narrow streets and in the wide city squares, she came across the watchmen (cf. Isa. 218, 11 626 Ezek. 336 Psa. 1271 1306). Finding her beloved soon afterward, she brought him to her mother's house: maidens lived in special quarters with their mothers (Gen. 2428) or with other women (Gen. 2467); the various wives had separate dwellings (Gen. 3133). On v. 5 see 27.

CHAPTER 36-11: THE PALANQUIN OF SOLOMON

This song describes, with elaborate imagery, the rustic wedding procession: the bridegroom,

King Solomon, accompanied by his friends, three-score mighty men, went to fetch the bride, who was brought with the bride's maids, the daughters of Zion, to the house of his parents (see Psa. 45⁸⁻¹⁵ 1 Macc. 9³⁷⁻⁴¹ Mt. 25¹⁻¹²).

6-8. The Procession Approaching in the Distance. As clouds of dust are perceived in the direction of the pasture lands along the Jordan someone asks: "What [not who] is this?" It is the sedan chair of Solomon (i.e., the young peasant bridegroom), fragrant with myrrh, incense, and all the powdered spices of the trader (cf. Psa. 45⁸ Prov. 7¹⁷). Sixty friends of the bridegroom, twice as many as Samson had (Judg. 14¹¹), armed with swords, protect the "king" against nightly perils (usually imaginary, but sometimes real: see 1 Macc. 9³⁷⁻⁴¹).

9-11. Description of the Palanquin and of the King. The pillars supporting the top are covered with silver, the framework of the seat is of gold, the cushion is of purple (crimson), the inside is inlaid (mg.) or plated with ebony (not with love; this error occasioned the addition of the gloss from the daughters of Jerusalem). The bridegroom was crowned like a king (Isa. 61¹⁰; cf. intro.) by his mother (in Euripides, Iphigenia in Aulis, 905, the mother crowns her daughter as bride).

CHAPTERS 4¹ TO 5¹: THE LOVER SINGS THE CHARMS OF THE MAIDEN

CHAPTER IV

1-7. The Beautiful Features of the Bride. The description of the bride extends to minute details. The comparisons are highly imaginative and, to Western readers, farfetched.

1-3. Eyes, hair, teeth, lips, and temples are compared with doves, goats, ewes, a scarlet thread (Josh. 2¹⁸), and a crack on a pomegranate (or a grain of the same). 4, 5. The neck and the breasts are compared to the tower of David (cf. Neh. 3²⁵⁻²⁷?) and to the twins of a gazelle. The coins strung on a necklace around her neck (110^f. 49) are like the shields hanging on the wall (cf. Ezek. 27¹¹ 1 Macc. 4⁵⁷). 6. Possibly an interpolation of 2¹⁷ with some changes. 7. The summary of vv. 1-5, recalling the beginning (v. 1a). Or should we read v. 7 before v. 6?

8. Invitation to a Maiden Living in the Hills. The scenic beauty of Lebanon (cf. 3⁹, etc.) is celebrated in Isa. 60¹³ Hos. 14⁵ Zech. 11¹. Amana is the peak from which the river of the same name (Abanah in 2 Kings 5¹², now Barada) flows to Damascus. Senir is the Amoritic name of Hermon (Deut. 3⁹). Amana and Senir occur with these meanings in the Assyrian records.

9-11. Insane With Love. With one of her eyes (6⁵) and with the amulets hanging from her necklace (110^f. 44) she has bewitched him, robbed him of his senses, driven him to distraction (the heart in the O.T. is the seat of the mind). On v. 10 see 12^f.; on v. 11a cf. Prov. 5³. 11. This verse describes the sweetness of the kisses rather than of her words (contrast Psa. 119¹⁰³). Garments were perfumed with aromatic herbs (Gen. 27²⁷ Psa. 45⁸).

12-16. The Enclosed Garden. (See also 5¹.) 12-15. The bride belongs exclusively to her beloved; she is like a locked park, like a sealed spring. Springs were often closed with large stones (Gen. 29^{2, 3} 2 Sam. 17^{18f}.) and could conceivably be sealed (cf. Deut. 32³⁴ Dan. 6¹⁷ Mt. 27⁶⁶ Rev. 20³). The comparison of the wife with a fountain is more fully developed in Prov. 5¹⁵⁻¹⁹. Garden and spring are parts of the same picture (Isa. 58¹¹): a fountain of gardens means a garden fountain. In connection with the garden the poet mentions valuable plants: pomegranates (4³ 6⁷, 11 8²), henna with spikenard (11², 14), saffron (crocus), calamus and cinnamon (ingredients of the sacred oil, Ex. 30²³), frankincense (Ex. 30^{34f}.), myrrh (11³), aloe (Psa. 45⁸ Prov. 7¹⁷ John 19³⁹). 16. The maiden uses the image of the garden to express delicately her wish to be with her beloved; he replies (5¹) with eager enthusiasm. The bride invites the winds to blow upon her garden (i.e., herself) and carry its fragrance to her beloved so that he may come to enjoy its fruits. He welcomes the suggestion, comes into his garden, gathers his spices, and eats his honey. My spice = my balsam (mg.): Josephus relates that this plant was introduced into Palestine by the Queen of Sheba (Antiquities, viii, 6:6); and he states that he has seen it thrive by Jericho (xiv, 4:4) and En-Gedi (ix, 1:2). Eat, O friends, etc., is incongruous in the mouth of the bridegroom; if the clause is not interpolated, it must be addressed by the wedding guests to the bridal couple.

CHAPTER V

1. See above under 412-16.

CHAPTERS 5² TO 6³: THE LOST BRIDEGROOM

2-7. The Search: a Dream of the Maiden. (Cf. 3¹⁻⁵). The youth knocked at her door one night, but had vanished in the dark when she opened to him. Vainly she looked for him in the city: the watchmen treated her with contempt, for no respectable woman would be seen wandering alone at that hour. This recollection of the bride is best explained as a dream (so also 3¹⁻⁵): while this happened she was sleeping but her mind (heart, cf. on 4⁹) was awake, dreaming, unless we should suppose that the maiden was a sleepwalker (Cicognani). When the young man knocked and asked the maiden to open she was sleeping after removing her tunic, which was worn directly on the person (the outer garment served as a bed covering for the poor, Ex. 22^{26f.}) and after washing her feet before retiring (Gen. 19² 2 Sam. 11⁸), for she went barefoot during the daytime (shoes, 71, are part of the bridal apparel). The young man introduced his hand through a hole in the door (for the key or for looking out) apparently to pour in the liquid myrrh (cf. Lucretius, The Nature of Things, iv, 124f.), that stuck to her hands as she opened the door. The youth did not have the persistence of the man in Lk. 11⁸ and withdrew after she teasingly excused herself. My soul . . . when he spake seems to belong after v. 4.

8, 9. A Message. Meeting the daughters of Jerusalem (1⁵ 2⁷ 5¹⁶, etc.) she requests them to tell her beloved that she is faint with love (2⁵, 7); they ask for his description.

10-16. The Handsome Traits of the Bridegroom. As in the parallel description of the bride (4^{1f.}), the features are mentioned from the head downward. He is white and ruddy (Lam. 4⁷), conspicuous among a myriad. His head is like fine gold (cf. Dan. 2³²); his locks are bushy (palm branches?), raven black; his eyes are like doves (1⁵ 4¹) by canals of water, perched on the rim (of a pool); his cheeks are like beds of balsam (5¹) raising perfumes (cf. LXX); his lips are like lilies (2¹); his hands are like jewels set with topaz (mg.; in Hebrew "Tarshish," a gem imported from that city in Spain); his body is like a slab of ivory; his legs are like marble columns; the whole of him is like Lebanon, choice (tall) like cedar trees; his mouth (palate, mg.) is like bonbons (or a sweet drink, Neh. 8¹⁰).

CHAPTER VI

1-3. The Lover's Whereabouts. To the inquiry of the daughters of Jerusalem the maiden replies that her bridegroom is in his garden (5¹). This section seems to contradict the preceding ones in which the maiden was vainly searching for the youth, but strict logic should not be expected in imaginative poetry of this kind.

CHAPTERS 6⁴ TO 7⁹: SONGS DESCRIBING THE BEAUTY OF THE BRIDE

4-12. The Charming Features of the Maiden. 4-7. These verses are closely parallel and in part identical with 4¹⁻⁷ (6^{5b-7}=4^{1b}, 2, 3b). The comeliness of the maiden is compared with the beauty of Tirzah, the capital of the Northern Kingdom from Baasha to Omri (1 Kings 15³³, etc.), and of Jerusalem, the capital of the Southern Kingdom. Tirzah is here chosen instead of Samaria on account of the meaning of the word ("pleasant") and on account of the bitter feelings of the Jews toward the Samaritans (Jn. 4⁹; cf. Ecclesiasticus 50^{25f.}). Terrible (vv. 4, 10)—on account of her bewitching eyes (v. 5, cf. 4⁹). 8, 9. She is more precious to the lover than a whole royal harem (cf. 1 Kings 11³), just as his little vineyard is dearer to him than the opulent plantations of Solomon (8^{11f.}). The maiden is the only daughter in her family, but she has brothers (16). 10-12. These verses do not seem to belong to their immediate context; Jastrow transposes vv. 11 and 10 (in this order) after 6³; v. 12 is unintelligible in the Hebrew and probably corrupt. 13. See under 7¹⁻⁹.

CHAPTER VII

1-9. The Dance of the Bride. (Begins with 6¹³.) In 6¹³⁻⁷⁵ the wedding guests sing the beauty of the dancing maiden, describing her features, not from the head downward, as elsewhere (4^{1f.} 6^{4f.}), but beginning with the feet, the most conspicuous part in a dancer, and moving upward. Naturally, the diction is far less restrained than in those other songs which confine themselves to the upper part of the body. The dance of Mahanaim (6¹³, "the two camps" or better, with LXX and Vulgate, of ham-mahanim, the camp or war dance) is probably identical with the sword dance, still a part of the wedding festivities in Palestine (Wetzstein, cf. intro.). Shulammit—elsewhere in the O.T. Shunammite (1 Kings 1³, etc. 2 Kings 4¹², 25), a woman from Shunem (now Sölem); the beauty of Abishag the Shunammite had evidently become proverbial and "Shulammit" is used here as a synonym of fairest among women (5⁹ 6¹). Return—turn around. Why will ye . . . What will ye see in the Shulammit as she engages in the military dance? The question in v. 13b should probably be changed to bring it in line with v. 13a. 1-5. Sandals (v. 1)—cf. on 5³. Prince's daughter—in Palestine the rural bride is still called daughter of a nobleman. The joints of thy thighs—better "the circling of thy thighs" (in dancing). Jewels—chain, necklace (Prov. 25¹² is the only other passage in which the word is used). The allusions in v. 2 are of questionable taste; on v. 3 cf. 4⁵. Neck—cf. 4⁴; eyes—cf. 4¹ 5¹² (11⁵). These pools are still in existence northwest of Heshbon. Bath-Rabbim—either a gate of Heshbon (meaning "the daughter of multitudes") or a village near by. Tresses—the Hebrew word means "watering troughs" and is obscure in this context. 6-9. The bridegroom compares the bride to a palm tree; his tone is more passionate than in the similar songs (49-51). Love—means probably "my beloved." Palm—the date-palm; Homer likewise compares Nausicaa to a palm tree (Odyssey, vi, 162f.); cf. Psa. 92¹². Branches—"panicles" (the Hebrew word occurs only here in the O.T. but is known in Assyrian). Smell of thy breath—literally, "of thy nose"; should probably read the breath of thy nose. Wine—cf. 12 4¹⁰. Of those that are asleep—is meaningless; with a slight change of the text the ancient versions read "gliding through my lips and my teeth."

CHAPTERS 7¹⁰ TO 8⁷: LOVE SONGS OF THE BRIDE

10-13. Love in the Springtime. See 28-14. V. 10 is an echo of 21⁶ 63; cf. Gen. 31⁶ 47. Villages—the same Hebrew word in 413 means "henna" blossoms; with a slight change it could be read "vineyards" (cf. v. 12). Palestine had few walled cities and numerous villages (Deut. 35; Tacitus, Histories, v, 8). On v. 13 see 611. Mandrakes—cf. Gen. 30¹⁴. Precious fruits—cf. 413, 16.

CHAPTER VIII

1-4. "Oh that thou wert as my brother!" Then she could enjoy his company without fear of scandal, and even kiss him before people (as cousins could do, Gen. 29¹¹); the wish is pure and maidenly. Mother's house—cf. 34. Who would instruct me—neither this nor the rendering of the margin is satisfactory; LXX reads, with 34, and into the chamber of her that conceived me. The Greeks also knew the wine prepared from the juice of pomegranate.

5. Two fragments, without connection with the context: the first seems to be a variant of 36; the second is difficult (the maiden awakens the youth sleeping under the apple tree where he had been born).

6, 7. Love's Irresistible Power and Inestimable Value. Here the book reaches its climax; these verses deserve a place among the best amatory poetry of all times. The association of love and death, the picture of love as a flame, are well-nigh universal. Seal—worn, in Babylonian fashion, attached to a string around the neck (cf. Gen. 38^{18, 25}) or as a ring on the finger (Jer. 22²⁴; cf. Gen. 41⁴² Esth. 31⁰ 82). Jealousy—cf. Prov. 6³⁴; some moderns translate "its passion." The grave—Hebrew Sheol (mg.), the pit wherein gather the shades of the departed: like a monster it opens wide its mouth (Isa. 51⁴) and is never satiated (Prov. 27²⁰ 30^{15f.}). Flame of the Lord—is doubtful: it is the only occurrence of the divine name (here Yah; the versions omit it) in the book, and the expression is not common in Hebrew (in spite of "the fire of the Lord," Num. 11¹, 2 1 Kings 18³⁸). Possibly we should render "its flames are . . ." (a word accidentally omitted).

CHAPTER 88-14. MISCELLANEOUS SONGS

8-10. An Incident of the Bride's Childhood. Her brothers (cf. 15^{f.}) wondered what they should do if she were asked in marriage (1 Sam. 25³⁹) when too young, and teased her about her immaturity; now she can mock them. The brothers decided to fit their actions to her behavior: if she be a wall—repelling suitors—they will raise the wall still higher, adding their watchfulness to her chastity; if she be a door—welcoming the advances of lovers—they will nail a plank of wood on the entrance, barring all access to her. The first alternative proved true: she was adamant to all allurements like a wall, her very charms were defensive fortifications, and thus she found favor in the eyes of her future husband.

11, 12. My Vineyard. The lover, rejoicing in the possession of his little vineyard, does not envy the vast estates of Solomon. Baal-hamon is otherwise unknown. Keepers—guards, not laborers. Every one . . . the Hebrew cannot mean that every keeper had to pay one thousand shekels to the king, but that a man, if he bought the whole produce, would have to bring in payment thereof one thousand shekels. We can get a conception of the vastness of this imaginary estate when we consider that a vineyard with one thousand vines was worth one thousand shekels (Isa. 7²³). My vineyard—means, of course, "my bride" (cf. 1⁶ 21⁵; see also 41², 15). Before me—under my authority and supervision: "I need no keepers for it (for the idiom cf. Gen. 20¹⁵ 24⁵¹ 47⁶): Solomon has to pay one fifth of the proceeds of his vineyard to his keepers, but I have no such expense." Expenses and cares increase in a far greater ratio than one's holdings.

13, 14. The Bride's Final Song. While she is in the gardens she is asked to sing; she responds with a verse from an earlier poem (21⁷; cf. 4⁶).

ISAIAH

By PROFESSOR ROBERT W. ROGERS

INTRODUCTION

Admonition. The book of Isaiah is one of the longest books of the O.T. as it is also one of the most important. Its influence is not so great as that of the Pentateuch, for the Pentateuch has exerted an influence upon the religions of mankind without parallel in any other book. It is the foundation of Judaism, and the roots of Christianity and of Mohammedanism also draw supplies from it or rest upon its solid foundations of the knowledge of God. The influence of the book of Isaiah upon Christianity is less than the influence of the incomparable book of Psalms, for in all periods of its history the Christian Church has sung its way out of tribulation in the hymns whose matchless beauty, grace, and emotion have welled up wherever men rejoiced or suffered, despaired or hoped. But when the Pentateuch and the Psalter are set aside there need be little doubt that Isaiah ranks next in power over Christian thought. The earliest struggle of Christians to win Jews to their faith drew largely upon the Messianic portions of this glorious book. Isaiah himself was not so great a prophet as Jeremiah, for there are no words in any of his sermons so profound in their meaning, so clear in anticipation of the Lord's own message as the prediction of the new covenant (Jer. 31³¹⁻³⁴), but Jeremiah even at his highest pitch of eloquence was not so great a wizard of words as Isaiah again and again in the early chapters. And if we spring over the historical section and add to these chs. 40-55, then there surge in a mighty sea of eloquence words so magical, so musical, and withal so full of moving thought as are not easy to parallel elsewhere in Holy Writ.

Yet great and full of majesty, dignity, and worth as is this book of Isaiah, taken as a whole it is in its entirety but little known among us, and especially in America is this true. At the Advent season Isa. 9 and 11 are wont much to sound forth among us, and at other times ministers of religion are oft impelled to read in public chs. 40 and 53 and 60, largely perhaps because 53 suggests so wonderfully the sufferings of our Lord, while 40 and 60 are so eloquent that even the deaf must hear their music and the dumb must repeat it.

But if the ministry confines its exposition almost wholly to chs. 9, 11, 40, 53, and 60, there is no need that all God's people should learn so little of this portion of the sacred Scriptures. To learn more is easy enough with a bit of patience, a leavening of perseverance, and a gift of continuance. Come now, O thou reader of a goodly and of a godly spirit, essay this pleasant and most profitable task, lay down this Commentary for the nonce, seize the O.T. in the Revised Version, shut yourself up from the world, and read the book through as a whole. Did you give a sigh of doubt before and a deep sigh of relief after? It may be so. There were hard spots, none too easy to understand. So you say, and you are right. I should be telling you that shortly, but it is much better to have discovered it yourself. Knowledge self-acquired is a rich acquisition. And what was the nature of these difficulties? There were certain words difficult to understand in their connections. That is true enough. To meet these difficulties commentaries have been written. But there were also difficult allusions to events long gone by; yes, and for the full explanation of these, historical knowledge is needful, and histories and commentaries have been composed. But as you read you came upon places where there seemed to be an enigmatic break in the connection of thought, which you caught up and connected somewhat later. Even so; and to meet this men have invented and almost perfected systems of literary criticism by which they are able, however imperfectly, to show that portions of the book are widely separated in the time of their origin, and there are books which expound these processes and make the book more surely intelligible. Now, read the book through again, and yet again, and for the fourth time. You are increasing gently and surely in knowledge now. You are discovering the ways of the Lord of the Scriptures. It is the Lord who has been speaking, but he has not been speaking in fire or thunder or earthquake, but in and through the words of men. These men lived and worked in history. God spoke through them in human history, and other men collected their sermons or addresses or their writings and preserved them for us. God did not miraculously preserve them from ill arrangements of the prophetic words, nor prevent the corruption of word or phrase by careless copyists. Many of the difficulties thus introduced have been successfully sought out and garnered for our instruction, and libraries have been written by learned men to set forth all that has thus been won. We who now live are the heirs of all the ages in biblical learning, and for few books has so much been done as for this book of Isaiah. Come, then, and let us make a beginning; let us ask those who have gone before to select for us from the mighty aggregations of learning so much as we can duly assimilate, wisely use, and completely make our own. Let us be content no longer with chs. 9, 11, 40, 53, and 60.

The Purpose of the Author of the Commentary. The author aims no higher than merely to introduce the beginner to the accumulated stores of knowledge which the years have assembled and made available for us. Every generation stands on the shoulders of its predecessors. It sees farther afield because other generations have labored and the new-comer enters into their labors, possesses their results. Yet must each generation make, so far as it may, its own contribution. Science, art, and letters must make some advance, somewhere, somehow, or the minds of men must stagnate and progress cease. This progress is, however, achieved almost always at the hands of a few leaders. Others must be content to garner their results and pass them on down the long oncoming line. Real originality is far less common than the half-crazed optimists who prate in every market place would have us imagine. Yet even if it be absent in any large degree, every individual must cultivate in himself whatever spark of originality may be his, and with it seek to increase his own judgment, learn how to use, not as a slave but as a free man, the results attained and promulgated by the great leaders of thought. To do this he must be modest, be willing to be taught the ABC of the subject, whatever it may be. When these have been learned, the foundations are laid, and the building of an independent structure may begin. But this cannot even be begun, much less finished, without individual effort, the exercise of personal thought, the assembling of one's own materials, the testing of the results of others, the subjecting of them to thoughtful searching criticism. The swallowing whole of the work of others is not an intellectual enterprise. The swearing by the word of any master, however great he may be, is not learning. Yet are we everywhere surrounded by the loud-voiced repetition of catch phrases, borrowed anywhere, ill assorted, ill digested, but all the more cocksure and final. This little commentary on the book of Isaiah is not intended for technical scholars, who having already found their way are now walking serenely therein. It is writ only for beginners in the study of this prophet. It makes no pretense of breaking new ground. Its author could with much less labor and concern have written for scholars. He might then have set long lines of Hebrew words and phrases in array, and have made unrestricted use of such new light as the labors of recent years have brought to bear upon them. Selection of materials would have been easy, the ordering of them a light task, the need of seeking to make them interesting hardly worth consideration. On the contrary, in a study such as the present, the writer must avoid tediousness as a plague, must leave out much that he would fain discuss, must try to catch the thing which may be difficult to some mind, without making the matter a bore to those who have advanced beyond the need of such exposition.

The Apparatus. He who now begins his serious study of the book of Isaiah must begin his work with one absolutely indispensable piece of working apparatus, and for some time to come needs only one,—the Revised Version of the Bible. But its possession without daily use is valueless. Knowledge comes to him who works for it; to none other is it granted. Nothing worth possessing comes without some drudgery. This is fully as true of the knowledge of the book of Isaiah as of any other book, any other subject. The first, the very first call to be made is a call to read again and again and yet again the book of Isaiah. It ought to be read through at a sitting; then the first thirty-five chapters should be read separately, not once but repeatedly; then the historical episodes in chs. 36-39; then the splendid chs. 40-55 over and over again; and finally chs. 56-66 also repeatedly. This is foundation work, and without it no independence in study is possible. He who has the will to do this, the courage to undertake it and the perseverance to complete it will some day know something for himself, and not merely because somebody else has said it. He is now really ready to read the pages which follow and to get profit of them. But before he does this, let him make one more serious resolve. Let him determine to seek out and read for himself the references to other parts of the book, and to other parts of Scripture, for only so will he be able to judge for himself whether this writer has judged rightly, or has leaped hastily and unwisely to conclusions. The reader who does these things, and not merely dreams of them, has already become a student, and his reward is sure. Mastery up to the full measure of his native ability will be granted him in due season.

A Word for the Courageous. If you are a reader who will do and dare, then come, follow on to know, delve deeper, read through slowly and methodically what is here written. Let it now be confessed that you will still not know much about this great prophetic book. For it is an encompassing book, a book of wide horizons and of mighty deeps. You will only have begun, but even though, for the present, you go no further you will have your reward, and will be able to take any other prophetic book with far greater ease. But if you decline to wander straightway into other fields, you will need to be advised where fuller and better knowledge may be sought. Let me then here set down the names of the greater books on Isaiah, but not a mere skeleton list, but a list with such description or characterization as will give you real light upon the rich literature already made available for you. From such a list you will be able to select what you will next read, whither future studies may well lead you.

Literature. The greatest commentary yet written upon the Book of Isaiah was the work of Franz Delitzsch, professor in the theological faculty of the University of Leipzig, written in the German language, and first published in 1866, and its fourth greatly revised edition in 1889. This fourth edition was translated into English and published in 1890. Delitzsch was the first Hebraist of his day, but he was much more than that, great though that was. He was a man of genius, and his grasp of religion, the religion of Judaism and the religion of Jesus Christ, was as emotionally rich as his knowledge was profound. He could indeed think, but he could also feel. His life was noble and ennobling, and into this great commentary he poured his whole great soul. I was his pupil forty years ago, and, as did hundreds of others, owed him a great gratitude not for mere knowledge but for inspiration and enthusiasm. His book is now superseded in many parts, for other questions have arisen which were not visible above the horizon in his day, but much of it remains as valuable as ever. Next in importance after the commentary by Delitzsch I should place that of August Dillmann, who took a commentary on Isaiah first written by Knobel, and prepared its fifth edition (1890) after the death of its author. Without a trace of impiety in handling the work of another, Dillmann contrived not only to bring its discussions up to the requirements of that day but also to stamp upon it the impress of his own distinguished personality, his exact scholarship, his patient, toilsome disentangling of fact from hypothesis. It was a great commentary when it left his master hand, and I who have been his student in the University of Berlin find it still a model of learning, cold at times, seldom, indeed, so warm as the work of Delitzsch, yet well worth close study. The sixth edition of Knobel-Dillmann was admirably revised by Rudolph Kittel in 1898, and all serious students value it still and count it better than before. These are the monuments of modern learning available for those who can use the German language. If that fail, let us ask what may be directly and immediately available in English. The one that deserves first to be named, chronologically at any rate, is a book by Thomas K. Cheyne, The Prophecies of Isaiah, whose first edition appeared in 1870, and the fifth in 1889. The later editions are in many respects less sound than the earlier, for Cheyne passed into and through a period in which ingenuity supplanted sobriety of judgment, and all his work though suggestive and often brilliant requires caution in the using. Next to be named is the remarkable book, The Book of Isaiah, in two volumes, by George Adam Smith (first published in 1889-90; new and revised edition, 1927) in the Expositor's Bible, which is not a commentary, but an exposition, and a book beyond all ordinary praise. It has insight, literary and spiritual appreciation, and is solidly based on sound learning. Let him who has made his way through this present work on the prophet Isaiah turn next to George Adam Smith. Then the next move should be to read the learned and critical commentary on Isaiah by John Skinner in the Cambridge Bible for Schools (1896-98), with which might well be used for comparison in places, The Book of the Prophet Isaiah, with introduction and notes, by G. W. Wade (1911) in the Westminster Commentaries. This will seem a long road to travel for one who is but now beginning. But he who has traversed this whole road will not only know Isaiah but he will have laid a solid foundation for a much more adequate appreciation of the whole body of prophetic literature. He will know something definitely. He will be able to talk or even write sensibly on this great book and he will have such an insight into the whole O.T. progressive revelation of God as will make the N.T. also a new book for him. Perhaps also he will inspire some boy to become a master in this fascinating and romantic field of learning, and so will perpetuate in another his own knowledge and enthusiasm. He could do few services greater than that for the Church of Christ among us in America. It is much to be regretted that there has not yet been produced by our American scholarship any large, deep, learned, and comprehensive commentary on the whole book of Isaiah. There have been popular commentaries, some of them sound and good, and there have been contributions to portions, expositions and suggestions here and there, but in a large way we still trail far in the rear of Germany and England. Perhaps some boy who reads these words will at last take away our reproach!

The Historical Background. We shall later see reasons for the confident assertion that the book of Isaiah contains in its present form many words that did not come directly from the preaching of Isaiah himself, but, however numerous or important they may be, the book owes its origins to Isaiah of Jerusalem, who began his prophetic work about 740 B.C., and continued it for forty years. Years of fate were they to his people, and his words, to be clearly understood, should be read against the background of the history in which he lived, in which he was an actor, and for which he toiled and suffered. To behold the man as he was in the times in which he lived we need to reconstruct his times as well as we may, and, matching knowledge with a trained and restrained imagination, seek both to see him and hear him. But to secure the picture we must go behind the days of his activity and see what was going on in the days of his childhood and youth.

Isaiah was partly contemporaneous with Amos and Hosea, of whom there is much to be read elsewhere under appropriate heads in this Commentary. It will be sufficient now to remind ourselves that Amos preached in Bethel in the Northern Kingdom about 760 B.C. during the reign of Jeroboam II, who was by far the greatest king alike in effort and result that the kingdom of Israel produced during the whole of its separate existence. Hosea preached also in the Northern Kingdom, probably between 746 and 734 B.C. The message of Amos was concerned with righteousness, and righteousness was the character of the God whom he preached to a wicked and adulterous generation. A message of greater tenderness and of a deeper religious experience was that of Hosea, for his emphasis was upon God as a Being of love. The men being different, the message from God must be different, yet was there no conflict between the two messages. Each saw truly what he did see and gave forth truly what God gave him to see and to know. Righteousness and Love are both alike attributes of our God, and both attributes needed declaration and emphasis. If Israel were but able to take the divine love into human breasts, and work out the divine righteousness in human word and deed, a new and better world would be forming. But for messages of such moment, of consequence so far reaching, the times were ill fitted. Amos spoke to a people full of the glory of victory and suddenly enriched by successful war. Jeroboam II had defeated the Arameans, plundered their chief cities of Damascus and of Hamath, and the fruit of victorious war was expressed in corruption in high places, and in a ritualistic but unmoralized religious worship. To these people Amos preached a declaration of doom. Against them Amos declared that a fearful war was in preparation sent by a God of righteousness. He declared that this war would come against Damascus and Gaza and Tyre and Edom and Ammon and Moab and Judah and Israel. For such a war as that a mighty power would be required, strong enough to assail these nations one by one, and beat them into pieces. Amos knew that such a power already existed, but he did not name it. What he does say is this, "Therefore thus saith the Lord God: An adversary!—even round about the land; and he shall bring down thy strength from thee, and thy palaces shall be plundered" (Amos 3¹¹). Amos knew full well what power this was, which should thus execute judgment upon Israel, for there are hints enough in his book to show he meant the Assyrians. Hosea knew fully as well that disaster was in preparation and spared nothing in a passionate description of it. Not even the eloquence of Amos could excel words like these: "Samaria shall bear her guilt; for she hath rebelled against her God: they shall fall by the sword; their infants shall be dashed in pieces, and their women with child shall be ripped up" (Hos. 13¹⁶).

The Assyrian Empire had but small beginnings in a territory only about twenty-five square miles in extent between the Tigris and the Lower Zab rivers. But it early displayed a genius for war; and the conquest of neighboring peoples, the acquisition of territory for expansion, and a threat against all western Asia were soon to be seen. About 1120 B.C. the Assyrians produced a great king who took the name or style of Tiglathpileser I, who made raids westward and was even said to have reached the Mediterranean. That would be sufficient cause for apprehension among the several peoples who carried on their political and social existence along the Mediterranean littoral and its hinterlands. But the Assyrians were not able to produce another such king as he had been until 885 B.C., when Ashurnazirpal III began to reign over them, and even more violently shook the western lands with plundering raids. Still more dangerous were the threats of his successor Shalmaneser III (859–824 B.C.), who set systematically about the task of subduing the western peoples and of plundering their possessions. Eleven or twelve of the small nations of Western Asia had the foresight to oppose him and the courage to unite and face him in a decisive battle at Karkar in northern Syria (854 B.C.). The Assyrian king has left us boastful accounts of a great victory and a heavy slaughter of his opponents. But it was a victory without evident or extensive results, and he was compelled to return to Assyria and recruit. At Karkar, among the kings who sought to save the west was no less a person than Ahab, king of Israel, who contributed two thousand chariots and ten thousand men. For his sad matrimonial alliance, and his weakness in suffering the religion of Israel to come into danger of corruption, the prophets of Israel, with the mighty personality of Elijah at their head, have covered him with denunciation, but as a national hero in the defense of his land and people we may justly give him praise and honor. Very different was Jehu (842-814 B.C.), who sent costly tribute to the Assyrian king, and so gave him the first deadly grip on Israel, which should never be wholly relaxed until the end of the little kingdom in 722 B.C. But that day was yet a long way off, and the Assyrians were not able to produce another such king as Shalmaneser III had been for many a day. But however deferred his day of coming might be, a virile people like the Assyrians were sure to produce another great king at some time. He came in 745 B.C. in the person of a man whose name had probably been Pul, or Pulu (2 Kings 15¹⁹), a man of determined energy and of immense resources alike in war and in peace. He was not likely to miss any favorable opportunity for fishing in troubled waters anywhere, and, as the outlook for Assyrian ambition had long been westward, Syria and Palestine would be most tempting. The Phoenicians held a strip of seacoast which their commercial genius had made into centers of world trade, as were the Aramæan cities centers of land commerce; the Lebanon and Anti-Lebanon ranges between these two produced cedar coveted beyond every other wood; the plains of Jezreel and of Samaria possessed fertile stretches much superior to anything that the homeland of Assyria could boast, and they with Phœnicia formed a bridge by which the untold wealth of Egypt might be reached. All of this part of western Asia was divided among small peoples, each too weak to make any determined opposition to Assyrian aggression. These little states had indeed once made common cause for a few glorious years, about 854 B.C., but were now severed, jealous of one another, blind to the signs of the times, incapable of any serious common enterprise. The Assyrians under Tiglathpileser III would be ready to strike at any favorable moment.

If there were space, it would be easily possible to show that every one of these petty commonwealths of the West was ripe for Assyrian plunder, but for our present purpose it is chiefly Israel and Judah that must claim our attention. The kingdom of Israel had received a new impetus from the conquests of Jeroboam II, and wealth had flowed in an enlarging stream into it, but social and religious weakness had come with it or in its train. There were swift changes in the royal dynasties, the kings were weak and vacillating in their external policies, and the political disorganization of the country went on apace. In the Southern Kingdom, the kingdom of Judah, there were interesting parallels to the experiences of Israel. Nearly contemporaneous with Jeroboam II of Israel, Judah had a strong king in Uzziah (782 (?)–740 or 737 B.C.). Edom was conquered and the Red Sea port of Elath restored (2 Kings 14²²) and these successful moves gave Judah control over the rich caravan trade with southern Arabia. The revenue thus secured developed the resources of the country and much increased its military efficiency (2 Chron. 26¹⁻¹⁵). Judah was now as rich as Israel, and quite rich enough to be an object of cupidity to its neighbors. "The land was full of silver and gold, and there was no end of its treasures; the land was full of horses and there was no end of their chariots" (Isa. 27). But as in Israel so also in Judah, prosperity brought incalculable evils in its train, both social and religious. Luxury and debauchery spread widely among the upper classes (Isa. 316-23 511, 12, 22 281-8 329f.). Capital increased in the hands of the few, and the old landowners were gradually deprived of their little farms, which were replaced by great landed estates (Isa. 5⁸ Mic. 22, 9) and a destitute and oppressed lower class was formed. When Uzziah died, about 740 B.C., the times called earnestly for a strong voice to be raised against these conditions.

It seems, as we look back upon these events, that the leaders both in Israel and in Judah ought to have had vision enough to recognize Assyria as the great and growing danger, but there was not enough foresight in either kingdom to have grasped the situation. So has it been over and over again in every succeeding age. Few indeed were they who foresaw the coming of the Great War in our own day, or made any wise provision for its dangers. Assyrian power seemed far away, and when Shalmaneser III was dead there seemed to western observers to be no successor to him. Even when Tiglathpileser III ascended the throne there were some years without much threat in them. If men of vision had ruled in

Samaria and in Jerusalem, there might have been a different story to tell, but Jeroboam II was busy with the aggrandizement of his kingdom at the cost of the Aramæans, and Uzziah with the enrichment of his people at the charge of Edom. But there was much worse in store. The only hope for the perpetuation of independent kingdoms in Syria and Palestine was in union for defense against Assyria instead of a move which seems to us so obvious. Rezin (the name should really be written "Rezon"), king of the Aramæans (the people of Damascus), and Pekah, king of Israel, conspired to attack and plunder Judah. The scheme, mad enough for the minds of lunatics, was apparently begun in the reign of Jotham but came to full force in the reign of Ahaz, king of Judah. The latter was a weak man, and ought to have taken the advice of Isaiah, whose vision of events present and approaching extended beyond the borders of Judah. Ahaz could see only the immediate present and the pressing danger. He appealed to Tiglathpileser III for help against this coalition, and received it promptly. Tiglathpileser invaded Israel in 734 B.C., plunging through Gilead, Galilee, and taking captive some of the inhabitants of Naphtali (2 Kings 15²⁹) and later took Damascus, and slew Rezon (2 Kings 16⁹). The effect was immediate. Rezon and Pekah had approached Jerusalem but were compelled by this move of Tiglathpileser to withdraw. Judah was saved, but at fearful cost. Ahaz went off to Damascus to pay homage to his deliverer, and Judah as well as Israel had by this shortsighted folly of the Judean king been placed in a position of tutelage to the great king from the Tigris Valley. The Assyrians would duly draw the proper conclusions from these situations, and arrange to take profit from them. Henceforth Judah had to pay a heavy annual tribute to the Assyrian overlord, and the Assyrian kings knew well how to make their annual collections from states which had accepted their overlordship. In 727 B.C. the great Assyrian king died and Shalmaneser V became his successor. He was far from equal to Tiglathpileser III, and, as happened so often in Oriental history at a change in kings, rebellions began in various parts of the empire. Hezekiah was now king in Jerusalem, though uncertainties in the chronological material make it doubtful whether Ahaz had died and Hezekiah had succeeded him, or was still alive with Hezekiah acting as regent. The Egyptians were doing their utmost to foment disturbances in western Asia, hoping to profit therefrom, but there is no evidence that Judah yielded to them. In the Northern Kingdom, however, the case was entirely different. Hoshea was now king in Samaria, having been appointed to office by Tiglathpileser as an Assyrian vassal. He was so mad as to yield to Egyptian intrigue, having entered into treasonable negotiations with a petty Delta king in Egypt, whose name is handed down in the Hebrew text in the form So, but named Sibe or Sabe by the Assyrians, which implies that the Hebrew form should be Seve. Hoshea refused the annual tribute and Shalmaneser moved against him, received shortly his personal surrender and began a siege of Samaria. The little city held out bravely against great odds for nearly three years, and surrendered to the Assyrian army in 722-721 B.C. In that very hour Shalmaneser died and one of the greatest kings ever produced in Assyria took his place, assuming the ancient name of Sargon, and fit for any enterprise, as his great Babylonian namesake had been. He incorporated the kingdom of the Ten Tribes into the Assyrian Empire (2 Kings 17³⁻⁶).

But the people of Israel were not so easily mastered, and the small neighboring peoples in Syria gained sufficient support and encouragement to begin a very promising revolt. Had the Assyrian monarch been a man of less force and character, the West might have won at least a fresh breath of independence. But there was no reason to hope for such a happy issue when Sargon was on the throne. He came west and opposition crumbled before him. The last gasp of Israel as a separate kingdom had come, and the whole of Syria went down with it. Sargon penetrated the coast to Ashdod, about thirty-three miles west of Jerusalem, and took it in 711 B.C. (Isa. 20¹), and at Raphia defeated the allied forces to which the Egyptians had made a contribution. Judah had most wisely remained neutral, and so secured another breathing spell, or she also would have then and there vanished out of independent existence. Sargon's period of reign was now soon to end, for in 705 B.C. he was dead and his son Sennacherib ruled in his stead.

Sennacherib inherited a vast empire, but many perplexities and dangers came with it. Babylon was a dangerous problem, for a skillful and energetic Chaldean named Merodach-baladan seized the city for his people, and by this coup encouraged the western peoples to rebel while Sennacherib was detained by eastern problems. The advisers of Hezekiah thought the hour propitious for an attempt to cast off the Assyrian yoke altogether. Flattery of the king, of his wisdom and supposed prowess in war, may have had something to do with his decision to join in a rebellion against the Assyrian overlordship, and to cut off the annual tribute. The Assyrians regarded the people of Ekron as the real leaders of the uprising, for they had seized their Assyrian governor, Padi by name, expelled him from office, and handed him over to Hezekiah for imprisonment. All these western peoples were more or less obsessed with the greatness of Egypt, and were ever ready to believe that help against the Assyrians might thence be derived. There could seldom have been less justification for any such hope than at that hour. For Egypt had lost its national unity and the land was divided, as it had been more than once before, under the control of pretenders who sought each to rule in his own nome or district, hoping that some chance might make him ruler over all the land. There was at least one competent observer of events in Jerusalem who knew that Egypt was in grievous danger of internecine civil war and therefore helpless to give aid. Isaiah saw the whole situation with amazing clarity of view and soundness of judgment, saying in God's name:

"I will spur on Egypt against Egypt,
and they shall fight,
Every man against his brother and every man against his neighbor,
City against city, and kingdom against kingdom" (Isa. 19²).

These would be sorry helpers in an uprising against a power so united and so well directed as Assyria. But the die was cast and Judah must take the consequences of her king's folly.

Sennacherib set his troops on the march and in 701 B.C. invaded the West, striking the Mediterranean coast at or near Tyre. He did not, however, attempt the reduction of the city, which would not have been possible without a naval force. Sidon was taken without a blow, and Ethobal was set up as its king, receiving authority as far south as Mount Carmel. This spectacular success over the Phoenicians alarmed the faint-hearted members of small states who had joined the coalition, who now sent deputations with gifts and promises of fealty. But in spite of defections in Arvad, Gebal, Ashdod, Moab, Ammon, and Edom the rest of the little confederation stood fast. Sennacherib pushed on down the coast, and took Ashkelon, carrying its king off as a prisoner to Assyria. So suffered also the towns of Beth-Dagon, Bene-barqa, and Azuru. The way was now open to the chief culprits in Ekron unless help came speedily. Strangely enough, a force did come out of Egypt but was quickly defeated at Eltekeh. Ekron was now taken and severely handled.

Then came Judah's turn. Sennacherib marched from the coast up the fertile valleys toward Jerusalem, claiming in his own official story to have taken forty-six cities. Jerusalem was blockaded, but not taken, and the great king contented himself with the picturing of the taking of Lachish upon slabs of stone used as wainscoting of his palace walls. He was, however, not leaving this as the sole record of his triumph, for on his most beautiful inscribed prism he has caused to be inscribed a full account of his punishment of these foolish rebels. It is a most remarkable result of the discoveries and investigations of our times that we should possess a contemporaneous account of these tragic events from the Assyrian point of view. Let us here set down, in translation, a small portion of the king's boasts, that we may relate it to the biblical accounts and the better place Isaiah in his historical setting. Hear Sennacherib speaking:

"I drew near to Ekron, the governors and princes, who had committed sin [i.e., rebellion against him] I slew, and hung their bodies on poles around the city. The townsfolk who had committed wickedness and offense I counted as spoil; to the rest of them, who had not committed sin and wickedness, in whom no guilt was found, I proclaimed pardon. Padi, their king, I brought out from Jerusalem, and set him on the throne of dominion over them, and the tribute of my dominion I laid upon him. And of Hezekiah, the Judæan, who had not submitted to my yoke, forty-six strong cities, with walls, the smaller cities which were around them without number, by the battering of rams and the assault of engines, the attack of foot-soldiers, mines, breaches, and axes I besieged and captured them. Two hundred thousand one hundred and fifty men, young, old, male and female, horses, mules, asses, camels, oxen and sheep without number I brought out from them and counted as booty. [Hezekiah] himself I shut up like a caged bird within Jerusalem, his royal city. I cast up entrenchments against him, and whosoever came forth from the gate of his city I turned back. His cities, which I had plundered, I separated from his land, and gave them to Mitinti, king of Ashdod, Padi, king of Ekron, and Sillibel, king of Gaza, and diminished his land. Beside the former taxes, paid yearly, I added the tribute and presents of my dominion, and laid these upon him. As for Hezekiah, the fear of the majesty of my dominion overwhelmed him and the Arabs, and good troops whom he had brought in to strengthen Jerusalem, his royal city, deserted. With thirty talents of gold and eight hundred talents of silver, precious stones, antimony, lapis-lazuli, couches of ivory, seats of ivory, elephant-hide, ivory, boxwood and ebony, diverse objects, a heavy treasure, and his daughters, the women of his palace, male musicians, female musicians, he despatched after me to Nineveh, my capital city. He sent his ambassador to give tribute and make submission." (A translation of The Taylor Cylinder, col. iii, lines 1-41.)

Here, then, is Sennacherib's own version of these calamitous events. This campaign took place in 701 B.C., and is briefly characterized in 2 Kings 18¹³⁻¹⁹. In this passage it is declared that Sennacherib withdrew because of some tidings which had come to him, for so do these words signify: "Behold, I will put a spirit in him, and he shall hear a rumor, and shall return to his own land; and I will cause him to fall by the sword in his own land" (2 Kings 19⁷). We shall perhaps come near the mark if we surmise that he was compelled to withdraw because tidings had reached him that risings against his authority were occurring or threatening elsewhere in his kingdom. However that may be, certain it is that Jerusalem had not been taken, and the Assyrians withdrew without securing the chief prize of their enterprise. Yet had Judah suffered terribly for her madness in aiding the confederation, and Isaiah was not slow in reminding king and people of their losses, in words that both moan and sting:

"Your land is a desolation;
Your cities are burned with fire;
Your tilled land before you,
Foreigners are devouring it;
And the daughter of Zion (that is, Jerusalem) is left
Like a booth in a vineyard,
As a lodge in a garden of cucumbers,
As a city of watch" (Isa. 17. 8).

But Sennacherib, at any rate, was gone, and king and people must pull themselves together as best they might, and they were soon as bold as before, and ready to take risks again. If, now, we correctly understand the rest of the narrative in Second Kings (19¹), the events that followed were these: that Sennacherib did not give up the hope of ultimately taking Jerusalem, but sought and found another opportunity for the attempt. We know that Sennacherib was again in the West at some time between 688 and 682 B.C., for he has left us a tiny little text which may be translated thus:

"Telkhunu, the queen of Arabia, in the midst of the desert, from her I took away a thousand camels. The fear of my dominion cast her down and Hazeel also: They left their tents and fled to Adummetu, whose location is in the desert, a thirsty place where there is neither provision nor places to drink."

This shows clearly enough that he was now near enough to threaten Jerusalem, and we may suppose that while on this expedition he sent messengers to Hezekiah. Tirhaka was now (689-663 B.C.) ruler in Egypt, and it was rumored that he might take sides against Sennacherib (2 Kings 19⁹), and Sennacherib took the first move and summoned Jerusalem to surrender. Isaiah stiffened the back of Hezekiah to refuse, assuring him that, "By the way that he came, by the same shall he return, and he shall not come unto this city, saith the Lord" (19³³).

Following shortly upon this a great disaster befell the army of Sennacherib, for "it came to pass that night that the angel of the Lord went forth and smote in the camp of the Assyrians a hundred fourscore and five thousand: and when men arose early in the morning, behold, these were all dead bodies" (19⁵⁵ mg.). So was it the custom in Israel to describe and define all catastrophes, great or small, as the direct act of God. Perhaps we should describe this as a visitation of pestilence, sudden and relentless, and it may well have happened if Sennacherib's army was on the borders of Egypt, perhaps near Pelusium where the Nile flows in separated and sluggish channels and where pestilence has often begun even in modern times. A most curious and interesting parallel to this biblical story is probably to be found in a narrative preserved by Herodotus (ii, 141), to which it seems well worth while to give space here, and so to be able to compare all these accounts.

"The next king, I was told, was a priest of Vulcan, named Sethos. This monarch despised and neglected the warrior class of the Egyptians, as though he did not need their services. Among other indignities which he offered them, he took from them the lands which they had possessed under all the previous kings, consisting of twelve acres of choice land for each warrior. Afterward, therefore, when Sennacherib, king of the Arabians and Assyrians, marched his vast army into Egypt, the warriors one and all refused to come to his aid. On this the monarch, greatly distressed, entered into the inner sanctuary, and before the image of the god bewailed the fate which impended over him. As he wept he fell asleep, and dreamt that the god came and stood at his side, bidding him be of good cheer, and go boldly forth, and meet the Arabian host, which would do him no hurt, as he himself would send those who should help him. Sethos, then, relying on the dream, collected such of the Egyptians as were willing to follow him, who were none of them warriors, but traders, artisans, and market people, and with these marched to Pelusium, which commands the entrance into Egypt, and there pitched his camp. As the two armies lay here opposite one another, there came in the night a multitude of field-mice, which devoured all the quivers and bow-strings of the enemy, and ate the thongs by which they managed their shields. Next morning they commenced their flight, and great multitudes fell, as they had no arms with which to defend themselves. There stands to this day in the temple of Vulcan, a stone statue of Sethos, with a mouse in his hand, and an inscription to this effect—"Look on me and learn to reverence the gods."

The explanation of this strange narrative is to be found in the consideration in ancient times of the mouse as the symbol of pestilence. Apollo Smintheus is known to the Greeks and is represented with a mouse in his hand. Here, then, we have a story, which Herodotus did not understand but which is apparently an echo of an actual historical occurrence, and may very well refer to the same event as that chronicled in Kings. The situation, then, would be, if we summarize all available information, that Sennacherib made two attempts to take Jerusalem and was called away from the first by troubles, political or military, at home, and from the second by pestilence in his army. (It should be noted, however, that many scholars interpret the evidence, biblical and otherwise, as implying only a single attack upon Judah and Jerusalem.) Home he went, and there soon afterward, in 681 B.C., he was assassinated either by one or by two of his own sons in a conspiracy.

So was Judah delivered providentially and spared for a season of hope and opportunity, which it was little able profitably to use.

We have now surveyed the whole historical situation in Israel and Judah during the life of Isaiah (cf. pp. 66-8). Let us turn now to the man himself and seek some picture of him as we see his noble and commanding figure against the background of his sadly troubled age.

Isaiah the Man. About the year 760 B.C. there was born, probably in the city of Jerusalem, a boy to whom was given the glorious name Isaiah, which means "Jehovah saves," or "Jehovah is salvation," which was a challenge to faith, to the belief that somehow at some time and in his own way Jehovah would save his people not only from political disaster, but from national wrongdoing, from evil of every kind. His father's name was Amoz (Isa. 1¹ and 2¹) and there is a Jewish tradition which makes this father a brother of king

Amaziah; and this, if true, would make Isaiah a cousin of king Uzziah. Though this is far from certain, there are indications enough to prove that Isaiah had social prestige, easy access to the kings of his day, and at least a hearing from the most prominent people of his time. Of his youth and the influences which molded it we have very little save conjecture to guide us. We know that he grew to manhood in the great and extraordinarily prosperous reign of Uzziah, and we might well expect him to be so much influenced by the material conditions as to take a very roseate view of the future. This was, however, not the case, and we must see, if we may, what were the influences which imparted a different color to mind and message. Three such influences spring at once to our thought. The first was the appalling earthquake which happened in this reign, though the exact year remains unknown to us. It made a tremendous impression both contemporary and later. The compiler or editor of the prophecies of Amos had heard of it (Amos 1¹), and even so late as the days of Zechariah (145) it was remembered. An impressionable boy such as Isaiah must have been could not have passed this over without serious thought. Next and more important were the influences exerted by the prophetic teaching of his distinguished predecessors Amos and Hosea, whose messages can be distinctly observed in his preaching. Third, and far the most important, was the influence of his vision of God, set down in glowing words, and representing vividly his call to the prophetic office (ch. 6). This came in the year that Uzziah died, about 740 B.C. The aged king, whose reign had been splendid, lay stricken with leprosy, and of his dreadful plight Isaiah must have heard much, and may, indeed, have with his own eyes seen the monarch almost in the jaws of death. He would be in any case sufficiently informed of the situation to be profoundly moved into an impressionable state.

He entered the Temple, quite probably to worship, and that he was admitted at all to a holy place intended only for priests, shows that he was linked in some way with priestly blood, or admitted as a man with royal family ties. There in that holy place he had a vision that changed his life. In a prophetic trance he saw Jehovah, God of Israel. The experience was actual, real, genuine, and not a fancy, not a vagary of a mind disturbed. It is described in prose, but the speeches are in verse. Nothing that even approaches it in grandeur of conception and beauty of expression appears elsewhere in the O.T., and this is equivalent to saying that it has no parallel in all the literature of all the Oriental peoples. (Let the reader go slowly and thoughtfully through the sixth chapter for himself.) There before the prophet's inner eye was Jehovah himself in grandeur, majesty, and holiness unapproachable. The prophet is overwhelmed at the sight, and feels himself by comparison a man of sin. Here, just here is a solemn difference between the prophet and ourselves. We belong to churches that do things. We are surrounded by clamors for service, for sacrifice, for work for God and for man. These are all well enough; they have an undoubted importance, but far too seldom have they any solid basis in an immediate personal knowledge of God. We do not know him in meditation and in prayer. We have not poured out our souls in adoration and praise and thanksgiving. Our prayer has been petition, and petition almost exclusively, and often very selfish, or at least self-centered. But Isaiah saw God, and from that day forward knew him. He had established a contact with the Divine, and was in a condition to receive inspiration from God and to represent him before man. But this came to him with no promise that men would accept him and hear his message and learn willingly from him the ways of God. Quite contrary is to be his experience. In the awful hour of God's revelation to him it is made clear that men will neither hear him nor make profitable use of his disclosure of God. It is revealed to him that the people of Judah have come to such unbelief because of sin, both national or social and personal, that they have entered into an incapacity for divine things, and are quite incapable of receiving the prophet's message. The more God is revealed the less will they be able to receive him. This principle appears again and again in the N.T. and often as a clear echo from the prophet: "This is the judgment, that the light is come into the world, and men loved the darkness rather than the light; for their works were evil" (Jn. 3¹⁹), and see how the very words of Isaiah are quoted or referred to in other places (Mt. 13^{14, 15} Acts 26^{26, 27} Rom. 11⁸). What a contrast does this present to the cheap optimism of our age! We keep looking for immediate results from the preaching of the gospel and the work of the church, and speak as though the reception depended on the preacher or teacher, forgetting that the receptive soil must be present, as well as the declared word. But too often neither the preacher nor the people have had any real vision of God and whatever is done must be done with mortal, and not immortal, tools or agents.

Yet, though Isaiah has been warned that the people of his day cannot accept him and his message, he is not left to hopeless despair for his people, for to the prophet there comes the promise of a Remnant. This doctrine, very characteristic of Isaiah, ought really to appear in the inaugural vision, and if the text, as it now stands, be correct, it does lie implicit in 6¹³. There is, however, a doubt about the last clause of the verse, which does not appear in the LXX, and we shall therefore not insist upon it. But however that may be, we have the doctrine given plainly enough in the name of Isaiah's first son, called Shear-jashub, which means "Remnant—shall turn," i.e., "shall turn to Jehovah"; it does not mean "shall return," i.e., from captivity. Isaiah was probably already married when the vision came and called him to be a prophet, and the first son must have been born soon thereafter. His name is a promise. No matter how much Isaiah's own generation may refuse to forsake its sins and come to its true father, there will be another and a better day. A remnant shall remain and in due time turn to Jehovah.

The Three Periods of Isaiah's Activity. And now Isaiah has received his commission and his work for his people is to begin. Hard and sore will be the struggle, but Isaiah will be faithful to the end, and the issue will be in the hands of God. The prophetic career may well be divided into three main periods (so Robertson Smith) as follows: (1) From the death of Uzziah to the beginning of the reign of Ahaz. (2) The period of the Syro-Ephraimitic invasion, about 735 B.C. (3) The period of Assyrian domination, culminating in the fearful invasion of Sennacherib, 701 B.C., and the deliverance of Jerusalem.

At the end of the first period is a break in the prophet's activity more momentous and significant than any other. We have already heard of the coalition between Rezon, king of Damascus, and Pekah, king of Israel, with the purpose of attacking and plundering Judah and perhaps of utterly destroying her. Ahaz was in a serious position and knew it well. He consulted doubtless his best advisers, and decided that there was not strength in Judah sufficient to meet a threat so serious. "And his heart was moved, and the heart of his people, as the trees of the forest are moved with the wind" (7²). Isaiah took his son Shear-jashub by the hand and went out to meet the king. He had probably learned that a decision had already been taken by Ahaz and his advisers to apply to Tiglathpileser for aid against the allies and to save Judah. Such a decision was madness in Isaiah's eyes, and he was determined to prevent its execution if it were possible. He felt nothing but contempt for Rezon and Pekah, these two tails of smoking firebrands (74), and he bade the king to be calm, trust in Jehovah, and rely on him and his resources and the resources of his people. But the king would not yield to him and was determined to carry out this fatal policy. Nor was he moved by the promise of a divinely given sign (for which see the commentary below on 714). Then Isaiah decided to carry the case to the populace, and seek over the head of king and counselors to prevent an alliance with Assyria, the real enemy of all the West. He was to set up a great tablet inscribed with the dreadful words "Maher-shalal-hash-baz"—a portentous combination word, the first two parts of which are Hebrew, the last two Aramaic and with the same meaning, the whole of which may be rendered in English as "Haste-spoil-speed-booty," and at the same time there was born to the prophet and his wife a second son, to whom was given this same name Maher-shalal-hash-baz. The people, as the king, refused the prophetic advice, and the fateful step was taken appealing to Tiglathpileser for help. The help, as we have seen already, was given.

Isaiah felt now that his present public service was at an end. He withdrew from all and every effort directly to reach either king or people and set himself to the service of his pupils. He would teach them in private and leave to them to work out in public, as best they might. He would write out his message, seal it up, and hand it over to them. "Bind thou up the testimony, seal the law among my disciples" (816-18). This was a most significant move. Many a time has it been shown in human history that great movements are best carried forward by a combination of some great teacher or leader with a company of disciples or followers. The greatest of all such examples is to be seen in the work of our Lord with his disciples. We do not know how much else Isaiah taught his disciples, but we shall not lose ourselves in empty speculation if we imagine that a man of his great and moving personality, his amazing gift of eloquence, his magical power over words, must have had an influence impossible to exaggerate. The influence of a great teacher lives long and powerfully after his little day is past. His pupils unconsciously take upon themselves not only the content but even the form of his teaching. They often imitate even his tones of voice and his gestures, sometimes the very expression of his countenance. These external imitations would tend to die out when the first generation was gone, but literary and spiritual reminiscences continue and are perpetuated through long periods. This may afford us a clue to some ideas and principles of value in the understanding of the book of Isaiah. It is now thoroughly well known that large parts of the book of Isaiah are not by the prophet at all but belong in some cases to considerably later periods. Some of these are so much like the portions of the book known to be by Isaiah that some students long held out that he had written them, because their points of view were similar or their language closely alike. These may indeed have been added to the book bearing Isaiah's name by editors who felt this resemblance, but in the first instance they may have been so produced under the projected influence of his glowing and potent personality.

But whether we attach much or little importance to this conjecture we shall do well to observe the prophet's method in this critical situation. He had tried to move both king and people from their mad resolve, and having failed was content to withdraw from public protestation and give himself to private teaching of such disciples as were willing to cleave to him.

With the accession of Hezekiah to the throne a new period of activity came to the prophet, and one more acceptable to him. Hezekiah was a different personality from his lame and weak predecessor, and Isaiah would find encouragement in him to come out boldly with his message. He gained also a valuable ally in the person of Micah, the prophet from the insignificant village of Moresheth-Gath, and so a prophet from the country-side as Isaiah was a city prophet. Micah spoke out boldly in defense of the common peasants and formed therefore an aide of importance to the social message of prophecy. But Isaiah continued to emphasize the political side, having a wider world-view than his contemporary.

Isaiah had his mind's eye on a dangerous situation in the state. The annual tribute payable to Assyria was naturally unpopular, and hot heads might at any moment wish to try a rebellion against it. Isaiah believed and taught that this Assyrian domination was providential, and that the divine will must be accepted. He was opposed to any leaning upon Egypt. He was sure that the future would show not a shrinking but an increase of Assyrian power, and that Judah must suffer from it. His only concern was to seek among his people such spiritual gains from Assyrian oppression as might be won. He felt assured that when the inevitable Assyrian invasion of the West began again Jerusalem would be spared. To this period belongs the tremendous passage 10⁵⁻³⁴ in which Isaiah boldly faces the whole difficult problem of explaining how God could use the immoral Assyrian power for moral ends. It is "one of the longest and most characteristic of Isaiah's utterances and perhaps the grandest exposition of the religious interpretation of history that ever was written" (Skinner). And now there comes swiftly the climax in the prophetic activity of Isaiah. The Assyrian invasion begins and Isaiah speaks out boldly and continuously. Judah must be sorely punished, but he is equally confident that the destruction of Assyria must ensue, and then would come a glorious era for God's people. The two thoughts of Jerusalem's punishment and of Assyrian downfall interlace, sometimes one and at other times the other is predominant. At times as we read the menacing words addressed to Jerusalem we seem to feel her case hopeless, but then there follows emphasis on the other side, nor is it easy always to follow the intricacies of the prophetic thought. We must see how we shall find our way as we come to study the chapters and verses later. The prophet had to oppose the insensate folly of the war party plunging madly into intrigues with Egypt, which would certainly bring down the full might of Sennacherib upon them. He failed again as he had done in the days of Ahaz. The fatal step was taken, and Egypt was solicited for help. And now, as he had done then, he decides to make a record of his effort to save his people from this folly. Thus in 30⁸:

"Now go, write it before them on a tablet
And note it in a book
That it may be as a testimony for ever."

The invasion came, as Isaiah expected. Jerusalem was spared, as we have seen in our historical survey, and even in a second attempt Sennacherib, for all his great strength, could not work his will.

And now soon after 701 Isaiah slips quietly out of our sight. Some of his greatest prophecies that concern the glorious Messianic age may indeed have come from him during the retirement which followed the events of Sennacherib's invasion, but we have no proof of it and must content ourselves with the long and brilliant story of his life. Nor do we know how or when his exit from life came. A late Jewish tradition asserts that he perished in the heathen reaction under Manasseh, but Scripture is silent and we do well not to attempt to fill in the gap. Isaiah had done enough for his refractory people; he was entitled to a well-earned rest.

The Messiah and His Age. The contribution which Isaiah made to religious thought has many sides. Were we to attempt a picture of it all, in all its ramifications, we should fill a volume with description, quotation, and characterization. We should be required to take his doctrine of God and to ask what he had therein to declare, and we should find him an uncompromising monotheist, not conceding one single word to the existence of any minor deities anywhere in the world. Idols are nothing, heathen deities are naught. There is no God but Jehovah. Then he fills out the picture, portraying Jehovah not as a cold abstraction, not as a force, but as a Person rich in all goodness, of infinite power and of infinite capacity for the care of mankind. Then we should come to his doctrine of man and of his salvation, and to his doctrine of the social life and of the state. But there is neither need nor space here for all this. We must narrow our search and fasten attention upon one thought only, asking ourselves what doctrine of the prophet has had the greatest significance for later ages and the greatest influence upon them. The answer to this must be that it is his teaching concerning the Messiah. He does not use this word in the sense that we now attach to it. He portrays an ideal king, whom we call Messiah, and this word is a convenient term to apply here. The passages in which Isaiah describes this King, this Messiah, are 91-7 111-9 321-8 and 3317. Doubts have been often expressed, and still are, by very many of the best scholars as to whether all of these passages in their entirety are really the utterances of Isaiah, and we must say a word about that on these verses when we meet them later. For the present let it suffice to say that whether every word does really come from the prophet's own lips or not does not seriously affect the question in the main. There is enough material as surely his as any literary material out of so distant a past can be shown to belong to any writer. To these we ought and must add also 714-16, the Immanuel passage, even though it be difficult to range it chronologically with the others. (Many recent writers deny a Messianic import to 714.) The entire picture presented by these passages is of a figure so wonderful in his powers, so far above all former kings in wisdom that it is no wonder that the most diligent search by Jewish defenders of their faith, and modern critical students of all faiths or of none, has not been able to point to any historical character who measures up to this ideal. Some have thought of Hezekiah, or of some unknown son of Isaiah, but it remains still an insoluble mystery. The simplest explanation is that which is older than any of the others. Reduced to its simplest form it is this: that the prophet foresaw an ideal king and that no such king arose worthy for a moment to be compared with the picture, but that at long last Jesus came and did satisfy not only this picture but many more predicted elsewhere in the prophetic books. Of course it will be said that the prophet's hope was that the ideal king would come at a time which would enable him to deliver Judah, but that this was not the case and that therefore it is idle to bring the passages into any relation with the Christ. The answer to this is that the prophets seldom saw future events in perspective, and were therefore often wrong in their time relations. They expected the great problems to be solved quickly and the sublime issue to result quickly. In this they were mistaken. But with that exception marvelous indeed was the outreach of their hopes, and curiously well suited to the plans, as our day has shown them to be. When we come further on to search out these prophetic delineations of the Messiah word by word in the following commentary we shall be not less but more amazed at the prophetic teaching. (See Excursus at close of ch. 53, p. 664.)

Other Prophecies. Thus far all that has been here set down relates only to the life and work of Isaiah of Jerusalem, who was born probably about 760 B.C., and vanished out of our sight sometime later than 701 B.C., though he may well have still been living as late as 680 B.C. But the book of Isaiah contains many and long prophecies which cannot have been written by him. The whole body of prophecy which fills chs. 40-66 belongs to another age and to an entirely different environment. To it there will be devoted a special introduction in the proper place, and even as we traverse the first part of the book we shall find evidence that the editors who compiled this great book have inserted materials not by Isaiah. These must have mention as we meet them. But as we go forward all the way we must not lose sight or touch with the original Isaiah, the true founder of the book, a man whose outgivings were so great, so noble in utterance, so stately and beautiful in language, so profound in thought, that no matter how much of others' teaching might be set in with his or added to it he would still serenely dominate the whole.

Analysis of the Contents of Isaiah 1-39. The first part of the book of Isaiah falls naturally into four main divisions: (1) chs. 1-12; (2) chs. 13-27; (3) chs. 28-35; and (4) chs. 36-39. The last named is a historical booklet mostly excerpted from 2 Kings, while the other three may quite probably have been originally circulated as separate booklets. Let us now take up the study of these divisions in turn, interpreting them briefly and seeking for explanations of words and phrases whose meaning may not be at once clear to the mind. In the limits here properly imposed it will not be possible to attempt an elaborate and detailed exposition, still less a discussion of all the difficulties or of the solutions sought or found by scholars during hundreds of years of investigation. They who would penetrate thus deeply must have recourse to the large commentaries whose names have already been given. In order to follow even so much as here may be given it is imperatively necessary that one have the O.T. in the Revised Version always at hand, reading it steadily and consecutively while seeking now and again some attempted explanation of difficulties or obscurities.

CHAPTERS 1 TO 12: VOLUME OF DISCOURSES CENTERING AROUND JUDAH AND JERUSALEM

CHAPTER I

The Great Arraignment. The entire chapter is a fearful indictment of existing conditions.

1. Superscription. This applies only to chs. 1-12, for from ch. 13 onward there are many prophecies relating to other nations and peoples than Judah and Jerusalem. This first chapter is introductory only, and was probably uttered by the prophet later than chs. 2-12, perhaps much later. It cannot well be earlier than the troubled period after the Syro-Ephraimitic war, and much of it would fit even better the terrible situation after Sennacherib's invasion. The editor found it and thinking it would serve the purpose well—as, indeed, it does—placed it as an introduction.

2-9. Rebellion and Punishment of Israel. Hear, O heavens. The prophets regard the whole universe as a unity, and often appeal to heaven and earth as witnesses against man. *Rebelle*d—the people have sinned against their God by idolatry and by refusal to hear the prophets Amos, Hosea, and Isaiah, and by many breaches of the moral law. Holy One of Israel. This was the view of God which Isaiah received at his call in the great vision, and God's holiness is ever before him. This phrase he probably coined, for we do not find it before his time. Overthrown by strangers. This is a tame conclusion, and we should probably read "like the overthrow of Sodom" (so Ewald). Daughter of Zion. A personification. It means Jerusalem. Booth . . . lodge. To keep off thieves it was customary to erect in the fields a frail structure on poles, and there sat the farmer, in most uncomfortable pose, watching all night long over his cabbages. It is surely a picturesque comparison for Jerusalem, watching over her desolated environment, but it is not unlike Isaiah to have struck out such a phrase as that.

10-17. "The False and the True Way of Seeking God's Favor" (Dillmann). The prophet enumerates all the regular forms of worship and their seasons, sacrifices, oblations, i.e., meal offerings, incense, the observance of New Moon and Sabbath, and boldly declares that God will not hear them. But what God does demand and must receive is righteousness of life and the fulfillment of the social obligations of taking care of the fatherless and the widow, who may readily otherwise fall under wrong treatment. It is a noble passage, and reminds one of Amos.

18-31. A Series of Miscellaneous Utterances. Vv. 18-20 contain a familiar and very rich passage. Men may be saved from their sins without the sacrifices. In vv. 21-23 the sins of all Judah are set forth in a severe castigation of Jerusalem, but there is a prospect of reform in vv. 24-28, for Jehovah has adversaries among his people; but they are dross and will be purged away, and good judges and counselors, as in earlier days, will take their place. It is a political change that the prophet foresees, and it is a restoration of former things. In his later teaching the prophet expects something far better than all the past has to offer. Then the chapter concludes in vv. 29-31 with a condemnation of tree and garden worship, which was common among the Canaanites, was adopted in Israel, and some forms of which continue in Syria in our day. Isaiah will have none of it. Men must worship Jehovah only.

CHAPTERS 2 TO 4: THE GLORIES OF THE MESSIANIC AGE AFTER A PERIOD OF SEVERE JUDGMENT

CHAPTER II

1-4. A Messianic Prophecy. Chs. 2-4 formed probably a separate book originally. The section following the title begins with a Messianic prophecy in vv. 2-4; the occurrence of the same prophecy in Mic. 4¹⁻⁴ raises an interesting literary problem. Did Micah quote from Isaiah, or Isaiah from Micah, or both from an earlier prophet? The evidence is too slight for us to feel confident, but, on the whole, it seems the more probable that it comes originally from some later prophet, and was here and in Micah inserted by the editors of these books. It is a precious bit and we may well be glad that it has been so well preserved by insertion in two books. It is a picture of the Messianic age, and to the prophet's vision Zion is to be the world's religious capital, and thence Jehovah shall judge all peoples. (In v. 4 we should translate "arbitrate for" rather than "rebuke" as in the A.V., or decide concerning in the R.V. mg.) When that age comes, and the Messiah is really ruling, then wars will cease. There seems not to be much hope that this great boon will come earlier. Men must first be brought everywhere to accept their king.

5-22. A Judgment of Jehovah. V. 5 is a transition verse. Vv. 6-22 describe a great judgment of Jehovah, for Judah has been taking up many heathen customs, and in the great prosperity of Uzziah's reign has grown rich and learned too much of easy ways of life and of foreign ideas. All these evils must be purged out and man's pride humbled.

CHAPTER III

Three Oracles. (Including also 41.) These oracles follow naturally enough on the denunciation of idolatry and national pride in ch. 2, for they deal with social injustice and private luxury. In vv. 1-4 the prophet predicts a time of anarchy, for Jehovah will take away all rulers, all who might guide the people, and, according to vv. 5-7, men will seek everywhere to find someone to lead them, to heal them, only to meet with refusal and failure. The reason for all this is the guilt of the court and the nobles (vv. 8-12), children are their oppressors, and women rule over them, i.e., their rulers behave weakly and foolishly like children, and the queen mother and the ladies of the court rule over them. Then Jehovah rises and calls them to account for the mismanagement of the country and the oppression of the poor (vv. 13-15). Upon this there follows, 31⁶⁻⁴¹, a fearful castigation of the women of Jerusalem, and a threat of the degradation which awaits them. When the men of the nation have fallen in war, then the women will seek a husband in vain.

CHAPTER IV

1. See under ch. 3.

2-6. A Picture of a Glorious Messianic Age. This is to follow upon the day of the Lord. It begins with a picture of the Holy Land clad in a rich vegetable growth given by Jehovah. The translation branch is unfortunate. Either "shoot" or "sprout" would be better (mg.). It is not the same word as that translated branch in 11¹. This runs parallel with fruit of the earth (mg.) in the next clause, and the prophecy is not of the personal Messiah but of his age. It is an idea frequently appearing in the prophets that great fertility will come to the land after the Messiah has appeared. Then those who have escaped the day of the Lord shall be holy, and shall be written for life, that is, predestined to life (v. 3). Then Jehovah will be revealed by means of a cloud by day and the smoke of a flaming fire by night; so should v. 5 be translated following the LXX. The imagery is derived from the wilderness wandering (Ex. 1321f. 4034-38).

CHAPTER V

1-7. The Parable of the Vineyard. A passage of singular beauty and grace, and with many echoes elsewhere in Scripture, e.g., Jer. 221 1210f. Psa. 808f. Mt. 201f. 2133f. The prophet assembles a company about him and in light, popular musical verse recites his parable, and then suddenly changes the rhythm in v. 7 and makes a severe application of the moral. The choicest vine was the Sorek, which produced red grapes; winepress should be "wine vat," a place to ferment and store the wine. In v. 6 the prophet begins to let out the secret, when he says I will command the clouds, for only Jehovah could do that. Then follows easily the application in v. 7. Observe how our Lord adapts this parable to the people of his day (Mt. 2133-41).

8-24. Denunciation of the Guilty, and Declaring of Woes. Six woes are described. (1) The first woe, vv. 8-10, is directed against rich landowners who gradually absorb small holdings and crowd out the small holders, a process that seems often to have resulted in the deprivation of civil rights, and a reduction to a sort of slavery. As a punishment the land shall be made barren. The word "acre" means so much as could be plowed by a yoke of oxen in a day. In our terms ten acres so interpreted would mean about five acres. Five acres of vineyard would produce only one bath of wine, i.e., about eight gallons; a homer is about eighty-three gallons, and an ephah about eight gallons; that is, only about one tenth as much as had been sown of seed (p. 79).

(2) The second woe, vv. 11-17, is directed against dissipation, and the dullness arising from it early in the morning. There was much intemperance in Israel and in Judah (Amos 28 41 66 Hos. 411 75 Isa. 2213 281 7), but it was especially deemed an excess to drink early in the day, or before the ninth hour, reckoning twelve hours from sunrise to sunset. The instruments used at the feasting should be translated, "guitar and harp, tambourine and flute." With these instruments and benumbed by wine they are unable to think about God's works, or to pay attention to the warnings which he sent. And now, because the rulers or other prominent people so behave, the people go into captivity; are gone (v. 13) is the prophetic perfect. It would convey the sense more clearly to us if translated "go" or "goeth." This is the only explicit reference to captivity in Isaiah. In vv. 14-17 there is a threat of the destruction of Jerusalem. Hell hath enlarged her desire, i.e., Sheol, the underworld, the place of the dead, represented in a sort of personification as an insatiable monster. God sanctifies himself by these judgments which he has imposed, and the land shall be depopulated and turned into pasture.

(3) The third woe, vv. 18, 19, is directed against a sort of skepticism which doubts whether God will really punish, and they challenge God to do anything. For cart rope, a slight change would give us "rope of wickedness" (Knobel), which is much better.

(4) The fourth woe, v. 20, is against those who practice sophistry and confound moral distinctions.

(5) The fifth woe, v. 21, is against the self-confident, and is probably aimed at the politicians who suggest policies which the prophet thinks bad for the kingdom.

(6) The sixth woe, vv. 22-24, is against dissolute and unjust judges. To mingle strong drink means to re-enforce the alcoholic strength of wine by adding to it spices (Songs 82) or aromatic herbs, and so set up a secondary fermentation which would make the wine more heady, and so a strong drink. Distillation was then unknown. Judges who were thus befuddled with drink might readily be induced by bribery to declare the wicked acquitted or, on the other hand, to take away the righteousness, that is, to declare guilty the innocent. For this they are to be punished, because they have rejected the "instruction" or the "teaching" (so render law; see mg.) of the Lord.

25-30. An Avenging Nation. This passage, though possible of some interpretation where it stands, makes better sense placed after 104. Isaiah neither collected nor arranged his prophecies, and there is, therefore, no difficulty in supposing that the editor of the book may have misplaced these verses. It must, however, be admitted that they do not seem perfectly to unite with 104. We feel the need of a link, and another supposition suggests itself that something which would have joined them better may have been lost. These verses depict a nation whom Jehovah will bring to put vengeance on his people. In v. 26 the nations should be "a nation," so Amos 614; will hiss—summon them as a bee-keeper does a swarm, with a sort of hissing whistle; in the rest of the passage they should be "he"; i.e., the Assyrian individualized. Horses' hoofs . . . flint; hard hoofs were valuable, as horses were not shod in antiquity; their roaring—their battle cry is compared first to the growls of lions and then to the voice of the sea. (See notes on 98-104.)

CHAPTER VI

Isaiah's Call. Now we come to the glowing chapter which portrays Isaiah's call to the office of prophet. If the book had been arranged with more strict attention to chronological order, this chapter would certainly be placed at the very beginning of the book, and not as the sixth.

1-4. The Vision of Jehovah on His Throne. I saw. There is no other way of describing such an experience than by using figures of speech drawn from experiences of the physical senses. So were called Moses (Ex. 33, 4), Ezekiel (Ezek. 1st.) and the apostle Paul (Acts 9th). God revealed himself to the inner spirit, but man must tell of it in words of the body. It was just as real as though the human eye had seen it. His train filled the temple: His skirts sweep outward and upward and fill all the space, and the awe-stricken prophet looks at them, rather than at the divine form and face. The seraphim—probably winged human figures, for they have hands, feet, and voice, and they somewhat resemble the cherubim (Ezek. 15-14). Holy, holy, holy, the words thrice repeated for emphasis; to Isaiah the word "holy" has come to have a great moral meaning which it did not have in earlier times, and for him God, Jehovah, is the Holy One of Israel. So does the progressive revelation move onward. Smoke—here means the "cloud" that often accompanies theophanies (Ex. 14th 40th Ezek. 10th).

5-8. Effect of the Vision on Isaiah. Isaiah feels himself to be a sinful man, member of a sinful nation. He feels that he dare not address God to pray for his people. Then one of the seraphim touches his lips with a glowing coal and he is cleansed by fire. Immediately he hears God's voice, and for the first time. God has work to be done, and at once after his purification Isaiah is ready to undertake it. He receives his message, and it is his duty to declare it to the sinful people.

9-13. Effects of the Message. The message is a dreadful one. They are not to be healed. They are to hear and see. They are to listen to God's message as Isaiah declares it, but they will not be moved by it. They will be blinder than ever; hardened, not softened. The nation is to be exterminated as a terebinth, as an oak. But when a tree is felled there remains a stump, and this may sprout again. The last clause—so the holy seed is the stock thereof—is wanting in the LXX, and most scholars regard it as a later addition. But there is this to be said for it, that it accords well with Isaiah's doctrine of the remnant. For the present at least, and unless and until more cogent reasons for its rejection are brought forward, we shall do well to retain it.

CHAPTER VII

1-9. Isaiah's Interview with Ahaz. The chapter belongs to the period of the Syro-Ephraimitic war, 735-734 B.C., concerning which there is a historical account in the introduction (p. 633a). The first verse comes from 2 Kings 16th. The meeting with Ahaz is also described there, and a hint is given concerning the contempt which Isaiah felt for Rezon and Pekah, these two tails of smoking fire brands (v. 4), which means that they were only fire-brands now flickering out. They are planning to take Jerusalem, as Isaiah well knows, and he even understands the plan so completely as to be able to name the man whom they intend to make king of Judah. The son of Tabeal (v. 6), or, rather, Tabeel, is some obscure adventurer. The name is Syrian, i.e., as we should say, Aramæan, and this shows that the men of Rezon were the leaders over the men of Israel. They could dispose of the future of Judah, if the war was successful. Sixty-five years (v. 8); these words are most probably an annotation or gloss by some later writer. The prophets do not usually deal in such precisely dated predictions. If ye will not believe, etc. The words in Hebrew are a beautifully expressed play or paronomasia. ("Gläubet ihr nicht, so bleibet ihr nicht," so Luther; "if ye will not have faith, ye shall not have staith," so G. A. Smith.) The king must accept God's word as given through Isaiah. "By the soul only is the nation great and free."

10-17. The Sign of Immanuel. In confirmation of the truth of his revelation of God Isaiah offers any sign that Ahaz may desire. Ahaz refuses the sign, fearful of committing himself to some change of policy. But Isaiah goes straight on with the sign. The passage is immensely difficult to interpret, and no absolute certainty or generally accepted explanation has even yet been secured. There is not space here for a discussion pro and con. It is possible only to express a cautious opinion. First of all, it must be said that the Hebrew word almâh may mean "virgin," but does not necessarily mean anything more than a young woman of marriageable age. Had the prophet intended specifically and precisely to say "virgin," he must have used the word bethûlâh, though even then there would be a faint shade of uncertainty. Leaving this then, on one side, what remains means that a child will be born, with the great name Immanuel, i.e., "God with us." He shall have butter and honey, the best foods of the land, and will not know poverty. Then, before he is two or three years old, the joint land of Syria and Israel will be destroyed, and the danger of Judah will be past. But now who was this mysterious Immanuel? The present writer believes that he was the personal Messiah, and here is his first appearance in prophecy. He is the same person who reappears in chs. 9 and 11. Ahaz is a poor king; this one will be the true King. Isaiah, of course, has his chronology all wrong, but so do the prophets regularly. He expects the Messiah to come to meet the issue then present, or the Assyrian danger. That was wrong in time, but the thought is sound in principle. There will be no hope for Judah, or for any other people, until the true King comes. He did come, but not for seven hundred years, and he was far greater than Isaiah dreamed. Both Skinner and Gray, in commenting on ch. 7, give a number of different interpretations of 7¹⁴, which the student should read.

18-25. Four Pictures. The pictures portray the devastation wrought by the hostile army: Flies and bees; the hired razor; reduction of the population to the pastoral life of the desert; thorns and thistles.

CHAPTER VIII

1-18. The Refusal of Isaiah's Counsel. The prophet failed to influence the king, and the mad policy of reliance on the Assyrians went forward. Isaiah took the case to the people. He prepared a great tablet and wrote plainly on it the enigmatic words, Maher-shalal-hash-baz, i.e., "haste-spoil, speed-booty," and then within a year Isaiah's wife bore him a son, to whom this was given as a name. There was therefore a twofold sign, and the prophet interpreted it by saying that before the child could speak its first words, "father," "mother," i.e., within a year, Damascus and Samaria would be taken by the Assyrians. And in due time Judah also shall likewise suffer. The words to Ahaz, the sign Immanuel, the mystical name of the son, all failed to convince either king or people, and it was as clear as noonday that in a really sharp test on a great occasion Isaiah had failed. Isaiah could do no other than declare solemnly that the issue was certain, the land would go down before the Assyrians. For the prophet himself it would be idle, under those conditions, to continue his public ministry. He therefore withdrew, and among a company of his pupils he put into their minds, hearts, and hands a statement of his message (vv. 16-18). This is extremely significant and important, and has been already discussed in the introduction (p. 638a).

19-22. Three Fragments of Prophetic Teaching. (Including also 9¹.) These are addressed to Isaiah's pupils, or through them to the people. Vv. 19, 20 are a sharp rebuke against "spiritism." There are not wanting other warnings against those who practiced, or believed in, the bringing of the dead back to earth, for these practices were common at many periods in Hebrew history. Isaiah would have the people turn for instruction rather to the Scriptures or to the prophetic teaching. Vv. 21, 22 picture a man traversing a lonely desert who loses hope, curses God and king, and so condemns himself to death. 9¹ portrays the recovery of Zebulun and Naphtali which had their ravaging at the hands of Tiglathpileser in 734 B.C.

CHAPTER IX

1. See under 8¹⁹⁻²².

2-7. The Ideal King. Here is one of the noblest and most beautiful, most moving passages in Holy Scripture. No criticism, however severe, has ever been able to diminish its luster, or lessen its appeal. The content is simple even in its grandeur of expression. It begins with an introduction calling on the people to rejoice over the happiness of a new day, and the reason is then given. The better day is coming in the person of an ideal King of Israel, who is described in verses poetical and beautiful. He will reign in peace, and the very implements of war will be destroyed. He will be royal indeed, possessing dominion, and that practical wisdom so highly esteemed in the Orient (Wonderful Counsellor, mg.). In some peculiar sense, not easy to define, he is called Mighty God, but the meaning and content must not be whittled down. It means much more than mighty in war. It implies some divine quality or character, and the person so defined is no mere man, as, indeed, the next clause implies, for he is there called Everlasting Father, and that means that he does not die or cease to care for his people as do mortal kings—a thought re-enforced in v. 7, which describes his peace as without end. The passage may thus be translated and arranged in verse form:

2. The people that were walking in darkness
Have seen a great light;
They that dwell in deep darkness,
On them hath light shone.
3. Thou hast multiplied the nation,
Thou hast increased the joy;
They joy before thee as men joy at harvest,
As they rejoice when they divide the spoil.
4. For the yoke of his burden,
And the staff about his shoulder,
The rod of his oppressor,
Hast thou broken as in the day of Midian.

5. For every boot worn in tumult [of battle]
And every garment rolled in blood
Shall be for burning,
For fuel of the fire.
6. For unto us a child is born,
Unto us a son is given,
And dominion is upon his shoulder;
And his name is called—
Wonderful Counsellor,
Mighty God,
A Father for ever,
Prince of Peace.
7. Great is his dominion,
And endless the peace
Upon the throne of David
And throughout his dominion,
To establish it and support it
In justice and righteousness
From henceforth and forever:
The zeal of Jehovah of Hosts will do this.

In all the literature of antiquity, whether Occident or Orient, there is nothing to match this. (See notes on 111¹⁻⁹.)

8-21. The Doom of Ephraim. (Including also 101⁴.) Following sharply on this beautiful passage of peace is a long passage of doom for Ephraim, comprised in 98-104 525-30. It is highly poetical in arrangement, much more than in any other part of Isaiah, and is divided into sections ending at 912, 17, 21 104 and 525 with the repeated refrain, For all this his anger is not turned away, but his hand is stretched out still. There has been much difference of opinion as to whether the passage relates to events already past, or is a prediction of serious events yet to come. It is, on the whole, much better to think that it was delivered shortly before the Syro-Ephraimitic war and to be a looking forward down the heavy years toward a complete fulfillment in 721 B.C. in the destruction of Samaria by the Assyrians. The burden of it is a complaint that Israel has learned nothing from her past experience, whether in war or in the severities of nature as displayed, e.g., in a severe earthquake (v. 10, with which we may compare Amos 11). What is to happen to Israel for this obdurate refusal to learn her lesson and abandon her sins is not made very clear, but in vv. 18-21 we catch a hint of civil war, and in 101⁴ we see the oft repeated charge of maladministration of justice of which Amos and others of the prophets made serious complaint. Then follows very well the passage 526-30 in which is pictured God as calling up the Assyrians from the end of the earth to punish his willful people. (See notes on 525-30.)

CHAPTER X

1-4. See notes on 98-21.

5-27. Oracles Against Assyria. Written somewhere between 717 and 701 B.C., these oracles form together a remarkable philosophy of history. Assyria has been used by God to punish his own people, as in the destruction of Samaria in 721, but has quite failed to understand her mission and its limitations. She has ascribed her victories to her own prowess, and looks upon her achievements as proof that her gods are superior to the God of Israel whose people she has humiliated and destroyed nationally. God is therefore compelled to vindicate himself by destroying this proud power, and Judah shall be spared. The Assyrians, under Sennacherib, will come, but Jehovah will break their power, and the splendid words are pronounced,

"His burden shall depart from upon thy shoulder,
And his yoke shall cease from upon thy neck"
(v. 27).

28-34. A Description of the Invading Assyrian. In these verses is contained a rhythmical account of the progress of an invading Assyrian army, though it is not intended to represent the exact route which such a force would take, nor, indeed, that which Sennacherib did take. At the very end of v. 27 there are three words in Hebrew which should probably be read, He is gone up from before Rimmon, which is about ten miles north of Jerusalem. Thence he goes forward, as place after place is named and often with a play (paronomasia) on the village names, until Geba is reached, only six miles from the capital. Then follows the ominous inference that he will soon fall upon Jerusalem. In vv. 33, 34 there is a short oracle, which did not form part originally of the preceding, but is happily enough placed here by the editor. Jehovah smites down the invader, just when he is ready to spring at Jerusalem. The destruction of the Assyrian is likened most picturesquely to the fall of a forest.

CHAPTER XI

1-9. The Messiah: His Person; His Influence. The world power, Assyria, is destroyed, and the prophet now returns to the Messiah, and his kingdom, following up and linking it with 92-7. In that passage there is a sort of world-view first; and only then does the majestic figure of the Messiah appear, but in this passage the Messiah appears at the very beginning, standing out in the forefront. The Messiah comes forth from the house of Jesse, as a shoot, and as a branch bearing fruit. Then at once his supernatural qualities are portrayed, as the Spirit of Jehovah rests upon him.

"The spirit of wisdom and discernment,
The spirit of counsel and might,
The spirit of knowledge and of the fear of Jehovah" (v. 2).

With these endowments he will judge men as no earthly king has ever done. He shall have no need of earthly guidance by the sight of his eyes or the hearing of his ears, but as he is the "Wonderful Counsellor" (96) he will of himself know how to judge. In v. 4 the text should be corrected, not he shall smite the earth, but, rather, "he shall smite the oppressor." Then follows in vv. 6-8 a most beautiful idyllic picture of the restoration of paradise among the animals. The wild animals are not destroyed, but their nature is changed. Man is not a creature apart; he belongs to the creation and so do the animals both wild and tame. Here in these beautiful figures we have a serious effort to show that in the Messianic Age it will not merely be man who is redeemed but the whole creation. This same conception carries over beautifully into the N.T. (Rom. 8:19-22).

10-16. A Prophecy of the Return from Exile. There is to be formed a great new Messianic people, to whom shall come God's scattered people from distant lands, Assyria, Egypt, and others. No such dispersion appeared near to Isaiah's time, but it did occur after the fall of Jerusalem in 586 B.C. It is perhaps not impossible that Isaiah could have foreseen this, but if we judge by analogy of Isaiah himself and of the other early prophets, who were engaged with the near, not with the remote, there is a strong presumption amounting almost to a certainty that these verses come from some later prophet. They are, at any rate, more easily explained on that supposition. In vv. 15, 16 the allusions are plainly to Israel's deliverance from Egypt at the time of the Exodus. Then the forces of nature, e.g., the wind (read east for scorching), are used by Jehovah, but in this passage there is to be a miraculous change in even the earth's surface, and the returning exiles will march homeward as upon a great highway.

CHAPTER XII

This chapter contains two songs: (1) vv. 1, 2; and (2) vv. 3-6, which are to be sung by the ransomed people, even as did Israel in early days sing (Ex. 15) when delivered from Egypt.

CHAPTERS 13 TO 23: PROPHECIES AGAINST NATIONS HOSTILE TO ISRAEL AND JUDAH

The Fall of Babylon. The section, 13¹-14²³, consists of two pieces quite distinct in manner, namely 13²⁻²², which predicts the capture and plundering of Babylon by the Medes, and 14⁴⁻²¹, an ode of triumph to be sung by the Jews in celebration of the downfall of their enemy; and these two are rather loosely united by a few verses (14^{1-4a}) in a different rhythm. The background of the whole passage is very clearly Babylon, and so evidently the editor understood. As we have been seeing, the background of the labors of Isaiah is Assyria, and not Babylon. When Isaiah lived and preached, Babylon was a province of the Assyrian Empire, and was little in the mind of the peoples of western Asia. In these oracles, on the contrary, Babylon is at the center of the stage. It is as clear as anything can be in ancient literature that these are the words not of Isaiah but of some later prophet. They were presumably written about 550 B.C., and Babylon did not fall until 538 B.C.

CHAPTER XIII

Capture of Babylon. It is unfortunate that the old translation burden (v. 1) should be retained in the R.V. The Hebrew word is Massa, the root of which means "to lift up," and the application of the meaning of the root is to the lifting up of the voice. It were better translated "oracle," or even "address," or "speech," or "sermon." The passage begins with a highly poetical, even ornate description of the preparations for the attack, and soon passes into the very plain but still poetic description of Babylon, desolated and deserted, as was, indeed, the case after 538 B.C.; there to be left lying until revealed by modern excavations.

CHAPTER XIV

See introductory paragraph to chs. 13, 14.

1-4a. The opening verses to 4a constitute an editorial link which quite successfully introduces the great pæan of praise, which begins in v. 4b with the words, How hath the oppressor ceased.

4b-23. The Pæan of Praise for Babylon's Fall. What follows is finely done and full of music. Very interesting is v. 8, in which the very trees rejoice at their deliverance, as well they might, for it is a common boast of both Assyrian and Babylonian kings that they cut down trees, sometimes to be used in their own building operations, but at other times out of sheer wantonness, or to impoverish the conquered. In v. 12 the R.V. unnecessarily changes the translation "Lucifer" to day star. It means literally, "shining one," and the old word "Lucifer" fits it beautifully. The conclusion in vv. 22, 23 is scarcely worthy of the preceding; it is prosy and without color.

24-32. Two Poetic Fragments. These two fragments undoubtedly come from Isaiah himself, the first (vv. 24-27) portraying the destruction of Assyria, the second (vv. 28-32) Philistia. They have nothing to do with the Babylonian prophecies which have just passed before our eyes, and may well have been written by Isaiah in the early days of Sennacherib's reign.

CHAPTERS XV, XVI

Prophecies Against Moab. Here are two chapters of so many difficulties both in text and interpretation that it is impossible, and likewise unnecessary, to attempt to deal with them in a commentary like this. They have little religious importance and their study may, for the greater part, be left to students who have time and patience and opportunity to consult the larger critical commentaries. For present purposes it suffices to say that there are notes of prediction in 15⁹ and in 16¹², but all the rest reads like an elegy over destruction and desolation already accomplished, or still in progress. In 16^{13,14} there is an epilogue which sounds quite like Isaiah in tone and force and quality, but all that precedes is quite unlike his utterance. It is worth noting that much of this elegy has an interesting parallel in Jer. 48, whose subject is the same and in which much appears almost literally. To explain this there remains only the conjecture that Isaiah and Jeremiah may both be using some earlier prophet whose message concerned Moab. But our present knowledge does not permit us the right to any dogmatic assertion about the problem.

CHAPTER XVII

1-11. The Coming Overthrow of Damascus and of Israel. Here we return to the words of Isaiah. To appreciate this prophecy fully in its historic setting it should be read immediately after the prediction which ends at 10⁴ and before ch. 7. It must have been uttered about 735 B.C., or slightly before that date. The chapter is fairly clear as to meaning in the English version and for our purpose needs little annotation, a few words only requiring elucidation. The fortress (v. 3) means the kingdom of Damascus which served as a buffer state to hold the Assyrians from direct attack upon Ephraim; vv. 4-6 describe the destruction of Ephraim, under figures of the wasting of disease, the reaping of grain and the gathering of olives. The valley of Rephaim (v. 5), which means "valley of giants," lay south of Jerusalem. The Asherim (v. 8) were wooden poles, representing female deities and commonly set up near Canaanite altars. Sun images is a very dubious translation of the Hebrew hammanim, the exact meaning of which is not known. They may have been stone or metal images to honor or represent gods of some kind. Pleasant plants (v. 10) seems to be an allusion to a custom in Greece of setting out pots of earth sown with grain or flower seeds, which matured quickly but perished as quickly. The prophet uses this to declare that all the reliance on foreign gods will bring no harvest.

12-14. Overthrow of the Assyrian Army. A pretty little poem by Isaiah describing the onset by many peoples in the contingents of the Assyrian army come to attack Jerusalem, only to be suddenly overwhelmed by Jehovah. It probably was written about 701 B.C., at the time of Sennacherib.

CHAPTER XVIII

Prophecy Concerning Ethiopia. Here is another very difficult chapter, the general meaning of which seems to be that messengers have come to Judah from Ethiopia, whose mission probably was to induce Judah to unite with other states in a conspiracy to throw off the Assyrian yoke. They were sent away empty, for Judah relied upon Jehovah. The rustling or whirring wings (v. 1) means locusts or other insects.

CHAPTER XIX

An Oracle Concerning Egypt. This is another difficult chapter. Jehovah will ride upon a cloud into Egypt, and punish it sorely by bringing about civil war. The chapter divides into two parts, vv. 1-15 and vv. 18-25, with vv. 16, 17 as connecting verses. In the first section the wrath of Jehovah and his fearful judgments will desolate the land. The Egyptian religion will collapse, and the people deprived of its hopes and illusions will plunge into civil war, which will end in a despotism. Then physical calamities will ensue (vv. 5-10), for the Nile will dry up and with it will end all prosperity, or even tolerable existence. The traditional wisdom of the Egyptians will fail (vv. 11-15), and the whole land will tremble under its load of misfortunes. All this prepares the way for the Egyptians to turn trembling unto Jehovah, and in vv. 18-25 we have a succession of cases in which the Egyptians will turn completely to Jehovah, and then there will be a great highway from Assyria to Egypt, and with Israel these will form a sort of triple alliance which shall bring great blessings to mankind. The first fifteen verses are clearly enough by Isaiah. The second section is also very probably his, though it would appear to belong to a later day. It is, however, not possible to date either with any assurance.

CHAPTER XX

Egypt and Ethiopia Will be Conquered by Assyria. This chapter is different in at least one respect from anything else in the book. Isaiah went naked, that is half clad, like a beggar, hither and yon through Judah for three years to call attention to his message. His message was that no help could be derived from Egypt and Ethiopia to get rid of Assyrian domination. On the contrary, these would themselves be conquered by the Assyrians. The date of the chapter is certain from the mention in the first verse of Sargon, and his attack upon Ashdod. We have learned from Sargon's own inscriptions that this was 711 B.C. (see intro., p. 633b). Isaiah was perfectly right in his thesis that Egypt would be conquered by the Assyrians, but the event did not come as early as he apparently expected. Egypt was first conquered by Esarhaddon in 672 B.C. The prophets are often mistaken in locating great oncoming events too soon. (See notes on 710-17.) But the main contention of Isaiah was sound. No help for Judah in escaping from Assyrian rule could come from Egypt or Ethiopia.

CHAPTER XXI

1-10. Oracle Concerning Babylon. This probably refers to the capture of Babylon by Cyrus in 538 B.C., and is therefore from some prophet later than Isaiah. Whoever he may have been he has a visionary way of describing the events which his prophetic sense expects. He depicts Elam and Media as uniting in a siege of Babylon; both of these were already dominions of Cyrus when he took Babylon, and the prophet sees the fate of the city with anxious care and much sympathy, which is an attitude not common among prophets or people in Judah. In v. 7 he describes the onset of the Persians by mentioning chariot, asses and camels, all employed, as we know, by the Persians in war. The epithets in v. 10 apply to Israel trodden down by Babylon.

11, 12. Oracle Concerning Edom. Dumah was a place name, but is here only a play on the name of Edom. The oracle itself is a quaint and curious bit of prophetic teaching, probably from the same period as the preceding and perhaps by the same writer. Though so very brief, it yet seems to be complete. From Sar there comes a cry, whether imaginative or real, asking for news about the future. The Babylonians have oppressed Edom. What hope is there? Will there come a better morning? The answer is intentionally ambiguous. The morning comes. Aye, and so does the night. The questioner receives no assurance, but is told to come again and inquire later. Perhaps he will then get a more definite answer.

13-17. Oracle Concerning Arabia. There is first a vision (vv. 13-15); a caravan of merchant traders from Dedan, overtaken by war, are turned from their way and are helped with food by the people of Tema. Then comes (vv. 16, 17) the interpretation of the vision. Kedar, a tribe of Ishmaelites (Gen. 25¹³), and representative of the peoples south and east of the Jordan and in northern Arabia, are to be punished by Jehovah's will. This prophecy probably belongs to the same period as its two predecessors.

CHAPTER XXII

1-14. The Sin of Jerusalem. Here the prophet rises to a threatening scarcely anywhere else approached in all his ministry. It is Isaiah himself who is preaching. He sees Jerusalem gay and light-hearted rejoicing over an assumed deliverance. It is the day of Sennacherib. He has raised the siege of Jerusalem and the populace is mad with joy, and has no power to take thought of the disgrace of Judah, overrun by Sennacherib's army, and left in misery. But the prophet can only see the city once more besieged (vv. 5-7). Then there follows very abruptly (vv. 8-11) an account of a previous experience in which the people defended their city, but gave no thought to their God. The prophet takes the religious view of history. Without God, and the recognition of his hand, there can be no hope for the future. Then comes the dreadful threat (vv. 12-14). They are still full of unbelief. They are satisfied with the moment. They eat and drink and take no thought. Jehovah has made it known to Isaiah that there will be no forgiveness for these deeds. Surely this iniquity shall not be forgiven you (see mg.) till ye die.

15-25. Denunciation of Shebna and the Promotion of Eliakim. This is the only place in which Isaiah attacks an individual. Shebna was governor of the palace, a sort of major domo. He has been supposed by some moderns to have been a foreigner, but the evidence is insufficient, and he may have been only an upstart. Isaiah evidently disliked him intensely. It may be assumed that he represented the Egyptian party, and Isaiah would certainly have found in this an occasion against him. He denounces him in violent language. He will be deposed and banished (vv. 15-19). In his place Eliakim will be appointed (vv. 20-23) and unto great power and honor will he come. But now comes a difficulty, for it is predicted in unmistakable fashion that Eliakim will fall (vv. 24, 25). This appendix must surely have been delivered later, after Eliakim had been tried in office and found wanting.

CHAPTER XXIII

Oracle Concerning Tyre. This chapter divides naturally into two parts: (1) vv. 1-14, a poem in three strophes concerning the great Phœnician cities, especially Tyre and Sidon, describing their destruction as something that had already taken place; (2) vv. 15-18, an appendix in prose, except for a snatch of song in v. 16, announcing the restoration of Tyre after seventy years. In the poem the ships of Tyre, which have sailed the whole length of the Mediterranean Sea, and out upon the Atlantic to Tarshish at the mouth of the Guadalquivir River, and are returning homeward bound, have called at the land of Chittim, which is the island of Cyprus named for the people who lived in its chief city, Kition. After leaving there they learn of the desolation of their home city, Tyre. Then the prophet addresses the inhabitants of Phœnicia, and mentions her sources of prosperity. Sihor (Shihor) probably means Egypt, though this is not quite certain; but we do certainly know that Tyre carried on a trade in grain between Egypt and various Mediterranean ports. Egypt will be sorry for the news about Tyre, and so also will Tarshish, to which the peoples of Phœnicia are warned to flee. Tyre is indeed a glorious city, well called the crowning city, as she had founded cities like Kition, Carthage, and Tarshish, each with a king of its own. The following verses to the end of 12 are plain enough, but v. 13 is quite hopeless. The text is in disorder and no conjecture satisfactorily solves the problem. The ordinary reader will do well to skip over it and leave it to the disputes of scholars. The date of vv. 1-14 is very doubtful. It may refer to the attack upon Tyre by Shalmaneser (727-722 B.C.), who is said to have besieged the city five years, or to the siege by Sennacherib in the expedition of 701 B.C. This only is certain, that the destruction of the city did not take place on either occasion, but was long deferred. As has been said before (ch. 20), the prophets frequently went astray on "times and seasons," and it may also be added that they were not mechanically precise in their foresight. They saw many things clearly, but others obscurely. The first fourteen verses are probably by Isaiah, but the appendix, vv. 15-18, is by some later hand. In Ezek. 26-28 may be read the magnificent passage which that great prophet devotes to Tyre.

CHAPTERS 24 TO 27: AN APOCALYPSE OF JUDGMENT ON THE WORLD

In these brilliant chapters we come upon a message different from all that have preceded it. In the twenty-three chapters that precede, whose beginnings are Isaiah's, and also much of their contents, the preaching is concerning definite and limited areas of peoples and countries. It has been the Moabites, Philistines, Israel, Damascus, Judah, and others that the prophet names. Here, on the contrary, his subject is not thus restricted but embraces the whole world. It is not of judgment immediate, but of judgment remote, not of a day of Jehovah, but of the day of Jehovah. We have here, indeed, no longer prophecy as it was preached from Amos to Isaiah, but Apocalypse, a "revealing" of the distant, the remote; its related literary products are Daniel in the O.T. and Revelation in the N.T., though this is not quite the same as they; nevertheless it is moving in their direction, and is not the same as the work of the earlier prophets (see art., Literature of the Intertestamental Period, p. 189). To say this is, however, not to disparage these chapters, for they are in religious importance of high value. "Two great truths in particular, the universality of salvation, and the hope of immortality, stand out with a clearness and boldness of conception nowhere surpassed in the O.T." (Skinner). Enough has already been said to indicate that Isaiah cannot have been the author of these chapters, and it remains only that a swift word be given to the question of their date. The problem is so difficult, complicated by questions of unity also, that it is impossible to do it any justice in a popular commentary. It must suffice to say that chs. 24-27 are certainly later than the book of Job, and must surely go into the Persian period. How much later is ever more dubious. It has even been plausibly argued that they are later than the book of Daniel, that is, later than 165 B.C. The question for present purposes may best be left indefinite. Let us now sketch briefly the progress of the prophetic thought, and now and again try to explain some word that seems at once both difficult yet capable of some elucidation.

CHAPTER XXIV

An Approaching World-Judgment. The whole earth and every form of human society will be doomed (vv. 1-3). The earth is under a fearful curse because of the sins of men, and under this weight all the little pleasures and comforts of mankind vanish (vv. 4-9). Some great unnamed city is to be destroyed, and the whole human race, save for a small remnant, shall perish (10-13). Then suddenly there is a change in the note of despair, for in vv. 14-16 there is a chorus of praise, but it ceases and again (vv. 17-20) the main theme of destruction is resumed and the imagery in the form of floods is so terrible that it must seem as though nothing could survive. Then in vv. 21-23 comes the climax, for Jehovah himself will appear, will vanquish all the powers of evil and take his everlasting throne on Mount Zion.

CHAPTER XXV

A Psalm of Thanksgiving; The Messianic Age; The Destruction of Moab. This chapter is made of three clearly marked sections: (1) It begins with a beautiful psalm of thanksgiving (vv. 1-5), in which Israel celebrates Jehovah's victory over some unknown city. (2) Then vv. 6-8 resume the themes of ch. 24 with a prophecy of the Messianic dispensation under the figure of a feast, to which all nations, and not the Jews only, are invited. Then comes the startling declaration (v. 8) that death is to be swallowed up, or abolished forever. This is the clearest expression of immortality anywhere to be found in all the prophetic literature, and the music of it sounds on and on into the N. T. in 2 Tim. 1¹⁰ 1 Cor. 15⁵⁴ and Rev. 21⁴. (3) After this there is another hymn of praise (vv. 9-12) over the destruction of Moab. This is an odd bit to follow close on the heels of a prophecy of good for all mankind, and the hope of the life to come, and it sounds like some other voice than that of vv. 6-8. At any rate we know of no historic episode which might be the occasion of this outburst against Moab. (See below 2620, 21.)

CHAPTER XXVI

Prayer for Deliverance; Israel is Immortal. The whole Jewish nation now prays to Jehovah for Jerusalem (vv. 1, 2) to be a city of truth and peace, and for the destruction of some hostile city (vv. 5, 6) which is not named. Israel then waits longingly for all of Jehovah's judgments (vv. 8-10), for only so will men learn righteousness everywhere. But (vv. 16-18) Israel has suffered much, and moans her losses; then suddenly, without the slightest warning (v. 19), there bursts on us this thrilling declaration that the grave shall give up their dead, all Israel's dead, or at least the pious in Israel who died before this new day shall again come forth, awake and ready to sing. Then the chapter ends (vv. 20, 21) with two verses that would be better set with the beginning of ch. 27, and carry us back to 25⁸. In these the people are bidden to hide until all evils and punishments are past and the Messianic age has begun.

CHAPTER XXVII

Climax of the Apocalypse of Judgment. Ch. 27 marks the end of this great apocalyptic prophecy. In v. 1 we have Jehovah executing judgment upon all the ungodly nations, under the figure of slaying leviathan. This poetical figure comes out of ancient Babylonian mythology, whose figures swept widely over the world and were worked up as metaphors by the poets. After this there follows a song (vv. 2-6) of Jehovah concerning his vineyard, but it is vague and difficult, nor in any way easy to bring into relation with the context. The final note (vv. 12, 13) is of the restoration of God's people. The first of these verses may be partially paraphrased and partially translated thus: "Jehovah will thresh out the grain from the ears of grain from the River, that is, the Euphrates, to the brook of Egypt, that is, the Wady el Arish." These were the two ancient ideal limits of Palestine. The meaning is that over all that territory Jehovah will separate carefully the grain from the chaff and the straw, i.e., he will separate the true Israelites from apostates or from heathen neighbors. Then (v. 13) at the blast of a trumpet the exiles will come from all lands, and worship the Lord on Jerusalem's holy mount.

CHAPTERS 28 TO 32: PROPHECIES DEALING WITH THE RELATION OF JUDAH TO EGYPT AND ASSYRIA

From the distant future we come back to historic days; from the vast universe and its problems to Israel and Judah; from the apocalypses of chs. 24-27 to the straightforward and limited prophecies of Isaiah himself. These prophecies range in point of time down as far as the invasion of Sennacherib, 701 B.C., but the first four verses in ch. 28 were delivered sometime between 725 and 722 B.C., i.e., before the fall of Samaria.

CHAPTER XXVIII

1-13. Denunciation of the Drunkards of Ephraim and of Jerusalem. Debauchery will destroy Samaria, the crown of pride of Ephraim. Then suddenly, in vv. 5, 6, the prophet turns from that gloomy picture to a gleam of light and joy, a brief Messianic prophecy. The fall of Samaria will come soon, but the coming of the Messiah's age is in that day, i.e., it is indefinite. In vv. 7-13 Isaiah turns to his own people of Judah to give a solemn warning. The dissipation once common in Samaria is now found also in Jerusalem. He denounces the stupid drunkards who are plotting a rebellion against Assyria, and in a sort of dialogue they respond scoffingly to him that they are sick of his dull preachments, line upon line. But he flings back the sarcasm into their teeth, declaring that Jehovah will soon speak to them.

14-22. A Solemn Warning. He warns against the irreligious temper of those who declare flippantly that they have made a covenant with death in their proposed or already perfected alliance with Egypt. But the prophet knows that the only sure foundation is in Jehovah's purpose toward his people, and that all other forms of refuge will be swept away.

23-29. A Parable. The figures are drawn from agricultural life. Fitches should be "vetches," or black cummin, Nigella sativa, whose seeds were used to flavor bread. The wisdom and skill of the farmer are a faint semblance of God's wisdom in his plans.

CHAPTER XXIX

The Imminent Danger of Jerusalem; The Peace of the Messianic Age. Jerusalem is addressed under the mystical name Ariel, which means "altar hearth," and is so addressed because there was the great altar of burnt sacrifice. But to the prophet this place of bloody sacrifice is only a symbol of the bloody sacrifice of the whole city. Yet in the very moment of the enemy's triumph Jehovah appears and the enemies disappear as a dream (vv. 1-8). But though thus spared the city is full of blindness and unbelief (vv. 9-14) and Jehovah will be compelled to adopt tremendous measures. Hereupon there follows (vv. 15-24) another Messianic prediction. The conspirators have concealed from the prophet their Egyptian plans, and this is a rebellion against God. He will work a transformation in nature and in society. The glorious age that will then begin will be free of scoffing and of injustice and the true religion will come into its own.

CHAPTER XXX

A Series of Oracles Against the Egyptian Policy. This policy has been foreshadowed in ch. 29 but now comes out fair and square. The embassy to Egypt is already on its way and the prophet knows that it is folly, for no reliance can be placed on Egypt. In vv. 8-17 the prophet carries out the injunction laid upon him to write down his message in permanent form that it may endure for ever and ever. There will come a fearful disaster upon the people through this bad policy. Gladly does the prophet turn from this to another Messianic prophecy (vv. 18-26), in which there is predicted a return of the people to their God, with the disappearance of idolatry and a great change even in the face of nature. This passage strongly reminds us of 29¹⁵⁻²⁴.

CHAPTER XXXI

A Return to the Problem of the Egyptian Alliance. There can be no real help from Egypt, for the Egyptians are only men; from God alone can come deliverance (vv. 1-4). And God will really save Jerusalem (vv. 5-9); it is only needful that Israel trust in him, and stand by while he also destroys Assyria.

CHAPTER XXXII

1-8. Another Prophecy of the Messianic Age. In this prophecy the emphasis is upon the ideal Commonwealth which will then be ushered in. Then there will be a just government, public opinion will be cleansed, and there will be a true aristocracy of character.

9-20. An Appeal to the Women of Jerusalem. Here are burning words addressed to the women of Jerusalem who have evidently shown themselves unmoved by former complaints and admonitions of the prophet. At first, he threatens them with the destruction of their city, and bids them give way to mourning over the desolation. Then there will ultimately arise a new world, even the same Messianic world of which he has spoken so often. This is somewhat spoiled in its effect by v. 19, which recurs to a threat of destruction. This verse comes in so awkwardly here that it may perhaps have come improperly from some other part of the prophet's teaching.

CHAPTER XXXIII

Jerusalem's Delivery Out of the Nation's Dire Extremity. The prophecy begins with a prediction of the city's ultimate safety (vv. 1-6) but passes thence to portray the terrible extremity to which it has been reduced (vv. 7-12) and concludes with a description (vv. 13-24) of the effect of Jehovah's interposition upon the sinful and the resultant felicity to the righteous. The situation to which the prophecy belongs seems to be that described in 2 Kings 18¹⁴⁻¹⁷. There Hezekiah seeks to gain deliverance for his capital by promising a heavy tribute to Sennacherib, who the rather insists upon the city's surrender. In a coming day all these miseries will be forgotten, for men will see the king in his beauty, the fierce invader will have vanished away. Even good health will come to the people, and their iniquity, for which all these miseries have been a punishment, will be forgiven. In spite of argument to the contrary the king in his beauty (v. 17) can be none other than the Messiah.

CHAPTERS 34 TO 35: CONTRAST BETWEEN THE DESTINY OF EDOM AND THAT OF ISRAEL

When we begin to read chs. 34 and 35 we are carried once more out of Isaiah's view, for the editor of the book has here introduced prophecies uttered by some unknown messenger of God who was living certainly after the destruction of Jerusalem in 586 B.C., and perhaps even after the Return in 537. His whole tone is different from Isaiah's, as are also his language and his historical allusions.

CHAPTER XXXIV

1-4. A Vivid Description of the Last Judgment. Not only shall the earth utterly perish, but even the heavens shall be rolled together as a scroll. This is certainly apocalyptic and not prophetic in character.

5-17. The Doom of Edom. The rest of the chapter is devoted to Edom, which has always shown hostility to God's people and is therefore to be visited with appalling slaughter and desolation. The land will then be given over to wild beasts, venomous reptiles, and demonlike creatures. It is a horrible passage. In marvelous contrast stands out the next chapter.

CHAPTER XXXV

A Prediction of Happiness and Prosperity. Here is a chapter full of joy and gladness, of hope in fruition, of redemption beyond compare. The imagery is largely derived from Isa. 40^{1f.}, and the language also owes much to the same source. This is intended as a contrast to ch. 34, as a prediction of happiness and prosperity to Israel as against the utter desolation with which the historic enemy of Israel has been threatened. The first two verses describe the desert as blossoming so beautifully as to compare well with the finest and fairest portions of Palestine. The rose is probably the autumn crocus (Colchicum autumnale). The rest of the beautiful chapter is largely a call to the exiles in Babylonia to strengthen one another in faith, and to prepare for the recompense of God, and his salvation. It shall be for all exiles, even for the blind and the deaf who shall find sight and hearing again, while the lame shall leap and the dumb find unloosed tongues. There is in v. 7 a very interesting word translated thirsty ground which is in Hebrew Sharab, appearing again in 49¹⁰ (see mg.), which is now generally supposed to be the same word as the Arabic Serab which means "mirage." On this interpretation, even the mirage shall turn to real water.

CHAPTERS XXXVI—XXXIX

ISAIAH'S ACTIVITY DURING THE REIGN OF HEZEKIAH

We have come to the end of the first part of the book of Isaiah. Here follow chs. 36-39, which are a historical narrative taken from 2 Kings 18¹³⁻²⁰19, where they are discussed, except for 38⁹⁻²⁰, which is discussed below.

CHAPTER 389-20

Hezekiah: His Song of Thanksgiving. This passage, which is not found in the book of Kings, and is not discussed in the commentary on that book, must be here the subject of a brief discussion. It is called The Writing of Hezekiah. Kuenen suggested that one letter be changed in the Hebrew, and that instead of reading Writing we should read "Michtam," a term found in the headings of Psa. 16, 56-60. This was accepted by Marti, and has lately been adopted by Wade. As we have no evidence which enables us to define the word "Michtam," this does not give us any help. Wade tries an explanation by suggesting that "Michtam" perhaps signifies "a golden (that is, choice) poem" (cf. on Psa. 16).

The poem divides naturally into two parts: (1) vv. 10-14, a description of the writer's anguish and despair in the near prospect of death (Skinner); and (2) vv. 15-20, an expression of gratitude for the extension of life. Wade divides at v. 17, calling the first half a prayer and the second a thanksgiving, while Duhm makes it a prayer as a whole. Skinner's solution is preferable. It fits the situation fairly well, but there are no sufficient reasons for supposing it to be an actual composition of Hezekiah. It is absent from Kings, and it has all the air of a liturgical composition of a date considerably or even much later. Its metrical form is irregular, for in vv. 10-12 it is in the Kinah, or elegiac measure, while the rest of it does not so conform. The text is in sad disorder, and this in itself would point to much complicated handling, in being transferred from place to place for liturgical purposes. This indicates a later date than that of Hezekiah, as does also the introduction of Aramaic words among the Hebrew.

In the noontide of my days (v. 10); literally, "the stillness," which the R.V. mg. gives as "tranquility." Hezekiah would now be about thirty-nine years old. The residue of my years, perhaps refers to the time until the age of seventy. I shall not see the Lord (v. 11), is a reflection based on the widespread idea of the O.T. that in this life, and not after death, is the true scene of communion with God. This is the reason for the horror of the O.T. saints for death and Sheol. There they could not know God as they knew him here. (See v. 18 below and cf. Psa. 885.) The beautiful figures (v. 12) of the shepherd's tent, so easily taken down, and of the weaver rolling up the carpet he has woven and so concealing its pattern or figures, well picture the transitory nature of human life. From day even to night means "within twenty-four hours." I quieted myself (v. 13), and the mg., I thought, are neither quite satisfactory; by a conjectural restoration we might translate "I cried out"; but it is doubtful. The breaking of bones is a figure for pain. Vv. 15, 16 as the text now stands are almost hopelessly difficult. Speculation is in this place idle and, on the whole, the best thing to do is boldly to follow Duhm's conjectural restoration, hazardous though conjectures always are, and read:

"What shall I speak and say to him—for he has done it;
I must toss to and fro all my sleeping hours because of bitterness of soul;
Lord, of this doth my heart make mention of thee,
Give rest to my spirit and recover me."

In v. 18 we come again upon the point noted above that Sheol spoke no hope to the ancient days of the Hebrews. In the end of the verse is the word truth, but the LXX reads thy mercy, or thy loving kindness, which seems preferable. V. 20 seems very clearly not to belong to the psalm but to be a liturgical appendix, intimating that the psalm was used in religious services, accompanied by instruments. The plural form we will sing supports this, and the instruments used are supposed to be stringed. This is, unfortunately, not quite certain. Our knowledge of the ancient Hebrew instruments is very limited. It may here be noted that vv. 21, 22 are misplaced. In the book of Kings they appear in their proper place, 2 Kings 207.

CHAPTERS 40 TO 55: THE SECOND PART OF THE BOOK OF ISAIAH

When the reader of Isaiah has come to the end of ch. 35, if he passes over the historical chs. 36–39 without reading them and proceeds at once to read ch. 40, he must be impressed with a marked difference. He would feel this still more if he had wisely read aloud some of the first thirty-five chapters. This would be especially noticeable if he would read chs. 32 and 33 aloud and then pass at once to ch. 40. He might then read bravely on until the end of ch. 55 were reached. He would by this time know, if his mind were really alert as well as open to conviction, that chs. 40–55 are not like chs. 1–33, but belong to quite a different historical situation, present another message to meet it, and presumably contain the preaching of another man. Such, at any rate, is now the common view of those who have studied most deeply and have meditated longest over this noble and impressive portion of Holy Scripture.

The reasons for this conclusion are many, some of them technical in character and requiring for their understanding a knowledge of the Hebrew language; while others are subtle, delicate, and dependent upon a wide knowledge of prophecy and its ways, which could only be secured from long years of reading and weighing of the prophetic books of all the other prophets; and yet others grow out of historical situations whose complete understanding requires a knowledge of ancient history only possible to those who have access to that extensive literature made available within the last fifty or sixty years by the unearthing of ancient cities and the decipherment of the records buried within them. A popular book cannot present all these various sides with any semblance of completeness, with any approach to thoroughness. The merest outlines may here be cautiously set down. The reader who would satisfy an inquiring mind must be asked to betake him to the elaborate critical commentaries whose titles and authors have already been named.

The arguments may then be simply classified, not characterized or completely worked out, under the following heads:

Style and Language. This is a subtle and delicate matter, and too much should not be made of it. Even in the English translation, however, the thoughtful and observant reader will notice a difference which he might find difficult to define, but may easily feel. If he now also commanded the use of Hebrew and set himself to examine the vocabulary he would quickly perceive that he who wrote chs. 40–55 had certain words and phrases much in use which appear seldom or not at all in chs. 1–35. He would, e.g., find the word for "righteousness" about seventeen times in the second part and only four or five times in the first. He would note a word for "work, reward," five times in the second and not at all in the first. He would discover a peculiar word to express the negative eight times in the second and not at all in the first, and a word meaning "also" or something allied to that, no less than twenty-two times in the first and not at all in the second. Such examples as these might be almost indefinitely extended. But when all were enumerated we should still be left with many indications more important yet far less easy to evaluate. We should certainly, if we read often enough and with sustained attention, feel marked differences in tone and method. The tremendous energy of the first part contrasts with a certain solemn beauty often sinking down into a deep and moving pathos, and running away again into duplications of phrase and descriptive repetition.

Religious and Theological Ideas. Much greater weight is to be attached to these ideas than to the foregoing points. Here we are in two quite different ways of apprehending and describing God and his relations to man. In the first part, e.g., we have the Messianic King, but in the second his place is taken by the Suffering Servant. The first insists continually on the Remnant who shall return, and this fills a great rôle, only to be but faintly present in the second. The second rises to great heights of eloquence in portraying the incomparableness of God, the universal Creator, the omnipresent Ruler. Much of this is indeed implicit in the first part, but is not so plainly and explicitly declared. So might we go on as do the great commentators to display differences which clearly suggest—if, indeed, they do not absolutely prove—the hand of another and different writer.

The Historical Background. Here we come to the most potent argument of all. There is no dispute that the chs. 40-55 deal with the human figures and with the political situation which obtained among the Jews in Babylonia during the Captivity which extended from 586 to 537 B.C. The writer places himself among the exiles, associates himself with their hopes rather than their fears, and endeavors to bring them out of a dull despondency into a new and living faith. In ch. 41 he touches for the first time clearly upon that historical situation. But he is soon much more clearly indicating it. For he portrays Cyrus as a world figure—nay, a world conqueror—and in 44²⁴-45²⁵ there is a whole series of oracles dealing with the mission and work of Cyrus. Now, it was at one time energetically argued that it was Isaiah of Jerusalem who wrote this, having foreseen nearly two hundred years earlier the rise of Cyrus, and the meaning of his work. This argument seems latterly to be but little brought forward, and great names in biblical learning are no longer attached to it. The reason is simple. There is nowhere else in the prophetic literature any parallel to this. The prophets did, indeed, predict future events, but not events anything like so remote from their own day. Their messages were to the men who were before them as they spoke, and the future events with which they had to do were those nearly at hand. Amos preaching about 760 B.C. can predict an Assyrian invasion which occurred within thirty years, for it might come and did come within the lifetime of those who heard him. Such in a general way was the method of all the early prophets. They did, indeed, predict a Messiah and his age, which was remote, but this is a wholly different matter and is related to their connection of his person and work with the need of their own day. If Isaiah foresaw Cyrus, it must be admitted that this is a unique case in prophecy; and once that is conceded the whole argument breaks down before the facts and characteristics of prophecy everywhere exhibited. There is no advantage for prophecy in maintaining a proposition so strange. Every principle of the work and influence of revelation can the better be attained by the admission of another prophet, to whom these chapters belong. We may call him the Second Isaiah if we will, or leave his name even thus undefined, and as completely unknown as time and conditions have demanded. On this conclusion the exposition which follows is based for chs. 45-55. As to chs. 56-66 there will be a word of comment when we reach these chapters.

CHAPTER XL

1-11. The Prologue. This introduces the great theme which in one way or another fills the whole field until ch. 55 is ended. The beginning is sublime. The eloquence of these chapters is wholly without parallel in the entire literature of the ancient Oriental world. A poet and prophet united in one person gave them utterance in an ecstasy of joy, in a glow of hope, in a certainty of conviction. For him the night, the black night of exile, is at its end. The morning dawns and Jerusalem looms clear and vivid before his eyes. There is little in these verses difficult to understand and comment upon them seems almost superfluous. Jerusalem means the people in captivity, it is an idealistic word, as is Zion (v. 9) so often. The voice (v. 3) is here an interjection, and were well translated "Hark! one crying." It is not God's voice or the prophet's but angelic. Prepare ye is taken from the Oriental custom of clearing a road before the king's visit to a city or province. And now we are prepared for the introduction of Jehovah himself.

12-31. Jehovah, God of Israel, the Incomparable. (Davidson.) The deliverance is to come by the intervention of Jehovah, whose greatness is more than equal to the task. He is shown in his greatness by his operations in creation (v. 12), and by the knowledge which he has displayed (vv. 13, 14), and by the insignificance of everything in comparison with him (vv. 15-17). All this is declared in order to rouse the people out of despondency and unfaith. In contrast with this great God are the idols (vv. 18-20). The people of Israel were in Babylonia, and everywhere about them were imposing temples, each with its statue or image representing its presiding deity, Marduk, Nabu, Shamash, to whom was paid the homage or the sacrifices of their worshipers. To the prophet all these images are only the work of men's hands and with them it is impossible to compare God. Contrasted also are the characteristics of Israel's God (vv. 21-26) who is manifest in the works which he has created, and is the disposer of the fortunes of men. In the peroration (vv. 25, 26), magnificently eloquent, God as creator is celebrated. "The word 'create' occurs fifteen times in chs. 45-55, and five times in the chapters which follow; perhaps not more than nine times in the whole of the earlier literature. No other language possesses a word so exclusively appropriated to the Divine activity" (Skinner). Israel may safely trust in such a God (vv. 27-31). He will not fail. They who are his people will be borne upon wings, and not any longer be toiling wearily.

CHAPTER XLI

Encouragement of Israel. In this great chapter there appears the figure of Cyrus, to whose sudden rise and amazing success there was no earlier parallel. He was born prince of a small province called Anshan. He conquered Media in 549 B.C., destroyed the Lydian Empire, then under the rule of the famous Croesus, in 540, and took Babylon in 538. The date of this prophecy may be fixed within narrow limits. It comes after the conquest of the Medes and before the taking of Babylon, i.e., between 549 and 538 B.C., and perhaps about 540.

1-7. Jehovah's Debate with the Nations. The chapter contains two debates, the first between Jehovah and the nations (vv. 1-7), the second between Jehovah and the idols (vv. 21-29), with an intervening passage (vv. 8-20) in which Israel is bidden to view this great crisis in history. The man (better than one) from the east is Cyrus, and it is Jehovah who has given him his victories, for it is Jehovah who has guided all human history from the beginning. The nations are alarmed at the intervention of this great God, and prepare to meet him by making new gods (vv. 5-7). These verses, though somewhat difficult in this connection, are, on the whole, better left where they stand, though they would give an easier connection if they were transferred and inserted in ch. 40 between vv. 19 and 20.

8-20. Israel's Security. But however much the nations may fear, Israel has no need so to do, for hers is a special relation to Jehovah; from the days of Abraham, her progenitor, she has been Jehovah's servant. Jehovah will strengthen her, giving her victory over all her enemies and a supply for all her wants.

21-29. Jehovah's Debate with the Idols. The prophet had before represented Jehovah as addressing the makers of idols; now the idols themselves are addressed. They are asked to give some proof of their foreknowledge. Can they point to any past which they have correctly predicted, i.e., any former things which came out into the present as they had said, or can they predict any future things? If they can do this, they will be known as gods. If they have no foreknowledge or are unwilling to make that test, let them do good or do evil, that we may look around on one another (v. 23, mg.). In v. 25 the prophet returns to the figure already mentioned in vv. 2-4, and here it is declared that he calleth upon my name, or perhaps better, "will call." The meaning is that Cyrus will ultimately recognize that his victories are to be ascribed to Jehovah and not to his former gods of Anshan or Media. He shall come upon (read tread upon) rulers. The idols know nothing of all this, neither can they understand it or explain it (vv. 26-29).

CHAPTER XLII

The "Servant Passages" in Isaiah. These important passages are as follows: 42:1-4 49:1-6 50:4-9 52:13-53:12. They afford us many difficulties, but no amount of thought or care lavished upon them would be unworthily bestowed. There is nothing in all the O.T. so rich as they, so far-reaching in teaching, so profoundly allied to the N.T. They are indeed evangelical, and the prophet who gave them utterance is well named "The Evangelist of the O.T." The interpretation which follows aims to explain them as a whole and as parts of the work of the Second Isaiah. They are poetical in form, but so also is his work in general. The rhythm of the Servant passages is, however, different from the rest, and this has been one of the causes, or origins, of much debate. There are two solutions which have been suggested. The one is that these passages are the work of another prophet, perhaps of a somewhat earlier date, which has been taken up and used by the Second Isaiah. The other is that they are interpolations inserted by an editor or by some other later hand into the work of the Second Isaiah. Of these two the second seems to many to break upon the rock that some of the Servant passages seem clearly to be utilized, commented on, expanded or explained by the Second Isaiah and must therefore have been used by him and not inserted without his knowledge. The first hypothesis is the more probable, but if it be the correct solution, then the question becomes purely academic. It does not matter for their interpretation whether they are original or quoted; for, if quoted, the author made them his own, and our interpretation of them may proceed as though he had written them just as well as the context in which they stand. The next question in importance is the question, Who is this Servant? Great and grave problems are suspended upon this, and it seems best to let the answer develop, as we proceed, from the exegesis of the separate passages rather than to discuss it under a separate head (cf. p. 664). (For those who would know it more perfectly and the views of modern scholars concerning it, reference should be made to the commentaries whose titles and authors have already been named, and to such discussions as those of A. Guillaume in Theology for Nov. and Dec. 1925 and Jan. and Feb. 1926; H. Wheeler Robinson, The Cross of the Servant; and C. F. Burney, The Gospel in the O.T.)

1-4. The First Servant Passage. Here is a picture of a Servant whom Jehovah has chosen and in whom he takes delight. He is to have a great work to do, and for it is prepared by having the divine spirit put upon him. So also were the prophets prepared, and so be it noted was the Messiah to be (11^{2f.}). His mission is to carry judgment to the Gentiles. The Hebrew word here used means the ordinances or judicial decisions of Jehovah, i.e., the practical side of Jehovah's requirements of men, namely, religion. Next we are told how the Servant is to do this. He is to do it in quietness, by the operation of gentle spiritual influences. Now this was not the way of the prophets usually. They spoke out in the streets and often clamorously. But it reminds us of the still small voice of Elijah (1 Kings 19^{12f.}), and we must not overlook the use made of it in Mt. 12^{17f.} He is to be very careful not to quench any little wavering burning light of religion among these Gentiles, nor, as later appears, among Israel. He is not to be discouraged, but wait patiently until this religion is set up in the earth, and the isles, i.e., the coastlands, wait for his "instruction," which is the meaning of the word law. Let us now inquire who is this Servant? The answer seems plain enough. The connections before and after show that it is Israel, not indeed that general mass of people in captivity as they then were, but that same people idealized as they should be, as God in the beginning meant that they should be. To be such a people—such a Servant—is and always was their divinely appointed mission. They are now called to fulfill it.

5-17. The Greatness of the God Who Calls Israel. The prophet goes forward to make promises to Israel, and in his writing takes up the chain which he left off when he inserted the Servant hymn. The great Creator is he who calls Israel to a great mission, namely, to be a covenant (v. 6), i.e., he is to bring the people into a new covenant with God, and to open their spiritual eyes, and release them from a spiritual bondage. There will be a new song then to sing (vv. 10-13) "such as has never been heard in the heathen world" (Delitzsch). In vv. 14-17 Jehovah speaks again, but continues the figure from v. 13. He has long held his peace during the captivity of Israel (586-540 B.C.), but will now cry aloud, gasping and panting, by which the deep passion of the Almighty is expressed in vivid terms of man's nature. God will reveal himself in nature and the lives of men. But idolaters shall be turned back, i.e., put to shame.

18-25. Israel Rebuked for Its Blindness. In these verses the people of Israel is rebuked for a failure to understand its vocation and the process of education which Jehovah has been carrying on to prepare it for its heaven-sent obligations. Very different is Israel as here depicted from the Israel of the first Servant passage in vv. 1-4. The difference is that this is Israel as it actually is, and the other is Israel as God meant it to be, as he was desiring even yet to make it. This is a sorry picture, in contrast with those beautiful verses. Servant . . . messenger—so was Israel to have been; God's servant and his messenger to all mankind. In v. 19 there is a very difficult phrase, which in A.V. is he that is perfect and in R.V. at peace with me, and in the margin made perfect or recompensed. The meaning is still uncertain after much modern debate. Skinner translates "the befriended one," and Wade partially follows with "admitted to friendship with me." In the last clause of v. 19, blind should probably be "deaf," and is so given in some MSS. In v. 23 the prophet seeks to rouse the people to prepare for the coming salvation, and then reminds them that all that has come to them is from the Lord, but they had hitherto not laid this chastisement to heart.

CHAPTER XLIII

1-13. Gracious Promises of Divine Help. The thought of the last verses in ch. 42 carries over into this chapter, which begins with gracious promises of God's great good will toward Israel, for he had chosen her for himself and will ransom her at the cost of the great nations by whom she was oppressed. Egypt, Ethiopia, and Seba are to go to Persia, as, indeed, they did during the reign of Cambyses, though not by the hand of Cyrus. The exiles of Israel will be gathered again and brought home. In vv. 8-13 the argument from prophecy is repeated, not as before with the idols, but with the nations. Their gods have not foretold the coming event, as Jehovah has done.

14-28. The Fall of Babylon Predicted; Another Arraignment of Israel. The prediction of the fall of Babylon is here for the first time announced. It will be an unparalleled display of God's working, exceeding even the Exodus from Egypt, for Israel will be led miraculously through the desert. Upon this there follows at once (vv. 22-28) an arraignment of Israel similar to 42:18-25, and the people are declared to have burdened their God with sins and iniquities and not with sacrifices and offerings, but they are thus reminded only that God will blot out their transgressions for his own sake. The first father who sinned was Jacob, who gave his name to the nation.

CHAPTER XLIV

1-23. Dependableness of God; The Helplessness of Idols. The reproof at the close of the last chapter is followed by a promise of a full restoration to the divine favor (vv. 1-5). Israel is now called Jeshurun, which means "Upright One," in contrast with Jacob, which signifies "Supplanter." In vv. 6-23 the prophet returns again to a theme already twice before discussed, and uses similar expressions in setting it forth. It begins with an unpromising declaration of monotheism, and then plunges into an exposure of the utter folly of idol worship (vv. 9-20) more severe than any found elsewhere in the book. And upon it there follows at once a glorious declaration of complete pardon to Israel for all her transgressions. And as he thinks of all that this means the prophet bursts into a paean of praise and calls upon all nature to unite with him in it. He concludes with the expression of faith that God having redeemed Jacob will glorify himself in Israel.

24-28. The Choice of Cyrus. This passage introduces the message of the next chapter. Here Jehovah describes himself in a series of attributes, beginning with his creation of Israel in the womb, and passing thence to the creation of the heavens, and then displaying his wisdom and power in overthrowing the heathen soothsayers, while confirming the voice of prophecy, and so leading on to his choice of Cyrus, who is mentioned by name. Of him it is said that he will order Jerusalem to be rebuilt, and the foundations of the Temple to be laid. It is a remarkable passage, and a fine introduction to the following.

CHAPTER XLV

1-8. Jehovah Speaks Directly to Cyrus. He has taken this new world hero by the hand and will endow him with power to subdue nations, whose doors shall not be successfully closed against him. The doors of brass such as those described by Herodotus at Babylon, of which he says extravagantly that they numbered one hundred, will be burst open and their hidden treasures be revealed. This career of unparalleled conquest is that thou mayest know that I am the Lord; so is Cyrus to learn, not by a special revelation, but by experience as we do. The hope of the prophet was that Cyrus would come to acknowledge Jehovah as the only Lord, but this was not fulfilled, for his inscriptions, now in our possession, show that he continued as a polytheist. Nevertheless, God will gird him even though he knows him not. But others shall see and know and understand that God makes all things and does all things. Then follows a beautiful lyric verse (v. 8) to describe the coming felicity.

9-13. Rebuke for Protesting Jehovah's Purpose. Here is a sharp rebuke to the Jews in captivity, who have evidently expressed displeasure at God's plan to deliver them from exile by the hand of a foreign conqueror, Cyrus. They who thus complain are only potsherders and not men. In v. 11 the translation, with a slight change in the text, should probably be "will ye question me concerning the things that are to come, and concerning the work of my hands, command me?" (Cheyne). God has raised up Cyrus, and Cyrus will rebuild Jerusalem, and set the exiles free. The city was not rebuilt by

Cyrus but by Nehemiah, 444 B.C. (See intro. to Ezra and Nehemiah, pp. 457-62.)

14-25. The Universal Acknowledgment of Israel's God. Then the wealthiest nations will confess Jehovah, and come in chains, i.e., like slaves to serve Israel, in order from Israel to learn of the true God. Hereupon follows a magnificent passage (vv. 18-25). God, the great creator of the habitable earth, has not spoken in secret, his predictions have been open and clear. He now calls all nations to come to him. It is tacitly assumed that the victories of Cyrus are so sure that they have already taken place. Let the nations who have seen come on and acknowledge the Lord who has wrought such marvels. He who declared it and showed it from ancient time, he is the Lord and there is no God beside him. Let them all turn unto him and be saved. God hath sworn by himself that all, all mankind, shall surely worship him. This tremendous prediction is slowly but surely coming about in our time by the dissemination of the Jewish knowledge of God through the missionary enthusiasm of Christianity. (Cf. Phil. 2:10, 11.)

CHAPTER XLVI

Contrasts Between Idols and Jehovah.

Cyrus now slips into the background and the prophet gives himself to describing the downfall of the gods of Babylon. The two great gods of Babylonia, Bel, i.e., Lord Marduk, the chief god of Babylon, and Nebo, i.e., Nabu, the chief god of Borsippa, are carried away, on the backs of weary beasts. When the people who worshiped them are conquered they can only lift up the images of their gods and carry them away. Such gods could not deliver their people, but go off into captivity with them. On the other hand Israel's God carries her, and has always so done, and ever will (vv. 3, 4). In the next verses (6, 7) there is another contemptuous description of helpless, useless idols. But (vv. 8-11) in contrast Jehovah appeals to history to prove his divinity. The phrase show yourselves men is more than doubtful in Hebrew. The best that we can do is to make a conjectural emendation and translate "be ye ashamed." (Let the reader take note that there are still many unexplained words and phrases in the O.T. It is not so plain and easy as our translations often make it.) In v. 11 Cyrus is called a ravenous bird from the east because of his great and sudden conquests. Ye stouthearted (v. 12) seems to mean those who are obstinate in disbelief. God will show them his righteousness and salvation will not tarry. (See what trouble the ancient prophets had to bring the exiles into confidence and trust in God. So it is in our day. They had their discouragements and so have we, but the end is sure.)

CHAPTER XLVII

A Taunt-Song Over the Coming Fall of Babylon. There are four strophes of unequal length. Certain difficulties in them strongly suggest possible or probable errors of copyists.

1-4. The first strophe portrays Babylon under the figure of a very grand and delicately protected lady seated in the dust in humiliation. She is a daughter of the Chaldeans, which means that at this time Babylon was under the rule of a Chaldean king, and not a native prince. This once elegant dame is now grinding at a mill, which is a mark of a woman's servitude, her veil is cast off, and the long skirts are gone, replaced by short ones such as captives who had to ford streams used to wear. The phrase will accept no man makes no sense, and many efforts to overcome the difficulty meet no general acceptance. Perhaps the best is to change the text and translate I will not be entreated. (So Oort and Duhm.) V. 4 interrupts the connection and is difficult. The best solution is to connect it, as does the LXX, with v. 3 and read saith our redeemer, whose name is the Lord of hosts, the Holy One of Israel.

5-7. The second strophe. This consists of a renewed apostrophe to Babylon, no more to be called the Lady of Kingdoms, because she has harshly treated God's people. She had thought she could do all as she wished because she would be a lady for ever, but it will not be so.

8-12. The third strophe. On the contrary she shall lose her people and be plunged suddenly into widowhood and her sorceries and enchantments will not save her. Her supposed security has been based upon her wisdom, i.e., upon her knowledge of all sorts of magic, but it will fail and sudden destruction will come upon her (vv. 10b-12).

13-15. The last strophe. The last strophe in this taunting ode declares that Babylon may call her astrologers, literally, "dividers of the heavens," as the Hebrew has it, and her star gazers, but all in vain. Babylonia was famous for astronomy, and for the turning of such facts as they could learn into astrological theories, to prognostications of the future by observations of signs in the heavens. These astrologers will perish in fire, and all who had dealings with them will depart, every one to his quarter, or, better, "each straight before him."

And now the prophet turns sharply to utter rebukes to his own people whose deliverance is near at hand, but they are still a sinful people, led astray by the idolatries round about them in Babylonia. This coming chapter has afforded interpreters much difficulty, and possible interpolations by later hands are not as improbable as in many other suggested places.

CHAPTER XLVIII

1-11. The Disloyalty of Israel in Its Captivity. Israel is rebuked for disbelief and idolatrous practices, and the prophet reminds them that the Lord has declared the former things, i.e., has predicted them in advance, and now they should remember this and believe and trust. They are, however, obstinate, and some of them say that an idol has done this. Though we have little definite information concerning much that went on among the Jews in Babylon, there is no evident reason for doubting that many must have been attracted by the ceremonial of the great Babylonian gods and so slipped away from Jehovah's faith. God has chosen them in this furnace, as he had done in Egypt, and for his own sake he will now save them.

12-16. Sole Deity of Jehovah. Here is a renewed declaration that the only God is the Lord Jehovah and he will destroy Babylon. In v. 14 the margin, as often in the R.V., is much better than the text. The passage should read he whom the Lord loveth [that is, Cyrus] shall perform his pleasure on Babylon and on the seed of the Chaldeans. (This last clause following Duhm.) In v. 16, from the beginning probably means from the beginning of the declarations concerning Cyrus, which are now so near fulfillment.

17-19. Lament Over Israel's Indifference. This is very troublesome here, for we feel almost instinctively that v. 20 would follow admirably upon v. 16. For this reason it has been much suspected as an interpolation, and so it may be; but it is well to remember that interruptions in prophetic discourses are common enough, and much more natural to the Oriental mind than to the more logical but less emotional Occidental mind.

20-22. A Joyous Outburst of Praise. The exiles are bidden to flee from Babylon and to carry to the ends of the earth the news that God has redeemed his people. The prophet speaks as though the great journey were already accomplished. They have traversed the deserts, but God has given them water to drink out of a rock. The words in v. 22 do not belong here at all. They have been taken by some editor or copyist out of 57²¹, where they have a proper context.

CHAPTER XLIX

Concentration on Two Main Themes: the Servant of Jehovah and the Future of Israel.

When we pass from ch. 48 to ch. 49 we cross a great divide in this great prophetic book. The prophet makes an advance in his teaching more marked than in any preceding case. As Driver has well said: "The controversial tone, the repeated comparisons between Jehovah and the idols, with the arguments based upon them, disappear; the prophet feels that, as regards these points, he has made his position sufficiently secure. For the same reason, allusions to Cyrus and his conquest of Babylon cease also; that likewise is now taken for granted." The prophet now devotes himself increasingly to two subjects—the Servant of the Lord and the glorious future of Israel. The Servant of the Lord is a personification at first of the ideal Israel whose duty it is to unite the rest of Israel and carry all forward in prosperity and peace; and, not stopping there, to be the agent of Jehovah in bringing the knowledge of him to all peoples, all nations of the world. If, now, the reader will turn back and read again the first Servant passage (42¹⁻⁴) he will see there the beginning of these noble and inspiring messages, and so be the better prepared to understand the one which now begins, a second carrying on and developing the teaching of the first.

1-6. The Servant of Jehovah Addresses the Nations. In this passage the Servant is dramatically introduced as speaking to the nations. He calls on all peoples to listen as he introduces himself, then explains his vocation, declares his sense of past failure, but also his assurance of future success. His mouth is a sharp sword, he has been hidden, i.e., secretly prepared for his mission, he is a sharp arrow, kept in God's quiver until the proper time should come, but now God has given him a name as Servant, and he is specifically identified with Israel. He has, however, labored in vain, but is still confident and leaves with God the future result. God has prepared him from the womb to bring Jacob, i.e., all Israel, again to him. Here, then, we see clearly that the Servant is not all Israel, but the ideal Israel, represented by the faithful nucleus within the larger Israel, and that his first duty is to bring all Israel, the larger Israel, more or less estranged from God, back to him, and in this vocation God will be his strength. But this mission is not great enough, for v. 6, as correctly translated, begins—It is too light a thing to be the Servant and merely raise up and restore Israel. His commission far exceeds this, for he is to be a light to the Gentiles, and so to carry salvation into the ends of the earth. But it is to be remembered that the religion of Judaism was not adapted for a world-wide use. Its form of worship embraced sacrifices only to be offered in Jerusalem. This alone would prevent its adoption as a universal religion. But the sacrifices were not the best expression of its spiritual life. They with some other temporary forms and uses must be stripped off. This was accomplished by Christianity, which became the Ideal Israel under the Ideal King, the Messiah as a Person whose portrait is soon to appear in another Servant passage.

7-13. Promises of Blessedness Because of the Servant. Israel has been despised and abhorred, but shall be exalted, so that kings and princes shall see that she is the Lord's choice. Then comes the picture of the exiles, redeemed from captivity and traversing in safety the long journey. This is all plain enough save for the last word in v. 12. Sinim is still hopeless, for nobody knows what is meant. The attempt to identify it as the name of the Chinese is impossible. It might mean "Syene," but it is doubtful.

14-26. More Assurances of Israel's Future Security. Here begins a passage extending from 49:14 to 50:3, consisting of assurances beautifully and eloquently presented that Zion is still Jehovah's well beloved, that her restoration is sure, that her scattered peoples will be restored to her, and that she may well alter her slow acceptance of the Lord's appeals and promises. The passage is singularly beautiful even in a book so rich as this. Zion is still an exile in Babylonia, and her hopes have not come to fruition. She counts herself forgotten of God, but is met by Jehovah's promise that even though a mother might forget her suckling child Jehovah can never forget his people. God has Jerusalem's walls before him and will rebuild them. They that destroyed the walls shall disappear and returning Zion shall find her scattered peoples like a bride's ornaments restored to her. So numerous will they be that the place will be too small for them. (V. 19 is too difficult for interpretation here. It seems highly probable that a portion of it has been accidentally lost by some copyist, which leaves the remainder in the air.) In v. 21 Zion speaks with surprise of all those who come to her on the return. They have been born in foreign lands. Upon this there follows a brief oracle (vv. 22, 23) in which it is promised that the nations will spontaneously restore the exiles. Swift upon this follows (vv. 24-26) a different view of their restoration as an act effected by force. The Chaldeans shall destroy themselves by civil war, and shall be reduced to such straits that they will devour themselves, and be drunken with their own blood.

CHAPTER L

1-3. The Unbreakable Bond Between God and Israel. The exiles have doubted whether God would ever restore them. They have gone so far as to believe that the marriage begun at Sinai between God and Israel had been terminated. Perhaps God had divorced her. To that the prophet gives an emphatic negative. There is not in existence any such bill of divorcement. Nor has God sold his children to any creditors. Only their own individual iniquities have sold them; they are the children, and their mother, Israel, has gone into captivity because of them. But God can and will redeem them. He has the power, and as a proof of that, appeal is made to the exhibition of divine power during the exodus from Egypt, when God dried up the sea, stopped Jordan's flow, and covered the heavens with blackness (cf. Ex. 10:21).

4-9. The Third of the Servant Passages. Here once more is the Servant of the Lord. He is not mentioned by name, yet it is certainly he who here speaks, and this must be accounted the third of the Servant passages. It forms an indispensable link between the second and the fourth, for here for the first time we have the Servant represented as suffering, and without this we could not find our way through the mazes of the greater passage which follows later. Let us see what the Servant has to declare. The Servant is prepared for his mission by God, who has given him a tongue with which to speak, a tongue of them that are taught, i.e., a tongue of disciples. With this tongue he will be able to—and now comes a difficult bit. The R.V. translates to sustain with words him that is weary. This gives an attractive sense, but is not based upon the Hebrew word, but upon Greek and Latin translations of it, and is therefore a little uncertain. The preaching that the Servant is to give comes from God, who comes to him early, as also says Jeremiah (7:13), "rising up early and speaking"; so now to the Servant comes God to teach him as one of his disciples. As a true disciple he was not rebellious, or turned away from duty, but persecution awaited him, and to that he gave no resistance, but accepted persecution as a divinely appointed messenger ought to do. He is, however, sure that God has helped him and has not suffered him to be confounded. God will justify him in the end, and little does it signify who shall rise up to contend with him. He has no fear of condemnation (cf. Rom.

833f.). They who attempt it shall vanish away like a moth-eaten garment.

10, 11. An encouragement to believers and a solemn warning to unbelievers. The verses are very unlike the messages of the Second Isaiah, and may be by some later hand.

CHAPTER LI

1-16. Encouragement for the True Israel in Babylonia. The thought which had been uppermost, but was broken by the third Servant passage, is now resumed. The purpose is to encourage all the true Israelites who in Babylonia are still lamenting their sad fate and desire to return to the land of their fathers. It is not surprising that many of them have grown old in hope as they have in years, and wonder whether there is really any reason to believe longer in a restoration. The encouragement which the prophet offers is based on history and experience. They are first bidden to remember Abraham and Sarah from whom they had sprung in the very beginning. Abraham was but one, but God made his seed into a great nation, and comforted them and gave them prosperity (vv. 1-3). A glorious future awaits those who endure, for an exhibition of God's righteousness is near. Let them look upward at the heavens above, and at the earth beneath. These may pass away but God's salvation and his righteousness will abide forever (vv. 4-6). Let them not give thought to the reproaches of men and their revilings, for they will soon pass away (vv. 7, 8). Upon this there follows a magnificent apostrophe to the arm of the Lord, whose ancient triumphs are described as a conquest of Rahab. This figure is borrowed from the old Babylonian stories which represented chaos under the figure of Tiamat who was destroyed by the god Marduk, and so cosmos was possible. (See notes on Gen. 1, and art., O.T. and Archaeology, p. 120.) Here Jehovah destroys Rahab, who corresponds to Tiamat. This is the same God who at the time of the Exodus dried up the sea for Israel to pass over (vv. 9, 10). In the same way exiled Israel shall surely return by his hand (v. 11). This verse has apparently been borrowed from 25¹⁰ and inserted here by an editor, who found it to be as appropriate as do we. Then God himself speaks, seeking to bring comfort to those who still doubt. They ought not be afraid of men, forgetting that He who made them is He who made heavens and earth. What can their oppressors do or be in comparison with him? (Vv. 12, 13.) The next three verses are a complex of difficulties, and the LXX offers no valuable help. The text must very early have been wrongly copied, and both the Hebrew and the Greek have been trying to mend it and extract a meaning, especially from v. 14. On the whole, the best that can be done, save for an elaborate conjectural emendation, is in the R.V. In v. 16 there is an echo of the Servant song in 49².

17-23. Further Encouragement for the Exiles. These verses, together with 52¹⁻⁶ and 527-12, contain three separate oracles, all of the same purpose, the encouragement of the exiles by an assurance that God will certainly turn the captivity of Zion. In 51¹⁷⁻²³ Jerusalem is presented under the figure of a woman prone on the ground, intoxicated by the cup of God's indignation which she has drunk to the dregs. Her people have been carried away into captivity, and none of her sons are left to take her by the hand and lift her up. Her fate has been desolation and destruction and famine and sword. Such of her sons as remain with her have fainted and can give no help. But the afflicted city is not drunken with wine, but with the cup of divine wrath (cf. Rev. 16, 17); now God has taken the cup from her hand, and will pass it to those who have afflicted her, i.e., the Babylonians (v. 23).

CHAPTER LII

1-6. Triumphant Announcement of the Return from Exile. The city is urged to rise, array herself as a bride, for no more shall the uncircumcised and unclean, i.e., the enemies such as the Babylonians, come to ravage and destroy. In vv. 3-6 the poetical form disappears into prose, and the subject is changed. It is very doubtful whether they belong here as a sequel to vv. 1 and 2, and they certainly do not prepare the way for the exquisitely beautiful lines in vv. 7-12. We may perhaps safely disregard vv. 3-6 altogether.

7-12. Establishment of the Kingdom of God. In these verses we are back again in the main stream of beauty. They begin with the figure of a messenger who comes over the hills crying aloud in jubilation. He is the herald of salvation to announce that God has become King, has begun to rule, has established a kingdom to last forever. Paul lifts the thrilling words and applies them to the gospel ministry (Rom. 10¹⁵). The first to see the herald is, of course, the watchman on Jerusalem's walls (v. 8), who joins voice with the herald, and bids all to join in celebrating God's work for Jerusalem. The whole world will witness Jehovah's deliverance of his people. He calls on the exiles to prepare to leave Babylon, and accompany Jehovah, who will both go before them and also guard their rear as they march homeward. They shall not go out in haste, as did their ancestors from Egypt, but deliberately, and in perfect security. This differs somewhat from the picture in 48²⁰ where they are represented as leaving in haste.

13-15. Introduction to the Fourth Servant Passage. (The identity of the Servant is considered in the Excursus that follows ch. 53 below.) The fourth Servant passage extends from 52¹³ to 53¹². These verses furnish an introduction to the whole, intended to state the import of all that follows. The general meaning and intent is to present the coming exaltation of the Servant as a contrast to his former abasement. And now let us see it sometimes word by word, at other times by phrases or sentences. It begins, Behold my servant shall prosper; the translation shall deal wisely is certainly wrong. There is, indeed, in the Hebrew a primary idea of "wisdom," but the secondary meaning which supplants it is the "success" which follows wisdom, as in Josh. 17¹. 1 Sam. 18⁵ Jer. 10²¹. The last time we saw the Servant (50⁴⁻⁶) he was in suffering, left there unexplained, but now his exaltation is predicated upon those sufferings. Upon this there follows immediately a parenthesis introduced by the words as many were astonished at thee, which means that the sufferings were so great that men looked on astonished; then comes the explanatory parenthesis to describe poignantly what they saw, to be rendered thus, so marred from that of a man was his visage, and his form from the sons of men. The meaning is that disease had marred his features, and disfigured his body so that he seemed scarcely human. There the parenthesis ends, and the next phrase resumes the broken thread with the words, so shall he startle many nations, the translation sprinkle cannot be justified on any account; as Davidson well said, "It is simply treason against the Hebrew language to render 'sprinkle.' The interpreter who will so translate will do anything." The meaning, of course, is that the exaltation of the Servant will startle into surprise, amazement, many nations, or, as the LXX puts it, many nations shall marvel. Then comes the clause, kings shall shut their mouths at him, unable even to speak as they look at this marvel of the triumph which has come out of suffering, the like of which they had never heard of before, yet now do actually see, and are called to consider. Here ends then the first strophe, the introduction to what is worked out in greater detail in the following.

CHAPTER LIII

of the Servant, and it begins with a complaint of the unbelief or disbelief which led to the complete misunderstanding of him. The complaint is a confession of penitence. They who speak had heard but believed not. They say, Who believed that which was revealed to us, and the arm of Jehovah, to whom was it revealed? The translation our report gives probably to most readers a wrong impression; it is not our report, the report which we made, but the report received or revealed to those who so confess. The reference, then, is to the revelation made in the earlier Servant passages, or through the experiences of the Servant. The arm of the Lord is a metaphor for God's operation in human history. It was Jehovah who raised up the Servant, and who made him, his work, and his destiny known by the prophet. This verse is used in the N.T. to express the rejection of the Gospel by the Jews (Jn. 12³⁸, and partly also in Rom. 10¹⁶). V. 2 begins a survey of the Servant's former history. Read for he grew up like a sapling before him (perhaps, better, before us), as a root out of the parched ground. He came so simply, growing like a young tree; read he had no form, nor beauty that we should regard him, or, better, when we saw him, nor aspect (or beauty) that we should desire him. Worse than all this, he was not only not to be desired, he was even so repulsive in some way or ways that men were actually driven from him. Despised and rejected of men, or "man-forsaken"; this is explained in the next clause, where read he was a man of pains and familiar with illness, and as one from whom there is a hiding of the face; i.e., men instinctively cover their faces that they should not look upon one so afflicted. He was despised and we esteemed him not; rather, "we held him of no account."

The picture thus far represents one as so fearfully stricken of God that men could not endure the sight of him because of their uprising of pity, or because they feared some contamination, some contagion. When, however, they had come thus far in contemplation and in thought upon the situation, there arose within them a new suggestion. They had felt, as did Job's friends as they looked at him, convinced in their minds that God had so terribly afflicted him because of some sins of which he had been guilty. They had to be brought to see that this was not true. So in this case the people of Israel began to repent of the judgments already formed and now adopt the view that the suffering Servant was really innocent, that the punishment which he was enduring was not personal but national. He was, rather, suffering for the sins of others, the sins of his own people, and for these he was suffering vicariously.

4-9. The Servant's Sufferings Endured for Others. Realizing this, they burst forth into the words, Surely he hath borne our griefs and carried our sorrows. But even the R.V., though generally so much better than the A.V., fails us here, for griefs should be "sickness," and sorrows should be "pains." The next clause, Yet we did esteem him stricken, smitten of God and afflicted, would better be rendered, "while we accounted him stricken," etc. The word stricken is very significant. It is the word used when God plunges a man into sudden and severe sickness (Gen. 12¹⁷ 1 Sam. 6⁹), and it is particularly applied in the case of leprosy, which is the stroke of God for sin (Job 19²¹ 2 Kings 15⁵ Lev. 13³, 9, 20). In the description of the Servant there are not wanting a number of other hints that the author is thinking of leprosy as the sickness of the Servant, but we have no need to stumble over this as we seek to understand the prophecy. The picture is an ideal creation, and as such we must not apply to it the laws of logic and mathematics. It is poetry and must so be interpreted. The poet-prophet wills to portray the Servant as suffering deeply for the sins of his people, and leprosy is but color added to the picture. It was the most cruel, most awful and awe-inspiring of human afflictions, and is here used to intensify the color in the picture.

In v. 5 the confessors dip still more deeply into the great mystery, as they emphasize their own share in it. It is better translated thus: Yet he—he was pierced for our rebellions, he was crushed for our guilt. This punishment which he bears is the punishment which should have come upon us. The next clause is even more interesting and significant, for it reads, The chastisement of our peace was upon him, and with his stripes we are healed. The meaning is plain. Chastisement was an act of God intended not for punishment but for moral healing. God chastises to make men better. In this case instead of the chastisement put upon them in order to work itself out in their peace it is laid upon the Servant. He bears that as well as the punishment already mentioned, but it is they who secure its benefits. In v. 6 we need to change have to "had," so that the verse reads, All of us, like sheep, had gone astray, we had turned every one to his own way, and the Lord had made the guilt to light upon him. The confessing people here admit in the clearest manner that his work was both vicarious and redemptive. He suffered in their place for their sins, and in their place assumed the chastisement which was to bring them peace. Ah, these are profound matters which this prophet laid so eloquently before his people, nor are their depths even yet fully explored!

In vv. 7-9 the account of the sufferings of the Servant comes to a finality. He must die and be buried, but the emphasis is placed not on death and burial, but on his submission. He accepts it all willingly, and the comparison is with sheep, the meekest of domesticated animals. He was oppressed, i.e., harshly and cruelly treated by the men of his day, but he neither forbade it, nor complained of it. He opened not his mouth (cf. Ps. 38¹³, 14 39⁹). He is led to the slaughter as a sheep, and as a sheep (literally, "ewe") that before her shearers is dumb (cf. Jer. 11¹⁹). Yea, he openeth not his mouth. This repeats in Hebrew precisely the words of the second line and is probably an accidental repetition by some scribe in copying a manuscript. V. 8 is a very difficult verse, and many are the suggestions which have been offered for its solution, and many the suggested translations which have followed. A word-for-word analysis is impossible here, but some suggestion must be made. The R.V. has much reason for its translation, but better, perhaps, would be, From oppression and from judgment he was taken away, i.e., taken away by death. The next clause offers a still greater problem. The R.V. again gives a fair meaning, but a better would be to take one word as Aramaic and translate it "dwelling," as does Duhm. The clause would then read, And who gave heed to his dwelling?—and then follows For he was cut off from the land of the living; and the last, if we here boldly follow the LXX, would read, Through the rebellion of my people was he smitten to death. Skinner adopts this, and so also, though with some modification, which I have not accepted, does H. Wheeler Robinson. And they made his grave with the wicked, is plain enough, but the next clause is again doubtful. It is, of course, very tempting to take the translation of the R.V., and with a rich man in his death, but rich man is too good to be true. On the whole, though doubtfully, the best seems to be to use a conjecture of Cheyne, and translate, And with evil doers when he died.

10-12. The Promised Reward of the Suffering Servant. In these verses again difficulties arise for us, and the text is apparently in disorder. We can only do the best we may with it. The LXX translates (v. 10), It pleased Jehovah to cleanse him from sickness, and H. Wheeler Robinson accepts this, but it hardly seems satisfactory. Dillman finds better support in other passages, when he translates,

"It pleased Jehovah to crush him incurably." Then translate the next clause, When his soul shall present a trespass offering, he shall see a seed, he shall prolong his days. The whole meaning, then, would be that after his sufferings, which are an offering for the sin of others, he will have a long life, and the purpose of Jehovah in the establishment of a universal religion will be met. George Adam Smith translates thus:

"But Jehovah had purposed to bruise him,
Had laid on him sickness;
So if his life should offer guilt offering,
A seed he should see, he should lengthen his days
And the purpose of Jehovah by his hand should prosper."

The great difficulty of the passage finds abundant evidence in the multiplicity of proffered translations. V. 11 bears a repetition of the thought of v. 10. By his knowledge is meant the knowledge which the Servant possesses and imparts in his prophetic activity. For v. 11b read My servant, the righteous one, shall justify many. Therefore, because of this great service and this great success of his, he shall inherit with the great, or "I set him a share with the great" (G. A. Smith), and he shall divide the spoil with the strong. It was the victors in battle who divided the spoil, and the meaning, therefore, is that he will be a victor, or the victor at last. And this final victory comes to him because he did not fail, but was faithful even unto death. He poured out his soul, i.e., his life, unto death, and let himself be numbered with the rebellious; in reality, he bore their sins, and made intercession for the rebellious.

So concludes this tremendous, this overwhelming prophetic passage, the last of the Servant passages. It were idle to deny that its difficulties are great. Some of them are insoluble or at least offer problems for which no general or universal solution can be found. Let not the general reader feel discouragement. He should at least be able to win for himself instruction enough to follow the main drift of the message. Even so little as that will be an enrichment of knowledge, a quickening of the emotions, and an enlargement of the spiritual vision and consciousness.

EXCURSUS ON THE IDENTIFICATION OF THE SUFFERING SERVANT

We have above the fourth, the last, and by far the greatest of the Servant passages. It is also by far the most difficult of the four, and in its interpretation both saints and scholars have differed widely and still do differ. Any reader of keen and inquiring mind would find both pleasure and instruction in hunting down in the great commentaries theories old and new concerning it. This is not the place in which to enumerate hypotheses, criticize them, and attempt analysis. Nothing more can here be done than to set down very modestly, and with no little hesitation, what seems to this writer the best solution. Something must be taken for granted, something must be allowed of unwillingness to be too dogmatic; yet, on the other hand, there must be something definite to propose, some conclusion reached, some effort to lay the ghosts of idle controversy, some solution to the problem. If the reader will have patience to turn back and read again the three former Servant passages, and such slight comment as time and circumstance permitted, he will see that the explanation already advanced was that in chs. 42, 49, and 50 the Servant in one way or another was identified with Israel. It was, however, the writer's intention to represent the prophet as dealing constructively with his problem, as advancing with his message. The interpretation thus advanced means that the prophet first spoke of Israel as God's servant to all the world, bearing his message concerning sin and salvation. But Israel, whether from thoughtlessness or carelessness or sinfulness, or from all three, refused the mission, and did not perform the duty. Then God's command was narrowed and laid upon the inner or spiritual Israel, whose obligation it was to win the larger Israel, the whole people, to God's service and also to convey the same promise of salvation to the nations outside Israel. But now we must take another step forward and upward. The Servant passage now before us portrays no longer all Israel, no longer even the inner or spiritual Israel, but an individual, a person from that spiritual Israel who takes up the work which Israel as a whole would not, which the spiritual Israel would not likely be able to do. There are, indeed, difficulties in this passage in interpreting it of any individual, but there are still greater difficulties in continuing its interpretation as applying to a large or even a small body of the spiritual Israel. In spite, then, of the difficulties let it be contended here that an individual is intended and described. (This interpretation is made with the full knowledge that the majority of modern interpreters deny an individual implication here.)

The next question to press for answer will be this—Who was this individual? Several suggestions have been advanced, each with some supporters and each with some support, at least for the identification. The chief among them are these: (1) Zerubbabel. He is called the Lord's servant in Hag. 2²³ and a distinguished name is his. He led the people back from captivity in 537 B.C., and he it was who under the spur of Haggai and Zechariah was chiefly responsible for the rebuilding of the Temple, begun in 520. His is, indeed, a great name. (2) Jehoiachin, king of Judah, carried into captivity, and released by Evil Merodach (2 Kings 25^{27, 28}). It is worth while to notice that it was Professor Sellin, once of Vienna, now of Berlin, who first suggested Zerubbabel, and then, finding that solution inadequate, offered Jehoiachin, equally, if not more, improbable. (3) Some unknown and otherwise unnamed teacher of the law, who was disfigured by leprosy and despised and rejected by his generation. This was Duhm's suggestion, even more vague and useless than its predecessors. (4) The best and the latest is also the earliest of the proposed solutions, that it is the Messiah who is here meant. This was, in part at least, the view of the Targum of Jonathan, and of the Babylonian Talmud, and it was positively accepted and propagated by the Fathers of the Christian Church. There are, indeed, some lineaments not discernible in the person of the Messiah, Jesus the Christ, but they are but the color which the prophet added to his picture. There is so much that is perfectly apposite that we should not hesitate to make the application. Jesus was the conscious fulfillment, nor is there any need to seek another. "The whole conception here given of the Servant of the Lord makes the prophecy the most remarkable anticipation in the O.T. of the 'sufferings of Christ, and the glory that should follow'" (Skinner). I personally accept also and make my own a fine testimony of George Adam Smith, which is in these words: "It may relieve the air of that electricity, which is apt to charge it at the discussion of so classic a passage as this, and secure us calm weather in which to examine exegetical details, if we at once assert, what none but prejudiced Jews have ever denied, that this great prophecy, known as the fifty-third of Isaiah, was fulfilled in One Person, Jesus of Nazareth, and achieved in all its details by him alone."

CHAPTER LIV

We have passed from the amazing spell of the Servant Songs, and, if we have been in any adequate way moved by them, we must necessarily feel our spirits let down, the strings of music less taut, the waves of hope and joy, of expectation and of fulfillment, sinking into a great calm. As we begin to read ch. 54 we shall not feel the same throb as resounded in ch. 53. Nay, more. If we read a few verses in ch. 54 and begin to sense a note somewhat familiar, we may easily turn back and find that it sounds much like an even continuation of 52^{11, 12}. It seems almost as though the great Servant passage 52¹³-53¹² formed a break in the continuity of the prophet's teaching and may be an insertion. So have thought not a few scholars, and so some still declare. They would even argue that the difference is so great that the portrayal of the suffering Servant must have come from some other hand. But there is ready an easy and sufficient answer to this. In every great work of literary art there must be meadow lands as well as mountain heights. It would be very easy to leave out passages and find an easy continuation without them. Whole choruses might be left out of Greek tragedies, and the story would flow on without appreciable loss of them. Speeches in Shakespeare are sometimes so grand that the simple dialogue that follows seems unworthy of the same hand. So it is here. There is no sufficient reason to doubt ch. 54 as the work of the same brain and hand as ch. 53. The great prophet has merely finished that part of his message, and is ready now to return to the main business of comforting the exiles. The chapter divides naturally into two main parts, vv. 1-10 and vv. 11-17.

1-10. The Constancy of Jehovah. Zion, in captivity far from the land which once was her own, in which Jehovah acknowledged her as his people, and cherished her under the figure of marriage, he as the husband, and she as the wife, this Zion is now comforted with the word that she has more children than ever before, and they shall be restored to her, when her separation from her husband Jehovah is ended. The separation was but temporary, to be succeeded by a union resting on a new and unchangeable covenant.

Barren in v. 1 is here used not of a woman who never bore, but of one who is separated but shall return. Let her sing and prepare to return under conditions greatly improved, all under the figure of a great tent stretched out in the homeland, both north and south, compassing not only the old land of Palestine but also the lands and cities of neighboring nations, even though now they be desolate and uninhabited. When that joyous return has been consummated she will remember none of these desolate days of exile, when she was filled with shame. She need not fear, for "her husband is her Maker" (so, not her maker is her husband). Her husband is He that made all that is, and has therefore dominion over the whole earth. She is now recalled not as some old wife, no longer a joy, but as a wife of youth. The time of exile may have seemed long to her, but it is really only a small moment, and she will now be gathered again with great mercies. His face was hidden in wrath only for a moment, to be succeeded by an everlasting kindness. This new covenant is sure, and it is compared with the permanence of the covenant with Noah, and also with the everlasting hills.

11-17. The Splendor of Jerusalem Restored. Here we come to a brilliant description of the glories of the restored city of Jerusalem, for it shall far exceed all that the ancient city was, the city from which the exiles were carried to Babylonia. The city is to be rebuilt of stone, and the stones are to be laid in fair colors, but the Hebrew seems rather to mean "in antimony." The salt of antimony was, and still is, used by Oriental women as a cosmetic. It was carried in a box or small horn, and was gray in color, a slight line of it was deftly run on the eyelids and there it turned black and at a little distance enlarged the appearance of the eye, and supposedly its dark fire of beauty. Here it is to be used as a costly mortar to set off the beauty of fine stones. The foundation stones are to be sapphires, and the pinnacles rubies, and the gates are "fiery stones" which means probably carbuncles, though the LXX renders stones of crystal, and all the border, i.e., the outer wall, of precious stones. To correspond to this external splendor there is to be an internal spiritual life of the inhabitants (v. 13). The people shall all be disciples of Jehovah, not dependent upon human teachers; so shall be fulfilled the wish of Moses (Num. 11²⁹). In righteousness, or perhaps better "in triumph," shall the city be established, and need fear no oppression or terror, i.e., destruction. Both oppression and destruction had the city well known, much feared and greatly experienced. This is now over and done; no more shall enemies gather, as they had so often done even under Jehovah's own command, but he shall raise them up no more, and if they gather of their own will they shall fall.

V. 15 is a difficult verse (see R.V. mg.), but there is no need to reject it, as Duhm and Cheyne have done, and the sense extracted by the R.V. seems reasonable and satisfactory. God will protect his people from any further attack upon them. No enemy can invade without arms, and arms are made by the smith, but the smith was created by Jehovah, and cannot make weapons without his will, nor can the enemy, the waster, destroy without Jehovah's will (cf. Nah. 2¹¹). No weapon that any one can fashion shall be able to work against them, nor any tongue condemn. All these things are the heritage of the servants of Jehovah; all these blessings which have been enumerated in this ringing chapter are for the saints of his. Note here that we have the servants of the Lord in the plural. Skinner suggests, and rightly, that this connects the chapter with the Servant of Jehovah in the preceding passages. "The ideal represented by the Servant of Jehovah is now reproduced in each individual member of the new Israel."

CHAPTER LV

This is a chapter of great beauty, of a melody so exquisite that its opening words have sung their way down the centuries and found place in Christian liturgies and in Christian lectionaries. Yet for all its beauty of words it is withal a solemn and earnest chapter.

1-5. "Come . . . Without Money and Without Price." Let us remember to whom the words were addressed in the first instance. The people had gone into exile with many heartburnings and with sharp cries against their captors, of which Psa. 137 is a vivid reminder. Then Jeremiah (chs. 29f.) wrote them an urgent letter desiring them to accept the situation as God-given national punishment, to be reconciled to the Babylonians, and pray for their peace, to give themselves diligently to the ordinary business of life and there win prosperity until God should will otherwise for them. Some accepted his advice and applied it with too great energy. The Hebrews had a gift for religion perhaps never completely paralleled among any other people. But the rudimentary possibilities of other kinds were in them, and in Babylonia these came very strongly to the fore. They developed immense capacity for business, and many rose to great heights of wealth and power. Of these, few retained the old religious fire. We need only to look about us—nay, even into our own hearts—to see how readily do religious emotions die when religious practices are abandoned, even temporarily. In Babylonia there were no Jewish temple services, and great were the efforts of the prophets like Ezekiel and the Second Isaiah to keep faith alive. To those who were absorbed in successful business in Babylonia are these words addressed, calling them back to God and to religious thought and meditation. The people are called by the prophet to come and seek spiritual nourishment, here figured under wine and milk. Let them give over the mad race for money, only to spend it for those things which can never satisfy the deep cravings of the human heart. Let them, rather, take the religious life freely offered without money and without price. Nowhere else in all the O.T. is the gospel invitation more wonderfully foreshadowed than in these words of the prophet. The only condition necessary is to incline the ear and come. There are no barriers between these people and their God. He is ready to impart a new life and to make with them an everlasting covenant, even the same mercies or lovingkindnesses promised long before to David (2 Sam. 7⁸⁻¹⁶). David in his day was a witness, leader, and commander to his people, but the complete fulfillment of all the promises to him will only come in the person of the great Prince of his house who is later to arise. This coming Prince is the Messiah, who is indeed not elsewhere made known by the Second Isaiah, who has only portrayed the ideal King, not the suffering Servant. In due time, however, the Messiah, the ideal King and the suffering Servant all were blended in one person, even the Lord Christ. (See Excursus following ch. 53 above, p. 664.)

6-9. Repentance the Condition to Restoration. But before the Messiah can come men must prepare for his coming, and the first step is that they be summoned to repentance, not to wails and tears as too often the modern man is disposed to define repentance, but to an entirely new life. The people are still in exile in Babylonia, but their release is coming soon; let them make preparation for it by seeking the Lord. He is now near, for he will be the leader of his people in their great march homeward, and he will be easily found. But upon men must come the burden of action, and the action required is to forsake the old sinful ways and the old sinful thoughts. This is true repentance, an anticipation of the N.T. doctrine. But man need not fear that the Lord will be harsh to the sinner on his return—nay, he will have mercy and will abundantly pardon. Let us read the words over again and taste their beauty and power. While the great peoples of Egypt or of Babylonia are wearied in the search for some escape from sin by magic, or incantations and wild cries for deliverance, the Jew is worshipping a God who needs no such appeal, requiring only that man change his life and seek his God, who will, without question or hesitation, have mercy and abundantly pardon. The ground for confidence that Jehovah will really do as the prophet promises is that he is a God far above all the weakness of men. His thoughts are not like man's, but transcend them in every way. His will for men is for their redemption; his purposes cannot be compared with man's. (Turn back and look at Isa.

40²⁷, and compare the beautiful words in Jer. 29¹¹ and see also Mic. 4¹².)

10-13. God's Word as a Fructifying Power. Jehovah's will to deliver his people from their sins is expressed in his word. This word will accomplish its mission, and the accomplishment is pictured very beautifully and poetically in the figure of rain and snow. God has given an energy to his word, an energy of its own, as he has to rain and snow, and it will fulfill its purpose as they do theirs. Once again does the prophet return to the glorious deliverance from Babylon. Jehovah will come, take his people out with joy and peace, not as they came out of Egypt, but in glory and honor. Even the natural world shall know the import and celebrate its occurrence. The mountains, so solid, so stolid as their wont has been, will unite with the hills in singing, while the trees clap their hands. Then when they are on the march the desert flora will be changed, and its repellent wild growths will be changed to the useful or the beautiful. In v. 13 these growths are enumerated, and the first mentioned, translated thorn, is a word which occurs elsewhere only in Isa. 7¹⁹ and is, with probability, supposed to be the same fiercely growing wild bush which is found still in the Jordan valley and up through the wilderness even close to Jerusalem. It has acquired the illfitting popular name of "Christ-thorn," and forms impenetrable clumps of savage, tearing thorns. It is to disappear and in its place will grow the very useful "cypress," here wrongly translated fir-tree. The word translated brier is in Hebrew sirpad, which is apparently an Egyptian word, the name of a kind of papyrus plant used in part for food. In its stead shall come up the myrtle, one of the most highly prized and widely distributed growths of all Palestine. In poor soils it is a shrub, but in good it rises to considerable size as a bushy tree. It has dark-green scented leaves, starry white flowers, and dark berries which are still eaten. It is still used among the cheerful decorations of the feast of Tabernacles. These all shall remain growing in the desert after Israel has passed by on the way to its former home, and they shall be an everlasting sign of God's providence.

So ends this beautiful chapter, and with it concludes the prophecy of that great prophet whose work began with ch. 40. He is indeed the Evangelical Prophet of God's people. He that carried down to us and our day the unforgettable pictures of the suffering Servant has fulfilled his mission, his work ends and we turn now to the consideration of other voices in chs. 56-66.

CHAPTERS 56 TO 66: THE THIRD PART OF THE BOOK OF ISAIAH

To any observant and unprejudiced reader there comes the impression as he begins to read ch. 56 of a great change in circumstance, tone, and color. The break from the high tone of ch. 55 is sudden and unmistakable. The first eight verses of ch. 56 make the break far more noticeable than any verses in the whole series. Their subject seems fussy and small when contrasted with the organlike tones of ch. 55. The eunuchs and proselytes seem so poor a subject after the redeemed of the Lord, a whole people invited to return to the Lord and take up the march over a transformed desert. The modern reader is almost ready to say that it does not matter at all what happens to the poor eunuchs, nor even to a small gleanings of folk out of the nations that knew not Jehovah. There is nothing else in the whole series of chapters so poor as these verses, yet they have done their useful literary work and set these chapters apart. Very different would have been the effect if chs. 60-62 had followed immediately upon ch. 55. They have melody and beauty not at all unworthy to compare with chs. 40-55 and would very likely have found a general, perhaps a very wide, acceptance as the work of the same mind (see pp. 653-4). Indeed, there are still some who would be disposed to hold that they really belong to him and have only been accidentally misplaced. There will be opportunity for another word about these chapters later, and we may pass them by for the moment, and speak yet a word more about the remaining chs., 56-59 and 63-66. The very first impression which they make is that they are not homogeneous. They change every little while, and one reads on, thinking as he does that the sound is not of one but of several prophetic voices. Some of these we should feel lack markedly a richness of vocabulary, a beauty of phrase, a colorful expression, but this would not appear in 631-6, which has fire and dash, is graphic and sustained in rhythm. And again there follows upon this (637-641²), a long prayer and confession which is sad, yet has a tone not unworthy of association with great passages elsewhere in this book.

With diversities so great as these here very imperfectly indicated, the date of these prophecies is extremely difficult to determine and doubts must be widely held concerning any attempt even to approximate it. On the whole, however, it seems clear enough that the major portion, if not all, comes from a period not only after the return from exile, but even as to most of it considerably after that significant event. It seems, e.g., clear enough that the Temple has not only been rebuilt, but its services have been long enough in observance to provide opportunities for minor difficulties and differences of opinion or practice to have arisen which cause debate or even confusion. If we consider the import of the rebuilt Temple, and of its services, we are carried down lower than the period of Haggai and Zechariah, i.e., later than 515 B.C. If we range with this matter other little hints too delicate for discussion without the citation of Hebrew, we must come down still later even to the period of Nehemiah, about 450 B.C. Let us rest the matter there and without dogmatism, but, rather, with much diffidence say that, on the whole, these chapters may better be located there than at any other time. And now come we to a brief exposition of the chapters and verses.

CHAPTER LVI

1-8. A Prophecy Concerning Eunuchs and Proselytes. The point of immediate emphasis for both these classes is the keeping of the Sabbath. The Jews have long been re-established in their own land, and many hearts were sad enough with disappointment, for the glories foreseen by the prophets have not appeared. Life was drab enough. The salvation of the Lord had been, so far as they could see, postponed, deferred; perhaps it would never come. They are creeping along, not bounding forward. They are busy with ritual and with matters small and poor when compared with the grandeur that had been promised. In these dull verses, the eunuchs come first. They can feel no inheritance in Jewry, for they cannot found a family and carry on its name. Let them keep the Sabbath, and do no evil. The prophet offers this as a duty, and makes the promise that somewhere within the Temple precincts a memorial or, better, a monument shall be set up for them, and that will be better than sons and daughters. The second class, who appear to have been anxious concerning their status under the new regime in Jerusalem after the return, was composed of the proselytes (v. 6, strangers) who were fearful lest they be somehow excluded, saying, The Lord will surely separate me from his people. To them reply is now made in vv. 6-8. They are advised that if they keep the Sabbath, and hold fast the covenant, they need neither doubt nor fear. Jehovah will surely bring them to the holy mountain, i.e., the sanctuary, and all their offerings and sacrifices will be accepted.

Then comes the splendid declaration that God's house shall be a house of prayer for all peoples, and not for the Jews only. This is cited by our Lord (Mt. 21¹³ Mk. 11¹⁷ Lk. 19⁴⁶). Then to those already gathered God will gather others. It is the true note of universal diffusion of the knowledge of God and its world-wide acceptance which was later to characterize Christianity.

9-12. A Furious Arraignment of the Leaders of Israel (including also 57^{1, 2}, which see). The passage 56^{9-57²¹}, which describes the idolatrous conduct of the people, is separated in thought as well as in form from the preceding. It comprises a severe indictment of disorders and of idolatry within the restored community. This runs on to 57^{13a}, and is followed by good and gentle promises to the humble and the penitent (57^{13b-21}). The evils are plainly ascribed to the Jewish authorities of the period (56^{10, 11}), and the seats of the idolatry are clearly Palestinian and not Babylonian (57⁵⁻⁷). The evils condemned are the same as those described in chs. 58 and 59, while the idolatries are again condemned in 65¹⁻⁷ 66^{1-4, 17}, and this makes it clear that those passages are contemporaneous; and the whole situation finds its parallel in Mal. 2¹¹ 3⁵ Neh. 5²⁻⁵ and Ezra 9^{1, 2}. With these, then, we are fairly safe in fixing this passage in point of time. It remains only that we examine it in details just enough to get the general view of it.

The incompetence or ignorance of the leaders leaves the whole nation defenseless. In verse order it runs so: In a figure the wild beasts are bidden to come and devour the people, because dogs, who are their natural protectors, are sleepy and dumb, and they are ever greedy (vv. 9-11). (The comparison between the rulers and dogs is interesting. The Jews, like the modern Arabs, were never lovers of dogs, and the comparison is quite naturally against the dog. It seems to have been the Indo-European who more largely and truly loved man's first friend among the animals.) The figure is dropped and the rulers are painted as having most pleasure in a great drunken carouse (vv. 11, 12). As a consequence the righteous perish and find their only rest and peace in the grave (57^{1, 2}).

CHAPTER LVII

1, 2. See comments on 56⁹⁻¹².

3-13a. An Attack Upon an Idolatrous Party. It is not easy to make sure who composed this idolatrous party. Among many attempts in modern times to identify them, the two that most stand out are that they were either the Samaritans or the Jews who were left behind in Palestine when Nebuchadrezzar carried out the deportation in 586 B.C. To the view that it was the Samaritans, Skinner gives his approval, but to me it seems much more likely to be those who remained in the land in 586 B.C., and formed various ties and connections with the Samaritans in the north and with their still remaining Palestinian neighbors. When the introduction of the Law under Ezra and Nehemiah took place they refused compliance, or were so much entangled with heathen or half-heathen rites and ceremonies that they would not have been acceptable to the orthodox. Their attitude toward religion was not a complete rejection of Jehovah. It was not a pure idolatry; it was a mixture of the worship of their father's God with idolatrous rites, or beliefs. It was, indeed, a religious syncretism. It was representatives of these ideas and practices that Nehemiah drove out, and so unconsciously produced the Samaritan religious community of which a sorry fragment remains to this day in and about Nablous. The castigation of them in the verses which follow is fearfully severe. Their forms of worship, under every green tree, "child sacrifice," "stone worship," all come under the lash. The allusion to bed (v. 7) hints at the connection between idolatry and adultery, while the next reference (v. 8) is to some heathen figure or idol used in private house worship. In v. 9 the word for king is in Hebrew Melek, which is the name of a Canaanite deity, and to him and the use of oils and unguents in his worship is probably the allusion, while the reference in Sheol (mg.) is probably to the gods of the infernal regions widely known and worshiped among neighboring nations. The journey to heathen shrines was often long and wearisome, but they kept on (v. 10) and were in fear of these idols, and not of the living God, and this perhaps because he was silent (v. 11; cf. Ps. 50²¹). I will declare thy righteousness—this is spoken ironically, and is followed at once by thy works, i.e., either their lives, or their idols, and they shall not profit (v. 12). Them which thou hast gathered (v. 13) is one word in Hebrew; it occurs only here, so its meaning is doubtful. It probably means idols; the wind shall blow them away. The next clause is a promise to those that take refuge in Jehovah, and introduces the next section.

13b-21. "The Lofty One that Inhabith Eternity. In fine and ringing sentences the prophet makes splendid promises to those who follow the Lord and not the idols. The figure with which he begins is the highway of salvation taken from 40³ (cf. also 62¹⁰) and Jehovah is speaking. In the earlier passage it is a description of the highway by which the returning exiles shall come home to Jerusalem; here it is only a figure of speech for the removal of everything which hinders the spiritual advance of the people of God. The God who will accomplish this is he who inhabits eternity and is not only on high but also holy, yet is he, on the other hand, willing to dwell with him who is crushed and abased in spirit, and these will he revive in spirit and heart. God will not contend (v. 16), i.e., punish forever, because man is so frail that he would break down under the strain. But God has seen the ways of man and will heal him, and restore him. God will create the fruit of the lips, (v. 19), which means "praise and thanksgiving," and will cry out peace to those afar off, i.e., those that are still in Babylonia; and those that are near, i.e., those that have already returned. In contrast to these who are thus made happy are the wicked who are described by the figure of the troubled sea which casts up mire and dirt. This is a description of the movements of conscience which will not let the wicked be at rest (vv. 20, 21). There is an even finer picture of the evil conscience in Job 15:20-25.

CHAPTER LVIII

A chapter devoted to fasting and to the observance of the Sabbath. It falls naturally into two parts—fasting, vv. 1-12, and the Sabbath, vv. 13, 14.

1-12. Fasting. The fault the prophet has to expose is formal fasting, which the people could and did carry on without interfering with evil practices in their daily lives. Fasting as a religious observance was common at all periods of Hebrew history, but the period of the Exile systematized it. In exile the ceremonies of the Temple ritual could not be carried through, and other religious forms were sought to take their place. During the last siege of Jerusalem disasters occurred (Zech. 7:3-5 8:19), and the memory of these was kept alive by a regular series of fasts held in the fourth, fifth, seventh, and tenth months on their anniversaries. When the people returned they brought these ceremonial fasts with them, and thought by them to attract the divine favor. So the prophet is bidden to cry out to them. They have complained that God paid no heed to their fastings and prostrations. To which the prophet in God's name makes answer, that even while they fast they find time to indulge their own pleasure, or, rather, to attend to their business and oppress their laborers (v. 3; cf. mg.). Their fasting is an external exercise, and makes them irritable for strife and contention, and fails to make their voice heard on high. Skinner aptly quotes,

"My words fly up, my thoughts remain below, Words without thoughts never to heaven go." (Hamlet, Act III, Scene 3.)

But these are not the suitable expressions for such a fast as Jehovah would desire. The true fast is described in vv. 6 and 7. Its expression is both positive and negative. They must abstain from oppressing the weak, and instead make provision for the destitute. (Cf. Ezek. 187-9 Zech. 8:16, 17 Job 31:13, 14 Mt. 57, 612, 18). When such ethical fasts and social duties take the place of the empty forms which they practice, then will come the glory of God's healing, then they may call and the Lord will answer. Then will come a true prosperity, and they shall be able to rebuild the waste places. This suggests strongly the period of Nehemiah.

13, 14. The Sabbath. Once more we come upon injunctions to keep the Sabbath. This also points toward the period of Nehemiah, when regulations were enforced to protect the day (Neh. 13:15). One phrase in this passage is unusual. The Sabbath is called the holy of the Lord; the word rendered pleasure should be "business." If they fulfil these commands, then God will cause them to ride upon the high places of the earth—which is apparently a quotation from Deut. 32:13. So is scripture tied up with scripture, and echo answers echo.

CHAPTER LIX

1-8. Sin a Barrier Between God and Men. This paragraph is closely connected with the last chapter and seems to be a part of the same prophetic message. We shall probably not go far astray if we so assume, and attempt the exposition of it on that basis. The prophet blames directly on the people the troubles that are upon them. His argument is that God is as able as ever to succor his people, and their troubles in the land of restoration are not due to his inability or unwillingness but to their sin. The arraignment is sharp, for blood guiltiness is charged, and they are litigious, and not in righteousness. Under a figure they are described as carrying on schemes which are profitable neither to themselves nor to others. This continues in v. 6 under an expansion of the figure, the point of which is that no good can possibly come from evil works.

9-21. God's Willingness to Destroy the Barrier. There are, however, good men among them who correctly discern the situation and lament the evil which they recognize is due not to God's remissness but to the sins of their fellows. This leads to a confession in vv. 12-15a. In the people's name the prophet confesses their sins, as shown in manifold transgressions and a denial of God. Righteousness, truth, and uprightness are unable to maintain themselves. But though the present is dark, some day Jehovah will interfere (vv. 15b-20). When Jehovah sees that there is none to interpose (v. 16, mg.) he concludes that he himself must rescue Israel. It seems possible, but hardly probable, that the evils from which he will bring deliverance are those already recounted, the social ills of the people themselves; however, more likely the reference is to external ills of some sort inflicted by the Persians who now ruled them. The prophet speaks in the prophetic perfect as though the intervention had already occurred. God is represented as a warrior putting on armor, and the figure carries over into the N.T. (Eph. 6^{14ff.} 1 Thess. 5⁸). In v. 18 according to and accordingly are very awkward in Hebrew, but the meaning is not very obscure, and we need not resort to conjecture. The last clause, to the islands (read with mg. coastlands) he will repay recompense, is wanting in the LXX and is probably an insertion. The translation of v. 19 in the R.V. is based largely on the LXX and is, on the whole, preferable to any other yet suggested, but the text is not above suspicion. In v. 20 the translation should be And as a Redeemer will he come to Zion; and in the next clause the LXX offers a better text in the translation, and shall turn away transgression from Jacob. Cf. Rom. 12²⁰, where there is a Messianic application. The final verse of the chapter seems to lack all connection with the preceding. It looks much like an insertion from some other prophetic message.

CHAPTERS 60 TO 62: THE FUTURE GLORY OF THE CITY OF JERUSALEM

We pass quickly from gloom and sin, from confession and manifold anxieties, to a prophecy of uncommon beauty and eloquence in chs. 60-62. They also belong to this later period, though they are so much like chs. 40-55 that one is tempted to think of them as a fragment which is misplaced here and belongs rather with those beautiful chapters of the Second Isaiah. On the whole, however, it accords best with such probabilities as there are to assign the chapters to the later age. The prophecy antedates, however, the days of Nehemiah, for the city walls are still not built (60¹⁰).

CHAPTER LX

1-9. The Nations Flock to a Restored Zion.

It is Jehovah himself who is here speaking, bidding Jerusalem arise and shine in the reflected light of his glory. The picture is of a city gleaming in the light of the morning, while the rest of the world is in darkness, and so the nations must come out of their darkness to Zion's light. In vv. 4-9 is a prediction that the scattered sons of Israel shall come home to their own people. One of the greatest difficulties of the restoration period was that so many of the exiles still remained in Babylonia and in other lands to which they had scattered. With them shall come also the abundance, i.e., the wealth of sea-borne commerce, and the great land caravans as well, typified under numbers of camels. Dromedaries should be "young camels," i.e., less than nine years old. Ephah is a Midianite tribe (Gen. 25⁴), and the Midianites were famed for their numbers of camels. Sheba lies in the southern part of Arabia; Kedar and Nebaioth are sons of Ishmael, and are pastoral tribes in Northern Arabia. The latter are probably the ancestors of the Nabateans, who formed a powerful kingdom in the second century B.C. (1 Macc. 5²⁵ 9³⁵).

10-14. Jerusalem to be Rebuilt by Its Destroyers. The city is to be rebuilt by the very foreigners who had destroyed it and carried off its people. The walls were still in ruin when Nehemiah came in 445 B.C., and it was he who took the lead in their reconstruction, receiving help from Artaxerxes, the Persian king (Neh. 27. 8). But the city will not need these walls for defense against evil nations. Rather her gates will be open day and night to receive the offerings of nations and their kings. V. 12 interrupts both thought and meter and is probably an insertion made out of Zech. 14¹⁷⁻¹⁹. The Temple has been rebuilt but upon a small scale, and it is now promised that it will be adorned and beautified by the choicest woods; and to this Temple shall come the descendants of the people who had harassed and destroyed Israel.

15-22. "The Lord Shall be an Everlasting Light." Whereas they had been a despised people they will now be fairly overwhelmed with adulation from abroad, and all the finest and most beautiful metals will take the place of humbler ones; and in correspondence with this external magnificence there shall be internal peace and righteousness. In that glorious age even the ordinary means of lighting the city shall not be needed, neither sun nor moon, but God shall be its light. The passage perhaps owes its primary suggestion to Ezek. 43², and in its turn becomes the foundation of the fine description of the New Jerusalem in Rev. 21²³. The sun and moon will not be destroyed, but rather shall never set, and God will be an everlasting light, and there shall be no more mourning. But the ethical side is not to be forgotten, for all shall be righteous, and they shall be so increased in number that there will be a great nation. All this will come to pass in due time; when the Lord is ready he will hasten it.

CHAPTER LXI

This chapter follows upon and carries out further the prediction of the future glories of Zion, as they are portrayed in ch. 60, but it has even closer ties with ch. 62.

1-3. The Prophet Anointed to Preach Good Tidings. The beginning is here quite different from both preceding and following. Here it is introduced by a speaker, and we must ask who he was. The answer, in spite of much debate, must be that it is the prophet himself; but the description of him is much colored by the imagery of the suffering Servant, and the prophet here becomes a sort of type of him in outline. He is here an ideal prophet, and thus becomes a type of the Christ as the suffering Servant. For this reason it is that our Lord identifies himself with this speaker (Lk. 41^{8f.}). This herald comes under a divine anointing to preach good tidings to the meek, i.e., the poor, the distressed, the humble. He is also to bind up, i.e., "heal" the broken-hearted, set free the captives, and to proclaim the acceptable, i.e., the "favorable" year of the Lord. There is also to be vengeance on the oppressors of the people, and perhaps also upon their own sinners. Then they are to have a garland on their heads instead of ashes, which were a sign of mourning, and oil of joy instead of mourning (for Orientals did not anoint themselves with oil when they were in mourning), and a garment of praise instead of a failing or flickering spirit. The trees are the terebinths, which were evergreen, an emblem of the life of the righteous.

4-11. Israel's Destiny as a Kingdom of Priests. In v. 4 we have the old predictions of rebuilding as in 49⁸ 58¹² 60¹⁰; for the need of this and the joy its accomplishment would bring was much on their minds. Then follows a picture of Israel as a nation acting as priest for the nations and so receiving such honors from other nations as the lay folk of Israel were in the habit of offering their priests. Israel had been called in the beginning to be a nation of priests or a kingdom of priests (Ex. 19⁶), and now this glorious destiny is at last to be fulfilled. In the glory of the nations shall ye boast yourselves (v. 6). This is sustained by the ancient versions, but the reading in the margin of the R.V., to their glory shall ye succeed, is perhaps preferable. The positions shall be reversed. Israel, which had suffered such humiliation, will now be moved into the place of glory and dignity formerly occupied by the nations. The robbery and iniquity (v. 8) are of the nations who oppressed Israel, and Israel is now to find a recompense, and God will make with them a covenant never to be broken.

In v. 10 Jerusalem is speaking, and giving thanks; as it breaks the connection between vv. 9 and 11 it must probably be regarded as a misplaced fragment. God will cause righteousness and praise to spring forth.

CHAPTER LXII

A beautiful and eloquent chapter well worthy to close the little group of prophecies in chs. 60-62.

1-5. "The Forsaken" to Become "A Delight." The speaker is probably the prophet as in 61¹, but there are some phrases which would make it appropriate to consider the speaker as Jehovah himself (cf. 61⁸); the reference to the Lord in the third person in vv. 2-5, however, makes the prophet as speaker seem on the whole most probable. As we read on it becomes more and more clear that the prophet is putting forth herculean efforts to encourage a people who were sorely discouraged. Just as it was the chief business and duty of the Second Isaiah to encourage the exiles to believe that Jehovah had not forgotten them but would see them safely out of Babylonia and on the way homeward, so now it was the mission of the "Third Isaiah" to encourage the returned people. They were obviously unhappy, as has before been pointed out, and to many of them the glories of earlier predictions must have seemed a mockery. So now the prophet appears as an intercessor with Jehovah on their behalf, and for their sakes will not be silent. For lamp in v. 1 read torch. Again we have the emphatic note that the nations will know and mark Israel's glory. They also shall have a crown; the ancient custom was to surmount a city deity with a mural crown, but in this case Jehovah will hold it in his hand, and over them. No more shall Jerusalem be called Forsaken, i.e., in Hebrew, Azubah, but, rather, Hephzibah ("delight in her") and Beulah ("married"), for she is to be married to the Lord.

6-9. The Duty of the Watchmen on the Walls. Here the prophet describes himself as assisted in the supplication just mentioned by a corps of watchmen on the reconstructed walls, who join in reminding Jehovah of his promises and in beseeching him for their fulfillment. The usual business of watchers on city walls was to sound the alarm on the approach of enemies, but these have a different purpose. They are apparently angelic visitors who stand on the new walls and take up the prophet's supplication to carry it on. Yet there are dangers to the city at the hands of marauders like the Edomites (Mal. 12-5), or because of the exactions of Persian governors (Neh. 5¹⁵). These are slight but useful hints in locating the date of the chapter as belonging to the restoration period. The watchers need not cry out that the invaders are coming, but need only remind the Lord of his promised protection.

10-12. Complete Restoration. Here is the encouraging announcement that the rest of the exiles are coming. Many had remained in Babylonia, while others were in Egypt, or even more widely dispersed. They will now enter the gates of Jerusalem, and preparations must be made to facilitate their journey. The prophet is clearly influenced by the description given by the Second Isaiah of the preparations for the first return. The salvation of Jerusalem comes and the fine phrase, Behold, his reward is with him, is quoted from 40¹⁰. And they are henceforth to be called a holy people, redeemed of the Lord, and the city is to be called, Sought out, i.e., sought after, or much sought after, in contrast to "Forsaken" as it had been. It is to be just the opposite of that which is suggested in an earlier description, "This is Zion, whom no man seeketh after" (Jer. 30¹⁷).

CHAPTER LXIII

1-6. Jehovah Approaching in Avenging Fury. Here is a poem of great but awful beauty, quite detached from all that precedes and follows. The prophet on some place of lookout perceives approaching from the southeast, from the direction of Edom, a majestic and lonely but awful figure; on him are crimsoned (better than dyed, but the word means literally "sharpened") garments, which are described in our translation as glorious, but the word really means "swelling," and the figure is not very clear. Duhm thinks it means they are blown out by the winds, and this, though uncertain, may be correct. He is marching; Delitzsch beautifully explains the action out of Arabic parallels as a "gesture of proud self consciousness." The awe-stricken prophet calls out to ask who this may be, and receives an answer that shows the person to be none other than the Lord himself. The Lord declares himself as true in speech, and as mighty to save. The Christian fathers made the lamentable blunder of thinking this to be Messianic, a picture in some way of Jesus the Christ in his capacity of Saviour by the outpouring of blood. But this was hopelessly wrong. It is the Lord Jehovah in his capacity not as a Saviour but as an Avenger. For centuries his people have been trodden down, plundered, slain, exiled. He has at long last come to avenge their wrongs. The Warrior-Avenger answers the prophet and tells who he is and what he has done. All this is future in reality, but it is expressed in perfect tenses to give it a sense of certainty. The A.V. translates much in future tense, but the R.V. does the original justice by representing the whole picture through perfects. The Lord usually commissions men or nations to execute his judgments, but in this instance he trod down Israel's oppressors and did it alone. The crimsoned garments were sprinkled with the blood of his victims. I trod is perfect, though the Hebrew has "I will tread"; the LXX supplies the necessary correction. Stained should be "defiled," a stronger word, and it is worth noting that it is an Aramaic and not a Hebrew form, and is so another slight indication of a late date. In v. 4 was in mine heart, should be "is in my heart"; heart means the seat of purpose, as in many other places, e.g., in Judg. 5¹⁵, 2 Chr. 12¹⁴. There was none to help. Jehovah looked the whole world over to see what nation or what man might save his people, but there was none and he must himself bring their deliverance. The contrast between this situation and that presented in the Second Isaiah is striking, for in the latter case the Lord had a deliverer ready for the task in the person of Cyrus. In v. 6 Jehovah again declares that he trod down the peoples, but the verb is not the same as that used in v. 3. Made them drunk; to make drunk is to lay prostrate, make helpless. Notice that it is the peoples, not "a people" that the warrior avenger is trampling in his anger. It is not only the people of Edom, historic enemies of the Hebrews since the days of Moses, but all other of the ancient enemies of the Israelites, including the Egyptians, Assyrians, and Chaldeans, as well as minor peoples such as Moabites, Philistines, Tyrians and the Aramæans of Damascus.

7-19. Prayer for the Renewal of Jehovah's Lovingkindness. In 63⁷-64¹² is found a remarkable prayer of deep and humble piety, and readily recognizable as representative of a type of devotion which arose especially during the exile. Then a people brokenhearted and demoralized, stripped of the sense of victory which they had enjoyed under David and Jeroboam II, were turning to God in humility of soul to find a way of assured communion with him and happiness therein. At first blush one would wish to ascribe this prayer to that period, were it not that difficulties obtrude. It is indeed a very complex problem. The historical allusions are not only very explicit in one place and vague in another, but, worse still, are at times even contradictory. Thus, e.g., it is made clear that Jerusalem and its Temple lie desolate (64¹⁰) and the Temple has been burned (63¹⁸ 64¹¹). These allusions would suit well the period between 586 and 537 B.C. But then we read that they had possessed the desolated sanctuary but a little while (63¹⁸), and this surely does not well fit the three hundred and fifty years or so that they had worshiped in it from Solomon to Nebuchadnezzar. Furthermore, the general tone suits the depressing period soon after the return better than the period of exile, and so one would think of the period between 537 and 520 B.C. But the Temple rebuilding did not begin until then, and 63¹⁸ would seem to imply that it had been rebuilt and only occupied for a little while. Thus we come to the difficulty of supposing that it had again been laid low; but we do not know of any destruction during this period, though suppositions have been advanced that the Samaritans had destroyed it. The simple truth is that we do not know the historical background of the passage and have no right to be dogmatic about it. On the whole, balancing probabilities, it seems best to express the hesitant opinion that it may be located shortly after 520 B.C. and between then and 500, though gladly admitting that this does not meet every indication. This would make it the work of some unknown prophet who lived a little earlier than the Third Isaiah.

At v. 7 the prophet turns back to past history and reminds himself of God's wonderful care of his people. This was very characteristic of the attitude of the devotionally minded. The glorious book of Psalms has much of it (Psa. 77¹⁰⁻¹⁵ 79^{1f}. 106²). It was in human history that God was manifested, and the Israelites always harked back in thought to the days when the divine manifestation was most readily discernible. God had confidence in their fathers, and believed that they would not be faithless, and for this he became their Saviour.

9. The verse is so beautiful that it were a pity to supplant or to change it, but difficulties in the text and the lack of complete parallels make the reading problematic. The ordinary

Hebrew text reads, "In all their affliction he was no adversary." It is the margin of the Hebrew text which has found a wide acceptance and this is adopted in both of our versions in the form, In all their affliction he was afflicted, literally, "there was affliction to him." Nowhere else in the O.T. is there so strong an expression of the divine sympathy as this, though there are approaches to it in Judg. 10¹⁶ and Psa. 106⁴⁴. That there is no parallel is, of course, not a proof that it does not occur here, but it does make one a bit doubtful. The doubt increases when we see that the LXX has a quite different text. It reads, In all their affliction it was not a messenger or an angel but his own self (Hebrew, his face, his presence) that saved them. This attracts us at once, and it may be right. He bare them would be better translated "he took them up." But though their God had so cared for them they proved faithless, and rebelled against him, and many are the illustrations of this which are reported in Holy Writ, as, e.g., in Num. 20¹⁻¹³ Psa. 78^{17, 40} 106³³; with these compare Acts 7⁵¹.

11. Here is a difficulty for which two solutions are proposed. It should be either Then he (i.e., Israel) remembered the days of old, or, Then his people remembered the ancient days of Moses (which is not a good order of words in Hebrew); the former is preferable. The next clause is, as commonly translated, ungrammatical in Hebrew, and one of the best LXX manuscripts is probably right in reading, Where is he that brought up from the sea the shepherd of his flock? This would make it a reference to the deliverance of the child Moses from the Nile (Ex. 2), the word "sea" being elsewhere used as an expression for the Nile (18² and 19⁵). The last word in the verse, them, should probably be "him," referring to Moses, as is the Hebrew, and also the A.V. The Lord's arm is personified, and is the symbol of God's power placed at the command of Moses, to divide the waters of the Red Sea and permit Israel to cross. Then in vv. 13 and 14 Israel is represented as crossing the sea just as firmly and securely as a horse treading the wilderness or the cattle going quietly into the valley. Thence God brought them to rest, i.e., in the promised land.

15-19. Basing his prayer on the experience of the past, the prophet in his day of gloom and disappointment appeals to God for a new manifestation, a new Theophany. God is represented as withdrawn from his people far away into heaven. He is not with them on earth as he was in the days of Moses, and piteously is besought to remember the mighty acts which he formerly wrought, and the yearnings of compassion toward his people which he then felt. God is then reminded that he is really the true father of the people. It is not Abraham; or Israel (Jacob), but God only, and he was the redeemer of old. The following verse (17) is very striking. The prophet actually reproaches Jehovah, and lays some of the blame upon him for the sins and the remissness of the people. God had not noticed their faint outreaching toward him. They were discouraged, and turned away from God rather than toward him. He had in effect hardened their hearts as he did Pharaoh's. Let God return to his people. V. 18 is again difficult in syntax, and it would greatly ease the matter to follow the LXX again, and read We have possessed but a little while thy holy mountain. This is not easy to explain, as has been intimated above in the introduction to this chapter, but no way out of the difficulty has yet appeared. V. 19 is quite plain, the meaning being that there is no longer any advantage in being an Israelite; they are as those heathen folk who have never had Jehovah as their God.

CHAPTER LXIV

Continuation of the Prayer for the Renewal of Jehovah's Lovingkindness. See notes above on 637-19.

Jehovah is besought for another great Theophany. It is put in a series of perfect tenses; read hadst for wouldst: "O that thou hadst rent," "hadst come down," "hadst quaked." The imagery is drawn from descriptions of other mighty theophanies, when the earth quaked, and the mountains melted (Ex. 19:16-18 Judg. 5:4, 5 Hab. 3:3f. Mic. 1:3, 4 Psal. 18:9). These were the glorious days, for in them God did terrible things which we looked not for, and so surpassed all their expectations.

4-12. The prayer changes into a less exciting strain, and becomes more tender in its supplication. It is not an easy passage, and the difficulty is at least partly due to the state of the text. In v. 4 especially is this the case. The Hebrew text differs from the LXX, and Paul's use in 1 Cor. 29 is based neither on the Hebrew nor the Greek but upon some other version to us otherwise unknown. See the critical commentaries. The prayer ends in a varied supplication that God may forget his anger, and hold his peace.

CHAPTERS 65 AND 66: THE FAITHFUL AND THE REBELLIOUS

Chs. 65 and 66 are apparently a continuous discourse, not easy to interpret in detail and still less easy to make popularly interesting. The situation with which they deal seems to be in the restoration period, in which we are elsewhere able, faintly at times, clearly at others, to recognize a division among the inhabitants of Palestine into two opposing parties. The one, consisting of diverse elements, was composed of the descendants of the Hebrews who were not carried away in 597 B.C., or 586 B.C., with some original Canaanite stocks and many Samaritans who had drifted down from the north. This ill-assorted group nevertheless wished to be considered Jews and observed after a fashion the ordinances of the law of Deuteronomy with many intermixtures. The other party was much more homogeneous, its basal constituent being the returned exiles. The latter received a valuable re-enforcement when Ezra came (Ezra 9:1-4). These two parties were at loggerheads and swords' points, each trying to excommunicate the other. It is a sorry picture.

CHAPTER LXV

1-7. Doing Evil in the Name of Religion. God complains of a people who are rebellious and practice impure rites. Sacrificing in gardens refers to worship under trees, a survival of Canaanite practices, but we have no idea what is meant by burning incense upon bricks. Sitting among graves is for purposes of necromancy; eating swine's flesh means at heathen sacrifices; and broth of abominable things was perhaps used in libations. God will not endure any of these offenses at their hands, remembering what their fathers did.

8-25. God's Rejection of the Faithless; A New Heaven and a New Earth for the Faithful. God will find new inheritors of the land, who shall eschew these evils, and as men preserve grape clusters for the wine later to be produced, so will he not destroy them all, but will give the land to the good among them; while he will slaughter the apostates who gave him no heed; the idolaters shall be sharply set apart from his true servants, who shall be well nurtured and shall sing joyously (vv. 13-16). Then shall begin the glorious Messianic age (vv. 17-25) when all these sad and disappointing days shall be forgotten. Man restored in spirit will find himself in a world likewise transformed, and sorrow and weeping shall be done away. Even untimely death shall disappear, and the child shall live to be an hundred years old. They who work and achieve shall have the reward of their labors, nor will they ever have need to appeal to their heavenly Father, for he will be quick to anticipate their desires even before they can be formulated into petitions. The poet catches up out of 116-9 the prediction of a transformed animal world, which he partly abbreviates and partly expands and so brings to an end the chapter.

CHAPTER LXVI

A chapter of mixed difficulties, of sudden shifts of subjects which afterward reappear. It remains to the Western mind, more methodical than the Eastern, enigmatic in its transferences and descriptive elements. We can do little else than divide it into sections and deal with them more or less separately.

1-4. A Protest Against Rebuilding the Temple. It must be inadequate whatever they may accomplish; the main problem is not a building but a poor and contrite spirit. It is a spiritual religion that God desires, and in v. 3 the point seems to be that sacrifices offered by unspiritual worshipers are as unwelcome as heathen rites symbolized under the slaying of a man or the breaking of a dog's neck.

5-14. The Results of a True Religion. The manifestation of God's pleasure will be in the increase of Zion. There follows (vv. 10-14) a prediction of peace, prosperity, and joy in the new Jerusalem, to participation in which all those are invited who have felt friendliness to the old city. In v. 11 there is one very difficult word, that which is translated abundance, in Hebrew ziz; this word is now known to us in Assyrian, where it means "udder," "teat," and it may be presumed to have the same meaning in Hebrew; metaphorically, therefore, abundance is not a bad attempt at translation.

15-17. Apostates and Their Certain Punishment. There is one doubtful phrase translated in the R.V. behind one in the midst. The best solution yet offered is to translate "after one in the midst," i.e., imitating his actions; and then to suppose that the intent is to picture a priest of some heathen cultus, surrounded by neophytes who imitate his movements in carrying out the sacred offices.

18-24. Restoration of Those Nations Which Survive the Judgment. The surviving nations shall be gathered to behold the Lord's glory, and among them God will set some great sign, i.e., a miracle. Then from among the survivors there will be chosen messengers to go and carry Jehovah's glory to many distant peoples whose names are taken from the book of Ezekiel (Pul should be Put, which was a land related commercially to the Egyptians and by them commonly called Punt). All these peoples will respond by bringing as an offering to Jehovah the Israelites who have been exiled or are dispersed among them. Israel thus reborn and remade shall be as enduring as the new heavens and the new earth. Then year in and year out, month in and month out, shall men worship the Lord, while outside of the sacred precincts shall they go to see the carcasses of the transgressors.

So ends the book in a note of horror, which the Massoretes felt so strongly that they gave directions that when this chapter was read in the synagogue, v. 23 was to be repeated after v. 24 had been read, that the book might be closed with words of consolation.

JEREMIAH

By PROFESSOR ADAM C. WELCH

INTRODUCTION

Historical Background. The period when Jeremiah was called to be a prophet was one of profound significance for Israel, especially for its religion. During the long reign of Manasseh the nation had been subject to Assyria, and this political dependence had brought with it a recognition of the religion of the suzerain power. Manasseh, who judged it impossible to resist Assyria, had accepted the inevitable consequences, and introduced several elements of Assyrian worship into the Temple at Jerusalem. Further, a large number of Eastern colonists had been settled in North Israel, and, though a Jewish priest had been sent back and had restored the old cult at Bethel, making it the religious center for the remaining Jewish population (2 Kings 17²⁸), the religion of the North was becoming an amalgam of the two faiths. There was grave danger that, if these conditions continued in the two parts of the country, Judaism, losing all its distinctive characteristics, might disappear as a vital force.

Reign of Josiah. Hence Josiah from his accession in 637 B.C. could count on all the best elements in the kingdom to join him in any effort promising a reformation. The conditions of the time gave the reformers their opportunity. So long as Assyria was strong, it was hopeless to throw off its control over the life of its subject states. But now Nineveh was engaged in a fight for life with Babylon and its allies. Needing all its strength to resist its enemies at home, it could not maintain its hold on the distant provinces of Syria, and a breath of liberty passed over all the West. Josiah purified the Temple from every emblem of Assyrian worship (2 Kings 23^{4f.}). The act was a declaration of Judæan independence, and appealed to the two strongest instincts in the kingdom, its passion for liberty and its zeal for its distinctive religion.

But in the weakness of Assyria Josiah saw an opportunity for Judah to extend its power over the now derelict province of North Israel and to reconstitute the old kingdom of David. He assumed authority over Samaria (2 Kings 23¹⁹), and since religion had always been the strongest bond between the kingdoms, that bond was drawn closer. About this time the religious literature of North Israel was adopted as the possession of all Jewry. E, the Israelite story of the nation's origin, was incorporated with J, the Judæan account. The records of the two kingdoms were amalgamated into the present books of Kings. Psalms from northern sanctuaries were admitted into the official Psalter. The book of Hosea was adapted to fit it for general acceptance. In the judgment of the present writer, Deuteronomy, originally an Israelite lawbook, was given wider recognition. (See, however, intro. to Deuteronomy, p. 320b.) Jewry was to become one through the possession of a common religious literature and common ideals. Finally the Temple at Jerusalem was made the only legitimate center for the worship of the restored nation.

Centralization of Worship. The time made this radical change possible. In Judah the Temple was the only shrine which had not been wrecked by the invasion of Sennacherib under Hezekiah. In Israel the one remaining sanctuary was that which had been restored at Bethel. Josiah merely needed, as he did (2 Kings 23^{15f.}), to destroy and desecrate this altar in order to leave the Temple in Jerusalem the sole center for sacrifice and pilgrimage. What had thus become the only sanctuary de facto was declared alone legitimate de jure.

The large plan obviously appealed both to patriotism and to religion. Standing for the restoration of united and independent Israel under a descendant of David, it appealed to every Jew who recalled the glory of the past. In the conditions of the time it stood also for purity of worship. Men were to be brought to the one sanctuary which had preserved unbroken the practices and traditions of the past; they were not to be left to drift into semi-heathenism. Since also the Jerusalem priests were declared the only legitimate priests, the plan secured the support of an official body all of whose interests enlisted its members for its success. Further, it appealed strongly to that large and dangerous body of opinion in every community which recognizes that something needs to be done and which accepts any reforming action that promises to be immediately effective. Few would have patience to ask on what ultimate principles the reform was based, and what therefore must be its consequences for the national religion.

Legalism and Nationalism. The reform, based as it was on false principles, led to disastrous consequences: it turned Judaism definitely in the direction of nationalism and legalism. Since it made one sanctuary and one priesthood not merely useful, but essential to right worship, it limited the grace of God and restricted the people's power to reach him. Only at the Temple and through its ritual could men enter into the full relation to their God. The older world had believed in a God who was the god of a race, whose power was largely limited to the country in which his people lived and who therefore could only be worshiped where his altar stood. The influence of this conception of religion appears in the remark of David (1 Sam. 26¹⁹). Josiah's reform meant in principle a return to this primitive form beyond which the better thought of Israel under the influence of its prophets had long advanced. Jehovah could only be rightly worshiped on the soil of Palestine. Again, since the Temple service with sacrifice and festival was essential to the faith, the method in which this ritual was performed by the priests and the ceremonial law which prescribed the correct condition of the worshipers became of primary importance. The attention of priests and people was directed to an exact observance of the outward means by which the divine grace was to be secured. Such an attitude meant simply a turning back to lower conceptions of the relation between God and Israel than those which had been taught by the prophets. For all these had insisted that obedience was more than sacrifice; and the obedience they had demanded had been an obedience to the moral and spiritual demands of the Law, not to its ceremonial requirements. The reform movement embodied both the legalistic, the nationalistic and the prophetic elements; emphasis on the ceremonial law represented both the nationalistic and the legalistic point of view; on the other hand, its moral and spiritual demands formed its historical and universal element, that is, its prophetic element.

The Prophet Jeremiah. It is easy to-day, in the light of the consequences which followed on centralization, to recognize its retrograde character. It is the peculiar merit of Jeremiah that he from the beginning saw how it threatened to undo the work of the prophets. He was a member of a priestly family at Anathoth, a village in Benjamin, north of Jerusalem—a fact which gave him special advantages in thinking about religion. He belonged to North Israel, in whose condition and fate he always felt a deep interest (cf. Jer. 36^f. 30). Therefore he was saturated in the thought of Hosea, the most spiritual of the prophets (cf. 21^f, etc.). He was reared in religious traditions, which meant that he knew something about the Israelite faith men were seeking to reform. Yet he did not belong to the professional priesthood, and was accordingly free from the narrowness which is apt to creep over an official caste. And three years before the Josianic reform he became a prophet (see 12, notes). It was through this experience that he entered into personal relation to the Eternal and learned to judge the laws which govern life and religion, not by their immediate and practical usefulness, but by their agreement with the divine principles, and especially with those which had been revealed to his predecessors in Israel's historic faith.

Like all the prophets he recognized the need for reform alike in Israel and in the world. To him as to them the day of the Lord was at hand: since the world was ripe for judgment, the foe from the North, the divine agent in judgment, would speedily come (14). In some of his early oracles (45^f.) he warned his fellow countrymen of the near advent of the great hour. What he asked from them was true repentance. The two essentials to a right reform were God and the penitent: everything else was secondary (31-5 319-44). For he went on to declare that, while Israel was indeed apostate like its sister Judah, it had at least not rendered itself impenetrable to the demands of its God by adopting a reform which was false in principle, and which therefore served to shut out from men's thoughts that which constituted a true return (36-12). His meaning was made clearer when he went up to Jerusalem in the time of Jehoiakim and, at a great festival in the center of the national reform, proclaimed Jehovah's purpose to destroy the Temple as completely as he had destroyed the sanctuary at Shiloh (chs. 7, 26). In the interests of religion it was better that the Temple should disappear, since it was being made a hindrance instead of a help. And, as religion had continued without Shiloh, it could continue without Jerusalem. Thereafter, when the court was inclined to rebel against Babylon, the prophet recognized and bade men recognize in the new world-power the instrument Jehovah was about to use for the destruction of the city (ch. 20). From that time through the succeeding reign of Zedekiah he never wavered in his conviction that Nebuchadrezzar should overrun Judah and destroy its capital. It was the divine will that this should be.

Denationalization of Religion. Jeremiah wrote to the exiles in Babylon that they must cease from all their efforts to return to Jerusalem (ch. 29). Their God had brought them into exile, and therefore in an exile which was of the divine appointment they could remain in relation to Jehovah and serve him with loyal contentment. Turning to men in Jerusalem, he told the priesthood, who counted their brethren in Babylon doubly exiled because they were outcasts from the divine grace, that those men were nearer God than themselves (ch. 24). For they were in no danger of turning a mere human institution into a substitute for faith. And, finally, he received for himself the needed and comfortable assurance that, though church and state must vanish in Judah, true religion could continue and should continue among the humble men who worshiped Jehovah in the fields and olive-yards of a Babylonian province (ch. 42).

Courage of Jeremiah. A man with such a religious message could expect only stout opposition in a community which had set its heart on a definite program of reform. The opposition that Jeremiah had been warned at his call to expect came soon and increased in bitterness to the end. The first to recognize the inevitable clash were the men who best knew what was at stake—the priests. From the hour when Jeremiah denied (ch. 26) that the Temple worship was essential, they rejected him, as their successors rejected Jesus. It took longer for the laymen to recognize what was involved. But when they, straining every nerve to defend the independence of their state, discovered that the prophet counted the national life quite secondary, they put him into a dungeon as the surest means to silence him (ch. 38). He seemed to them a traitor.

Nothing could be further from the truth than the common picture of Jeremiah as a plaintive sentimentalist. He was, as his call said he needed to be, like a brazen wall. Wherever principle entered he showed the almost inhuman austerity of every Puritan. He saw one thing, the religion which made men servants of Jehovah and which delivered them from haunting fear of success or failure. A Jew who could meet God in his day could meet anything; he walked the world a free man, free to expect God's coming and to serve him till he came. To Jeremiah this was a gospel. And it came as a shock to the single-minded enthusiast that his fellows counted him a traitor to the dearest hopes of Israel.

Spiritual Religion. Jeremiah envisaged a religion which was not national, but historical, since it had been revealed to Israel. It required no special institution like a local temple, and no peculiar organization like state or priesthood. It could be practised in every country where men, while giving allegiance to their rulers, retained their final allegiance to their

God. Its demands were spiritual, for men must pray; and moral, for they must serve. Jeremiah was thinking in terms of a universal religion. From this sprang that feature which has always been recognized in his attitude, his individualism. It was the corollary of his position as a prophet to the nations: the individual is alone the universal. But the basis of universalism and individualism alike was his spiritual and moral relation to his God (cf. the promise of the new covenant, 31³¹⁻³⁴).

His weakness was his failure to recognize the place of the institution in religion. Every prophet who presents a great principle in a time of controversy exaggerates it. The nation did not accept Jeremiah's teaching in its full scope, for the returning exiles came back for the sake of the Temple and its worship, and they speedily restored the institutions of altar and priesthood (see intro. to Ezra-Nehemiah, pp. 458f.). It is equally just to remember that the Jews of the Dispersion, who came to form the major part of Jewry, maintained themselves by the prophet's message. They paid their Temple tax to Jerusalem and recognized that the daily sacrifice was offered in their name and for their benefit. But they found God in the prayers of their synagogues and served him in their strongly ethical community life. These things they learned from Jeremiah.

Significance of Jeremiah. It is possible, therefore, to recognize how, at this particular period of his nation's history, Jeremiah contributed to maintain its life and history. But it also becomes possible to set him in a larger succession. At three crises of the national and religious life three voices came to guide it. Before Samaria fell in 722 B.C. Hosea came to gather up the life of the past and preserve what was of eternal remembrance in the thought and deed of Israel. Before the collapse of Judah in 586 B.C. Jeremiah handed on to a people now without a state the truths by which their souls might still live. And before the Temple finally disappeared in 70 A.D. a greater than both conserved for the world through His living church the enduring things which could not die. And these three are intimately associated. Jeremiah borrows continually from his predecessor, and there is no prophet in the old life of Israel from whom Jesus quotes more freely and more intimately than Hosea and Jeremiah. They all saw beyond the outward forms the free spirit which had given these their worth and vitality, which was itself eternal and which, after the breakdown of the old, could build new forms for its fresh and inexhaustible expression.

The Book of Jeremiah. The text of the book of Jeremiah has come down in what virtually amounts to two recensions, for the LXX version contains only seven eighths of the material found in the Hebrew Bible. On this question the student must be referred to Streane, Double Text of Jeremiah; Volz, Studien; Cornill, Commentary, the Introduction. But, further, the present book is better described as a collection of material bearing on the period of Jeremiah than as oracles from or a biography of the prophet. Thus it contains material which ranges in date from Jeremiah's call to the period of Cyrus (511¹¹⁻¹⁴), and even to that of the return (1719^t), and presents historical matter (chs. 40-42, 52) which is only indirectly connected with Jeremiah. Again, the book clearly contains little collections which once existed separately (cf. chs. 30^f.; 46-51). Each of these has its own history, especially its own place and date of collection. Some of these booklets may have consisted entirely of oracles. But there also appear a series of records which present an informal biography of the prophet. Yet even in these the incidents connected with Jeremiah's career are presented in order to convey oracles which he uttered in certain circumstances and under certain conditions. And in this biographical material Jeremiah is sometimes introduced in the third person, in other cases in the first person. It will thus be seen that the whole question of the composition of the book is extremely complicated and perplexing. No explanation yet offered seems entirely satisfactory. To take for granted that Baruch was either the first or the final compiler appears unwarranted in view merely of the statement in ch. 36 (see commentary).

Two things need to be said in connection with the study of the book here presented. Since oracles here ascribed to Jeremiah appear elsewhere under the names of Isaiah and Obadiah, and since Jeremican material appears alongside sayings of later date, it is clear that the original oracles were much briefer and more disconnected than they appear in the long chapters of the English versions. In some respects they resemble the Sermon on the Mount, which contains collected "logia" (sayings). Anyone who studies them for the first time in this form will probably be annoyed by the abrupt breaks. But he may find it profitable to be freed from trying to connect verses which have no connection beyond the fact that the editor so arranged them. Again, all the material has passed through the hands of men who attempted to interpret it for the needs of their own time. But these men had come through the great experience of exile and had also, in obedience to the principle of centralization, returned to Jerusalem for the purpose of maintaining their Temple worship. The natural result was that, while they reverently retained the prophet's oracles, they at times softened and glossed his strong utterances. In a short commentary it is not possible to give all the evidence for distinguishing these glosses and setting them aside as secondary. Readers who may count the decisions arbitrary are asked to remember that all the evidence cannot be presented.

CHAPTER I

1-3. Title. Jeremiah's father was not the Hilkiah of 2 Kings 22⁴. V. 2 dates the prophet's call in 624 B.C., three years before the Josianic reform described in 2 Kings 23; v. 3 dates his activity from 624 to 586; but this covers the book only down to ch. 39.

4-10. Jeremiah's Call. A man's birth makes him an American or a Jew and so qualifies him to speak to his own people. It also limits him in his sympathies and his appeal. Jeremiah is set apart (so read in v. 5 instead of sanctified) before his birth, because he has to speak to all nations (cf. Isa. 49^{5f.}). Amos (11) was summoned to speak concerning Israel: but, since he spoke in the name of a God of righteousness, he could not limit his message to his own people, for righteousness knows no frontiers. Jeremiah is commissioned to utter the divine words (v. 9). These, in the thought of the prophet, contain the absolute standards of all right conduct, and therefore determine the fate, not of Israel alone, but of all nations. The prophet utters the final standards and speaks by the authority of the Lord of the universe. A child (v. 6)—"but young." Abraham's fighting men (Gen. 14²⁴) are described by the same Hebrew word. Set thee over (v. 10) in full authority like one who acts for a superior. The word is used about Joseph in Egypt (Gen. 41⁴¹).

11, 12. The First Vision. Jeremiah sees a dry twig. When he gives it its right name of shōkēdh, an almond, he receives the assurance that God is shōkēdh, awake and watchful over his word. The Hebrew was fond of such puns (see on Amos 5⁵). The divine word, announced by former prophets, may have been delayed in its coming. But the judgment cannot fail and is now on the way. The Lord is at hand.

13-19. The Second Vision. Jeremiah sees a boiling pot, the blower of which (so read instead of the impossible face of v. 13) is from the North. The first and inevitable result of the emergence of the divine word expressing the final standards in the world shall be judgment on Judah for its sins, especially for its false religion. Judah is the boiling pot, and the influence which causes it to boil is being blown (so read with LXX instead of shall break forth in v. 14) from the North. The North here is not a point of the compass, and Jeremiah is not expecting any historical invader. The North is the source of the divine wrath (cf. how Ebal, the mount of the curse, lies toward the North, Deut. 27^{12f.}; and how Joel, 2²⁰, can speak in general about the destroyer as the Northerner). Jeremiah describes the divine judgment under the form of an invasion, which was one of the favorite forms with several of the early prophets (see further at chs. 4, 5). Burned incense (v. 16) = offered sacrifice, and so throughout the book. The description has had some turgid phrases added. Omit in v. 18 an iron pillar against which no one fights, and with LXX read "wall" for walls.

CHAPTERS 21 TO 44: THE RELIGIOUS FAILURE OF THE PEOPLE

This section comprises a collection of oracles, some addressed to the whole nation, others specially to North Israel. The oracles deal chiefly with the religious failure of the people rather than its social and moral corruptions. They are all early and may be confidently referred to the time of Josiah. They offer a reason why the people are ripe for the judgment of their God (116). The thought is deeply influenced by that of Hosea.

CHAPTER II

1-3. Israel the Chosen of Jehovah. Jehovah remembers in Israel's favor (for thee, v. 2) its tender loyalty during the wilderness period. Being loyal, it was also secure under the protection of its God. For it was set apart (or holiness, v. 3) as the divine property, like the first fruits. Anyone who treated such sacred property as if it were his own incurred the guilt of sacrilege. Jeremiah shares with Hosea (910) the idea of the innocent happiness of the wilderness period.

4-12. Israel's Apostasy Means Bitter Ingratitude. The oracle is addressed to North Israel. The people have gone after useless gods (things that do not profit, v. 8) and false worship (vanity, v. 5) to become false like them. Yet God (v. 7) gave them their land: note the emphasis and the contrast in "I." Hence he has still his right to assert against them (so translate v. 9a). Let them go east and west

(vv. 10f.), and they will not find the like. V. 7b refers to the sin at Baal-peor (cf. Hos. 910 and see comment there; Num. 25³ Deut. 43). Kittim is probably Kition in Cyprus, Kedar is located in Arabia.

13-19. Israel's Dependence on Foreigners. This dependence has tainted Israel with foreign ideals, ruined its self-dependence, and sapped its national religion. The nation is making itself a mere slave so that it becomes a prey, subject to another's will (v. 14). The result is that the people of Memphis and Pelusium are shaving it bare (v. 16). Egypt is using the little buffer-state between itself and Assyria as a tool for its own ends. It is unnecessary to seek an exact parallel to v. 15 in the events of Jeremiah's time. The prophet, who described in vv. 1-3 Israel's security in the time of its dependence on its God, may refer to the helpless condition to which disloyalty has not once but constantly brought it. In its own divinely given ideals it had a perennial spring of life, instead of which it has elected the stale water of heathen cisterns, which are so cracked that they cannot retain their flat contents (v. 13). But nothing will now teach it except bitter experience: the disaster resulting from this wickedness must correct thee and convince thee of backslidings (so paraphrase v. 19a). Here again Jeremiah is following the thought of Hosea (cf. 78-11, etc.). In v. 17 omit as untranslatable when he led thee by the way.

20-22. The Apostasy Is Not of Yesterday. Of old thou hast (not, I have, v. 20) broken thy yoke, the bands of religion (cf. Hos. 11⁴) saying, "I am not going to be a slave to any." What a change from the early condition! (Read v. 21b as an exclamation.) Israel has rebelled against its God, because his religion involves a moral demand. Lye=soda.

23-29. Futility of False Gods in Time of Need. When things go well, the nation says, "There is no use of good advice, for I love strange gods (v. 25, the stock and stone of v. 27) and will follow them." But when it is disappointed in its hopes and finds out its mistake (v. 26) it says (not will say, v. 27) to Jehovah, save us. The only response to a religion of this type must be that God asks what right men have to complain against him (v. 29a) if he does not help. The valley (v. 23) refers to some public apostasy of which we have lost the clue. Translate vv. 23c-25a: thou dromedary in heat, changing its mates. Thou desert wild-ass, snuffing up the wind in its lust, which any male that wants it need not weary itself to discover, since in its season anyone may find it. Do not run your feet sore and your throat dry.

30-37. Condemnation of the People's Self-Confidence. This section has a very difficult text: v. 34b is untranslatable, and the sense of v. 30 can only be conjectured. There is also little connection between the successive verses. It may really consist of a number of fragments. Thus vv. 36f. refer to dependence on foreign powers (cf. vv. 13–19), now to one, again to another of which the people go gadding. Since Jehovah will have nothing to do with these sources of confidence, the people will be disappointed in them. (For the gesture of abandoned sorrow in v. 37, cf. Tamar, 2 Sam. 13¹⁹.) The other verses deal with religious apostasy, charging the people (v. 31) with having broken away from the divine restraint (cf. v. 20). They are so abandoned that they could teach even the vilest women methods of seeking love (v. 33). On their hands (not skirts, v. 34) is found the proof of some guilt, which, however, the condition of the second half of the verse prevents us from defining. Yet they count themselves loyal servants of their God. For the very reason that they believe themselves innocent, God must judge them (v. 35). In v. 30, for your own sword the LXX reads the sword, namely, of Jehovah. This may be correct (cf. the preceding “I”), but it is impossible to define the reference in the allusion.

CHAPTER III

1–5. Sham Repentance. These verses with vv. 19, 20 form one oracle. Both passages describe a facile and empty repentance. In v. 1, omit they say; it is part of a last introductory phrase like that in 21. The figure of Israel as bride and son of God is from Hos. 9¹ 11¹. No man who has divorced his wife, or (not and) whose wife has left him for another man, takes her back at a word. Such a woman (not land) is defiled. Yet Israel disloyal, not with one, but with many, counts repentance a trivial thing (vv. 1f.). It has learned nothing from the punishment which followed, and showed how seriously God regarded its sin (v. 3). Even then did not you call Jehovah “my husband,” “my companion from childhood,” and say “He will not always be angry,” “He does not keep up a quarrel for ever”? See, you talked thus, but acted vilely and were capable of combining the two—fine talk and vile deeds (vv. 4f.). But I intended (v. 19; note the emphatic “I” contrasted with thou, v. 4) to treat you as a son, and give you . . . the goodliest heritage of the nations (Palestine). I thought then, etc. (vv. 19, 20a.).

6–13. An Oracle on Repentance and Forgiveness. Jeremiah addresses an oracle to the North (v. 12), because Israel, for whom it was destined, was living there. Judah and Israel have both been faithless to their God. But Judah, appalled by Israel’s punishment in the collapse of the state (722 B.C.), has carried through a national reform by which it hopes to escape the same fate. This reform, however, has been not merely inadequate, but false in principle: the Hebrew word in v. 10 is much stronger than feignedly. Its effect, therefore, has been to make Judah worse than Israel, which obviously no mere inadequate reform could do. The reference can only be to the Josianic reform, since the oracle is dated in the reign of Josiah, and there was no other national reform at that period. Even if the prophet be taken to refer to the earlier movement under Hezekiah, the conclusion remains the same, since Hezekiah merely initiated the movement for the centralization of worship at Jerusalem, which was later carried into full effect. What the prophet demands in the divine name, in vv. 12f., is a right repentance and a return “unto me”—so read with LXX. There are two essentials of religion to Jeremiah—the penitent soul and the forgiving God of Israel.

Read, in vv. 7c, 8, her sister Judah the traitress saw this, saw too, how, when, etc. Omit in v. 9, with LXX, the land was polluted, and. Shown herself more righteous (v. 11), i.e., put herself in the right better.

14–18. A Later Promise of a Reunited Israel. A later generation which took the return of v. 13 to mean, not repentance, but return from exile, added a promise of reunited Israel. But Jeremiah, who pronounced Judah worse than Israel, could not regard a restoration to Zion (v. 14) a blessing to Israel. The writer too does not expect a renewal of the nation living in its own land (v. 12), but the restoration to their own land of scattered individuals (v. 14) from the country where both peoples are in exile (v. 18). So great will be the concourse of the exiles returning to the holy city that the ark shall not be remade (so read for shall that be done; cf. A.S.V. mg., v. 16). Jerusalem itself shall take the place of the ark and shall alone be adequate for the multitudes who throng to the Temple worship (v. 17).

19, 20. See notes under vv. 1–5.

21–25. The Penalty of Apostasy. Apostasy has brought disappointment and moral impotence. The voice Jeremiah hears is that of the better elements of the people, who know that heathenism has never satisfied and never can. They wail on the heights, where the false worship was practiced. The riot and tumult there (so read v. 23) have always been vain. It is the voice every preacher must be able to hear if he is to continue with hope of effecting any good. God bids them repent, and they are able to reply we are thine (not, we are come unto thee, v. 22). But they sadly confess that the Baal-worship (shameful thing) has eaten out their moral vigor and left them impotent (vv. 24f.).

CHAPTER IV

1-4. The Cure for Moral Impotence. The cure is sincere repentance. "If it is in thy mind to turn back, to me thou must turn back; if thou wilt remove thy false gods, thou must not wander out of my presence" (v. 1). Acknowledge Jehovah alone, since in him the world finds blessing (v. 2). The verse describes, not what shall be, but why a repentance which is more than impotent remorse is so blessed a thing. It brings men into relation to the one source of all blessing. Only the people must make clean work in repentance (v. 3), and their circumcision must be that of the heart (v. 4).

CHAPTER 45-31: THE DAY OF JEHOVAH

This series of oracles deals with the day of Jehovah. Since the day brings the self-revelation of the God of righteousness, its first result must be judgment on every form of evil. And judgment must begin at Judah, because the people had received and ignored the revelation of the divine will. But, since Jehovah is God of the world, and the word he put in Jeremiah's mouth contains the absolute standards, and since the prophet's commission is to all nations, the day must bring a world-judgment (cf. ch. 25).

5-8. Imminent Doom. In the lion from his lair in the North, Jeremiah personifies the divine instrument in the work of judgment; he is the destroyer of nations. The figure gave rise to Ezekiel's Gog and ultimately to Antichrist in Revelation. As the adversary who appears in Job as a mere messenger developed into Satan, the opponent of God, so Jeremiah's instrument for chastisement grew into much more. Send a trumpet-blast through the land, v. 5, says the prophet, using words employed by the prophets in announcing the divine advent. Set up a rallying-flag, bring your goods into safety, make no delay (v. 6); for the time is at hand. For sackcloth as a sign of mourning cf. Isa. 22¹².

9-12. A Picture of Wasted Judah. The courage of the king shall die in him and the bewildered prophets shall say, Ah, Lord (so read in v. 9 with LXX, making v. 10 the utterance of these prophets. For Jeremiah's attitude toward these men cf. 28^{7f.}). The civil and religious leaders are in equal dismay, for there is appointed for this people a blasting sirocco (v. 11), a wind too powerful for fanning or cleansing—a destroying wind (v. 12).

Note how Jeremiah uses other figures than that of invasion for the coming disaster.

13-17. The Foe from the North. The foe comes by Dan and Ephraim (v. 15). Nations are enrolled and summoned against Jerusalem (v. 16); the verbs are not imperatives. Besiegers come from far and utter defiance against Judah. For evil purposes make their home in Jerusalem (v. 14).

18-22. A Cry of Regret Over the Inevitable Ruin. My tent and my curtains (its hangings) of v. 20 is Jerusalem. The city's wickedness has brought it about that the ruin is bitter and mortal (v. 18b). The bowels to the Hebrews were the seat of the feelings, the heart the seat of thought. In v. 21 for shall I see read must I see.

23-26. Chaos Come Again. The world is waste and void (v. 23), it returns to the condition from which God brought it in the beginning (Gen. 1²). The mountains, which, according to Hebrew thought, sustained the world, tremble (v. 24). The fertile earth becomes a wilderness (v. 26). The day of the Lord involves a change, not only in man, but in the world (cf. Amos 7⁴ Isa. 11^{6f.}, etc.). From this conception of judgment bringing chaos has come the idea of the new heavens and the new earth of the consummation in Rev. 21¹⁻²²⁵. Obviously, God alone, and no human invader, could produce such a change.

27-31. Ruin of the World and Especially of Jerusalem. The land of v. 27 is the world (cf. v. 28); the whole (not every) city of v. 29 is the whole world (with LXX). At the rumor (not noise) of the coming foe men go into hiding (v. 29), and the prophet can hear (not have heard) the distress of Zion (v. 31). Omit v. 27b; the clause has come from 30¹¹. The first clause of v. 30 is untranslatable. In what remains Jerusalem is represented as a prostitute. The paint is antimony, which is used by Eastern women to darken the eyelids, and so make the eyes appear larger and more luminous.

CHAPTERS 5 AND 6: THE SIN AND DOOM OF JUDAH

A series of oracles describing the sin and doom of Judah. Dealing with doom, they were naturally joined with the oracles of judgment in the day of the Lord. The sins denounced in them are in general anti-social in character, as contrasted with the religious failure of chs. 2, 3.

CHAPTER V

1-6. The Unrighteousness of Jerusalem: A Threat of Doom. Jeremiah is horrified by the absence of uprightness in Jerusalem; truth in v. 1 is practically honesty, a moral quality (cf.

Gen. 18¹⁶⁻³³). If men employ the sacred name, it is to perjure themselves by using it in support of a lie (v. 2). Yet that on which Jehovah is intent is honesty (v. 3a). When he thinks that these are humble people who go wrong because they have never learned their own religion, he remembers that the well-to-do are no better (vv. 4f.). The remark gives a tantalizing glimpse into the social and educational conditions of old Jerusalem. The yoke and bands (v. 5) are the restraints of their religion (cf. 220). For wolf of the evenings (v. 6) read desert wolf and cf. 47.

7-11. Two Oracles on the Corruption of Judah. Read in v. 7 How can I pardon them, saith the Lord, since, forsaking me, they acknowledge gods that are no gods (the guilt is not in the children) and settle down to play the harlot from me. In v. 8 omit in the morning (cf. mg.). The reference in vv. 7f. is to spiritual disloyalty, not to physical immorality, though the lewd practices connected with the nature-worship of Baal may have helped to suggest the figure to the prophet. In v. 10 read vine-rows for walls (cf. the following branches). The figure of Judah as the vineyard of the Lord was a favorite one with the prophets (cf. Isa. 5¹).

12-17. Penalty for Spurning the Prophets. Because men say of Jehovah, "He does nothing" (so in v. 12; cf. Zeph. 1¹²), and the prophets are becoming mere wind with no word of revelation in them (v. 13, but the sense here is very uncertain), the divine standards in the prophet's mouth (cf. 19^{f.}) must bring doom (v. 14). The instrument of that doom is then described in v. 15 in terms which appear in several other prophets, but which are not peculiarly applicable to any one nation of Jeremiah's time. From which thy (v. 17) read they shall eat up thy sons and thy daughters.

18, 19. Disciplinary Purpose of the Exile. An addition, applying the oracle to the conditions of the exiles. In v. 19 read ye are serving for shall ye serve.

20-29. Terrible Manifestation of Jehovah. The condition of the nation described in this late passage resembles that which appears in several of the later psalms, and the appeal to the divine power over nature is strongly reminiscent of Deutero-Isaiah. The writer says the people had (not hath) the heart of a rebel (v. 23) and never thought rightly of God (v. 24a). Their sins upset the laws of ordered life (v. 25), since God, to punish them, withheld the rains. The former rain fell in October, the latter in March-April. Deceit means the proceeds of their fraud. For that they should prosper (v. 28) read so they prosper.

30, 31. Preference for Lenient Leaders.

Judah prefers for its spiritual leaders men who make slight moral demands. The verses offer an interesting illustration of the relation between prophet and priest in Jeremiah's time. The prophets are appealed to in connection with difficult cases and novel circumstances where the ordinary law of the priest fails to give guidance. Then the priest issues decrees in accordance with this decision (v. 31). Evidently, the two bodies of spiritual guides are able to work together.

CHAPTER VI

1-8. The Sin of Jerusalem Leads to Certain Judgment. Jeremiah's fellow-countrymen are bidden to flee from the doomed city to Tekoa (Amos 1¹), and Bethhakkereem (Neh. 3¹⁴), villages in the south of the capital, because their own towns are already occupied by the northern foe. The enemies are present every one in his place, i.e., as if the place belonged to them (v. 3). If it were legitimate to render Woe unto us by Ha! for us, vv. 4f. would describe their confident eagerness and their fury in attack. Neither midday heat nor darkness can check their ardor. They hew down Jerusalem's trees (v. 6, see mg.); the phrase emphasizes the pitiless character of the war (cf. Deut. 20^{19f.}). For the Lord has declared woe to the false city (so read with LXX for this is, etc.). As a cistern keeps fresh its waters, she keeps fresh her sin (v. 7a). The following words, violence and spoil, were a cry used, like our cry of "Murder," by one who was assaulted in the street. That cry was constantly heard in Jerusalem. The Hebrew text of v. 2 is untranslatable.

9-15. A Picture of Complete Devastation. Under the figure of a vineyard from which every grape is stripped, doom is pronounced on Jerusalem, because of its greed, and because of the moral insensibility of its spiritual leaders. Glean like a vine what is left to Israel, examine with care every twig (so read v. 9). The remnant here is not, as in Isaiah, any particular part of the nation: it is what is left after the harvest is over. The sense is that even the gleanings are not to be spared. For is there anyone to whom God may speak in the hope that he will listen? The divine word has become to them a nagging weariness (v. 10). Read in v. 11, with LXX, my fury (wrath) for the fury of the Lord, and I must pour: God is still the speaker. Assembly means groups. For wives (v. 12) probably read vineyards; the women have been already mentioned. Vv. 13-15 reappear at 8¹⁰⁻¹². The time to which they refer is the time of God's appearance in judgment.

16-21. Indifference to the Messages of the Prophets. God sent prophets, the watchmen of v. 17 (cf. Amos 2¹¹), with the trumpet warning of the coming divine judgment, but in vain. Read in v. 16 said for saith; cf. set in v. 17; both verses refer to the divine guidance given to Israel in the past (cf. Amos 2^{11f.}). For your souls, which suggests too exclusively spiritual rest, read yourselves; the sense is that of well-being and security. Therefore he now calls heaven and earth to witness that the end is at hand. Read v. 18 perhaps, noting the appeal to the earth in v. 19, Hear, O heavens, and bear witness against them. But the text is corrupt. Frankincense (v. 20), used in connection with certain offerings (cf. Lev. 21), was brought from Sheba in South Arabia (cf. Isa. 60⁶ 1 Kings 10¹⁰). It and the calamus were valued because brought from the far distance. But no offering, however costly, is a substitute for obedience.

22-26. Advance of the Foe from the North. The foe from the North, set in array like one man (so read in v. 23), is advancing against Jerusalem. Vv. 22-24 are applied in 50⁴¹⁻⁴³ to Babylon. Evidently, then, the northern foe was not interpreted as a historical invader and especially could not be the Babylonians themselves, since the same enemy could not be expected to attack Judah in Jeremiah's time and Babylon much later (cf. 51⁵). By the way (v. 25), i.e., in the open roads. Make thee, etc. (v. 26), i.e., mourn for thyself as men mourn for an only son.

27-30. Jeremiah's Function. The function of Jeremiah is that of a trier and examiner (not tower and fortress). The effect is described in v. 29, where we should probably read in clause b the fire is piled up, and in clause d the slag is not separated out. The text is uncertain, but the general sense is clear: the corruption has gone so far that there remains only judgment. But the prophet brings the divine standards (cf. 19 and Amos 77¹). In v. 28 omit they are brass and iron as a gloss.

CHAPTER VII

1-15. The Temple Address. This section gives Jeremiah's words in full; ch. 26 deals with the effect produced by the address on the people, and especially with the resultant attitude of the religious leaders to him. Ch. 7 appears among the oracles, ch. 26 in the biography. Two matters deserve close attention. The prophet severely blames the men of Judah for some new and false confidence in the Temple, as though its very existence could guarantee them security. It is natural to conclude that this new attitude was the reflection of the Josianic reform, which, by making the Temple the sole legitimate center of worship, led men to believe that Jehovah must maintain it as essential to true religion. Note that the address is dated early in Jehoiakim's reign, i.e., very soon after the reform. Again Jeremiah declares, not that Jehovah will chastise the people for their false ideas, but that he will destroy the Temple as he once destroyed Shiloh. To declare that it is the divine will to destroy the Temple is to say that its disappearance is in the interests of real religion. True religion, according to Jeremiah, can continue in Judah without the Temple at Jerusalem, as it continued after the shrine at Shiloh was wrecked. Jeremiah appeared in a court (not gate, v. 2; cf. 26²), probably at a great festival (cf. Amos at Bethel, 7¹⁰, and our Lord at Jerusalem, Mt. 24¹ Lk. 21⁵).

In v. 3, repointing two Hebrew words, read so that I may dwell with you in this place for and I will cause, etc. The people did not live in the Temple. Then vv. 5-7, since they take the place to be the country, and also break the close connection between v. 4 and v. 8, are a little exhortation which has been added later. Called by my name (v. 10), i.e., specially dedicated to me. In v. 11 join in your eyes to the house. The sense is: "Is this Temple, which even in your eyes is peculiarly mine?" etc. The reference in v. 12 is to the sanctuary at Shiloh, where, immediately after the conquest of Palestine, the early center of worship for the northern tribes was set up with the priesthood of Eli and the sacred emblem of the ark (1 Sam. 1-3). Apparently, the place was wrecked by the Philistines when they overran Benjamin, for it suddenly disappears from history (cf. Ps. 78^{60f.}).

16-20. An Oracle Against the Worship of Astarte. Astarte was mother and virgin, queen of heaven (cf. 44^{15f.}). In various forms this worship has always been prevalent throughout the East, and, in particular, it was practiced under the name of Ishtar by the Babylonians, and may have found its way from them into Judah. If the oracle is by Jeremiah, it must belong to a very different period from that of the Temple address.

21-23. Jeremiah's Judgment on Sacrifice. The judgment is closely connected, in subject at least, with the Temple address. The oracle does not imply that there was no developed ritual with a code which claimed divine authority. Indeed, it would have been idle in any prophet to protest against such a sacrificial system, unless it had not only existed but had been exerting a powerful influence on men's minds through the fact that it laid claim to such great authority. The prophet with vehement exaggeration declares that the essential factor in the revelation to Israel was its moral demand. The exact sense of v. 21 is uncertain. The verse may mean that men may eat even the burnt-offering, which was generally reserved in its entirety to Jehovah, as they eat their other offerings, after having devoted part of them to him. God is indifferent about these petty refinements.

24-28. A Little Sermon on the Sins of the Fathers. This was a favorite subject with the exiles, who believed they were expiating this guilt. Jeremiah's habit was to stir the conscience of the living. Daily rising, etc. (v. 25), means, never failing to send. Truth, etc. (v. 28), i.e., faithfulness is dead and never spoken about.

29-34. A Late Oracle on Topheth. The place is located (v. 31) in what may have been an actual valley near Jerusalem (cf. 2 Kings 23¹⁰), but its site has not been identified. The Hebrew name of this valley, gē ben Hinnom, has supplied the word "gehenna" (Mk. 9⁴³). The meaning of "Topheth" is also uncertain, for the Hebrew consonants have been repointed with vowels taken from the word "bosheth," or "shame," in order to suggest the shameful character of everything connected with it. Deut. 18¹⁰ forbids passing children through the fire, regarding it as a heathen rite, which was practiced for purposes of necromancy. The last clause of v. 31, however, seems to imply that at some period these sacrifices were offered to Jehovah (cf. Mic. 6⁷). It is puzzling to understand why it should be counted necessary, here and in 32³⁵, to say that God never commanded them. In v. 32 read the last clause as in margin: so terrible shall be the judgment that their sanctuary shall become a cemetery. Thine hair (v. 29), since the Hebrew reads "thy crown," may be the consecrated hair of the Nazirite; or it may merely be the hair shorn in sign of mourning (cf. Mic. 1¹⁶).

CHAPTER VIII

1-3. An Oracle Denouncing the Worship of the Heavenly Bodies (cf. Deut. 4¹⁹ Ezek. 8¹⁶). It must be late, since the people are in exile. The treatment of the corpses is both a dishonor to the dead and an insult to the objects of their worship, which look helplessly down on them. Sought (v. 2), i.e., in order to consult.

4-7. The Incurable Heart. If a man falls does he not get up again; if he wanders (from the road) does he not find his way back? But Jerusalem holds fast a false thing, like the wrong road of v. 4. God hears men say nothing of return; they hold on in their course. The unintelligent birds (turtle-dove) keep their dates of migration; men use their gift of reason to ignore the higher guidance of conscience and religion. In v. 4 omit, with LXX, the opening clause.

8-13. Condemnation of False Teachers. Omit vv. 10-12, which have been repeated from 6¹³⁻¹⁵; they break the connection here. The last clause too of v. 13, omitted by LXX, is untranslatable. Clearly Jeremiah is bringing no general charge, but refers to some definite act on the part of these scribes. He also accuses them, not of any trifling mistake in a minor point, but of some deliberate deed which in his view has completely changed the intention of the Law—their false pen has turned it, the Law, into a lie (so read in v. 8). Opinion is much divided as to the precise meaning of this accusation. But many have seen in it an evidence that the prophet was condemning the conduct of the priesthood in connection with the Josianic reform. In the judgment of the present writer, Jeremiah refers to the change made in the code of Deuteronomy. When this North Israelite book, which originally contemplated a multiplicity of sanctuaries, was adopted and given authority in Judah, a little preface, Deut. 12¹⁻⁷, was added, which prescribed centralization at Jerusalem. Jeremiah, who belonged to North Israel and was familiar with its code, recognized that by this slight addition the scribes had changed the entire character of the legislation and introduced a novel principle into the religion of the nation.

14-17. Doom From the North. This doom is to fall on the whole earth (not land, v. 16). Probably read, v. 16a, the destroyer is heard from Dan, the snorting of his horses. A noun is needed to which the recurrent his may refer. His strong ones are his stallions. Then continue, when he comes (instead of for they have come) he will devour. The water of gall (v. 14)—the same word is rendered "hemlock" in Hos. 10⁴ and means "poison." Hence read die there and brought us to death for let us be silent and put us to silence.

18-22. A Hymn of Pity Over the Nation's Condition. The hymn includes also 9¹, which in Hebrew forms the closing verse of ch. 8. This hymn of pity over the nation's condition—the daughter of my people is the people itself—may be by Jeremiah, who foresees what shall be. But, since it vividly represents the country as already ruined and apparently forsaken by its God, it may emanate from the time when Judah lay desolate before the return of the exiles. Since from a land that is very far off (v. 19) may mean from "a land far and wide," the phrase does not necessarily imply that the nation is already in exile. Strange vanities are foreign idols, and black (v. 21) means "clothed in mourning garments." V. 20 does not refer to spiritual conditions. The people, using the natural imagery of an agricultural population, describe their condition as being like that of a farmer, who sees his grain harvest and the later harvest of wine and oil pass without bringing any relief to his needs. Balm (v. 22) was one of the products for which Gilead was famous (cf. Gen. 37²⁵). Evidently it was used for medicinal purposes.

CHAPTER IX

1. See under 818-22.

2-6. The Disappearance of Mutual Confidence. Mutual confidence, the cement of all human society, has disappeared in the nation. It were better to live in a mere caravanseraï among casual travelers who own no intimate relations to one another than in a country where these relations are so shamelessly exploited (v. 2). Falsehood, not faithfulness, has power in the land (so read with LXX in v. 3). Every brother is a very Jacob at supplanting (v. 4); this rendering brings out the allusion to Gen. 27³⁶. Men heap violence on violence, fraud on fraud, and refuse to acknowledge me (so v. 6).

7-9. The Imminent Judgment. God must test the people in his furnace of trial, because of my people's vileness—so read with LXX the last clause of v. 7. On v. 9 see 529.

10-16. A Lament Over Ruined Judah. With this lament goes a summons to all thoughtful men to recognize and lay to heart what has brought Judah to this condition. Probably it dates from the period when the country was lying waste after the capture of Jerusalem. Thus, while it retains the form of a prophetic oracle, it does this clumsily, for the prophet is the speaker in v. 10, and Jehovah in v. 11. The wilderness of v. 10 is not the barren desert, but the steppes on which at certain seasons rain produces a short-lived but excellent pasture. These pastures lie waste (not are burned up), without the familiar sound of sheep (not cattle). In v. 15 read thus said; the speaker emphasizes that Judah's ruin is the direct outcome of the divine warning.

17-22. A Similar Lament. The writer bids men summon the professional mourners, women skilled (cunning) in the practices connected with mourning and especially trained to chant the funeral dirge. For the people are expelled from their land and homes (v. 19b). Death cuts off the children in the streets, the youths in the public places (v. 21). Omit in v. 17, with LXX, consider ye. Omit in v. 22, with LXX, Speak, Thus saith the Lord, and read lie for shall fall.

23, 24. Man's Chief Glory. God's perfect purpose is the one source of human confidence.

25, 26. Jew and Gentile Will Suffer Alike. As it stands, this oracle seems meaningless. Omitting one Hebrew word and a preposition, we might read in v. 25 simply, I will punish all uncircumcision. With this change the thought of v. 26 would be: The nations named are uncircumcised in the flesh, Israel is uncircumcised in spirit; both stand essentially on the same level; hence both will suffer. The polled corners or shaved temples refers to a practice prevalent among some of the Eastern desert tribes (cf. Herodotus iii, 8). Probably because the custom implied a reverence for some deity, it was forbidden in Israel (Lev. 19²⁷).

CHAPTER X

1-16. A Series of Lessons on the Folly of Idolatry. These lessons are intended for the guidance of the Babylonian exiles. What the people are warned against is not the syncretistic worship of Palestine, but apostasy to the idolatrous customs of the nation among which they are living. The resemblance between vv. 1-10 and Isa. 40^{19f.} 44^{9f.} is very close; the three passages reveal the same situation and danger. V. 11, which is in Aramaic, is a formula intended for the use of humble Jews who are being invited by their neighbors to join in heathen worship. Vv. 12-16 reappear in 51¹⁵⁻¹⁹ among the oracles on Babylon. The section forms an interesting illustration of the careful way in which the religious leaders helped their people to resist the seduction of their new surroundings.

They must not learn the heathen religion (for way cf. Acts 9²), nor revere the heavenly bodies, which bulked largely in Babylonian worship (v. 2). The religious rituals of the heathen are absurd: a man carves a log which another has felled (v. 3). The thing stands dumb, like a scarecrow in a kitchen garden (so v. 5a), and must be carried about—a reference to the religious processions of Babylon (cf. Isa. 46⁷). But in all their pantheons (for royal estate) there is none like Jehovah (v. 7). V. 8b is untranslatable. Tarshish (v. 9) was probably "Tartessus" in Spain. Uphaz = Ophir, from which came the best gold. Artificer is "joiner." Read v. 11a thus must you say about them, i.e., the idols. There follows a description of Jehovah's power. His voice is the thunder, and he sends lightnings flashing through the rain (v. 13). All men are struck dumb and senseless (at this proof of Jehovah's power), but especially every maker of idols (v. 14). When those are put to the proof, they fail (v. 15b).

17-22. Fragments of Oracles of Doom. Vv. 17, 18 are untranslatable. In vv. 19, 20 Jerusalem is the speaker; the cords support the tent; the shepherds are rulers.

23-25. The Nation in Exile Acknowledges That It Is in the Divine Hands. The people have come to know that a man's fate is not in his own power (v. 23). But they plead that, while they merit punishment, they merit it less than the heathen world which works its will on them. If they are not succored they may disappear as a people, being made very small (v. 24). And with them will disappear the divine purpose which is involved in their continuance. The truth in this plea deserves more attention than it generally receives.

CHAPTER XI

1-14. Results of Disobedience to the Mosaic Covenant. This section has often been taken to describe Jeremiah's attitude toward the Josianic reform. It has even been suggested that the prophet undertook or was commissioned by the priesthood and court to carry out a mission for spreading the principles of that reform in the country. But nothing is said here of that book which 2 Kings 22⁸⁻¹³ states to have been one originating cause of the official action. What vv. 3f. refer to is a covenant which is definitely stated to be no novelty, i.e., the old covenant at Horeb, by which Jehovah constituted the nation and made it his peculiar people. The present distress in which the people are involved is regarded in v. 8 as the outcome of their disobedience to that Mosaic covenant, not to any new covenant under Josiah. The real content of the passage is that Jeremiah's activity and message have been in close agreement with the attitude of all the prophets in Israel, and that, in now prophesying disaster, he is taking no novel course, but is merely continuing the tradition of his predecessors. Thus it represents practically the position Jeremiah took (28^{6f.}) when he found himself in clear opposition to certain prophets who promised the nation success and peace. For shall cry (vv. 11, 12) read may, and change for their trouble (v. 14) to in the day of.

15-17. Israel to be Banished for Unfaithfulness. The nation must be expelled from Palestine in spite of its sacrifices. Since the Josianic reform, with its new attitude toward the Temple, attached greater value to correct sacrifice; the oracle may have special reference to that movement. Read, with help of LXX, what right has my beloved to live in my house, so long as she cherishes lewd thoughts? Can vows and holy flesh take away your sin, or can you thus be saved? The Lord called you a spreading olive of fair shape; at his thunder its leaf withered. Jeremiah uses Hosea's figure of Israel, the bride of Jehovah, and Palestine, the home to which he brought her.

18-23. Hostility to Jeremiah for His Message. Jeremiah states how in practical experience he learned the bitter truth involved in his commission as prophet (16). When he sought to present the divine standards he became at once the object of violent attack. Since, however, the cause he upholds is the divine purpose, he commits (have revealed, v. 20) himself and his opponents into the hands of God. The Lord will maintain his own cause in his own way. The saying is expressed in quite general terms. In v. 19 for with the fruit thereof read in its full vigor. Vv. 21-23 refer the general statement of vv. 18-20 to a particular period of the prophet's life, about which unfortunately we have no further information, when he suffered from persecution at the hands of the men of his native village. Along with them should be read 12^{3b}, 6, which have no real connection where they stand. In all probability the verses are a later explanatory comment. For even (v. 23) read in.

CHAPTER XII

1-6. Jeremiah's Complaint and Jehovah's Answer. On vv. 3b, 6 see 11²¹⁻²³. Jeremiah acknowledges that God is always in the right when he enters a plea before him. Yet he would urge the apparent injustice of granting prosperity to bad men, who, it is true, acknowledge God in their talk but keep him far from their real thoughts and aims (vv. 2, 6). Indeed, they say about God, He never sees what we do (so, with LXX, last clause of v. 4). Yet thou, O Lord, seest by testing that my heart is thine (so v. 3a). He receives for answer that, if in a time of relative calm he is seeking cover (secure, v. 5), he will fail when the severer test comes. Men who live, like the prophet, by standards which are not of this world need not be surprised if the world, which tries to ignore these standards, makes obedience difficult for them. Will the day's journey take the whole long day? From morn to night, my friend. The pride of Jordan (v. 5) is the belt of thorny jungle along the river-bed, apt to become half swamp when the floods are out. Hence it always offers bad going for a pedestrian.

7-13. Jehovah Alone Cares for His Heritage. A voice from Palestine (mine house, v. 7; cf. Hos. 8¹ 9¹⁵), lying desolate after the Exile, declares that none but Jehovah cares for it.

Many owners (shepherds, v. 10) have wasted it: the reference is to the conquerors who have worked their will on Judah. Brigands (spoilers, v. 12) wander there. Men are ashamed of their harvest, the harvest of the fierce wrath of Jehovah (so v. 13b). V. 9a can be translated only by means of a serious and highly problematical emendation of the text.

14-17. A Proposal to the Foreigners. Another post-exilic oracle, which promises a future to the (not mine, v. 14) heathen neighbors who have ravaged Palestine, on condition that they cast in their lot with Judah and adopt the true religion.

CHAPTER XIII

1-11. Degeneration of the Exiles in Babylon. Under the figure of a girdle spoiled by damp this oracle speaks of the degeneration of the exiles through contact with Babylonian life. Since it is impossible to suppose that Jeremiah took four journeys across the desert in order to perform this symbolic act, the Prath (=Euphrates, v. 4) referred to has been explained as Parah in Benjamin (Josh. 18:23). But Parah is a town, and Prath elsewhere is always Euphrates. More probably, therefore, this is the warning of an exilic prophet who saw that contact with heathen practices was threatening the life of his nation. They are becoming (not shall even be, v. 10) like the rotten girdle.

12-22. Four Oracles of Doom. The terms of the first oracle (vv. 12-14) are very obscure. The wine, with which the jars, i.e., the nation, are to be filled, might naturally be the wine of the divine wrath. But why these jars should be dashed together is far from clear, since no potter dashes his jars together, especially when they are filled with wine. Probably we have the effort to interpret a badly transmitted utterance of Jeremiah. The second oracle (vv. 15-17) contains a summons to attention, before it becomes too late. Otherwise, the eye of the prophet and your eye also (so v. 17) shall weep sore over the rejected nation. The message of doom in the third oracle (vv. 18-22), describing the result of reliance on the foreigner, is addressed to the king and queen-mother, because the latter had great influence in old Judah. They are told that from their heads is falling their glorious crown (v. 18b). They themselves have taught their neighbors to treat them with contempt (v. 21a). They shall be exposed to dishonor and their shame laid open to sight (v. 22b). The situation does not suit any known historical conditions, nor is any particular king named. To refer it to the situation after Carchemish does not account for the description of the South, the district which falls away from Hebron to the desert, as shut up. Jeremiah is speaking, like Hosea, in general terms. The fourth oracle (vv. 23-27) compares Jerusalem to a woman, resolute in her infamous ways; how long can this condition last? (So v. 27b.) There can be but one end, since Jehovah is righteous. The stubble of v. 24 is described as "whirling before the sirocco." The idea of v. 26 is that of exposing a woman's person.

CHAPTER XIV

1-9. A Picture of Drought, with an Appropriate Prayer. Men sit mourning in the towns (gates) of Judah. Jerusalem, which has always been greatly dependent on cisterns (pits) hewn in the limestone rock, laments. To these cisterns its nobles send their servants (little ones), but the men return with covered heads in sign of grief (cf. 2 Sam. 15:30). Lying untilled, the land faints (so v. 4a). Though men merit nothing, let God act for his own sake. He is no passing stranger, no man asleep (so, with LXX, for astonied, v. 9): he is Israel's God. Omit in v. 6 like jackals, with LXX.

10. The fragment of an oracle, condemning the people's apostasy.

11-16. Jeremiah Persists in Interceding for His People. Jeremiah, forbidden to pray for his people, urges (v. 13) that the fault lies, not in the people, but in the prophets who mislead them by promising success (cf. ch. 28). These men are denounced, as uttering no more than empty superstitions and the fancies of their own minds (v. 14b). Their doom (not wickedness, v. 16c) is sure with that of their misled followers. It deserves notice that a leading function of the prophet in old Israel was evidently to intercede for his nation. Even Amos, a prophet of doom, does this (7:5). The prophet's prayers too were regarded as possessed of peculiar efficacy. Jeremiah needs to be forbidden to pray, because now Jehovah is resolved (cf. Amos 7:8). As man of God, the prophet knew the divine mind, both in the temporary need to punish and in the ultimate desire for reconciliation.

17, 18. A Lament Over Ruined Judah. In v. 17 read mine eyes run and do not cease; and in v. 18 for them that are sick with read the horrors of, and probably for go about in the land read are bowed to the ground.

19-22. A Prayer of the Exiles. This has probably been inserted near the prayer in time of drought because of the mention of Jehovah's power to bring rain. The writer, however, appeals to Jehovah's power over nature, as contrasted with the helplessness of heathen gods (vanities, v. 22), in a way which is characteristic of Deutero-Isaiah. For his own sake, for the sake of Jerusalem, the throne of his glory (i.e., the Temple), for the covenant's sake, he must redeem. For is it not thou on whom we rely because thou doest such things? (So v. 22b.) The things are the rain.

CHAPTER XV

1-4. Judah's Fate. Judah is doomed to four fates (kinds, v. 3) because of Manasseh's sin. On Moses and Samuel, as prophets and intercessors, cf. 14¹¹⁻¹⁶.

5-9. Another Lament Over Jerusalem. Who now pities or bemoans (not shall, v. 5) Jerusalem, the once prolific mother? (V. 9a.) God has winnowed her people out in their towns (v. 7a), for his pity was at last worn out, because of the vileness of their ways (so read, with LXX, the last clause of v. 7). Omit in v. 8 against the mother of the young men.

10-14. Miscellaneous Fragments. Vv. 10, 11 are a fragment with very uncertain text; v. 12 is untranslatable; vv. 13, 14 recur in 17^{3f.}, where they are more in place.

15-21. Jeremiah's Prayer. Jeremiah prays God in his long-suffering toward his opponents not to ignore his servant, whose very loyalty has brought him reproach from men who despise thy words (so read, with LXX, the first clause of v. 16), for he is wholly dedicated to his God (v. 16c). He has not sat among mockers or those who made merry with them (v. 17a). Why should God fail him, like a brook which runs dry when it is most needed? (V. 18b.) The inner voice replies: "If thou surrender wholly to me and I restore thee, thou shalt be my servant; if thou make clear the difference between good and evil, thou shalt be as my mouth. Men may fight against thee, but they shall not prevail." The thought is that of the divine word of 19, which contains the ultimate standards of eternal validity. Men may turn to this, but the prophet dare not turn to them. Magna est veritas et praevalet. The hand of v. 17 is that of 19; the verse has nothing to say about the ecstatic or other conditions in which this hand appeared. In v. 15 omit, with LXX, thou knowest.

CHAPTER XVI

1-9. Jeremiah to Remain a Man Apart. Because the end is at hand, Jeremiah must remain unmarried and take no share in the ordinary tasks of life. The cuttings and baldness of v. 6 were forms of mourning (cf. Lev. 19²⁸ Deut. 14¹). For the mourners' bread and the cup of consolation at death cf. Ezek. 24¹⁷ Tobit 4¹⁷.

10-21. Israel Making Atonement for Past Sins. A little sermon, to explain that Israel in exile is atoning for the sins of the past. The explanation served in the end to dull the consciences of the exiles, since it led them to say that the fathers had eaten sour grapes and the children's teeth were set on edge (Ezek. 18). But it is not Jeremianic teaching. The idea of a double recompense (v. 18) is also an exilic thought (cf. Isa. 40²). The hunters and fishers of v. 16 are the heathen conquerors who have carried out the divine will in chastising Israel. The carcasses of their detestable things (v. 18) are their dead and corrupt gods, and mine inheritance is the land, not the nation. In v. 13c, for I will read which shall. Vv. 14, 15 recur in 23^{7f.} and suit the connection there better than here. In v. 21 for this once read at this time.

CHAPTER XVII

1-4. An Oracle Against the Popular Worship. Perhaps read for v. 2 merely as a memorial against them. A later generation, believing Jeremiah to be attacking the forms of heathen worship, added the details about the Asherim, etc. But the prophet was attacking Judah's whole worship. The pen of iron, which was used for writing on rock (Job 19²⁴), is intended to suggest the hardness of Judah's heart, which demands such an instrument. Vv. 3, 4 contain a passage with a bad text, which closely resembles 15^{13f.} and is probably not original here.

5-8. A Late Psalm. This is not an oracle, but a psalm, closely resembling Psa. 1. In v. 6 for shall inhabit read living, as it does, in; and for he shall be here and in v. 8 read he is. Careful (v. 8), i.e., need have no anxiety.

9-11. Two Gnostic Sentences. These sentences are like those in Proverbs. One speaks of man's heart as secretive and set on evil, which only God knows. The other, using a popular idea about the habits of the partridge, describes it as hatching out eggs which it has not laid, with the result that the brood forsake their foster-mother.

12, 13. The Song of a Pilgrim. The pious, glad utterance of many a pilgrim to the Temple. Himself loyal to the faith of his fathers, he says that all renegades, "all who rebel against thee in the earth," shall be brought to shame (so v. 13b).

14-18. Jeremiah Affirms His Sincerity. Jeremiah, taunted with the fact that his predicted doom does not arrive, disclaims any malicious pleasure in uttering only prophecies of disaster. "Yet," he says, "I have not urged thee to hasten the disaster . . . what I really did say is before thy face" (so read v. 16a, c). He then prays to be vindicated before his opponents (v. 18) in terms which resemble his prediction of the fate of Hananiah in 28^{15f}. It may be noted (v. 16) that the Hebrew words for "shepherd" and "disaster" only differ in their vowels.

19-27. Sabbath Observance Legislation. This piece of legislation about Sabbath observance belongs to the period of the restored Temple (cf. Neh. 13¹⁵⁻²²). Its promise (v. 25) that Davidic kings (omit princes, since these did not occupy thrones) shall be restored implies that they had ceased to reign in Jerusalem. And the picture (v. 26) of worshipers streaming from Judah and Benjamin, the maritime plain (lowland), the hill country south of the capital (mountains), and the steppe running down to the desert (South), shows that the Temple had become the center of the national life. The LXX reads in v. 19, gate of thy people, meaning the gate of Benjamin leading to Anathoth; cf. 37¹³. For the offerings in v. 26, where oblations mean cereal or meal offerings, cf. such passages as 6²⁰ Ex. 20²⁴ Lev. 2^{1f}. 7¹². The threat in v. 27 is modeled on Amos 2⁵.

CHAPTER XVIII

1-12. The Potter's Wheel. Jeremiah compares Judah in the hand of God to a vessel on a potter's wheel (vv. 1-6). If the clay proves incapable of taking the shape first designed for it, "being marred, as it is apt to be, in a potter's hand," the potter does not throw it away, but tries it in a different shape. Thus no special shape, such as that of state or kingdom, is essential to the nation as the instrument of the divine will. The wheels (v. 3) are probably the upper stone which carried the clay and the lower stone which the potter turned with his feet in order to leave both hands free for his work. Vv. 7-12 contain a later comment on the oracle which misses the point, for they make the divine change of plan depend on a change of mind in the instrument which God is shaping. Now, clay cannot change its mind. For at what instant (v. 7) read at one time I may decree. In v. 9 at what instant = at another time. Cf. on ch. 19.

13-17. Israel's Incredible Folly. Does snow vanish from Lebanon's crest, or do the waters fail from the Mediterranean? Yet Israel has done an equally incredible thing in sacrificing to idols (vanity; A.S.V., "false gods"); hence they have stumbled (not, caused to stumble) in their ways, thus making their land desolate. Jehovah must turn his back instead of his face to them in the day of their calamity (so v. 17b). The text of v. 14 is uncertain, but the sense is clearly as rendered above. The distinction between bypaths and the cast-up way (v. 15) is that between a rough track across fields and a built public road.

18-23. A Plot Against Jeremiah. Certain men plot against Jeremiah, from the sense that the result of listening to the prophet must be to nullify the guidance of all their other spiritual leaders. The verbs in v. 18b should be read in the present, not in the future: priest, wise man and prophet have counsel to supply. The men say, "Let us pay close attention to his words," i.e., in order to trap him. So to read v. 18b and, with LXX, to omit the negative lends double force to Jeremiah's prayer (v. 19a) that God will give equally close attention to him. He pleads that he has prayed for these men that God should not pour out his fury on them. Vv. 21, 22a are probably an addition to heighten the effect. The sentences break the connection between vv. 20 and 22b and anticipate the conclusion in v. 23.

CHAPTER XIX

The Symbolism of the Broken Pottery. Jeremiah is directed to take some of the leading laymen and priests down to the "pottery gate," so called probably because outside it the people of Jerusalem were in the habit of throwing their broken pottery. There he is to break an earthenware jar in token of the way in which Jehovah means to deal with the nation. The meaning of his act, like that at 18², is to be revealed to him on the spot (v. 2). Hence vv. 3-9, which introduce the oracle before the symbolic act and thus nullify the whole effect of the act, must be an addition. The date of the prophet's action is quite uncertain. Since, however, it is followed, ch. 20, by an account of Jeremiah being thrown into the stocks, it should probably be set later than the Temple address (chs. 7, 26). There the people interfered in his defense. This renewed public outburst led the priests to a renewed effort to silence him. And since he here attacked the national existence, there was no one to interfere. In v. 4 estranged means "desecrated." Read also, and the kings of Judah have filled. To hiss (v. 8) is to whistle with amazement. Omit, in v. 11, with LXX, the clause about burying in Topheth. For Topheth cf. 2 Kings 23¹⁰.

CHAPTER XX

1-6. Jeremiah in the Stocks; His Rebuke of Pashhur. Pashhur arrests (not smote, v. 2) Jeremiah. Evidently this priest was an officer charged with the duty of maintaining order in the Temple. And according to 29²⁶ one part of his function was to take action against irresponsible prophets. Contrast how the priest at Bethel appealed to the king and did no more than warn the prophet Amos (7¹⁰). The priest is now invested with full authority in the Temple. Jeremiah declares that God will hand over to terror Pashhur and his friends (so v. 4a). He also declares that this policy of stifling true prophecy must bring ruin on the city. Pashhur has allowed lies to be prophesied, not has prophesied (v. 6). The man was no prophet, but Jeremiah charges him with having permitted the false prophets of the temple to speak unchecked. Which was (in v. 2) = "beside."

7-11. "A Burning Fire Shut Up in My Bones." Jeremiah in his loneliness recognizes afresh that he can have peace with the world only by forsaking the life-task intrusted to him by God. The words may reproduce the thoughts of the prophet when he sat in the stocks. If not, this was a fitting place to insert them. God has led him where he would, and he has let himself be led. Yet, whenever he prophesies in obedience to the divine will, he has reason to cry, Violence and wrong (v. 8), i.e., he is maltreated (cf. 67). But if he tries to hold his peace, the message becomes an inward fire, and he is so weary of enduring this that he can bear no more—it must out. He hears the whisper of the crowd, "He and his terror on every side"; "Let us denounce him"; the whisper of those who were his friends, "Perhaps he may make a false step, then we shall get our revenge." But God is with him and his vindication is sure.

12, 13. Two Misplaced Fragments. V. 12 has been repeated from 11²⁰; v. 13 is an intruded verse from a psalm.

14-18. A Cry of Bitter Distress. Making him glad (v. 15) = congratulating him. V. 16 refers to Sodom (Gen. 19²⁵). Shouting is the battle-cry. In v. 17 LXX reads in the womb; and her womb always great means that she should go with her unborn child to the grave.

CHAPTER XXI

1-10. Jeremiah Announces to Zedekiah the Coming Doom. Near the beginning of the final siege of Jerusalem in 588 B.C., Jeremiah informs King Zedekiah that there is no hope of the Babylonian army retiring (go up, v. 2). It is the divine will that the city should fall; and only those who surrender ("passeth over," A.S.V., v. 9) to the enemy shall survive and so at least save their lives.

Two matters deserve close attention here.

(1) This victory of the Babylonians is never brought into connection with the consummation which the prophet announced (45, etc.). He sees the Babylonians, as Isaiah (10^{5, 15}) saw the Assyrians, to be an instrument in the divine hands for chastising Judah. But they do no more because they can do no more. They cannot bring the consummation, since that involves more than judgment. The judgment of the consummation is but the preparation for a new and better order. And, since it involves so great and, above all, so positive an end, only God can bring it in. (2) But, further, Jeremiah believed that in this he was delivering a religious message. He was consulted as a prophet and he answered in that capacity. To him it was the will of God, or, in our modern language, it was better for the religion of Israel that the capital with its Temple should be destroyed. To say that Jeremiah was more clear-sighted than the court in his recognition of the inevitable issues of the war, or, as Volz bluntly states it, spoke plain common sense about the hopelessness of resistance to a power like Babylon, is to ignore this clear fact. Old Israel did not believe that a special revelation was given or needed to utter common sense. Jeremiah saw his people through the influence of the Josianic reformation making city and Temple essential to their religion. It was better for true religion that the things in which they trusted should go. The section should be compared with 37³⁻¹⁰ and ch. 38. Gather them (v. 4) means "bring the conquerors."

11, 12. A Call to Justice. Cf. 22¹⁻⁹. Read v. 11—To the courtiers of Judah: Hear the word of the Lord, ye of David's house. The first clause is the heading (cf. "concerning the prophets," 23⁹) to the series of oracles in ch. 22, addressed to the kings and courtiers of Jeremiah's time. In the morning (v. 12), i.e., diligently. The spoiled are the wronged. The court exists to bring justice to all men.

13, 14. Jehovah Cannot Be Escaped. An oracle of uncertain origin against some unknown town, addressed as "dweller in the ravine, rock of the table-land," which boasts that none can "reach" it. In v. 14, for her forest read your, and for about her read it.

CHAPTER XXII

1-9. "Execute Ye Justice and Righteousness." Cf. 21^{11f}. Jeremiah is to go down from the Temple to the palace which was connected with the Temple at a slightly lower level. He is to declare that power in Judah exists for the protection of the weak. The stranger is mentioned because he had no rights in his adopted country and was therefore open to wrong. Cf. Nathan's parable to David and note that Uriah was such a stranger (2 Sam. 12:1-15). In vv. 6, 7, Jeremiah, referring to the hall in Solomon's palace (1 Kings 7:2), the cedar columns of which were like trees on Gilead or Lebanon, says, Once thou wert (not art, v. 6) a very Gilead to Jehovah, but now thou art rejected. Vv. 8, 9 are a prose comment taken from Deut. 29:24-26.

10-12. An Oracle on Josiah and Shallum. Josiah is the dead king (cf. 2 Kings 23:29f.), and Shallum (Jehoahaz) the exiled king (cf. 2 Kings 23:31f.). The verses should be rearranged: Thus saith the Lord concerning Shallum who succeeded his father Josiah, Mourn not for the dead: weep bitterly for him who is going away, for he shall never return to see his native land. Once he has left this place, he shall never return, but, etc.

13-19. Jehoiakim Blamed. Jehoiakim is severely blamed for his passion for fine buildings and his meanness in paying his workmen. Is a king proved a king by worrying about cedar? (V. 15.) He shall receive at death neither such mourning as men offer their kin nor such as is given to a great lord (v. 18). His father, Josiah, proved himself royal, when he cared for justice. The emphasis, however, with which it is said that then it was well with Josiah suggests that there was a period in the king's life with which Jeremiah was not in sympathy.

20-23. An Oracle on Obduracy. The oracle is against some unknown town (cf. 21:13f.) situated east of the Jordan. Abarim is in Moab (Deut. 32:49). The wind drives at its will its leaders, its allies are exiled (v. 22a).

24-27. The Fate of Jehoiachin. Cf. mg. and 2 Kings 24:8f. 25:27f.

28-30. Two Fragments on the Same King. According to 1 Chr. 3:17 Jehoiachin had children. The sense, however, here may be that he shall have no successors of his own children.

CHAPTER XXIII

1-4. Unfaithful Leaders to be Replaced. Jeremiah speaks against the leaders who have not cared for (visited) their nation. Throughout these oracles the leading idea is that power means opportunity for service. Vv. 3, 4 present a post-exilic promise of restoration from the lands to which Jehovah has scattered Israel.

5-8. Two Oracles on the Restoration of the Nation. Both of these appear again in 33:16f. and 16:14f. The first predicts Messiah, who is a shoot out of the present stump of the Davidic house. Hence to the writer the royal house of Judah has already been cut off. He is conceived as a second David, ruling by divine authority over a reunited nation. His title, The Lord is our Righteousness, can also be applied to Jerusalem (33:16; cf. Ezek. 48:35). Deal wisely (v. 5) means "prosper." The second oracle declares that the future shall surpass the past.

A Series of Oracles on the Prophets (vv. 9-40). The series corresponds to the series on the kings (cf. 21:11).

9-12. Jeremiah's Agitation Over the False Prophets. Jeremiah's bones become without strength (shake) when he sees the spiritual guides of Judah disloyal in spirit (adulterers) to the God whose religion they teach. Their conduct is bad and they are strong only for evil (v. 10b). The penalty shall be a judicial blindness which urges them on to their ruin when God visits his world. To men who have ignored the eternal standards (holy words) the day of the divine self-revelation brings nothing but judgment. Omit in v. 10 the clause from for because to dried up.

13-15. "Folly in the Prophets." Prophets, in whom disloyalty to the divine standards of right and hypocrisy (lies) are combined, can only bring it about that no man feels it necessary to repent.

16-22. True Prophets Distinguished from False. It is easy to speak soothing words to careless souls. But any man who has stood in the divine council must listen with awe and attention: who has ever heard God's word to purpose otherwise? (So v. 18.) God's anger cannot calm down till it has done his work, and his work is after his holy heart. True prophecy must deal first with the conscience. In the consummation men shall find this true. Vv. 19, 20 reappear in 30:23f.

23, 24. The Inescapable God. Here is offered an oracle of very uncertain sense. If it were legitimate to render at hand by local, i.e., with narrow outlook and correspondingly limited power, the sense would be clear. But it is difficult to justify that translation.

25-29. Revelation of God's Mind a Great Theme. And how long will it be in the thought of prophets who utter their own false fancies, till, with their dreams which men hawk about, they make my people forget my name and all it means? Tell your dreams by all means: but why mix chaff with wheat, i.e., dreams with prophecy? True prophecy does not amuse, it converts men.

30-32. Prophets Who Lack Conviction. This passage is directed against prophets without inner conviction. The men of v. 31 are those who copy God's language and are constantly saying, Thus saith.

33-40. A Pun on the Word "Burden." For What burden! (v. 33) read, with LXX, ye are the burden. Jeremiah's answer contains a Hebrew pun. Massa means a load, but also, like our "burden of a song," means a divine oracle. The divine burden or message to you is that you have become a burden to God. This people (v. 33) = any layman, as contrasted with prophet and priest.

The saying in v. 33 having been misunderstood, the following verses are efforts to explain it. Vv. 34, 35 forbid the use of the expression "massa (burden) of Jehovah," and prescribe two others for public and private use. Vv. 36, 37 order "Never again employ the phrase, 'massa of Jehovah,' for how can his word be a burden to anyone?" (so v. 36a) and omit, with LXX, v. 36b. Vv. 38-40 declare that if men use the phrase God will lift them up like a burden and cast them off.

CHAPTER XXIV

Two Baskets of Figs. Jeremiah, seeing two baskets of figs, one good and one bad, beside the Temple (probably brought there as first fruits), receives the revelation that the good figs represent the exiles carried away with Jehoiachin, the bad figs the remnant population of Jerusalem, and that the former are peculiarly approved (regard for good, v. 5) by their God. Now, the first exiles were the leading men of the nation, and in this has been sought the reason for the prophet's preference. But to make this distinction the ground of the divine preference is to make Jeremiah count God a respecter of persons, and, what is worse, a respecter of persons for reasons of outward dignity and position. For the conqueror did not select his hostages from among the most religious citizens: he chose the men of influence whose absence would most weaken the resistance of Judah. Jeremiah was bringing a religious message, not a confirmation of men's estimate of what makes men favored of God.

Evidently, also, his message ran counter to an opinion which was prevalent in Jerusalem. Now, the exiles, cut off from the Temple and its worship, were regarded by their fellows as ipso facto cut off from relation to their God. They were even apt to believe this themselves. Jeremiah teaches that these men are nearer their God than the men who were living under the shadow of the Temple. These last count their Temple worship essential to any relation to God. The exiles have the opportunity, if they believe that God regards them in their captivity, to learn a higher conception of the divine power and the divine grace. Hence there is a special appropriateness in the baskets being set before the Temple. Figs of the first crop (v. 2) were regarded as the best (cf. Isa. 28⁴). For to be tossed to and fro for evil (v. 9) read an object of disgust.

CHAPTER XXV

1-29. Jeremiah Predicts a Seventy Years' Captivity. The first task here is to sift out the original, for the section has been seriously overlaid with later material. Now, vv. 2-8, with their clumsy introduction and their conclusion, which doubles back to the beginning, form a little sermon which is out of place in this connection. Again, the clause in v. 9, and I will send unto Nebuchadrezzar the king of Babylon, my servant is an impossible grammatical construction as it stands, and is absent from the LXX. Further, in v. 11a, this whole land appears in the LXX as the whole earth, and v. 11b appears in so curiously variant a form in the LXX that it is clearly secondary. Vv. 12-14 refer to chs. 50f. and ascribe those chapters to Jeremiah, but no one now credits the oracles on Babylon to the prophet. Vv. 17-29 describe Jerusalem as desolate at this day (v. 18), and must therefore date from the time after the destruction of the capital. Their late origin is further proved by their ascribing to Jeremiah in v. 17 what was physically impossible to any man. The later generation, which had lost touch with the actual situation, interpreted in a somewhat bald and literal way the fine symbol of the prophet being intrusted with the cup of the divine anger. What remains after these excisions is an oracle on the day of the Lord: Jehovah is about to bring all the families of the North (v. 9, cf. 11⁴) against Jerusalem first, but also against all the nations round it. The world shall become a desolation, returning to the condition from which God brought it at first (cf. 42^{3f.}). Jeremiah is repeating the revelation he received in the second vision after his call.

For and I will do you no hurt (v. 6) read to do you hurt. Read v. 10b, the millstones are heard in every hamlet, the candle seen in every home. In v. 14a read because many nations . . . have enslaved them, i.e., the Jews, I will, etc. The mingled people (v. 20), or Ereb, apparently some part of the population of Egypt. The land of Uz (cf. Job 11) is unknown. The isle which is beyond the sea (v. 22) is the Mediterranean coastlands. In v. 23 the reference is to Bedouin of North Arabia. Omit, in v. 24, and all the kings of the mingled people. The lands named in v. 25 lie east of the Tigris. Sheshach (v. 26) is Babylon.

30-38. Three Minor Oracles. Three minor oracles on the day of the Lord have been added to the longer one. There is no reason for denying these to Jeremiah, except the a priori dictum that he wrote no apocalypse. Havoc reaches from end to end of the world, for the Lord asserts his right and vindicates his claim among all nations: he will destroy the wicked. This, which reproduces v. 31, is the theme of the whole. God's self-manifestation concerns the world, because he is its God; it involves judgment, because he is righteous.

CHAPTERS 26 TO 52: THE PREDOMINANTLY BIOGRAPHICAL SECTION OF THE BOOK

From this point on the chapters contain more narrative and, where they report oracles, report them in connection with the circumstances in which they were spoken. The division cannot be pressed too far, since certain biographical material is found also in chs. 20, 21, and among the later chapters dealing with the story of Jeremiah appears the booklet of consolation, chs. 30, 31, which contains nothing but oracular matter.

CHAPTER XXVI

A Plot Against Jeremiah. This chapter should be compared with 7¹⁻¹⁵. The address here has been softened by the addition of vv. 3-5 and v. 13, which make the destruction of the Temple contingent on whether the people repent. But the message Jeremiah had to deliver was so perilous and unwelcome that he was specially ordered to deliver it in its entirety (v. 2). Now, a call to repentance was no unusual message for a prophet to deliver; but in vv. 7-9 the religious leaders, reproducing Jeremiah's message in the form of an unconditional destruction of the Temple, declare that such an oracle in the name of Jehovah is simply incredible. Again, when the royal officials took their seats to examine and decide the case (v. 10), the point of Jeremiah's appeal in vv. 12, 14 is that he has spoken in his capacity as prophet by the direct authority of Jehovah, not that the priests have reported his words incorrectly. The lay court passes no judgment on Jeremiah's sincerity or insincerity; the men recognize the right of a prophet to utter his message (v. 16).

The elders present from the country, to whom Micah's words were familiar, since that prophet belonged to the country, not to the capital, recall how Micah uttered a prophecy in similar terms. And it is they who introduce the possibility that the doom on Jerusalem may be averted. In v. 8 probably omit and all the people, since in vv. 16f. the laymen support

Jeremiah against their religious leaders. Evidently, the message was peculiarly offensive to the priesthood. Temple and palace (v. 10) were contiguous. The mountain of the house (v. 18) is the Temple hill (cf. Mic. 3¹²). Great evil (closing words of v. 19) means a great crime. Common people (v. 23)=nameless men. A man who was ben so and so, i.e., son of so and so, was buried with his fathers in the family grave. Ahikam (v. 24) was the father of Gedaliah, the official into whose charge Jeremiah was committed after the destruction of Jerusalem (40^{5f.}).

CHAPTER XXVII

Oracles on Submission to Nebuchadrezzar.

The chapter should be studied along with ch. 28. Both belong to the early period of Zedekiah (not Jehoiakim, v. 1, mg.). But they do not come from the same source. For, while 27¹, a later heading, speaks of Jeremiah in the third person, the two oracles in the chapter introduce him in the first person. On the other hand, ch. 28 begins with Jeremiah in the first person, but continues in the third. Nevertheless, the three oracles in chs. 27, 28 seem to be connected with the same historical situation. Apparently, certain neighboring states were seeking to draw Judah into an alliance for a rebellion against Babylon, and the movement was supported by several of the prophets at Jerusalem. What prompted these men to take this attitude is quite unknown. Few things would have thrown more light on the situation of Jewish religion at this period than the preservation of oracles from men whom Jeremiah denounced as false prophets. The attempted rebellion came to nothing, probably because Nebuchadrezzar, hearing of the movement, took prompt action. At least there is mention of a messenger sent from Jerusalem to Babylon in the early period of Zedekiah's reign (51⁵⁹). By this means Jeremiah may have sent his letter to the exiles (ch. 29). The purpose of the messenger may have been to deny or excuse Zedekiah's share in the attempted coalition.

1-11. The First Oracle. In the first oracle of ch. 27 Jeremiah is directed to put on thongs and a yoke, such as were employed for plow-cattle. These are symbols of submission. He is also to send a message (so, with LXX, for them, v. 3) to the allied kings rejecting their offers of alliance. For Babylon is an instrument in the divine hand, and to oppose it is to oppose God. (On this position see intro., p. 678b.) Since the prophet had no power to contract or reject alliances, this narrative may once have had a different setting which represented it, like vv. 12f., as advice given to Zedekiah.

V. 7 interrupts the connection and may be an addition. For dreams (v. 9) read dreamers.

12-22. The Second Oracle. In the second oracle, given to Zedekiah, Jeremiah declares it to be the divine will that Nebuchadrezzar should conquer Jerusalem and despoil the Temple. The section has been modified by the addition of sentences which predict the fall of Babylon and show special interest in the fate of the Temple vessels. It is reported in such different terms in the LXX that many scholars reject the entire chapter. The present writer counts this too skeptical, but, using the evidence of the LXX, he has attempted to disentangle the original. Thus v. 13 is probably an addition, and vv. 18-22 should read If they do prophesy and there should be a message from the Lord with them, let them plead with the Lord. For thus speaks the Lord about the other vessels which Nebuchadrezzar king of Babylon did not take when he carried Jeconiah into exile from Jerusalem: They shall be taken to Babylon. The vessels are those mentioned in 2 Kings 24¹³. Evidently the hope of their restoration was being used as a religious motive by the prophets to support their plans. What Jeremiah announces is that the devastation of the Temple shall be made complete. In v. 15, for that I might read so that I must; and for might perish read shall perish.

CHAPTER XXVIII

Jeremiah's Reply to Hananiah. This is the third oracle in this series. (See opening paragraph under ch. 27.) From v. 10 it would appear that Jeremiah was wearing the yoke and thus that Hananiah's act was later than the oracles of ch. 27 (see introductory remarks to ch. 27). The incident is of great interest as illustrating the attitude of Hebrew prophecy. Jeremiah, when confronted by Hananiah, was conscious of having no special revelation to meet this case. He had already exhausted the terms of his commission and uttered his message. Yet he is inclined to discredit his opponent on the general ground that Hananiah's oracle was not according to the tradition of the great prophets of the past. A prophecy of success needed confirmation as a prophecy of doom did not: The Lord confirm thy words . . . by restoring the vessels (v. 6). In the same way Deuteronomy is not content (18^{21f.}) to appeal to the event happening as a prophet foretold it, but Deut. 13¹⁻⁵ requires every prophet to be in agreement with the traditional faith of Israel. There is something more than rank individualism: corporate experience must also be considered. For thou shalt (v. 13; A.S.V., thou hast) read I will (cf. v. 14). From all these (v. 14) omit the word these, with LXX.

CHAPTER XXIX

1-23. Jeremiah Sends Counsel to the Exiles. As religious motives were being employed to stir up rebellion at Jerusalem (cf. chs. 27f.), so prophets were fomenting political unrest among the exiles. The men were cut off from the Temple, and that, in the judgment of many, meant that they were cut off from the divine grace (cf. ch. 24). Jeremiah uses the mission of certain royal envoys to Nebuchadrezzar to send a message to the men in exile. If the envoys, as suggested in connection with ch. 27, were sent to clear Zedekiah from the charge of plotting rebellion, it was peculiarly suitable for the prophet to send with them a letter the purpose of which was to counteract rebellion among the exiles. He bids the men recognize that their exile is God's will (I have caused, v. 4), and must therefore mean more than loss. Jewish homes can be founded in Babylon (vv. 5f.). They must loyally work for the good of their new country (v. 7). Nor must they imagine themselves forgotten of God. They are on his heart and so have a future which offers hope (v. 11). Therefore let them try whether the relation between him and them has come to an end. They will find it cannot come to an end through an exile which he caused. When you cry to me, I will answer; when you pray, I will listen (so v. 12). As for their saying that their prophets are teaching otherwise (vv. 15, 16), the names of these prophets shall be used as a curse, so dreadful will be their fate (v. 22), for God did not fail to take heed of their conduct (v. 23). The exiles can worship Jehovah without a temple and a native state: they can be loyal citizens of Babylon and loyal Jews. The best comment on the letter is the glimpse given of the non-returning exiles, Daniel rising to high office in the service of Babylon and praying three times a day to Jehovah, the loyal servant with a double allegiance.

The section has been retouched by the later generation which believed their return to the Temple essential to the faith. Thus vv. 16-20 are intruded; they break the connection, are absent from the LXX, and speak about the nations to which God has scattered Israel. V. 14b is late; it is addressed, not to the Babylonian exiles, but to the whole Dispersion. Vv. 10, 11 offer two reasons why the exiles should refuse to be influenced by their prophets. According to v. 10 the men are to wait patiently for the proof of the divine good will, which is to appear after seventy years; according to v. 11 they need not wait and need not rebel, for the divine good will is toward them now and where they are. V. 10 is an addition by the same hand which introduced the seventy years at 25¹¹.

In v. 1 omit the residue of, with LXX. For your dreams, etc. (v. 8), read their dreams.

24—32. Jeremiah Criticized by Shemaiah the Priest. The text here is very confused, especially at the beginning. Thus v. 25 opens with the customary formula of an oracle, but the oracle really begins at v. 30. The LXX and Syriac present a very different text. With their help it is possible to reconstruct a text which would run to this effect: "Shemaiah sent a letter to Zephaniah the priest as follows: you were appointed a priest in succession to Jehoiada, that there might be officers in the Temple to restrain anyone who plays the part of a prophet. Why, then, have you not restrained Jeremiah?" Shemaiah is remonstrating with the Temple authorities at Jerusalem for not having prevented Jeremiah from upsetting the movement among the exiles by his letter. On this new authority given to a priest to control prophecy see 20^{1f}.

CHAPTERS 30 AND 31: THE BOOK OF CONSOLATION

A booklet which once existed in a separate form before being incorporated in the larger roll.

CHAPTER XXX

1—4. Title. The heading belongs to this minor collection, not to the whole book of Jeremiah. V. 3 gives the general character of the oracles: they are all concerned with the restoration of the nation. Hence the collection is often called "the book of consolation."

5—11. The Day of Jehovah. In the day of the Lord (v. 7) the heathen shall be destroyed. Israel shall be punished, since Jehovah cannot hold it guiltless (v. 11b); but in the end church and state shall be restored (v. 9; cf. Hos. 35). The oracle dates from a time when the entire nation had gone into exile. For the description of the day in v. 7 cf. Isa. 13^{6f}. For his yoke (v. 8) read the. Vv. 10, 11, absent from the LXX, are practically identical with 46^{27f}.

12—17. Zion to be Renewed. Jehovah will renew Zion, for which no other cares (v. 17b). Vv. 12—14 describe the past: read, therefore, in vv. 12^f, was for is.

18—24. A Promise of Restoration. (See also 31¹.) Omit vv. 23^f, which reappear in 23^{19f}, and, with LXX, v. 22, a duplicate of 31¹. Jeremiah promises that Jehovah shall turn the fortune of Northern Israel. He shall restore to himself a people which has lost courage to seek him: in v. 21 read them and they for him and he, and cf. 32¹⁻²⁵. Their towns shall be rebuilt on the ruins of the old ones, and their palaces inhabited on the old sites (v. 18). Instead of diminishing and degrading them he shall make them many and honored (v. 19b). Their ruler shall be of native stock (cf. Deut. 17¹⁵), and they shall be Jehovah's people. Nothing is said of return from exile or a Davidic king.

CHAPTER XXXI

1. See under 30¹⁸⁻²⁴.

2—14. Two Additional Oracles Promising Restoration. The first oracle (vv. 2—6) is based directly on Hosea. That prophet believed that Jehovah would reduce Northern Israel to the condition from which he brought it into Palestine. In the wilderness, Israel, again dependent only on him (cf. 21⁻³), should return to its true allegiance. Jeremiah sees this hope fulfilled in the consummation. Once before Jehovah revealed himself to it in a distant land, i.e., Egypt or the wilderness, and maintained his loving-kindness toward it (so v. 3, with which cf. Hos. 11¹). In that happy day men shall keep the vintage feast (enjoy, v. 5) in Samaria, and Israel, like the girls at Shiloh (Judg. 21²¹), dance with her timbrels. In that day there will be a reunited nation (v. 6). The text of v. 2b is uncertain. The watchmen of v. 6 are those in the vineyards.

The second oracle (vv. 7—14) is from the period of Deutero-Isaiah. Northern Israel, restored from exile (v. 8), shall say, The Lord has saved his people (so, with LXX, in v. 7). Coming to Zion, they shall find poured out over their land God's richest gifts, corn, wine, etc. (v. 12). In this day of their restored prosperity the people's offerings shall be so abundant that priests and people shall alike be satisfied (v. 14). Note the different emphasis laid here on the promised return to Zion. For together in v. 13 read with LXX shall be merry.

15—17. Benjamin's Exile. Benjamin's exile shall issue, not in death, but in renewal. Ramah is in Benjamin, and there, according to 1 Sam. 10², Rachel died at her son's birth (cf. Gen. 48⁷). The mother's work is her weary toil.

18—20. Ephraim's Prayer. Ephraim prays for the divine help that he may be wholly restored (v. 18). Now, he adds, that I have grown gray (was turned, v. 19) and have gained experience (was instructed) I repent, and bear the disgrace due to my youthful folly. Then v. 20 should be read, with LXX, as a statement, not as an interrogation. It is the divine response to this confession of moral impotence (cf. 32¹⁻⁴⁴). I cannot forget that he is still this, i.e., my dear son, and my affections are stirred. To Hosea and Jeremiah salvation is as sure as the divine love.

21, 22. A Later Summons to Return from Exile. Go hither and thither (v. 22) means "hesitate." The final cryptic clause the present writer regards as a grammatical note which has crept from the margin into the text.

23-30. A Series of Promises. V. 24 should be read, with LXX: May he bless also Judah, its towns, husbandmen and shepherds, when I shall have satisfied the weary soul. The section in vv. 23-26 is a prayer for Judah, when God turns his fortunes (v. 22). The last phrase does not necessarily imply a return from exile. The turning of fortune may mean the new condition when Judah (or Jerusalem) can really be called a habitation of justice. Then v. 26 says that the very thought of this is sweet. 27, 28. The promise of a new day; cf. 1¹⁰, 29, 30. Against fatalistic despair. Cf. note on 18^{5f}, and Ezek. 18^{2f}.

31-34. The New Covenant. The new covenant will be established in the consummation—after those days (v. 32). For a covenant to endure, the law which every such covenant brings with it must cease to be something imposed from without. It must be loved and accepted as the law of life. Although I was an husband unto them (v. 32) read, with LXX, and so I rejected them.

35-37. Two Oracles in the Manner of Deutero-Isaiah. These ordinances (v. 36), i.e., if this order of nature may be changed.

38-40. An Oracle in the Manner of Second Zechariah (cf. Zech. 14). The Lord's city, Jerusalem, shall be rebuilt (so v. 38a). The author is peculiarly interested in the ceremonial purity of the new city, as containing the Temple. The old Hinnom valley, which circled round into the neighborhood of the Temple and which had been used for the unclean purposes of burial and false worship, shall be consecrated. Every risk of pollution shall thus be removed from the sacred precincts. On the tower and gate (v. 38) cf. 2 Kings 14¹³ Neh. 3¹ 12³⁹ Zech. 14¹⁰. For it shall not (v. 40) read they, i.e., the people (cf. v. 28).

CHAPTER XXXII

Jeremiah's Purchase of the Field at Anathoth. The long introduction, vv. 1-5, serves to bring the incident here narrated into close connection with the period in Jeremiah's life when he expressed his conviction that in the interest of religion Nebuchadrezzar should capture Jerusalem and bring to an end both the state of Judah and the Temple with its worship (cf. 21⁷ 37¹⁷). What, then, was to be the future of Judah? And since Judah had received a special revelation of God's will and was the representative in the world of pure religion, what was to be the future of religion, if the Temple were destroyed? Through a divine instruction to purchase a field in his native village the prophet receives a promise for the future. As the exiles in Babylon (ch. 29) could worship without a temple, the religious life of Judah was to continue in the lives of humble men who continued their daily tasks in the ruined land and recognized that, though robbed of capital and altar, they were not beyond the grace of God. The situation can be compared with that when the site of Hannibal's tent was put up for auction in the Forum. Only, the Romans were confident about the future of their city; Jeremiah about the future of religion.

The account has been expanded by additional matter, which, however, can be easily distinguished. Thus vv. 17-23 are an expansion of Jeremiah's prayer, the terms of which have no connection with the special situation. The Ah Lord God with which v. 17 opens should then be carried to and repeated at the beginning of v. 24. Again, vv. 28-41 form an irrelevant expansion. Since Jeremiah has already said that the city was as good as captured, it was unnecessary to repeat that this was sure. Further, v. 37 shows that this passage was written after the dispersion of the nation, while vv. 42-44 speak merely of Jehovah turning Israel's fortune and promising the continuance of life and well-being, not its renewal after exile.

Jeremiah held the first right of purchase as next of kin over a certain field (v. 7b). His cousin came to him in the guarded court of the palace (v. 2; cf. 37^{20f}), asking him to exercise this right, so that the property might remain in the family (cf. Lev. 25²⁵ Ruth 4^{3f}). From Hanamel's coming after he had been warned to expect it, the prophet recognized that the matter involved more than a mere coincidence, even a divine revelation for the nation (v. 8b). Some of the words employed about the transaction are probably technical terms, the exact sense of which is unknown; but read in v. 11 I further took the purchase deed containing the full stipulations, both the outer copy and the inner. The purpose of making a double copy, which was the practice with papyrus deeds and clay tablets, was to preserve a record, though the outer copy became worn and illegible. Even unto this day (v. 20), i.e., "dost continue to do them to this day." Behold, the mounts or siege-works are close to the city (v. 24). And thou hast (v. 25); better, yet. Instead of Jeremiah (v. 26) read me, with LXX. That I should (v. 31); better, so that I must. One heart and one way (v. 39), i.e., in thought and conduct alike. With my whole, etc. (v. 41), i.e., with my entire good will.

CHAPTER XXXIII

Five Oracles. All center round the restoration of Jerusalem and the worship there. The little collection may have been made in Jerusalem itself between its overthrow and its restoration. If so, the emphasis on the difficult things (v. 3) may reflect the apparently hopeless situation in which the community was placed.

1-9. A Happy Future for Jerusalem. In v. 2, for that doeth it read, with LXX, who made the world, and formed, not formeth. The text in vv. 4, 5, from to make down to but it is (R.V.) is hopeless. For the thought of v. 3 cf. Isa. 48⁶. Truth (v. 6), rather security. Do unto them (v. 9), read it.

10-13. The Happiness in Store for Jerusalem and Judah. It culminates in v. 11 in the restoration of the Temple worship. Note the introduction of the common liturgical phrase, Give thanks, etc. (cf. Psa. 106¹). Then vv. 12f. describe the folds for shepherds in charge of flocks (v. 12b) among the pastures of Judah, and the security of those who are able to count their flocks in peace (cf. Lev. 27³²).

14-18. A Promise of the Continuance of the Davidic House and the Sacrificial Worship. With v. 14 cf. 29¹⁰, which is also late. A Branch (v. 15), cf. 23^{5f}. The Lord, etc. (v. 16), cf. note on 23⁶. Oblations (v. 18), cf. 17²⁶.

19-22. Another Prophecy of the Davidic House and the Levitical Priesthood. The stress laid on the Levites points to a date earlier than the limitation of the priesthood to the family of Aaron. With v. 20 cf. 31³⁵. Of the day, of the night, i.e., concerning day and night.

23-26. A Prophecy of the Nation and the Davidic House. This, again, points to a time when it was possible for outsiders to regard Israel as having ceased to be a nation (v. 24b).

CHAPTER XXXIV

1-7. Zedekiah Warned that the City Must Fall. Jeremiah, declaring it to be the divine will that Nebuchadrezzar should burn down Jerusalem, assures Zedekiah Thou needest (shalt, v. 4) not die by the sword: thou mayest (shalt, v. 5) die in peace. He is advising the king to surrender. Burnings (v. 5); this does not refer to cremation, which was never a Jewish practice, but to the burning of spices in honor of the dead (cf. 2 Chr. 16¹⁴). For Ah Lord! read alas! your Majesty—the suitable lament over a king. Lachish (v. 7), the modern Tel el Hesi, west of Hebron, and Azekah, west of Bethlehem, were two fortresses on the Philistine frontier.

8-22. The Perfidy Toward the Released Slaves. Apparently, when the Babylonians were besieging Jerusalem, the city authorities proclaimed a general freedom to all Hebrew slaves, which they confirmed by a solemn ceremonial rite in the Temple. This action was probably taken in the hope of thereby stiffening the resistance in the capital. When, however, an Egyptian army advanced to support their ally and the Babylonian army was compelled temporarily to raise the siege in order to meet this new enemy, the leaders, thinking themselves secure, withdrew from their contract. Jeremiah entered a vehement protest against this cynical conduct. "You did," he says, "an upright thing in the proclamation of liberty" (v. 15), or, as it appears in v. 9b, "in resolving that no Jew should hold his brother Jew in slavery. But you have profaned the divine name (v. 16) in this act of perjury. Therefore Jehovah proclaims unto you a general release, like that which you have proclaimed to your slaves. You in turn shall serve new masters, sword, pestilence and famine, and shall become an object of horror in the world" (v. 17).

The text has been confused by a legally minded editor who misconstrued the situation and added vv. 13f. Misled by the technical word for liberation in v. 8, he thought the covenant of v. 8 referred to the Sinai covenant with the nation, and the proclamation of release referred to the permanent divine law of Ex. 21², etc. But the covenant of vv. 8, 15 was no more than a civil agreement made by the leaders of the state, though sanctified and made binding by a religious ceremony. And the liberation was not the regular liberation granted to every Hebrew slave after a seven years' service: it was a special decree issued to meet the peculiar conditions of the time. Hence in v. 8 omit unto them after liberty and cf. Lev. 25¹⁰. When they cut, etc. (v. 18), literally, the calf which they cut, etc. The clause is a marginal note which has crept into the text at a wrong place. It should follow v. 19, and was meant to describe the ritual which was observed in such cases. For its meaning and purpose consult Gen. 15¹⁰. Which are gone up (v. 21), i.e., retired from the siege.

CHAPTER XXXV

The Rechabites' Refusal to Drink Wine. The Rechabites were a Jewish sect whose members, maintaining the old nomadic customs, rejected the settled agricultural life.

In particular they continued to live in tents and refused to cultivate the vine. Their objection to the vine was based primarily on the fact that it only yields after some years' culture. Nomads may sow a crop in some temporary settlement, and after reaping it may move on, as Isaac is said to have done. But men who plant vines have taken root themselves. They have become fellahin, not nomads. (Cf. further 2 Kings 10¹⁵.) Jeremiah brought "the whole house" into one of the side-rooms of the Temple (1 Kings 6⁵)—evidently the sect was small in numbers—set a wine-jar and cups before them and bade them drink. They refused, appealing to the rule of their founder, and adding that the only reason for their living in the city instead of in tents was the invasion of the enemy (v. 11). Jeremiah uses the sect's strict obedience to a narrower ideal to point a moral to Jerusalem: take a reproof as to how you should obey (v. 13). Sons of Hanan (v. 4); since the person referred to is called a man of God, this must originally have been a proper name. Wherein ye sojourn (v. 7), i.e., in which you are mere passing guests, tent-dwellers. Stand before (v. 19) is used in the special sense of 15¹⁹.

CHAPTER XXXVI

Jeremiah's Roll Read, Burned, Re-written. Following the Temple address of ch. 26, or the arrest of ch. 20, Jeremiah was forbidden (shut up, v. 5) to enter the Temple by the priests charged with maintaining order there (cf. 29²⁴). Accordingly, he dictates (from my mouth, v. 6) a scroll which Baruch is to read on a fast day, when the citizens of Jerusalem and the country people are gathered in the Temple (v. 6). Perhaps their petition, offered at their fast, may then become acceptable (so v. 7a). The contents of this scroll cannot have been so long as it is represented in the introduction (v. 2), for it was read aloud three times in one day (vv. 10, 15, 21). Its tenor also must have been uniform, since Micaiah was able to give a summary of it after one hearing (v. 13); and it is certain from v. 29 that it contained a prediction of Nebuchadrezzar's capture of Jerusalem.

Micaiah, recognizing that such a message was a state affair, went down to the palace, where he found councilors in session (v. 12), and gave a general report. These men, realizing the matter to be grave, summoned Baruch and bade him read it aloud again to us (so with LXX, v. 15). Startled at the message, they consulted together (omit with LXX with Baruch, v. 16) and decided that they must report to the king. First, however, they made sure who was ultimately responsible by asking Baruch, How didst thou write all these words at his dictation? (V. 17.) There was no need to mention Jeremiah's name to his secretary. Baruch replied that he had been a mere secretary, he had reported faithfully (not with ink, v. 18). Thereupon they went to the king's private room (court, cf. 1 Kings 1¹⁵) and related the whole matter—not all the words, for they had left the scroll behind (v. 20). The king was in his winter room, for it was the ninth month (December, 604 B.C.). The month is mentioned to explain the room and to show how there came to be a brazier at hand for Jehoiakim's burning of the scroll. From the fact that the king was peculiarly irritated by the prophet's attitude toward Babylon (v. 29) it may be concluded that Jehoiakim was already planning that rebellion against Babylon (cf. 2 Kings 24¹) which led to the first captivity under Jehoiachin. Hence too arose the dismay of the councilors and their decision that the matter must go before the king.

On learning the fate of his first scroll, Jeremiah instructs Baruch to write a new one (vv. 27f.). By this act he was not laying up a record for the future, but giving a message to the present. The scroll is rewritten, because it contains a word of the Lord: and no pen-knife, even that of a king, can mar the divine purpose. The one result of such destruction is to add more. It is unwise to conclude too much from such an act in connection with the difficult questions which center around the book in its present form. It is interesting, however, to note the division of opinion about Jeremiah. Here certain courtiers venture on a protest to Jehoiakim; in ch. 26 elders successfully maintain "liberty of prophesying." In 26²⁰ appears a prophet whose message agreed with that of Jeremiah. It was these elements in Judah that preserved his oracles. The king's son (v. 26), i.e., of the blood royal, not necessarily a son of Jehoiakim. With v. 30 cf. 22¹⁸. If this prophecy was fulfilled, it must have been after the final capture of Jerusalem. There is, however, no record of such treatment of Jehoiakim's body.

CHAPTER XXXVII

1-10. Reply to a Request. In reply to a request for help and guidance from Zedekiah, Jeremiah declares that the retirement of the Babylonian army from the siege of Jerusalem on the approach of an Egyptian force will afford a mere temporary relief (cf. ch. 34). The conviction that the destruction of Jerusalem at the hands of the Babylonians was part of the divine purpose and therefore served a religious end could not be more strongly expressed than it is in v. 10. Nebuchadrezzar carried Jehoiachin away captive because of his father's rebellion (v. 1) and appointed Zedekiah king (cf. 2 Kings 24¹⁷). Surely (v. 9), better, wholly. The reference is to their temporary withdrawal.

11-21. Jeremiah Released but Again Imprisoned. Jeremiah seized the opportunity of the raising of the siege by the Babylonians to go to Anathoth. The meaning of one Hebrew word in v. 12 is so uncertain that it is impossible to be sure on what business he went. But that it was private business and may have been connected with the inheritance of 32^{6f}. is clear from the mention of his kindred (people). The captain of the guard arrested him on a charge of desertion to the enemy; and after examination he was flung into an underground cell (so read in v. 16). In reply to a secret message from Zedekiah, the prophet repeated his reiterated assurance of the victory of Babylon. He also took occasion to ask why he should receive exceptionally harsh treatment. If the king flung a prophet of disaster into a cell where was he confining the prophets of success, whose promises had come to nothing? (Vv. 18f.) On this he was removed to the guarded court and given rations. Bakers' street, or bazaar (v. 21): it is the practice in the East for each trade to occupy a special quarter.

CHAPTER XXXVIII

Jeremiah in a Dungeon; His Release; Another Secret Interview with Zedekiah. This chapter may be a variant of 37¹¹⁻²¹. Both report that Jeremiah was flung into a cistern (v. 6), and delivered by royal authority into the guarded court. They differ as to the method, not as to the ultimate cause of the arrest. According to this chapter, certain leaders complain that the language the prophet is in the habit of using (so v. 1) is damping down the courage of the defenders. Vv. 2, 3 offer samples of the kind of oracles to which the men object. And it is necessary to acknowledge that there was sufficient cause for the men to take some action. For a state to allow a prophet to say openly what is no travesty of Jeremiah's message, but a fair reproduction of its contents, was to encourage sedition. And the steps taken by the authorities in Jerusalem to silence him were in principle no worse than the action taken toward conscientious objectors in America or Great Britain during the Great War, and it is a just question whether a state, engaged in a life-and-death struggle for its existence, will or can ever do otherwise.

This raises at once a question as to the view which should be taken of Jeremiah's conduct. The only excuse which can be offered for the worthy conscientious objector is that he was animated by nothing petty, but by profound conviction. The prophet must have been driven on by the same conviction. No mere idea of the hopelessness of the struggle meets the case. He believed it was better for the religion of his people and the world that Jerusalem should go. To men who believed that it was of life-and-death interest for the city to stand, that was the worst kind of treason. No question of expediency, but one of principle, was involved.

Ebed-melech, a eunuch on duty in the palace (v. 7), received authority from the king to interfere. He took three men (so, with LXX, v. 10) and provided them with old and worn-out clothes from a palace-wardrobe (treasury, v. 11) to put between Jeremiah's armpits and the ropes and so hoist him out of the cistern.

When Zedekiah asked the prophet for an oracle, the latter demanded an assurance of safety and added whenever I give counsel, you do not listen (so v. 15b). When, however, the king swore by God who made us living men that he would be safe, he received the old response that only by surrender could his life be safe. The closing terms of this oracle in v. 22 are obscure; but probably the sense is, "I saw in a vision the women of the royal harem being led before the Babylonian officers, and they were repeating, 'Thy intimate friends have deceived and overcome thee, have plunged thy feet in the mire and forsaken thee.' " So sure is the ruin that the prophet has heard the royal harem intoning a funeral dirge over Jerusalem, addressed as thy and thee. V. 23 may be an effort to interpret this dirge with reference to Zedekiah's position. Of Malchijah of the blood-royal (so v. 6); probably a marginal note, which should be read after Ebed-melech (v. 7), to explain that the eunuch, whose name means "royal slave," belonged to Malchijah. The third entry (v. 14)—perhaps the entry of the bodyguard (cf. 2 Kings 11⁶). These words (v. 24), better, matters. The matter was not perceived (v. 27), i.e., the interview had not been overheard.

CHAPTER XXXIX

1-14. The Capture of Jerusalem; Jeremiah Spared. The LXX omits vv. 4-13; i.e., it relates merely how Jeremiah fared after the capture of Jerusalem. The Hebrew text consists of two parts: vv. 1-10, which describe the fate of the city; vv. 11-14, parallel to 40:2-6, which deal with Jeremiah. It seems probable that into vv. 1-10 have been inserted materials, such as vv. 1f. and 4-7, taken from ch. 52, and that the section was originally concerned with the prophet's fate. But it is not easy to decide how much is original. The names and titles of the foreigners who set themselves down to decide the fate of the city have been confused. Read in v. 3, Nebo-Shazban the Rabsaris, Nergal-Sarezer the Rabmag. These, probably civil authorities, appear in v. 13 alongside the captain of the bodyguard or military leader. The gate between the two walls (v. 4) lay south of Jerusalem opposite the breach by which the besiegers entered. The fugitives were making for the Jordan Valley and East Palestine (cf. Jos. 31⁶). Houses of the people (v. 8) is a curious expression. The text reads house, and possibly the original was house of the Lord. Then the sense will be that with the fall of palace and Temple church and state came to an end. The text of v. 9 must be faulty, for there is no difference between the residue of the people in the city and the residue of the people. Perhaps by the second people was meant the country as contrasted with the city population.

15-18. Jeremiah's Promise to Ebed-melech. The section dates before the capture of the city and finds its natural connection after 38:28a. It may have been displaced. For in that day (v. 16) read at this time.

CHAPTERS 40 TO 44: THE JEWISH COMMUNITY IN JUDAH AFTER THE FALL OF JERUSALEM

These chapters relate the fortunes of the Jewish community in Judah after the fall of the capital; Jeremiah appears as a prominent figure merely in connection with one incident, namely, the flight of a body of Jews to Egypt. In most of the narrative he does not appear at all. Apparently, therefore, the chapters were not written in connection with the life of the prophet, but to serve another purpose. When they were inserted in the larger book it was necessary to provide them with some link; and the heading, the word which came to Jeremiah from the Lord was added. But the somewhat incongruous character of the heading only serves to confirm the impression of the independent character of what is introduced.

CHAPTER XL

1-6. Jeremiah Entrusted to the Care of Gedaliah. The account is parallel to 39:11-14. In dating the prophet's release a month after the capture of the city, this account has the greater air of verisimilitude. The conquerors would have more serious matters to engage their attention immediately after their victory, and might well postpone decision of the fate of an individual until the prisoners and spoil were being examined at Ramah before the long journey to Babylon. Nor is it easy to suppose that Nebuchadnezzar was so intimately acquainted with the inner life of Judah as to give the orders of 39:11f. On the other hand, the language of the general here (vv. 2f.) cannot be the ipsissima verba of a Babylonian. The exact terms of the liberty allowed to Jeremiah cannot be determined, for the first clause of v. 5 is hopelessly corrupt. It is tempting to conjecture that the original contained a refusal to allow the prophet to settle in Jerusalem. One notes that Gedaliah is appointed over the towns of Judah and settled at Mizpah, as though the Jews were at first given no authority over their ruined capital. In v. 5b read the captain of the guard supplied him with rations.

7-16. The Country Stripped of Leading Citizens. The country was stripped of its leading citizens, but not of the crofters and farmers. In leaving these behind the victors looked to their own interest (cf. 39:10), since they alone could pay the tribute. And they appointed Gedaliah, a leading Jew, to act as intermediary between the native population and the foreign officials who administered the new province. Gedaliah first attempted to get in contact with and win the confidence of the leaders of the guerrilla bands (forces, v. 7) who were wandering in the country. He assured them that they need have no fear of the new officials; he himself would be responsible to such as were sent from time to time. They might confidently gather in their harvest, store it and settle in the wrecked villages which they might choose to occupy. But at the instigation of the king of Ammon, Ishmael planned the murder of Gedaliah (vv. 13-16).

CHAPTER XLI

The Assassination of Gedaliah. Omit in v. 1, with LXX, and one of the chief officers of the king. The man had nothing to do with the Babylonians. Even the men of war (v. 3), i.e., Ishmael murdered all the fighting men, whether Jews or Babylonians. The second day (v. 4), i.e., the next day. It is significant (v. 5) to find these men from North Israel, after the destruction of their Bethel altar by Josiah, on their way to the Temple with their offerings. Also, though they must have known of the destruction of the Temple, they continue to come. From the first the site continued to be used for worship by the population that remained behind. According to the LXX, it was the pilgrims (v. 6) who were weeping. Into the midst of the pit (v. 7), read into a cistern. By the side of Gedaliah (v. 9), read, with LXX, was a large one. The cistern was dug by Asa to serve his garrison when he fortified Mizpah (1 Kings 15²²). Omit in v. 10, with LXX, and all the people that remained in Mizpah. For great waters (v. 12) read great pool, the scene of the incident in 2 Sam. 21³. Gibeon is one mile distant from Mizpah. For the men of war (v. 16) read men, women, and children. Ishmael had butchered the fighting men (v. 3). On their way they halted (dwelt) at the khan or caravanseraï of Chimham (v. 17). Some of these khans were large and could accommodate a considerable body of travelers with their animals. Yet it is clear that those who migrated to Egypt with Johanan were a comparatively small body. They were men who felt that they might be held responsible by the Babylonians for the conduct of Ishmael. It is singular that nothing is said about Jeremiah, though he must have been among the men rescued from Ishmael.

CHAPTER XLII

Jeremiah Opposes Flight to Egypt. The fugitives consult Jeremiah as to their future course, asking him to pray for oracular guidance. The prophet agrees, and the people invoke on themselves the divine curse should they disobey; read in v. 5, the Lord be a witness against us. After ten days he delivers a message to the effect that they need have no fear of the Babylonians, for Jehovah will protect them and cause them to settle in their own land—so read, with Syriac, for return in v. 12; cf. v. 13. If, however, they elect to go down to Egypt, the divine curse will rest upon them to destroy them.

The chapter is far from clear. Thus the sense of v. 20a seems to be that the people have wronged their own souls in asking for an oracle at all; and v. 21 represents them as having made up their minds before consulting the prophet. When one recognizes that the chapter does not come from the same source as chs. 40f., and notes that the natural time to consult Jeremiah was before they began their journey, this rouses the suspicion that the passage has received additions. It may originally have contained merely the oracle advising the men to remain in Judah. When the incident was placed at the khan, after the people had started on the road to Egypt, the narrative naturally assumed an appearance of insincerity on the part of the people.

For Jezaniah son of Hoshaiiah (v. 1) read, with LXX, Azariah son of Maaseiah (cf. 43²).

CHAPTER XLIII

1-7. A Band Decide to Go to Egypt; Jeremiah Accompanies Them. The company, consisting of the little band round Gedaliah (v. 6) and some refugees who had returned in the hope of settling in Judah under his authority (v. 5; cf. 40^{11f.}), were evidently in a panic. Their accusation against Baruch shows the inclination of such men to find a scapegoat. They followed the headstrong party, opposed to Jeremiah, who were naturally the guerrilla leaders, since these men were already suspected by the Babylonians. They fled to Daphne (Tahpanhes, v. 8; cf. 21⁶), a fortified town on the northeast border of Egypt, where the Syrian road crossed the frontier. In v. 2 for Hoshaiiah read with LXX, Maaseiah.

8-13. Jeremiah Predicts the Conquest of Egypt. Jeremiah sets great stones before an official building in Daphne: the meaning of the words translated "mortar" and "brickwork" is wholly uncertain. On these Nebuchadrezzar will erect his victor's throne. In v. 10 read with LXX, he will set and you have hid. He will overrun Egypt, and especially will burn its temples. In v. 12 read with LXX, he will kindle. He will deal with Egypt's gods with the same ease with which a shepherd deals with his coat, ridding it of its lice (v. 12b). V. 13, which predicts the destruction of the obelisks of Heliopolis, a town north of the present Cairo, is an addition. It is inappropriate after the announcement of the departure of Nebuchadrezzar, and Heliopolis is too far from Daphne to have meant anything to newcomers in Egypt. Nebuchadrezzar conquered Egypt in 568 B.C.

CHAPTER XLIV

Jeremiah's Difficulties with the Jews in Egypt. This chapter is very puzzling. Not only is the text confused and full of intolerable repetitions, but it represents Jeremiah addressing a convention of Jews gathered from all Egypt. Migdol, or Magdolos, is another frontier fortress east of Daphne; Noph is Memphis; Pathros is Southern Egypt (v. 1). The Papyri from Elephantine, near the southern boundary of Egypt, have revealed a Jewish colony settled there at this time. But they have also shown it to have been possessed of a temple and therefore little likely to come north for religious guidance. Such a convention round a fugitive prophet is scarcely probable at this period. What remains clear is that Jeremiah rebuked the practice of a heathen rite which was peculiarly prevalent among the Jewish women. The present writer suggests that the original nucleus was a rebuke to the Daphne colony for its toleration of this cult. Jeremiah declared that the result of disloyalty to the first principle of their religion, namely, the acknowledgment of Jehovah alone, must be that the people will melt away into the surrounding heathenism and be submerged in its coming doom. At the beginning this original oracle was increased by a threat of doom against the people, because, in direct disobedience to the divine word, they have come to Egypt in the first place. In the end it was expanded into a statement that, since the Egyptian Jews were everywhere practicing such mixed cults, they shall be punished through some great calamity. It is not possible, however, fully to justify the analysis here.

1-14. The People's Sin in Coming to Egypt. The sin of the people consists in their coming to Egypt (note especially v. 12). Their false worship is merely incidental to and the outcome of their having resolved to settle there (v. 8). Nothing is said about the special sin of the worship of Astarte. The doom also shifts between all the Egyptian Jews and the Daphne colony. The text in v. 9 is very confused; probably read with LXX, Have you forgotten the sin of your fathers, the kings of Judah and your leaders which, etc., how they were never contrite, etc. All of v. 10 describes the past. Jehovah has now resolved (not will set, v. 11) against them. None shall survive, except casual refugees (such as shall escape, v. 14).

15-26. The Women Protest Against Jeremiah. Here the situation is entirely changed. A number of women, with a few of their husbands who have approved the conduct of their wives, protest with a loud outcry (so read for a great assembly, v. 15) against Jeremiah having interfered with their worship of Astarte. They intend to maintain the definite decision they have made to continue the rite which is no novelty, but dates from their time in Jerusalem. The women whose husbands are not present add (insert, with LXX, at the beginning of v. 19, the women further added) that their worship has been carried on with the full approval of their husbands. The point of the remark is that, according to the law of Num. 30^{6f.}, a woman's vow was only valid if it had been approved by her husband. The prophet's attack must therefore have been directed, not only against one definite form of worship, but against the women practicing it. Jeremiah declares that this mixed worship has ruined Judah, and is the same thing as complete apostasy

(v. 26). Jehovah must be everything or nothing. In v. 19 for to worship her read stamped with her image. In v. 25 for ye and your wives read with LXX, you women.

27-30. The Ruin of Egypt Again Predicted. According to Herodotus, ii, 169, Hophra was deposed by Amasis, who rebelled against Nebuchadrezzar in 570 B.C. and was defeated in 568.

CHAPTER XLV

Jeremiah's Oracle to Baruch. This is dated in 604 B.C. (cf. 36¹). Accordingly, it is long prior to the Egyptian incidents; it belongs to the period when the prophet was predicting the coming of the end (25¹); evidently these words in v. 1 must mean the oracles in the scroll Jehioakim burned (ch. 36). The text is in bad condition. The first clause of v. 4 should be omitted: Baruch is directly addressed. The last clause, as it stands, is untranslatable and is absent from LXX. V. 4 then declares: It is I who built up, who also break down, etc. In v. 5 it is possible to insert the last clause of v. 4 with the addition of a word, and to read I will bring evil on all flesh and ruin on all the world. The sense will then be that in the coming consummation Baruch may be secure as to his life and must be content with this.

CHAPTERS 46 TO 51: PROPHECIES CONCERNING FOREIGN NATIONS

These chapters form a collection of oracles dealing with the fate or the temper of the nations which influenced Judah about this period. The collection once existed in a separate form, since it was inserted by the LXX in the middle of ch. 25, a more suitable position for it than its place in the Hebrew text. The oracles may have been collected in Palestine, but some of them were clearly uttered in Babylon and others in Egypt. They are also of varied dates, since parts of chs. 50f. belong to the age of Cyrus, while 46²⁻⁶ was probably uttered under the tremendous impression produced by the struggle at Carchemish between Egypt and Babylon for the empire of the world. Another significant feature of the oracles is that several of them appear elsewhere and are ascribed to other prophets than Jeremiah. They abound in names of cities and peoples. For their identification the student must be referred to the more detailed commentaries.

CHAPTER XLVI

1. A Heading to the Entire Collection. The oracles are arranged under the nations dealt with: on Egypt, 462; on Philistia, 471; on Moab, 481, etc.

2-28. Oracles on Egypt. The oracles are alike in predicting Egypt's fall. 2-6. Mount, ye horsemen, and fall into rank (v. 4). Why are these dismayed, turned in retreat? (V. 5.) The swiftest may not flee (v. 6). So powerful and self-confident was the Egyptian army, so utter its rout. 7-12. Egypt advanced like its own Nile. Let its horses rear: the old Hebrews had a peculiar dislike for horse and chariot. Let its allies be many and well equipped. These may serve for common needs, but this is a day of Jehovah; his sword shall devour (so read v. 10, with LXX; cf. Isa. 34^{5f.}). The mighty hath clashed with the mighty to their common ruin (v. 12b). In v. 8 omit the city and, with LXX.

In vv. 13-26 we have a collection of fragments with a new heading, probably derived from the Jewish colony in Egypt (cf. 43^{8f.}). 14-17. The sword is devouring on all sides. Why is Egypt's strong one swept away? The reference may be to the leading god or the Pharaoh. Jehovah has smitten him (v. 15). He has tottered and fallen. One says to another, Arise (v. 16). The text of v. 17 is bad. Perhaps read they give Pharaoh a new name, the boaster who is never up to time. 18, 19. The destroyer comes, like one of Israel's highest mountains. Lady Egypt, who sittest so quietly, get thee gone. Noph (Memphis) was the capital. 20. A gadfly stings the fat heifer. 21-24. Egypt's mercenaries before the conqueror are like calves fattened for the butcher. The text of vv. 22f. can be restored only by conjecture. 25, 26. This passage contains also a promise of Egypt's restoration in curiously different terms (cf. Ezek. 29^{13f.}). Amon of No was the chief god of Thebes. 27, 28. Added from 30^{10f.}, where they more properly belong.

CHAPTER XLVIII

Oracle on the Philistines. It refers to an otherwise unknown Egyptian attack on Gaza: the LXX reads merely, "On the Philistines." The flood from the North is no historical invasion. Like Jeremiah's Northern invader (113) it overwhelms the world (land, v. 2) so that mankind wail. The day (v. 4) is the day of the Lord. In this universal catastrophe the ruin of the Philistines is merely one feature. In v. 5b read How long must you, the remnant of the Anakim (cf. Josh. 11²²), make cuttings in your flesh; i.e., in sign of mourning, like Gaza's baldness? Caphtor (v. 4) is Crete, from which, according to Amos 97, the Philistines came. For thou and thee (v. 7) read it.

CHAPTER XLVIII

A Collection of Oracles on Moab. This may once have existed separately, since it has a formal heading and conclusion. The text is often very bad, local allusions to which we do not possess the key abound, and several of the oracles appear in other prophetic books.

1-6. This oracle of doom bears a general resemblance to Isa. 15. The student, however, should be on his guard against concluding that this, because taken from the Isaiah passage, must be later. We have no definite criterion to decide which of the two is earlier. Misgab (v. 1), perhaps Ar Moab. For in Heshbon they (v. 2) read simply men, i.e., some foreign enemies. In v. 4b read with LXX, its cry can be heard as far as Zoar; in v. 5a, men climb the pass to Luhith in tears; in v. 6 for like the heath read to Aroer, i.e., flee thither, as a place of refuge. 7-10. Moab's insolence is the cause of her fall. Chemosh (v. 7) was the local god. For and no city (v. 8) read nor shall Ar Moab, the capital, escape. The plain=plateau. The last clause is a marginal note, which quotes an otherwise unknown prophecy: As Jehovah said, Give wings to Moab, for she would fain fly away.

11-15. Moab is like a generous wine, the flavor of which has endured unaltered (v. 11b). But now the destroyer of Moab and its towns has advanced (so read v. 15a), and he will pour it into new jars, emptying and destroying the old ones (v. 12b). The country was famous for its vines. 16-25. Noteworthy, because of the sympathy it shows with Moab. Name (v. 17)="renown." For rod read scepter. For in thirst (v. 18), probably read on the ground. Stand by the way (v. 19), i.e., on the highway, to learn what comes. Arnon (v. 20)—the news has reached across the frontier. Plain country (v. 21)=plateau (cf. v. 8).

26-34. Moab is drunken—with the cup of the divine anger (see Rev. 14¹⁰). He clapped his hands in derision, but shall himself be derided (so read with LXX). Did he catch Israel among thieves that he mocked the nation? V. 28b is untranslatable. With vv. 29-31 cf. Isa. 16^{6f.}. In v. 31 for shall they read I mourn. With vv. 32, 33 cf. Isa. 16^{9f.}. Passed (v. 32), i.e., they once stretched over the sea, reaching as far as Jazer (so with LXX). In v. 33 omit the shouting shall be no shouting. It is probably a marginal correction which has crept into the text. V. 34 appears in more intelligible form in Isa. 154-6. 35, 36. V. 36a is found in Isa. 16¹¹ and v. 36b is practically the same as Isa. 157; soundeth like pipes, rather, wails like a flute. 37-39. Vv. 37f. appear in a slightly different form in Isa. 15^{2f}. The terms of v. 37 describe the land in mourning. In v. 39 read How it is broken!—take up your lament—how has Moab! etc. 40, 41. V. 40 appears in 49²² among the oracles on Edom. In v. 40, he = “the coming destroyer.” For Kerioth (v. 41) read the towns. 43, 44. Applied in Isa. 24¹⁷, not to Moab, but to the inhabitants of the world. 45, 46. These verses repeat Balaam’s oracles against Moab (Num. 21^{28f}). These seem to have been inserted at the close of the little collection of Moab oracles in order to emphasize that the old doom, though long delayed, is none the less sure. In v. 45 for they that fled read refugees; for for read but; for corner read brows; and for tumultuous read arrogant.

CHAPTER XLIX

1-6. An Oracle Against “the Children of Ammon.” This oracle against Ammon, Milkom its god (v. 1), Rabbath its capital on the Jab-bok and its dependent towns (daughters, v. 2), evidently refers to some border warfare in which that people took possession of Israelite territory in Gad. But, whether the writer refers to incidents of his own time or to older wars, it is impossible to decide. Read v. 4, Why dost thou boast of thy rich valley, and glory in thy wealth, saying, Who can rival me? The text of v. 3 is corrupt: for Ai is read you are, and for run to and fro, etc., read make cuttings in your flesh. But the verse is clearly an intrusion, for Heshbon belonged to Moab, not to Ammon; and the last clause is taken from Amos 11⁵.

7-22. An Oracle on Edom. The section consists largely of material which appears elsewhere, and which is frequently applied to nations other than Edom. The places mentioned are in that country. Edom’s proverbial sagacity has perished (vv. 7-10). V. 7 should not be read as an interrogation. The people must seek a secure abode (dwell deep) for Jehovah has brought (not will) calamity (v. 8). The gleaners will leave nothing, the thieves destroy all they can (v. 9)—the verse reappears in Obad., v. 5. There is none to help (so for he is not, v. 10). The connection and purpose of v. 11 are alike enigmatic. Those who were not destined to drink the cup of the divine anger (v. 12), i.e., Israel, are drinking (not shall drink) it, how much more must Edom! With vv. 14-16 cf. Obad., vv. 1-4. “I have heard how a herald is being sent to summon the nations against Edom, for Jehovah makes (not made) Edom small.” In v. 16 omit *as for thy terrible*ness. V. 17 is applied in 19⁸ to Jerusalem. Vv. 18-22 are applied in 50^{40f}. to Babylon. The destroyer will attack Edom’s fortress, for suddenly I will expel them thence (so read in v. 19). Who can equal me (appoint me a time)? Their shepherds shall drag them away and their fold be startled at their fate (so v. 20b). Their wail shall be like that of the drowning Egyptians at the Red Sea (v. 21b). V. 22 is applied in 48⁴⁰ to Moab.

23-27. Damascus. Conquered by Nebuchadnezzar in 605 B.C. The oracle may refer to this event. Hamath and Arpad, cities in Northern Syria, are described as disquieted (over its fall) like the troubled and restless sea (so read v. 23b). The glorious city itself is doomed. V. 26 is applied in 50³⁰ to Babylon. V. 27 is made up from Amos 14, 14.

28-33. Three Oracles Against Some Eastern Tribes (vv. 28-30; 31, 32; 33). Their isolation in the Arabian desert shall afford them no security. Let them collect tents and tent-coverings (curtains), baggage and camels. Let them cry, Terror on every side (v. 29). Jehovah has said to the enemy, Arise, attack (cf. Ezek. 38¹¹). In v. 32 for cattle read flocks.

34-39. Elam. On the hills east and north-east of Babylon. The chief of their might (v. 35), i.e., the bow is Elam’s mainstay.

CHAPTERS 50 AND 51: PROPHECIES CONCERNING BABYLON

Two features of this long collection of oracles, which may have once been separate from the rest, deserve special attention. They all presuppose the destruction of Jerusalem, and many of them are addressed to the captives who are already settled in Babylon. But these exiles are addressed as though they constituted the Jewish community, not as the little company of the period of Jeremiah. The oracles also take an entirely different attitude toward Babylon from that which was taken by Jeremiah. The prophet regarded that nation as a divine instrument the mission of which was to destroy Jerusalem. In these oracles, however, Babylon is not merely the enemy of Israel but is the opponent of Jehovah. So far from the exiles being encouraged to work for the prosperity of their own new home, they exult in its downfall and are summoned to leave it. Indeed, Babylon becomes here almost a symbol of that worldly pride in power which is always hostile to the kingdom of God.

Babylon to be Destroyed; Israel to be Delivered. See introductory notes above. 1-5. In the consummation the Northern foe shall destroy Babylon, and shall especially discredit its gods, Bel and Merodach. Escape then and go, both man and beast (so read v.

3b); Israel is addressed. The reunited nation shall at once make its way to Jerusalem with a common purpose: let us join ourselves to Jehovah, the eternal covenant must not be forgotten (so v. 5b). The consummation involves a reunited nation and a restored Temple, since these are essential to the covenant relation to God. 6-10. Jehovah's people have long wandered (for turned them away), forgetting their fold (v. 6). Their foes have said, We shall not suffer for ill-treating them, since their sin has merited it (v. 7). Now, Babylon's foes are at her gates; they are like a keen, sure arrow which does not miss (so read v. 9b). In the coming collapse Israel, being forewarned, shall be like the bellwethers that head a flock (v. 8), the first to escape. 11-13. The verses are addressed to Babylon, which is your mother (v. 12). Behold the end of a nation—a wilderness, etc., instead of a wanton heifer at grass. 14-16. A shout of triumph over Babylon's fall, which means (v. 16b) deliverance to all her captives. In v. 15 read because this is the vengeance of the Lord, take vengeance upon her. 17-20. Instead of scattered (v. 17) read stray. For his soul (v. 19) read he. There is no special reference to spiritual satisfaction. For shall be sought (v. 20) read may.

21-28. Merathaim and Pekod: the writer substitutes for names of two Babylonian provinces Hebrew words, meaning "double defiance" and "visitation." The no-men is to be an omen. Thee (v. 21); in the LXX it is the sword which is addressed. In v. 26 for from the utmost border read from every side. Cast her up, i.e., the contents of the storehouses. Bullocks (v. 27), i.e., warriors. Zion always survives Babylon (v. 28). 29-32. Three fragments, united by the tag of proud. V. 30 is applied in 49²⁶ to Damascus. 33, 34. Israel represents an enslaved world. Read v. 34b, that he may give the world peace, he must disquiet Babylon. 35-40. For upon read against throughout; for boasters (v. 36) read sooth-sayers; for mingled people (v. 37) read vast population; for drought (v. 38) read sword. With v. 40 cf. 49¹⁸. 41-43. This oracle may have been deliberately transferred from 622-24 in order to say that the doom pronounced on Jerusalem shall overwhelm Babylon. 44-46. Applied in 49¹⁹⁻²¹ to Edom.

CHAPTER LI

1-58. Further Description of God's Judgment on Babylon. See introductory notes preceding ch. 50. 1-6. The destroyer, not wind (v. 1), brings Israel's deliverance. "Lebkamai," an acrostic for Babylon, means, in Hebrew, "the mind of my antagonists" (cf. 50²¹). For strangers (v. 2) read winnowers. Read v. 2b,

Woe unto her on every side in the evil day. In v. 3 (cf. A.S.V. mg.) omit the first two negatives. Read vv. 5b and 6a, Because their, i.e., Babylon's, land is full of guilt, etc., flee out of the midst of Babylon. 7-10. The Lord has made good Israel's cause (so v. 10a) against Babylon, which was once his instrument in the world. For are (v. 7) read were and for not healed (v. 9) read incurable. 11-26. These verses show the hopes stirred in Jewry by Cyrus' advance: LXX reads, v. 11, king of the Medes. For hold firm, etc. (v. 11), probably read fill the quivers. The central clause of v. 14 presents a hopeless text. With vv. 15-19 cf. 10¹²⁻¹⁶. Cyrus is an instrument in the hand of Jehovah (vv. 20-24). Vv. 25, 26 are not very suitable to the alluvial plain of Babylon, where men built, not with stone, but with bricks. Burnt mountain (v. 25), rather, slag-heap. 27-33. Cyrus, king of the Medes (so LXX, cf. his dominion, v. 28) has enlisted his host. Babylon, like a threshing-floor, is stamped hard for the harvest: soon the harvester will arrive (v. 33). Ararat, Minni, Ashkenaz are parts of Armenia. The writer sees the issue. In vv. 27, 29 for land read world. For as the rough cankerworm (v. 27) read in swarms like locusts. Do stand (v. 29), i.e., are being realized. For to meet (v. 31) read after. Passages (v. 32), i.e., fords. Reeds is suggested for the impossible Hebrew "pools."

34-37. Zion's complaint has been heard. Read v. 35, O Zion, cry, Havoc and ruin against Babylon. O Jerusalem, cry, etc. And in v. 34 read us for me. 38-44a. Babylon used to (not shall) roar like lions. But I will poison their banquets and make them drunken to stupefaction, and they shall sleep, etc. (so v. 39a). An end is set to Babylon's greed. Doom has overtaken Sheshach (vv. 41-44a), an acrostic for Babylon (cf. note on 50²¹) and its god Bel. 44b-53. Let Israel escape, since Babylon's walls are fallen (not shall, v. 44b). And let them not fear the flying rumors through the world (land): every year will have its rumor of havoc in the world, and of tyrant set against tyrant. V. 50 is a summons to Israel; v. 51, its reply, and vv. 52, 53, its encouragement. In v. 49 perhaps read Babylon is about to fall, ye slain of Israel; yea, Babylon is about to fall, ye slain of the world. 54-58. The Lord spoileth Babylon and destroyeth its loud tumult, he roars against it like mighty waters and utters his voice with threatening (so read v. 55). In v. 58 for shall be read are. The destruction is conceived as having taken place. So nations toil for nothing and peoples weary themselves to feed the flames. With this vanitas vanitatum the collection of oracles on Babylon is brought to a striking close.

59-64. Jeremiah Commands Seraiah to Sink the Roll in the Euphrates. Jeremiah is said to have written on a scroll the preceding oracles (all these words) against Babylon, and to have delivered them to Seraiah, quarter-master of Zedekiah, when he went to that country charged with a commission from (so LXX, for with, in v. 59) the king. Seraiah is to sink the scroll in the Euphrates as a sign of the doom impending over Babylon. The story is dated at a period in Zedekiah's life when he was being urged to rebel (cf. ch. 28). Hence an embassy to Babylon to explain and excuse his conduct is probable. But at this period Jeremiah was publicly declaring in Jerusalem that Nebuchadrezzar was destined by Jehovah to conquer the capital, and was bidding the exiles live peaceably in their new country (cf. ch. 29). It is difficult to believe that he instructed a high court official to carry out a symbolic action the only effect of which must have been to annul his other messages. Further, the oracles Seraiah was bidden to sink in the Euphrates cannot be ascribed to the prophet. The section must have been written after chs. 50f. were already formed into a collection. The last clauses of v. 64, and they shall be weary. Thus far are the words of Jeremiah are a marginal note which has crept into the text. An editor, who wished to separate the oracles proper from the historical chapter 52, added, The oracles of Jeremiah extend only as far as "they weary themselves," i.e., as far as the last Hebrew word in v. 58.

CHAPTER LII

The Rebellion and Overthrow of Zedekiah. Vv. 1-27, which describe the final captivity under Zedekiah, are parallel to 2 Kings 24¹⁸⁻²⁵²¹, while vv. 4-16 have already appeared as Jer. 39¹⁻¹⁰. Again vv. 31-34, which deal with the ultimate fate of Jehoiachin, are parallel to 2 Kings 25²⁷⁻³⁰. Between these sections this chapter places three verses which give the number of the exiles deported by Nebuchadrezzar. In the same place Second Kings sets a very brief synopsis, summarizing chs. 40-43 in Jeremiah and relating events in Judah after the destruction of Jerusalem.

The sense of v. 3 is: Matters went so far toward the Lord casting them away that Zedekiah rebelled. It is hardly possible to date to a day the outbreak of famine in a city (v. 6). Probably the ninth day of the fourth month refers to the breach in the wall of v. 7. The second half of v. 10 and the last clause of v. 11 are absent from Second Kings. Tenth (v. 12)—Second Kings reads seventh. Read v. 13b the houses of the leading men burned he with fire. In v. 15 omit of the poorest sort of the people and. For residue of the multitude read the surviving artisans. In v. 20 omit with 2 Kings 25¹⁶ the reference to the oxen; these had been removed by Ahaz (2 Kings 16¹⁷). Without weight, i.e., unweighed. In vv. 21, 22 the one=each, chapter=capital; for it read each. On the sides (v. 23); something has fallen out of the text. Out of the city (v. 25), i.e., from the lay population, contrasted with the priests of v. 24. Seven—Second Kings has "five." Mustered, i.e., enrolled the common soldiers. There are difficulties connected with the numbers in vv. 28-30, for which the student must consult more detailed commentaries. Lifted up the head (v. 31), i.e., showed favor to. Before him (v. 33), i.e., at the royal table.

LAMENTATIONS

BY PROFESSOR W. G. JORDAN

INTRODUCTION

Place in Canon and Authorship. In the Hebrew Bible the book of Lamentations is one of the books in the third division, the miscellaneous collection called "The Writings"; but in the LXX, the Syriac, and the Latin versions it follows the book of Jeremiah; from the latter the order Jeremiah, Lamentations has passed into the English O.T. There are other evidences that the tendency of keeping Jeremiah and Lamentations together, and the tradition that Jeremiah was the author of Lamentations, go back to early times. The LXX sets at the head of the first chapter these words: "And it came to pass after Israel was taken captive and Jerusalem made desolate, Jeremiah sat weeping and lamented with this lamentation and said"; in the Vulgate the closing words are given in this form: "and, in bitterness of heart sighing and crying, said." The passage in 2 Chr. 35²⁵, whatever may be its significance, shows that very early this form of literature was connected with the name of the great prophet. No wonder that as late as 1882 a commentator, after citing a number of objections to the Jeremican authorship, could say, "On the whole, therefore, we conclude that Jeremiah was beyond question the writer of this book." Since these words were written scholarly opinion has moved steadily in the opposite direction until at present it is almost unanimously admitted that Jeremiah did not write these elegies. Moreover, it is generally doubted that the five poems constituting the book were written by one and the same author or at approximately the same date. (For a detailed discussion see Eiselen, The Psalms and Other Sacred Writings, pp. 202-208).

Date. If there is diversity of authorship, as is practically certain, the dates of the individual poems are not easily determined. In view of the vivid descriptions in chs. 2 and 4 these two poems might be assigned to about 573 B.C. They are probably the work of one, or, possibly, two men who passed through the distressing experiences of the siege and capture of Jerusalem. Ch. 3, on account of its highly artificial structure and its pronounced didactic tone, is generally considered the latest of the five poems, originating about 325 B.C., or even later. Opinions differ widely regarding the date of ch. 1; on the whole, however, a date shortly before the return under Cyrus seems best to satisfy the internal evidence. To the same general period may be assigned ch. 5.

Nothing is known regarding the time when the individual poems were brought together to form the present book. It has been suggested that at first, about the time of Nehemiah, a collection was formed, consisting of chs. 1, 2, and 4; and that subsequently, about 300 B.C., chs. 3 and 5 were added by the author of the poem in ch. 3.

Contents and Significance. The book consists of five independent poems, all centering, though in different ways, around one common theme: the calamities that befell the people of Judah, and especially of Jerusalem during the siege and subsequent capture of the holy city. Poems 1, 2, and 4 are in the nature of dirges over the death of the city and nation; poem 3 describes the sufferings endured by the poet and his compatriots in the course of the calamity—the sufferings are traced to the anger of Jehovah, aroused by the sins of the people; but the knowledge of Jehovah's loving-kindness inspires a hope that the sufferings will not continue forever. Poem 5 is a prayer for speedy deliverance.

The first four poems form alphabetic acrostics; (cf. p. 154); the fifth poem has the requisite number of stanzas, but no attempt at alphabetic arrangement is discernible. The first four poems are in the so-called kinah meter (see Eiselen, The Psalms and Other Sacred Writings, pp. 22, 23). The consistent use of this particular meter and the alphabetic arrangement make it evident that the poems were constructed with conscious art: they are not the unstudied effusions of natural emotion, they are carefully elaborated poems, in which every trait which might stir a chord of sorrow or regret is brought together, for the purpose of completing the picture of woe.

Lamentations is of interest and value because it furnishes a vivid and in some cases at least a contemporaneous picture of the thoughts and emotions aroused by the Fall of Jerusalem. No doubt, the faith of some was shattered; but there were many others who remained loyal to their God and were convinced that, in spite of all appearances to the contrary, Jehovah's compassion and lovingkindness would never cease. These faithful saints were also persuaded that heartfelt repentance must precede the return of the divine favor. This conviction inspired the confessions of guilt, exhortations to repentance, and prayers for mercy, which constitute such an important element in the book.

CHAPTER I

The chapter begins with the exclamation "How!" often used in lamentations (cf. 21 41 and Isa. 121) and is in its nature a dirge. Like other alphabetical poems it is not easily arranged in consecutive sections. The subject is the desolate condition of Jerusalem and the dispersion of the Jews. It is usually divided into two parts, vv. 1-11a, in which the poet speaks; vv. 11b-22, in which the city is supposed to speak, but v. 17 must also be placed in the mouth of the poet. The three-line verse of unequal parts prevails throughout.

How doth the city sit solitary—that was full of people;

She is become as a widow—that was great among the nations;

The princess among the provinces—she has become a bond-slave.

1-11a. Solitariness and Desertion of Jerusalem. The opening verse marks the contrast between Zion's past prosperity and her present misery (Isa. 478, 9 545). No human help is available in her hour of need; all her friends have failed her; the night which should be given to rest is a time of weeping with no hope in the morning (v. 2; cf. Job 73). There is uncertainty about the word rendered in v. 3, because (from); whether the statement should be taken to mean that the people had gone into exile to endure toil in Babylon or gone from Judæa to escape the forced labor (419 55). In either case they were driven to an unclean land where the exercise of their religion was not possible; within the straits—"in her distress" (pains, Psa. 1163). Zion itself and the ways leading to it were once covered with joyful pilgrims, but now they are desolate; instead of sacrifices and songs there is the sighing of priests and maidens. The opposite of the splendid promise in Deut. 28¹³ is due to her sins;

this charge and confession is repeated in vv. 8, 18, 20, 22. Like harris (v. 6)—"rams" seems more suitable for princes, but the poet may have meant to lay stress on weakness and timidity. All her pleasant things that were from the days of old makes a fourth line and may be a marginal note.

Vv. 8-11a repeat the fact of Jerusalem's sins and the gruesome details of her punishment. Those that see her shame despise her as forsaken by God, and his sanctuary, which was to be kept inviolate, is desecrated by the heathen, i.e., the Chaldeans (Deut. 23³ Ezek. 449). This feeling that the Temple was profaned by the presence of Gentiles increased in intensity in later times. Pleasant things (v. 10), the material treasures; the same word in 24 seems to be applied to the strong young men; any valuables that are left must go to buy that which is more precious, namely, bread.

11b-22. Severity and Justice of the Affliction. These verses, except v. 17, are a direct complaint of the personified community. The well-known plaintive appeal of v. 12 is in the first line uncertain, but the English probably represents the sense. V. 14 also is doubtful as to its exact form; it may mean that the Lord, in consideration of their sins, has woven a yoke around their neck and left them without strength in the presence of their foes. With the striking phrase, abroad the sword bereaveth—at home there is death (v. 20), cf. Deut. 32²⁵. The conclusion brings a prayer that the enemies, who have been the instruments of Jehovah's vengeance and who have exulted in the misery they have caused, may meet a similar fate.

CHAPTER II

A pathetic lamentation over the sorrows of "the daughter of Zion," a phrase repeated six times in the poem (cf. "daughter of Judah," 115 25). Whether by actual experience or imagination, the poet makes clear the terrible conditions into which Judah and Jerusalem were plunged by the Babylonian conquest. Even if the author was somewhat hampered by his alphabetical scheme he has managed to maintain a certain continuity of thought and strength of feeling. The structure of the verses is best seen in the following form, though in some cases it is not perfectly preserved:

How hath the Lord covered with a cloud
The daughter of Zion!
He hath cast down from heaven to the earth
The beauty of Israel,
And hath not remembered his footstool
In the days of his anger.

1-10. Suffering and Affliction a Divine Judgment. It is uncertain from the context whether beauty refers to the Temple (Isa. 64¹¹) or to the political splendor (Isa. 42); footstool is used for the earth (Isa. 66¹), the ark (1 Chr. 28²), the Temple (Ezek. 43⁷; cf. Psa. 99⁵ 132⁷); the latter is most suitable here. V. 2 describes the devastation of the country places (habitations), the destruction of the cities (strongholds), and the profanation of kings and princes. The Lord's anointed and those of royal blood received shameful treatment instead of the reverence due to their rank. The horn (v. 3), a frequent symbol of power and pride, is cut off. His right hand—instead of being used in Israel's defense is drawn back (Psa. 74¹¹), and the fire of God which should protect consumes (Zech. 25).

The following verses amplify and strengthen this terrible description of Jehovah's angry activity. V. 4 seems to be imperfectly preserved. For the figure of Jehovah as a hostile archer see Job 16¹³. V. 5 ends on an assonance for which "moaning" and "bemoaning" have been suggested. The destruction of the sacred place and the rejection of king and priest are clearly stated in v. 6, but the first line is obscure:

He has broken through his hedge like a thief;
Destroyed his sanctuary, is a plausible suggestion. V. 7 clearly refers to the desecration of the Temple, the noise and confusion being more like a heathen assembly (Psa. 74^{3f.}) than the sober, solemn worship tendered to Jehovah. The close of v. 7b, the walls of her palaces, has puzzled the commentators, as it is difficult to explain it as referring to the Temple. Along with material damage there goes spiritual deprivation (v. 9). The hope of false prophets (Jer. 17¹⁸) has perished and now the leaders have gone where the law is not. Law (torah), i.e., priestly instruction (Mal. 2⁷). Her prophets find no vision from the Lord—cf. Mic. 3⁵. V. 10 presents a pitiful picture of the community mourning its God-forsaken condition.

11-17. Depth of Distress and Despair. The poet inquires where he can find anything to compare with this, and how he can give comfort in such a case. Liver poured on the earth is a peculiar expression; it is compared with pour out thine heart, etc. (v. 19). A similar form means "glory" in the sense of soul or life (Psa. 42⁴). Here the blame is laid upon the prophets who saw visions of vanity and foolishness (v. 14c; cf. mg.) which lead to disaster rather than to deliverance. This great sorrow is aggravated by the scorn of those that pass by and compare in sarcastic tones the present wretchedness with the former splendor. It is easy for those that are self-content to point out the judgments of God on other people.

18-22. Prayer for Deliverance. Zion is urged to plead her cause with persistent earnestness. The first part of v. 18 is not in good order. Comparison with the Versions suggests something like "Cry aloud to the Lord; Virgin daughter of Zion. Let thy tears run," etc. A bold rhetorical appeal closes the poem (vv. 20-22). Jehovah is called to look upon the terrible things that have come upon the community as the result of his anger. What hope is there for a nation if its babes are to be consumed by the mothers who carried and caressed them or by the ruthless conquerors?

CHAPTER III

In the third poem there is a more artificial arrangement producing a more complicated structure. The verses are numbered from 1 to 66; i.e., three times the number of the letters in the Hebrew alphabet, but there are only the same number of lines as in chs. 1, 2, and 4, the difference being caused by the fact that here each line is numbered as a verse, and begins with the corresponding letter of the Hebrew alphabet, i.e., the first stanza (vv. 1, 2, 3) has three clauses each beginning with aleph, the first letter of the Hebrew alphabet, and so on. There has been keen discussion on the question of the collective or individual interpretation of the poem. The fact that the feminine form is so often used to personify the community leads many to regard the "man" here as an individual sufferer. His personal experiences may be intended to represent the sentiment of the community. The attempt to analyze the poem into two psalms (vv. 1-24, vv. 25-66) which the author used as distinguished from his own contribution (vv. 25-51) is interesting but not convincing.

1-20. Lament of the People. The speaker, the man (cf. vv. 27, 35, 39)—representing the community—claims to have had experience of misery on account of the rod of his wrath. A certain impressiveness is produced by the avoidance of the direct mention of the divine name. With v. 4 begin the particulars of his ill-treatment. Many of the figures used may be found in Job and the Psalms; gall and travail (v. 5) is a peculiar combination; gall and worm-wood seems to be a preferable reading. V. 6 is found also in Psa. 143³, where it reads, "He hath made me to dwell in dark places, as those that have been long dead." Here, to suit the alphabetical scheme, the order of the first two words (in the Hebrew) had to be changed, In darkness he made me to dwell, etc. In vv. 7-15 the poet pictures his sad condition in figures made familiar to us by the book of Job: God hedges him round about, fetters his movements, blocks his path, obstructs his progress, turns him aside into dangerous ways (cf. Job 197, 8, 12). Reduced to this miserable condition he has forgotten what prosperity is like. In v. 17 read he has removed, etc. As the prayer form is not maintained in v. 19 it is suggested that the reading should be the memory of my afflictions and wandering is wormwood and gall.

21-39. Jehovah's Loving-kindness the Basis of Hope. This section is gentler in tone: it preaches patience and submission because God's mercies do not fail and the Lord will not cast off for ever (v. 31). This (v. 21) should, according to the alphabetic structure, refer to what has gone before, but there is a strong temptation to apply it to the beautiful consolatory words that follow. Vv. 25-27 have been compared to the noble passage in Rom. 5³⁻⁵; each of the three verses begins with good, laying emphasis on the moral discipline of suffering (cf. Heb. 125-11). The thought of waiting patiently on Jehovah who is the portion (v. 24) and inheritance of the saints is characteristic of many psalms. Several scholars accept Budde's suggestion for v. 31: "Not for ever does the Lord cast off the children of men" (Mic. 7¹⁸ Isa. 55¹³). There are linguistic difficulties in vv. 34-39, but it is difficult to improve on the English translation. The poet asks questions of those who are doubtful as to the righteousness of God's actions (vv. 37, 39). Possibly v. 36 should take the form "Doth not the Lord see?"

40-54. Prayer of Confession and Penitence. Instead of vain searching into the ways of God, it is better to search and try our own ways. Note the striking phrase lift up our heart with our hands. Vv. 43-54 contain a recapitulation, partly in the singular and partly in the plural, of the sufferings caused by Jehovah's relentless anger. He has clothed himself in such a cloud of anger that even earnest prayers cannot reach him. V. 46 is probably quoted from 216. The transposition suggested by Loehr, vv. 51, 49, 50, does not interfere with the alphabetical scheme and gives a better order. The constant weeping of the poet wears away his strength (v. 51); his sorrow is on account of the women of Jerusalem (cf. 212) or the desolated countryside (cf. Ps. 4811).

55-66. Prayer for Vengeance. The poet closes the previous paragraph by declaring They have cut off my life in the dungeon; now he begins a prayer out of the lowest dungeon. He acknowledges that Jehovah has saved his life and calls upon him to take vengeance on the enemies. To hide the ear (v. 56) is a peculiar expression found nowhere else in the O.T. The line is too long; perhaps my cry is a gloss explanatory of my breathing. Under the heavens of the Lord (v. 66) is another peculiar phrase. Metrical considerations favor "under thy heavens." The Versions give under the heavens, O Lord! (Cf. Deut. 914.)

CHAPTER IV

This alphabetical poem differs from the preceding in the fact that each verse consists of two lines (in ch. 3, one line, in chs. 1 and 2, three lines). It is probable that it is by the same author and of the same date as ch. 2, on account of the vivid, concrete pictures of the great catastrophe found in both, their similarity of literary quality, arrangement of subjects and their affinities with Ezekiel. The contrast between the former glory and the present misery of Zion's sons is ascribed to the sins of the people. The horrors of famine are again described, priests and prophets are denounced for leading the people astray. The bitter reference to Edom's exultation brings the sad lament to a close. There are a number of textual difficulties, for full discussion of which the critical commentaries should be studied.

1-11. Distress of the People. The exact rendering of certain lines in vv. 1, 2 is uncertain, but it is clear that the contrast between the former prosperity of the citizens of Judah and their present miserable condition is set forth under the figure of gold and precious stones that by some strange process have become worthless. Leadership has been lost and motherhood has been crushed under the stress of fierce famine (vv. 3-5). Hungry mothers are as cruel to their children as the ostrich (Job 3913-17), less kind than the jackals, in whom the maternal instinct is strong. V. 6 contains a very strong statement, whether we follow the rendering of the text or the margin. In the first case the poet infers the greater sin of Judah from the greater suffering. Sodom fell at one stroke; Judah's suffering is a continual and increasing agony (Ezek. 1647f.). The concluding phrase—and no hands were laid upon her—is peculiar and uncertain. Suggested explanations are that there was no time for "wringing of hands," it was all so sudden; or "no human hands fell upon her," it was purely a divine act of justice. In vv. 7-9 the thought of vv. 1 and 2 is repeated in different terms expressing the deterioration and degradation of the Nazirites (probably the nobles here), and the section closes with the bitter reflection they that be slain with the sword are better than they that be slain with hunger. With

v. 10 cf. v. 3 (where probably daughters should be read) and 220.

12-16. Faithlessness of the Religious Leaders. V. 12 does not connect closely with what goes before or follows after. It is regarded as saying that no one believed that Jehovah's anger would carry to the extent of destroying Jerusalem, and that even the poet shared the general belief in the inviolability of Zion, a belief supposed to have been based on the teaching of Isaiah (cf. Jer. 26⁶, 18). In the succeeding verses the poet declares that this terrible suffering has come on account of the sins of her prophets and the iniquities of her priests (v. 13; cf. Jer. 531 613). Though the text is uncertain in places (probably prophets should be read for elders in v. 16) these verses produce a vivid impression of the terrible punishment that has come upon the leaders; they are treated as outcasts (Lev. 1345), the curse of Cain is upon them as they are driven to wander and doomed to find no rest.

17-20. Utter Hopelessness of the Situation. These verses picture the feeling of depression and hopelessness as the end drew near, and probably contain references to the vain reliance upon Egypt for help, and the miserable end of Judah's last king Zedekiah.

21, 22. Doom of the Edomites. The poem closes with a declaration that the punishment of the daughter of Zion is accomplished (Isa. 401) and that Edom's turn has come. There are many evidences of the bitter feeling between Edomites and Jews (Psa. 1377 Isa. 34 Ezek. 35). Here a certain satisfaction seems to be gained by the author from the thought that if Israel has suffered severely, the justice of Jehovah must punish the arrogance of other nations.

CHAPTER V

This poem resembles the previous chapters in having twenty-two verses, according to the number of letters in the Hebrew alphabet, but it is not, like them, an alphabetic acrostic. Moreover, it is a prayer rather than a dirge. The poet does not use the Kinah meter, but the regular parallel lines with equal number of accents. It contains a plaintive description of the sad condition of the Jewish community at the time it was written. It cannot be arranged in clearly marked divisions according to a definite course of thought.

1. Theme of the Poem. V. 1 strikes the keynote, with its appeal to Israel's God:

Remember, O Lord, what is come upon us;
Behold, and see our reproach.

Then particular features of the fierce oppression and terrible distress are described in detail. While all classes are involved special prominence is given to the sufferings of women and children.

2-18. Miseries of the Exiles. Whether taken literally or figuratively vv. 2-6 describe the sad condition of the community, as in a strange territory they have to buy wood and water. There is textual difficulty in v. 5. Proposals are: With the yoke on our necks we are pursued, or The yoke on our neck they have made heavy. In v. 6, given the hand, i.e., submitted (see Jer. 5015), here perhaps "in supplication." V. 7 contains a distinct declaration that the present generation is suffering for the sins of its predecessors (cf., however, v. 16). This raises a question that was much discussed in the exilic period (see Jer. 3129 Ezek. 18); the terrible punishment is then sketched, dishonorable servitude, severe privation, the shame of the women, the torture of the children; there is no reverence for age and no joy for youth. Sword of the wilderness (v. 9) is not found elsewhere; words of similar form would give "wilderness," "heat," or "Arabians." Though all this is a wretched heritage from the past it deepens the present sense of unworthiness and helplessness and so prepares for the final appeal with which the chapter closes.

19-22. Prayer for Speedy Deliverance. Over against the changeful fortunes of men the poet sets the strength and stability of God's throne (cf. Psa. 456 10212). V. 22 as read in the R.V. brings the prayer to an end in a hopeless tone, and it was so regarded in the Jewish synagogue where the reader was directed to repeat v. 21 as a more cheerful conclusion. The margin "unless thou hast," etc., softens the hopelessness somewhat, but not sufficiently. Some scholars maintain that it is possible to regard v. 22 as a question; but whatever the grammar may decide, we, like the ancients, refuse to believe that anger and scorn are God's last words to his people.

EZEKIEL

By PROFESSOR W. L. WARDLE

INTRODUCTION

The Prophet. Our knowledge of Ezekiel ("God is strong," or "God makes strong") is limited to the information derived from his writings. He was a priest, the son of Buzi (13), and, though there is no direct evidence that he had officiated in the Temple, his familiarity with its structure and ritual strongly suggests this. He was evidently trained in the circle of those who were influenced by the Deuteronomic Code (see p. 146). As a member of the upper classes he was deported to Babylonia at the capture of Jerusalem in 597 B.C. At this time he was probably in the prime of life, rather than, as Josephus says, a youth. That he was married appears from 24¹⁶⁻¹⁸—the tenderest touch in his book. He was settled at Tel-abib, near the Chebar canal, occupied a house of his own, and was regarded as a leader by his fellow exiles; the elders of the Jews frequented his house to receive oracles (cf. 8¹ 14¹ 20¹). Though his utterances were appreciated as works of art (cf. 33³²), the message he proclaimed was not popular, and the failure of events to justify some of his predictions tended to discredit him. However, the fall of Jerusalem in 586 B.C. established his reputation (cf. 33³⁰). The last date given in the book is 571 B.C. (29¹⁷). Nothing is known of the end of his life.

Call and Method of Work. Ezekiel received his call to the prophetic work in 593 B.C. by way of a vision. Though the theory that he was a cataleptic is now not generally accepted he was certainly psychic, subject to trance and ecstasy (cf. 8^{1f.} 11^{1f.} 24^{1f.} 33^{1f.} 37^{1f.}) and gifted with second sight (cf. 8¹⁶ 11¹³ 24¹). Many of his prophecies were given in the form of symbolic actions, and it seems to be certain that these were actually performed. Such actions in Semitic thought are more than mere symbols; they are "sympathetic magic," tending to produce the results of which they are symbolic.

Ezekiel's own conception of his work may be gathered from 33¹⁻⁹. More than any other O.T. prophet Ezekiel is a writer. The careful system of dates in the book is clear evidence that he prepared a collection of his prophecies, and even scholars who suppose that generally the collections of prophecies under the names of other prophets were put together by later hands make an exception in the case of Ezekiel. The vision of the roll confirms this conclusion (cf. 28-33, note). Ezekiel's style, abounding in symbol and allegory, and often burdened with repetition, seems at times grotesque. But many of the oracles, as, e.g., the dirges of ch. 19, the picture of Tyre as a ship (ch. 27), the prophecies concerning the shepherds (ch. 34), and the dry bones (ch. 37), have both beauty and vigor.

Teaching. The central idea of Ezekiel's theology is his conception of God as spiritual, powerful, but beyond everything as "holy." The crime of Israel throughout its history he finds in the profanation of this holiness, and to punish it God is compelled to destroy the state. But to the Oriental a god and his people are indissolubly connected, and the destruction of a people proves the impotence of its god. Such an aspersion upon God is for Ezekiel intolerable, so he protests that the punishment of Israel is the action of God himself, unable to endure the profanation of his holiness, and he proclaims that God will yet restore his people, after cleansing them. Thus he rebukes the taunt of Israel's enemies that her God has failed in his purposes. The nucleus of the restored people is to come from the exiles, among whom, and not among the survivors in Palestine, Ezekiel finds the true heirs of the promises. The restoration, however, is not for the sake of the nation, but for the sake of Jehovah's name. In interpreting this phrase we must be careful to remember that for the Oriental the "name" means much more than it does for us, it being equivalent almost to "personality" (cf. Psa. 23³ 75¹, etc.).

The great contribution of Ezekiel to the development of religious thought is individualism. Earlier prophets were concerned primarily with the nation as a unit. The destruction of the state raised a new problem. A restored state could be formed only of cleansed individuals. In ch. 18 Ezekiel insists that the individual has a standing before God. He is not condemned because he is the descendant of guilty ancestors; and he can be redeemed from his own guilty past. God is just in his dealings. The individual is judged by his own present conduct. The prophet does not consider the further question whether suffering is always punishment for sin. With that a greater poet, the author of Job, wrestled.

As a priest Ezekiel conceives of righteousness as obedience to laws and statutes expressing the will of Jehovah. For him there is no sharp line between ritual and ethics. While the Christian may find him unduly concerned with correctness of ritual, it would be unfair to say that he had not a lively sense of the importance of morality.

The Father of Judaism. Ezekiel stands in a position of great significance in the history of religion, because in him we find the transition point from the Hebrew state to the Jewish Church. That the latter ever came into being is due very largely to the work of Ezekiel in a time of religious as well as political crisis. Ezekiel's emphasis of ritual, forms and institutions has led to the charge that he "transformed the ideals of the prophets into laws and dogmas, and destroyed spiritually free and moral religion." This sweeping charge is not warranted. (1) Ezekiel had every reason for believing that his age required the expression of religious ideals in external, concrete forms. The great mass of people still needed the Temple, the sacrificial system, and other institutions as means of communion with God, and it is exceedingly doubtful that the religion of Jehovah could have survived without them. That later generations exaggerated the importance of externals until finally the spirit was altogether lost sight of was not the fault of Ezekiel. (2) The ritual does by no means exhaust the religious interests of the prophet. Again and again he insists that a pure and righteous life is an essential part of true religion (chs. 3, 18, 33). Besides, it must be borne in mind that the provisions in chs. 40-48, outlining the ecclesiastical organization of the restored community, are intended for a regenerated people. They are intended to aid a regenerated community to give proper expression to its devotion to Jehovah.

Arrangement of Book. The text of the book has suffered considerably in transmission, and the Greek translation, which differs widely from the Hebrew, has often preserved the better reading. The material is arranged according to an orderly scheme. The first twenty-four chapters contain, after the opening vision, utterances of almost unrelieved doom. The following twenty-four chapters give the reverse of the shield, telling of the doom of the nations who had been, or might yet be, oppressors of the people, of the new day of salvation, and of the coming Utopia.

Authenticity. Opinion as to the integrity and authenticity of the book has varied. Whether it should be admitted into the Jewish canon was a question debated among the early rabbis. Chronologically Ezekiel occupies a position between the Deuteronomic Code and the Priestly Code (see art., The Pentateuch, pp. 142-3). Some nineteenth century writers denied that the book was in any sense the work of Ezekiel; and some writers, like Seinecke, assigned it to the Maccabæan age. The prevailing opinion, however, among scholars has been that the work is from the hand of Ezekiel, and, indeed, freer from addition and interpolation than any other of the prophetic writings. Hölcher, it is true, has lately suggested that all but a nucleus of poetry is the work of later hands, and Burrows, on the basis of literary affinities with other biblical writings, is inclined to date the whole as late as the third century B.C. But Hölcher's view is doubtless determined in some measure by his late dating of the Deuteronomic Code, and literary parallels are very difficult to assess. On the whole we may regard the first thirty-nine chapters, allowing for minor supplements, as coming from Ezekiel himself, but in the remaining chapters much of the matter may have been added by later hands.

CHAPTERS 1 TO 3: THE PROPHET'S CALL

CHAPTER I

1-3. Introduction. In these verses are combined two titles, possibly from two distinct recensions of the book. V. 1 joins more naturally to vv. 4f., since in vv. 2, 3 Ezekiel is spoken of in the third person. No satisfactory explanation of the thirtieth year has yet been found. The Hebrew cannot mean "when Ezekiel was thirty years old." Duhm suggested that the thirtieth year may have been calculated with a view to explaining the discrepancy between the forty years assigned to the Exile in 46 and the seventy years of Jer. 25¹¹; if so, the figure will be due to a later hand. The Chebar is the nār Kabari, a canal flowing southeast from the Euphrates at Babylon—not the Habor of 2 Kings 17⁶. The fifth year is 593 B.C., counting the year of exile, 597 B.C., the first. Priest (v. 3) may refer either to the prophet or to Buzi; Ezekiel probably belonged to the Zadokite priestly family of Jerusalem (40⁴⁶ 43¹⁹ 44¹⁵).

4-14. Vision of Four Living Creatures. Ezekiel in a state of trance (the meaning of v. 3b) receives his call in vision form. The description is full of the splendors of flashing light, so brilliant that the details are minutely revealed, but so dazzling that they are not clearly seen. Textual corruptions, which do not seriously affect the general interpretation, have aggravated the obscurity in some points of detail. The reminiscences of Isaiah's vision (Isa. 6), and of the sapphire pavement (Ex. 24¹⁰), show that the Divine Spirit of inspiration employs the ideas already existing in the prophet's mind. Herrmann and Hölcher have recently argued that the detailed description of the chariot is a later elaboration inserted between vv. 4 and 28b; but even if their arguments are cogent, the elaboration may have been the work of Ezekiel himself.

From the north, for the Hebrews a region of mystery (Jer. 1¹⁴), borne by a fierce wind comes a dark cloud haloed with light. Lightning flashes in zigzags continuously through it; at its heart is a flame with the sparkle (not color) of electrum (not amber)—a mixture of gold and silver. As it approaches, Ezekiel sees the likeness—note how this vague word is used throughout the vision to describe the ineffable—of four living creatures. These—the models for the four living creatures of Rev. 4⁶—are in general form human, but each has four faces and four wings. Apparently, they have straight jointless legs ending in a circular foot: probably each has but one, and the suggestion of sex is thus avoided. Each seems to stand at the middle of one side of a square, its wings when outspread just touching those of the creature on either side of it. The four sides of the chariot face the several points of the compass. The creatures never turn; i.e., all motion is from north to south and from west to east, or vice versa. To reach a point lying southeast the chariot would travel due east until it was due north of the point, and then due south to the point. The human face is in front, and the eagle face “on the inside” (so read for and their faces, v. 11, and join to v. 10). Their movements are controlled by the spirit of the enthroned Deity. In the midst (so with LXX for as for the likeness, v. 13) of them is a glowing, flashing fire. Delete v. 14 with LXX.

15–28. Vision of the Divine Glory. Beside each living creature is a double wheel (delete faces thereof, v. 15, with some of the ancient versions, and and their work and their appearance and, v. 16, with LXX) sparkling like topaz (not beryl), constructed of two wheels set at right angles about a common diameter, one in the north-south plane, the other in the west-east plane. The four sides may mean the four half-circles thus formed. Like the creatures, the wheels do not turn; their motion too is always due north, south, east or west. This would be impossible as a matter of engineering, but we are dealing here with a supernatural machine. (V. 18 is incurably corrupt at the beginning.) The felloes of the wheels are full of eyes, so that they go on no blind path. This trait is less strange when we read that the Divine Spirit animates creatures and wheels alike, insuring harmony of motion. In Enoch the Ophanim (=wheels) appear as a class of angels, with the cherubim and seraphim.

Poised above the heads of the living creatures (read plurals, v. 22, with some MSS. and versions) is a platform (not firmament) sparkling like crystal (the word usually means “frost” or “ice,” which give a blue sparkle like sapphire). In v. 23 each creature seems to have six wings, as in Isaiah's vision, but some MSS. and versions do not contain the reference to wings covering the body, which may be a gloss from Isa. 6. In any case the platform rests above, not upon, the outstretched wings. The beating of the wings as the chariot moves resounds like the noise of a heavy thunder-shower. (The comparisons after waters, v. 24, are later additions, and v. 25 should be deleted.) Upon the sapphire platform—as the appearance of a sapphire stone, v. 26, properly follows heads, and must qualify firmament—is a throne, seated on which is a human form. Note how the prophet modifies the anthropomorphism by the circumlocution likeness of. This human form is half concealed and half revealed by the glorious light that enfolds it, the sparkle of electrum about the upper part, and a less brilliant light below, like the flaming color of the rainbow (cf. Rev. 4³).

From the vision we learn some of the leading conceptions that dominate the prophet's ministry—the supreme transcendence of God, his glory, and the conception of God as Spirit, not limited to the Temple at Jerusalem, but able to visit his people wherever they may be, and able to control all things by his power. If we should be tempted to charge the prophet with anthropomorphism, let us remember the delicate reticence with which he portrays—despite the detailed description—the form of the Deity. If God is to be pictured in concrete form, the loftiest symbol man can use is the human form: after all, was not the supreme revelation of God made in the form of the Man Christ Jesus?

CHAPTER II

1–7. Ezekiel's Commission. The divine voice—note the reticence which avoids mentioning the name of Jehovah—bids Ezekiel, who has fallen prostrate before the glory of the vision, arise, addressing him as son of man, i.e., "mortal one." He is unable to rise himself, but spirit (delete the, v. 2), divine energy, infuses his paralyzed body and raises him to his feet. He receives his commission to Israel, rebellious now as ever—this adjective rings like a keynote through the passage. He is to proclaim the divine message fearlessly, and without regard to the attitude of his hearers, though he will be like one surrounded by scorpions. 3. For children read house with LXX, and delete to nations with LXX and Old Latin. 6. Though briars and thorns be with thee is very dubious, possibly read though they contend with thee and despise thee.

8-10. The Roll. (Continued in 31-3.) The prophet is given the substance of his message in the form of a written roll, which he receives from the divine hand (Rev. 51), though, unlike Jeremiah (Jer. 19), Ezekiel avoids using the name of Jehovah. The roll is full of sad utterances, so numerous that they cover the back as well as the front.

CHAPTER III

1-3. Eating of the Roll. (Continued from 210.) The prophet is commanded to eat the roll, and, bitter as its contents are, in his mouth it tastes sweet (Rev. 109). The significance of this may be that the prophet finds joy in doing the will of God, however painful his task (Jer. 1516). Obviously, this experience is not a literal happening; presumably it took the form of a trance. That it is genuine is attested by the description of the roll as containing unrelieved woes; at a later stage Ezekiel has more comforting words to speak, which would have been mentioned in a later production. The roll hints at the fact that the prophet is a writer as well as a speaker.

4-9. The Prophet's Endowment with Hardness. So powerful are the divine words that even had Ezekiel been sent to foreigners whose language he could not speak, they must have taken heed. So obstinate, however, are his fellow countrymen that they will refuse to listen. Like Isaiah, Ezekiel is warned from the beginning that his work will fail. But Jehovah will make him harder even than his hardened listeners, so that he will not be shattered in the conflict (cf. Jer. 118).

10-15. The Prophet's Return. Ezekiel is bidden to announce himself to the exiles as prophet, by using the prophetic formula, Thus saith the Lord. Spirit lifts him up, and as he leaves the scene of the vision he hears behind him the sound of the departing chariot, a noise like an earthquake (the word rendered rushing, v. 12, is that used for "earthquake," 1 Kings 1911). Perturbed in spirit, and still in a state of trance, he makes his way to the colony of exiles at Tel-abib, where for seven days he remains appalled and dumb. 12. The spirit—delete the. Read for saying, Blessed be, changing one consonant, in the rising of. 14. The last clause means "and I was in a trance" (cf. 13). 15. Tel-abib means "Corn-hill"; the name should possibly be read Tel-abub, meaning "Hill of the storm flood."

16-21. The Prophet as Watchman. A space in the Hebrew text after days, v. 16, indicates that vv. 16b-21 have been inserted here later, either by Ezekiel or by an editor. The natural continuation of v. 16a is found in v. 22, where there refers to Tel-abib, v. 15. The commission of v. 11 is properly followed by the account of its being carried out, not by a further commission. The insertion contains important elements of the prophet's teaching which will be considered in connection with chs. 18, 33. The difficulty raised for the Christian by I lay a stumbling-block, v. 20, is mitigated, though not entirely removed, by the fact that the stumbling-block is laid subsequently to the sin of the righteous man. 19. Soul means "self," not the spiritual part distinctively.

22-27. A Further Commission. This forms the continuation of v. 16a. In a renewed access of trance Ezekiel goes at the divine command to the plain (v. 23)—so called, perhaps, in contrast to Tel-abib, which name implies an eminence (cf. on v. 15). Once more he sees the theophany, and as before is prostrated, and raised again by an influx of divine energy. He is commanded to keep at home, and warned that his freedom of movement will be restricted by the exiles, and that God will restrain his utterance, suffering him to speak only when specially directed to do so. The phrases for binding and dumbness are metaphors only (cf. Job 2910). 25. Perhaps we should read I will lay bands . . . and will bind, so that vv. 25f. both refer to divine action.

CHAPTER IV

In 41-54 four symbolical actions are recorded. That these actions were actually carried out is clear from the use of sign (43) and in their sight (412). The actions recorded in ch. 4 center around two subjects; there are some verses referring to the siege of Jerusalem and other verses referring to the Exile, the two having been inexplicably interwoven. The former group contains vv. 1-3, 7, 10, 11, 16, 17; the latter, vv. 4-6, 9, 12-15 and probably 8, which seems to be connected with both groups; but for siege, not the same Hebrew word as in v. 2, read restraint. The entire chapter may be treated under two heads.

1-3, 7, 10, 11, 16, 17. Symbols of the Siege. Ezekiel is to engrave upon a brick the plan of a city, and surround it with all the works and apparatus of a besieging army. Glaring steadfastly at the city, with arm uplifted (Isa. 52¹⁰) to strike, he is to enact the part of Jehovah, whose agents the besiegers are. The flat iron sheet (v. 3, mg.) to be set up between Ezekiel and the city may symbolize the absolute estrangement between Jehovah and Jerusalem, which name a glossator has added in v. 1. The prophet is to ration his food and water to meager quantities, taken at fixed times daily. This symbolizes the scarcity of provisions in Jerusalem during the siege. (Cf. 12¹⁷⁻²⁰ Isa. 31 Jer. 19⁹.) 16. Staff—cf. 5¹⁶ Lev. 26²⁶ Isa. 31 Psa. 105¹⁶. 17. For be astonished read languish.

4-6, 8, 9, 12-15. Symbols of the Exile. Ezekiel is to lie on his left side one hundred and ninety (so LXX) days, as one bearing a burden. These days represent the number of years the Exile of the Northern Kingdom is to endure (? reckoning from the time of Pekah; cf. 2 Kings 15²⁹). Similarly, forty days on his right side symbolize forty years for Judah's exile. The position was presumably maintained only for part of each day. The prophet is to eat cakes made of many materials, cooked in an offensive manner, to symbolize the impurity of the food eaten in exile (cf. Hos. 9³). Ezekiel's protest (v. 14) shows the essentially priestly character of his outlook, and is further proof that the actions were really performed.

CHAPTER V

1-4. Symbols of the People's Doom. Ezekiel is to shave hair and beard: this, in itself a sign of mourning, is made more ominous by the use of a sword for a razor (cf. Isa. 7²⁰). The hair is to be weighed on an accurate balance (so balances to weigh, v. 1) into three equal parts. When the days of lying upon his side (rather than of the siege, v. 2) are over, Ezekiel is to light a fire in the city, burn one part of the hair, thrust with his sword-razor at the second part, round the city, and scatter the remaining third to the wind. A few of these scattered hairs are to be retrieved, and bound for safety in a fold of his garment. Even of these some are to be cast into the fire. 2. The last clause is an interpolation from v. 12. 4. Read simply and thou shalt say unto all the house of Israel, attaching these words to v. 5.

5-17. Explanation of the Symbols. The city is Jerusalem, regarded by the Hebrews, as other cities by other peoples, as the navel of the earth (38¹²). Her wickedness is made conspicuous, on this account, to the other nations. V. 7b, indeed, suggests that Jerusalem falls below the level of her neighbors, but possibly we should read with some MSS. and Syriac but for neither have. Her punishment shall be as conspicuous as her situation. Siege shall reduce her people to cannibalism (Lam. 4¹⁰). Her survivors shall be exiled. Note that for Ezekiel her supreme crime is the pollution of the sanctuary. Jehovah will shave (so for diminish, v. 11) her. The fire of v. 2 is interpreted of pestilence and famine which destroy a third of the inhabitants. Another third, attempting to escape, shall be slain by the sword near the city, the remainder exiled, and even then pursued by the sword of Jehovah, which will destroy some. Jehovah's purpose in all this is that men shall know that his righteous anger is appeased. No specific explanation is given of the retrieved hairs (vv. 3f.), which suggests that those verses may be a gloss. 16. Staff—cf. 4¹⁶, note.

CHAPTER VI

1-7. Doom on the Mountains of Israel. The mountains of Palestine, standing sharply in contrast with the plains of Babylonia, were notorious because of their association with the high places, i.e., local sanctuaries, where idolatrous rites were practiced. Ezekiel is to glare toward these and announce that Jehovah is on the point of bringing a sword against their devotees. Idols, altars, and sun-pillars (so for sun-images, v. 6) shall be shattered, and the corpses of their worshipers shall defile the sacred places before the broken images so impotent to help them. The shrines in the wadies and valleys shall share the same fate.

8-10. A Repentant Remnant. Those who as exiles escape this terrible fate shall remember Jehovah, i.e., recognize this as his doing, when he has broken the hearts and eyes that love and regard idols, and shall hate the sight of their own faces. These verses may have been added later. 8. Read Inasmuch as ye shall have refugees among the nations and shall be scattered through the countries. 9. Read mg.

11-14. Utter Desolation Inevitable. Vv. 11, 12 read like an oracle that is out of its context; it is more closely associated with ch. 5. The gestures in v. 11 are all gestures of triumph (for Alas! read Aha!). The reference is clearly to the siege. In v. 12 delete remaineth and. Vv. 13, 14 resume the threat of vv. 1-7, adding to the sacred shrines the luxuriant trees and leafy terebinths (v. 13, mg.), where the scent of sacrifice (cf. Gen. 8²¹) and incense had ascended. Doom shall sweep the country from the southern wilderness to Riblah (so Michaelis, for the unmeaning Diblah, v. 14). All this is to teach the people that Jehovah will tolerate none of these offenses. Note the recurrent and they shall know I am the Lord.

CHAPTER VII

The text in this chapter is very corrupt, in several places defying translation; it also contains duplicate passages. The order in LXX varies greatly. Some passages seem to refer to the Day of Jehovah (cf. pp. 206–7), while others relate more naturally to a disaster about to befall Jerusalem. It is as though two stained-glass windows, one representing the day of Jehovah, the other the Fate of Jerusalem, had been shattered, and their fragments afterward pieced together in one restored window. It is hazardous to say whether any of the verses are Ezekiel's, and difficult to interpret details.

1-9. Doom Is at Hand! Jehovah will relentlessly requite (so render for bring upon, v. 4) his people according to their abominations and ways. In v. 2, after man insert "say," and after an end, "is come," both with LXX. For land render earth, the Hebrew word meaning either; "the four corners of the earth" is a Semitic idiom for the whole earth (cf. Isa. 11¹²). Vv. 5–9 are a parallel to vv. 1–4. The text of vv. 5–7 is much longer than in LXX. Of v. 7 no certain translation can be given.

10-13. Universal Humiliation and Destruction. Whether the day, v. 10, means the Day of Jehovah or the day of Judah's doom is uncertain; the latter is more probable, but vv. 10f. are corrupt. The rod of wickedness apparently means a wicked ruler. So terrible is the time that even men of business cease to take interest in their dealings.

14-27. Helpless Dismay Paralyzes the Inhabitants. The few who escape from the horrors of the siege to the hills shall be as mourning (so for of the valleys, v. 16, with Syriac; cf. Isa. 59¹¹) doves, and shall die (so with Syriac for all of them mourning, v. 16). In their despair the inhabitants will cast out with contempt the idols of gold and silver in which they had vainly trusted. These shall become the spoil of the invaders, who will penetrate even into the Temple. The worst of the heathen (v. 24), the Babylonians, will be the instruments of punishment in Jehovah's hand. In this disaster prophet, priest, and wise man will be helpless to aid. In their common calamity rulers and people will recognize that Jehovah punishes iniquity. 20.

Read mg., and for his read its, referring to gold and silver. 23. Make the chain is unintelligible. 27. Delete the king shall mourn, with LXX.

CHAPTER VIII

1-6. The Image of Jealousy. While the elders of the exilic community, who seemingly had a measure of self-government, wait in his house, the prophet falls into an ecstasy, and sees dimly the form of Jehovah. The divine hand lifts him by the hair, and divine energy transports him, in vision, to the Temple at Jerusalem. There he beholds Jehovah (as in 322), and sees an idolatrous image. This may have been a replacement of the Asherah erected by Manasseh (2 Kings 21³), destroyed later by Josiah (2 Kings 23⁶). 2. Cf. 14. 27. For appearance of fire read of a man, with LXX. 3. LXX omits which provoketh (Jehovah) to jealousy; the words are a correct gloss on image of jealousy.

7-13. The Mystery Cult. Ezekiel is bidden to dig through a wall. Thus discovering a door, he enters a chamber, whose walls are adorned with animal pictures (cf. the pictures on the walls of the Ishtar gate at Babylon). Before these seventy of the leading citizens are burning incense; among them Jaazaniah, evidently a man of eminence, though we know nothing else about him. The cult is probably Babylonian rather than Egyptian. V. 7b should probably be deleted with LXX. No satisfactory explanation of chambers of imagery (v. 12) is known.

14, 15. The Tammuz Worship. Jehovah leads Ezekiel to another place—the details of the itinerary, doubtless easy to interpret for those familiar with the plan of the Temple, cannot be clearly discerned—where he sees the women wailing for Tammuz, seated on the ground in the attitude of mourning (Job 21³). Tammuz was a deity of the Sumerians, whose worship continued to flourish among the Babylonians, who succeeded them. He was a vegetation god, supposed to die each year and to be recalled from the underworld by the litanies of mourning recited by his worshippers.

16-18. The Sun Worship. In another place the prophet sees some twenty-five men with their backs to the Temple, worshiping the sun-god, a cult popular in Babylonia, which had been introduced into Jerusalem by Manasseh (see on 2 Kings 21³ 23⁵). The one ethical note of the chapter occurs here, the charge that these idolaters have filled the land with violence (v. 17c). The phrase, put the branch to the nose (v. 17d), is obscure (cf. Isa. 17¹⁰). It has been supposed to refer to phallus worship, and compared to the Zoroastrian worshiper's custom of holding a bundle of myrtle-rods, or the barsom held to the face by Parsee priests before the sacred fire. An Assyrian letter in which subjects say, "The king has brought us to life again by laying the plant of life to our nose" may also be compared.

CHAPTER IX

The Purging of the City. In response to the loud summons of Jehovah appear those to whom he has committed the cleansing of the city, seven angels, six armed with clubs, and the seventh, garbed in white linen—a mark of high rank (Dan. 10⁵ 12^{6f}; Rev. 15⁶)—equipped with an inkhorn, carried, as is to-day customary in the Orient, in the girdle at the side. This angel is bidden to go through the city, inscribing upon the forehead of each man who had dissociated himself from idolatrous practices a taw, the last letter of the Hebrew alphabet, originally in form like a cross. The club-bearers, following in his wake, are to destroy all who are not marked with this sign of immunity. They are to begin with the idolaters who are even now practising their unholy rites before the Temple, sparing neither age nor sex (vv. 1–7; cf. Rev. 14⁹, 11 21⁷).

Ezekiel, appalled at the doom pronounced, utters a pathetic plea for reconsideration. Jehovah, charging his people with wholesale murder and persistent perversion of justice—ethical faults, be it noted—refuses to relent (vv. 8–10). The angel returns to report that his duty is done. We should have expected a report from the executioners too: possibly that has been suppressed because of its horror. Observe that Ezekiel's doctrine of individual responsibility is prominent here; each man is judged according to his conduct. The linen-clad angel is probably the Angel of Jehovah (cf. p. 204), the guardian angel of Israel (Ex. 23^{20f}). The number seven may have been suggested by Babylonian analogies, and certainly suggested the seven of Rev. 15⁶. 1. Here read mg. Delete last clause as duplicate from v. 2. 3. Delete as anticipation of 10⁴, breaking the connection. 7. This, which repeats the order whose execution has already begun, is a parallel to vv. 5f.

CHAPTER X

Jehovah's Departure from the Sanctuary. The analysis of this chapter presents almost insuperable difficulties. The narrative of ch. 9 is resumed in v. 2, v. 1 being obviously an intrusion breaking the connection. Again, vv. 3–6 seem to be an intrusion, for v. 6 repeats the command of v. 2 and its performance. The continuation of v. 2 may be v. 7, though the language of v. 2 implies that the linen-clad angel is to take the fire himself rather than receive it from a cherub. The original narrative must surely have had as its conclusion the burning of the city. V. 8 refers back to 1⁸, recalling that the living creatures possessed hands, to explain v. 7.

The rest of the chapter repeats, with noteworthy variations, much of ch. 1, and tells of the chariot's departure from the Temple. From the narrative of chs. 8f. one would hardly have expected any reference to the chariot—93a is an interpolation, cf. note—and it has been argued that all these references to the chariot are later interpolations; but some reference to the chariot is needed to explain where the fire was obtained (cf. 11³). Probably the chariot is supposed to be kept at the Temple when not on its journeys. The insertions may be due to Ezekiel himself, though he certainly did not leave the chapter in its present form. He may be responsible for the identification of the living creatures in ch. 1 with cherubim. Apparently, it was not seemly that Jehovah should remain upon the chariot while the linen-clad man approached it closely. Note that in contrast to the description of ch. 1 the wings when at rest make a noise like thunder—the voice of God Almighty (v. 5). V. 12, which extends the eyes in the wheels of ch. 1 to the cherubim also, is based on a misconception of the word rendered rings in 11⁸, here rendered backs. The substitution of a cherub face (v. 14) for the ox face of ch. 1 is probably a mistake.

CHAPTER XI

1–13. The Caldron and the Flesh. This experience cannot well be the immediate sequel of the Temple vision, for, even in a trance, Ezekiel could hardly relate these happenings in the city immediately after describing the burning of the city and the slaughter of its evil doers. Note too that Ezekiel is taken up by spirit (cf. on 2²), in contrast to the simple "he brought me" which is used in 8⁷, 16 for change of position. There is no need, however, to doubt that it is a genuine experience of the prophet, or that he himself inserted the record at this point. The twenty-five men (v. 1) are evidently a party of leaders, but hardly, as often supposed, the anti-Babylonian faction, for the latter could not reasonably be reproached with fear of the sword (v. 8). Two are singled out as familiar to the exiles; the Jaazaniah is not the one mentioned in 8¹¹. They are accused of murderous violence. Their boast we be the flesh, v. 3, may mean that the city walls protect them from danger as the pot keeps fire from the flesh, or that they are the flesh in contrast to the exiles, who, as bones and offal, have been cast away.

Ezekiel is bidden to prophesy against these cruel boasters: Jehovah knows their misdeeds, and will fetch them out of their "caldron," in which the only flesh remaining shall be that of their victims. They shall be delivered to exile and death (vv. 9f.). As he utters this threat Ezekiel, in vision, sees Pelatiah fall dead, and the fear that Jehovah will utterly destroy his people wrings from him a cry of agony.

3a. No satisfactory explanation or emendation has been made. 7c. Read mg., with MSS. and versions. 10. Cf. 6¹⁴, where "Riblah" should be read; cf. 2 Kings 25⁶, 20, 21 Jer. 52⁹⁻¹¹. 11f. Delete with LXX. The climax is reached in the last words of v. 10.

14-21. A Glimp of Sunshine. Here we encounter the first hopeful utterance. The opening formula marks it as an independent oracle; like the preceding section it does not belong to the Temple vision, but is inserted here because it agrees with that section in rebuking the arrogance of those who remained in Jerusalem after the first deportation. These have boasted that they, not the distant exiles, are the inheritors of the national estate. Jehovah bids Ezekiel proclaim that the exiles—to whom he could be but little of a sanctuary because their remoteness from the Temple limited their possibilities of practicing the cultus (cf. ch. 48)—shall be brought back. They shall purge the city of idolatry, and for a stony heart shall be given a fleshy one (36^{26f}. Jer. 24⁷ 31³³), upon which his ordinances would be easily impressed (vv. 19, 20). The idolaters shall reap the reward of their sins. 15. For kindred perhaps read captivity, with versions; for are they unto read concerning; and for Get you read They are. 16. For yet will I be read and have been; and for a sanctuary for a little while read but little of a sanctuary. 19. For one read another, with versions; for you read them, with MSS. and versions.

22-25. The Departure of the Chariot. This passage should follow ch. 10. The chariot rests on the Mount of Olives ere it finally disappears from view. Ezekiel awakes from his trance and relates his vision to the exiles.

CHAPTER XII

i-16. An Acted Prophecy of Exile. As the exiles obstinately refuse to understand Ezekiel, Jehovah bids him prepare such utensils—e.g., staff and scrip—as an exile might carry on his march into captivity. At night he is to carry these out through a hole previously made in the soft brick wall of his house. All this is to be done ostentatiously before the exiles. Having done this, next morning he receives from Jehovah an explanation of the object lesson. When asked the meaning of this madness he is to say, "Thus shall those who remain in Jerusalem go into exile, and be scattered among the nations." A postscript (v. 16) explains that the remnant who thus survive sword, famine, and pestilence, survive merely that they may bear witness that their country's fate is due, not to Jehovah's inability to protect it, but to his wrath at its sin.

Whether the references to the fate of the king belong to this context is doubtful. Not because the references which seem to foretell the blinding of Zedekiah (vv. 6, 12-14) are suspected as prophecies after the event; in that case the correspondence would have been more exact. Zedekiah was not blinded until he reached Riblah (2 Kings 25^{6f.}). Nor did he go forth through a breach (2 Kings 25⁴ Jer. 52⁷). But v. 7 does not record the fulfillment of the command to cover the face, and therefore that command is probably not original in v. 6. 3. Delete and remove, with LXX, and and thou shalt . . . in their sight. 5, 6. For carry read go, with versions. 7. Delete with mine hand, with LXX and Syriac. For brought it read went, with versions. 10. The beginning is untranslatable; for among whom they are read who are therein.

17-20. An Acted Prophecy of Siege. With this symbolic representation cf. 41^{of}. The mention of violence (v. 19) once again strikes the ethical note. The people of the land (v. 19) usually means the rural inhabitants in contrast to the dwellers in Jerusalem. Klamroth has proved, however, that it may mean the people in contrast to their rulers. Ezekiel's object lesson could, of course, become known to them only by report. For from all read and all.

21-28. Rebukes for the Skeptics. The first rebuke (vv. 21-25) is meant for those who yet remain in Palestine, between whom and the exiles there is evidently constant communication. They are wont to taunt the predictors of doom, such as Jeremiah, with the failure of their predictions. Ezekiel, as elsewhere (11³ 16⁴⁴ 18²), uses a popular saying as a text (v. 23). Not the predictions of Jehovah's prophets, but those of the prophets who are falsely optimistic, shall fail. Their flattering mouths will be made dumb when Jehovah's word comes true, as it will in this generation. Ezekiel's companions too skeptically say that even if he prophesies truly, the fulfillment will be long deferred, but Jehovah announces that fulfillment is imminent (vv. 26-28). With these passages it is instructive to compare Jer. 23^{16f}. 28¹⁻¹⁷.

CHAPTER XIII

1-16. Against the False Prophets. In the first part (vv. 1-7) the false prophets are accused of palming off their own inventions as the inspired words of Jehovah, who expressly disowns them. Moral, rather than intellectual, folly is implied in foolish (v. 3, the epithet is absent from LXX). Vv. 4f.—possibly interpolated—are difficult: apparently they mean that, as foxes by their burrowing make ruins more ruinous still, so the false prophets, far from helping, make the situation worse—the very opposite of what they should do, namely, repair the breach (so for gaps, v. 5), and make a secure wall of protection, enabling Israel to hold its own in the Day of Jehovah. Compare the instructive passage 1 Kings 22⁶⁻²⁸. 2. Delete that after Israel. 3. The latter part is corrupt and the translation uncertain. 6. Read mg.

Vv. 8-16 announce the penalty, which is that Jehovah's hand shall be upon them—not for inspiration, but for punishment. They shall be excluded from the community (so for council, v. 9), their names erased from the book of life (Isa. 4³), i.e., the register containing the list of Jerusalem's inhabitants. This suggests that the passage comes from the later period when the prophet was looking forward to a reorganized nation. It is characteristic of the false prophets to promise prosperity—the real meaning of peace (v. 10)—when no prosperity is likely. They are compared to men who build an unsound wall, camouflaging its defects by some deceitful covering. Jehovah will hurl against it a torrential storm, which will level it to the ground, crushing them in its fall. Then will Jehovah ironically ask, "Where is the wall, and where they who daubed it?" (So render v. 15b.) 10. See mg.; the unique word used here for wall may mean a wall of stones loosely piled together, with no cementing material (Ehrlich); the rendering mortar is dubious. 11. Delete ye, O.

17-23. Against the Sorcerers. The sorcerers were predominantly women (Ex. 22¹⁸), who, like modern witches, were credited with power of life and death over their victims. V. 18 is wrongly translated: for pillows read knots; the word rendered kerchiefs is obscure. The symbolical tying and unloosing of knots as charms by which a person might be brought into their power was a common practice of Babylonian sorcerers. The snapping of such knots released the victim. Thus one exorcism text appeals to the fire-god to "break the cords" whereby a sorcerer has bewitched his victim, and so release the latter from the spell. The sorceresses whom Ezekiel attacks usurp by their charms the divine prerogative of life and death, adding insult to injury by doing this for trifling fees (v. 19). Jehovah will snap the knots they have tied, and loose their victims. 18. For souls read men (cf. 3¹⁹, note). 20. The mg. is preferable, but uncertain. 22f. These add little to the meaning, and may be a later expansion.

CHAPTER XIV

1-11. Idol-Worshippers and the Prophets Who Encourage Them Are Doomed. When certain leaders of the exiles come to Ezekiel—presumably seeking an oracle—Jehovah reveals to him that they have reverted (so, taken into their heart, v. 3) to idol-worship. Jehovah will answer them, not through the prophet, but in his own person (so, for therein, v. 4). Unless they repent he will make an example by destroying them. The concluding formula (v. 8) shows that vv. 9-11 are an appendix—possibly added later. The prophet who gives a false oracle is lured by Jehovah to do so. For he who panders to idolatrous inquirers is equally sinful with them, and both shall receive the reward of their sins. This purging is necessary, that the people may be cleansed and become truly Jehovah's people. 5. Take . . . in their own heart—cf. Psa. 102^b. 7. Strangers; i.e., resident aliens—not the word so rendered in 7²¹ 11⁹. Ezekiel contemplates that such will exist in the reformed community (47²²). 8. Delete an astonishment, for. 9-11. Cf. 1 Kings 22^{19f}. Deut. 13¹⁻⁵. 10. The mg. gives the true meaning.

12-23. Why the Remnant Survived. Ezekiel's utterances had suggested that none would survive the fate of doomed Jerusalem. Probably this oracle is intended to explain why, after the fall of the city in 586 B.C., a second deportation reached Babylonia. Jehovah once promised Abraham (Gen. 18) that could ten righteous men be found in Sodom, the city should be spared; but now when he sends upon a land one of his four plagues, famine, beasts of prey, sword, or pestilence, though pre-eminent saints such as Noah, Daniel and Job dwell therein, they shall save themselves alone. How much more, when he sends all four upon Jerusalem, we should expect the conclusion "shall none escape." Yet here is the exception that proves the rule—some shall survive, not to their own comfort, but that from their conduct the exiles may see that Jehovah was justified in destroying the city (cf. 12¹⁶). The references to Daniel (cf. 283) and Job are not to the books we know by those names, which are later than Ezekiel, but to traditions—one of which may possibly survive in the prologue and epilogue to our book of Job—concerning heroes of those names. 13. For committing a trespass read playing me false; on staff of bread cf. 41⁶, note. 15. For they spoil read I bereave. 19. Delete in blood. 22. Read bring for be carried.

CHAPTER XV

The Worthless Wild Vine. Jeremiah (221) compared Israel to a good vine become degenerate; Hosea (101) to a luxuriant vine; Isaiah (51-7) to a choice vine that produced but wild fruit. Ezekiel likens Israel to the wild vine, producing no useful fruit, its wood too poor to serve any useful purpose, not substantial enough even to make a peg, fit only for fuel. Should a half-burnt piece be saved from the fire (Amos 411), what good can it be? It was useless even before it was burned! Even so Jerusalem, the remnant of an unworthy people, is worthless. Though a remnant be saved from the fire, it can but be cast into the fire again! 2. The vine branch—delete, with LXX^B. 6. I have—read probably has been. 8. Committed a trespass; render played me false.

CHAPTER XVI

This chapter contains two separate allegories. In vv. 1-43 the prophet, by the allegory of the foundling child, who became the faithless wife of her benefactor, shows the inevitableness of Jerusalem's destruction. The second allegory, that of Jerusalem and her sisters, is in vv. 44-63.

1-14. Jehovah's Gracious Kindness to the Foundling. The parable likens Judah to a girl-child unwanted and exposed to die, so receiving none of the attention or care usually given to an infant. Jehovah, passing by, sees the frail infant kicking convulsively (so for weltering, v. 6). He bids her live and flourish. Later, when she has grown to ripe womanhood, he sees her again, and solemnly espouses her. He decks her with fine clothing and beautiful ornament. For food he assigns her luxuries. Her beauty, enhanced in all these ways, is superb and famed among the nations. The point is emphasized that Judah owes nothing to herself, but all to Jehovah.

3. Read mg. On Amorite and Hittite cf. p. 60a. Though it is a mistake to attempt an explanation of all the details by historic events, it seems not improbable that Ezekiel follows a tradition of Israel's ancestry not found elsewhere in the O.T.; certainly the Hebrews were composed of divergent stocks. 4. Navel— rather, "navel-string"; salted—the ritual custom of rubbing an infant with salt still prevails in the East. Salt is a "giver of life." 6. Yea I . . . live—delete with MSS., LXX, Syriac. 7. For I caused thee to multiply read and thou shalt flourish; for excellent ornament read puberty. 8. Cf. Ruth 3⁹ Deut. 2230; sware—this feature of a marriage is unique in O.T.; covenant—cf. Mal. 214. 9. Cf. Ruth 33 Esth. 212. The washing away of the blood, which here can be only menstrual blood, is strange, and perhaps Kraetzschmar is right in removing this verse to follow v. 6. 10. Seal-skin, linen—translations uncertain. 12. For bridegroom's crown cf. Isa. 6110 Cant. 311; the bride too wore one. 13. Fine flour; cf. Psa. 8116. Delete last seven words with LXX.

15-34. Her Shameful and Shameless Ingratitude. Isaiah, Amos, Hosea, Jeremiah, speak of an early period of happy relations between Jehovah and his bride. For Ezekiel her sin begins immediately after her espousal. Her beauty, which has become renowned, she uses to attract lovers from the chance passers-by (Gen. 3814 Jer. 32). The fine raiment her husband gave her she uses to make gay her high places (cf. p. 166)—or possibly to make tent-shrines (2 Kings 237)—her ornaments, to make images. These she clothes with her gay apparel (cf. Jer. 10⁹), and to them she makes over her dainty food. Her crowning infidelity is that to them she sacrifices her children, who are really Jehovah's children. Not one thought does she give to the misery from which Jehovah had rescued her! 15, 16. The last clauses are unintelligible. 17. Images of men—the reference may be to phallus-worship. 19. Honey—this, though a common element in Semitic sacrifice, was forbidden in Israelite cultus (Lev. 211). 20f. Child-sacrifice, though exceptional, was not unknown in early Israel. It became increasingly popular in the troubled times from the reign of Ahaz on. Note that the victims are slain before they are burned (cf. 2 Kings 327 1731 Jer. 195 Mic. 67). 24. Eminent place—uncertain, but better than mg.; cf. the Calvaries and Madonna shrines in Roman Catholic countries, and Jer. 1113.

The figure changes in v. 26 from the Baalim to foreign nations. Foreign alliances, which in Jehovah's eyes are adultery, entailed some recognition of the cult of the allies, hence there is a connection between the two ideas. The bride has had relations with Egypt, notoriously a sensual people (the meaning of great of flesh, v. 26). Her appetite is never satiated; so to Egypt she had added Assyria and Chaldea. Her licentiousness exceeds that of the common harlot who receives pay, for she, on the contrary, bribes her lovers. The reference here is to the tribute she paid to those nations. 27. This is possibly an addition; punishment is described in a later section of the chapter; diminished—cf. Ex. 21¹⁰; daughters—a common Semitic idiom for dependent cities. 29. The mg. gives the right meaning. 30. How weak is thine heart appears to be corrupt; imperious—render unrestrained. V. 32, and probably also v. 34, are interpolated.

35-43. The Punishment of the Adulteress. The faithless bride shall be exposed naked before her lovers—here the nations, not the Baalim. Evidently the siege and destruction of the city in 586 B.C. are in view. Her ruin will reduce her once more to the beggarly condition from which Jehovah had brought her (v. 39 echoes v. 7). Now the figure changes to that of a solemn assembly gathered to inflict upon a faithless wife the customary penalties (cf. 23²⁸ Lev. 20¹⁰ Deut. 22²² Jn. 7⁵³⁻⁸¹¹). So shall the righteous wrath of Jehovah be glutted. 37. For with whom thou hast taken pleasure read whom thou hast loved inordinately; with all them that thou hast hated is difficult to interpret and may be a gloss. 43. The last clause is unintelligible and should be deleted.

A new subject—Jerusalem and her sisters—is introduced in v. 44, and continues to be the main topic to the end of the chapter. This section is hardly the natural continuation of what precedes, and if by Ezekiel must have been added later. The general tone of the references to restoration harmonizes better with Isa. 40-66 than with the latter part of Ezekiel; and there is something to be said for Holscher's attribution of the passage to a later hand. At the same time it has many affinities with Ezekiel's style, and we must not expect rigorous logical consistency in a prophet's oracles separated by intervals of time.

44-52. Jerusalem Worse than Sodom or Samaria. Jerusalem shall be a byword for her likeness to her Hittite mother and to her sisters Samaria and Sodom in their unnatural treatment of husband and children. Her sin, indeed, exceeds theirs (cf. Jer. 31¹). Sodom's sin is defined as arrogant prosperity and callousness: that of Samaria is, rather strangely, not specified. Beside Jerusalem's black guilt her sisters seem relatively innocent (v. 51) and are accordingly acquitted (v. 52).

45. The parallel suggested here seems inexact, for though Jehovah might be regarded as the husband of Samaria, this cannot well apply to Sodom or the Hittites. Children—the reference is probably to child-sacrifice. 46. Left hand and right hand are idiomatic Hebrew for north and south respectively. Samaria is called elder (Hebrew "greater") as being more important than Sodom. 47. But

. . . thing—text and meaning uncertain. 50. For as I saw good read thou sawest.

53-58. Jehovah Will Restore the Fortunes (so render turn again . . . captivity, v. 53) of Sodom, Samaria, and their daughter-cities, and—a surprising turn—also of Jerusalem. Then Jerusalem will be ashamed that her sisters have been able to congratulate themselves upon her greater iniquity, though before her nakedness (so for wickedness, v. 57) was laid bare, exposing her to the scorn of the surrounding nations, she had been too proud to speak her sister's name. Her punishment has purged her sin (Isa. 40²). 53. The captivity of thy captives—read, with versions, I will restore thy fortunes. 57. For Syria read Edom, with MSS.

59-63. Jehovah Remembers His Covenant. Though Jehovah will punish Jerusalem for breaking her covenant, he will remember that earlier covenant and renew with her an everlasting covenant. She will blush for shame when he returns good for evil by bringing her sisters under her domination—not because she has merited this by keeping faith, but of his pure grace. So shall she learn, not, as the phrase has heretofore implied, because of his sternness, but because of his grace, that he is Jehovah, and she shall be speechless before the wonder of his magnanimity.

CHAPTER XVII

1-10. The Allegory of the Eagle, the Cedar, and the Vine. This is clear in general, and only a few details need be commented on. 3. The reference in which had divers colors is probably to the colored representations of the eagle as a symbol of royalty (cf. Hos. 8¹ Jer. 48⁴⁰ 49²²) found on Babylonian monuments. 4. Land of traffic—the Canaanites, in contrast with the Hebrews, were a trading people, and "Canaanite" became a synonym for "trader"; mg., a literal rendering, refers to Babylon, called Canaan, i.e., "a land of shop-keepers." 5. In the place of land some read, changing one consonant, cedar; fruitful—better, cultivated; cf. mg. Delete he placed it. A single unintelligible word in Hebrew is rendered as a willow tree, but willows do not become vines. 6. In the place of and it grew and became read that it might grow and become. 7. For beds read the singular; a garden terrace is meant. 9. He—the first eagle. Delete all from even without to the end. The whole verse, which does not harmonize with v. 10, the natural continuation of v. 8, may be a gloss.

11-21. The Interpretation of the Parable. The first eagle is Nebuchadrezzar; the cedar, Jerusalem; its top, Jehoiachin and the princes whom Nebuchadrezzar carried off. The seed

(cf. v. 5) is Jehoiachin's uncle Zedekiah, whom Nebuchadrezzar appointed king, exacting from him an oath of fealty, intending that Judah should remain a kingdom, though but a vassal state. But Zedekiah has plotted with Egypt against his overlord, seeking cavalry (cf. 1 Kings 10^{28f.}) and soldiery thence to assist him. Shall not such an ingrate be punished? Verily he shall die in Babylon. Probably the oath of Zedekiah had been sworn "by Jehovah," so his breach of faith was (v. 19) treachery also to Jehovah, who will therefore bring him to book. 16. With him should follow covenant. 17. This may be a gloss, corresponding to the gloss in v. 9; make for him—the Hebrew more naturally means "act against him"; those who retain the verse consequently delete Pharaoh as incorrect gloss. 18. The natural continuation of v. 16. 20. Plead with (cf. A.S.V.) in the forensic sense—"convict by legal argument." 21. (And all his) fugitives; some MSS. and versions read chosen ones; but probably delete the phrase. With the whole passage cf. 2 Kings 24⁸⁻²⁵. The probable date of the allegory is a year or so before the final siege: Zedekiah doubtless sought Egypt's aid some time before he "rebelled against the king of Babylon" (2 Kings 24²⁰). That the prophecy is "after the event" need not be assumed; had it been, Riblah rather than Babylon would have been named in v. 20.

22-24. A Messianic Prophecy. Nebuchadrezzar's attempt at planting may have failed, but, says Jehovah, I—emphatic in Hebrew—will plant a tender cedar twig on a high mountain. It shall become a mighty tree, and the birds shall shelter in it. The other trees shall realize that Jehovah can work his will, whatever it be, on the trees. Bear fruit (v. 23)—a slight change gives "make wood"—cedars have no fruit. Cornill introduces "beasts" as subject of dwell, transposing fowl as subject of the following clause. Mic. 41-5 and Isa. 22-4 should be compared. Seemingly, despite the flaw in metaphor, both birds and trees represent Gentile nations. Other personal Messianic prophecies are found in Ezekiel (21²⁷ 34²⁴ 37²⁴); to reject these as interpolations because his final vision of the future (chs. 40-48) does not find room for a Messiah is to deny that the prophet's doctrine may have developed in the light of his experience.

CHAPTER XVIII

1-20. A Man's Standing Before God Is Not Determined by His Ancestry. Suffering, as they suppose, for their fathers' sins, the people utter their complaint in a popular proverb (cf. Jer. 31^{29f.} Lam. 57). Ezekiel retorts that every man stands in personal relationship to God: none dies save for his own sins. He gives an example of three generations. The grandfather (vv. 5-9) is righteous, and escapes death. His son (vv. 10-13) is unrighteous, and, as penalty, dies. The grandson (vv. 14-17) takes this as a warning, is righteous, and lives.

It is important to remember that soul here means "person" or "self"—the whole man, and not any special part of him. The ideal of righteousness is illustrated by typical virtues. The priestly cast of mind is evident in the order of their mention. First, avoidance of ritual sins (v. 6); even the last two named here are regarded as offenses rather against the cultus than as ethical transgressions. Then come the ethical virtues. A difficulty arises in the word die. All men, righteous and unrighteous alike, die. Therefore ordinary physical death cannot be what is intended; unless the idea of an early death, before man has completed the normal span of life, is in the mind of the prophet. Another possible interpretation makes death, as the most striking of legal penalties, a general synonym for punishment. Still other interpreters assign to the term an eschatological meaning, threatening that the sinner will perish in an imminent judgment like the Day of Jehovah. Such a judgment, though it accords ill with other utterances in the book, may at times have been Ezekiel's expectation. A modification of this view connects the utterance with the O.T. hope of the "kingdom of God." "Live," then, would refer to entrance into the glories of the Kingdom, while "die" would mean exclusion from these glories. The chapter does not connect closely with its context, and may be of later date. 1. For land LXX reads children. 6. Upon the mountains refers to impure worship. Many emend "with the blood"; cf. 33²⁵ Lev. 19²⁶; in her separation—menstruous. 7. Cf. Ex. 22²⁶ Amos 2⁸. 8. Usury, increase—synonyms for "interest"; cf. Ex. 22²⁵. 10f. The text is disordered; LXX varies considerably. The sense is obtained by substituting "that" for all words between son (v. 10) and hath eaten (v. 11). 14. Feareth (so versions) is better than mg., which can be only accidental repetition. 17. For the poor read iniquity, with LXX. 18. For in read mg. 21-29. A Man's Standing Before God Is Not Determined by His Own Past. At the time of the eschatological (?) judgment a reformed sinner will not have his past brought up against him, nor will a backslider be able to plead his former righteousness. God will judge each as he is. Men may act capriciously, but God acts in accordance with eternal principles. This section considers a problem more advanced than that arising out of the popular proverb. 22. In—render for. 24. Delete, with versions, shall he live? 26. Delete and dieth therein with support in versions; in—render for. 27. His soul=himself. 28. Delete considereth, and, with LXX.

30–32. An Appeal. Here Ezekiel becomes the evangelist, appealing to the house of Israel to realize that their fate is determined neither by their guilty ancestors nor by their own guilty past. God is merciful, and will, if they repent, rejoice to pardon them. 31. For wherein read which against me with LXX.

CHAPTER XIX

1–9. Allegory of the Lioness and Her Whelps. The allegory, with its pictures of lion-hunting, is clear. The prince (v. 1; read singular, with LXX) is Zedekiah: the lioness (though see note at end of chapter) his mother, Hamutal (2 Kings 24¹⁸). The first young lion is Jehoahaz, an older son of Hamutal (2 Kings 23³¹), who after a brief reign was made prisoner by Pharaoh-necoh (2 Kings 23³³). To him succeeded Jehoiakim, son of Josiah by another wife than Hamutal, and he in turn was followed by his son Jehoiachin. When the last-named was carried captive to Babylon a second son of Hamutal, Zedekiah, the second young lion, was appointed by Nebuchadrezzar to succeed him. Possibly Hamutal used influence to achieve this end. Zedekiah, rebelling against Nebuchadrezzar, was captured and carried to Babylon (2 Kings 25⁷). 3. For she brought, LXX reads there grew. 4. For heard of read, with LXX, raised the alarm about. 5. Delete she had waited, and. 7. The text of v. 7a is hopelessly corrupt; delete. 8. For from the provinces read their traps. 9. Delete with hooks . . . they brought him into strongholds.

10–14. The Vine and Its Branch. The vine is Hamutal; the conspicuous branch—strong rod—of the vine, Zedekiah. Vine and branch are uprooted and withered. Fire has kindled the dry branch and consumed the vine also. In other words, Hamutal has been involved in the catastrophe brought about by Zedekiah's rebellion. The sense has been obscured because rod, singular in versions, has been treated as plural. All references to the rod should be emended accordingly (cf. mg.). 10. In thy blood—corrupt; the correct text uncertain. The planting (v. 13) comes strangely after v. 12, which has its natural continuation in v. 14. The last sentence reads like a scribe's note; shall be is really has been.

These two beautiful dirges, the most finished poems in Ezekiel, need not imply sympathy with Hamutal and Zedekiah any more than the Song of Deborah implies sympathy with Sisera's mother. According to another—less probable—explanation, the lioness and the vine are the country, and the second young lion is Jehoiachin.

CHAPTER XX

1–31. Jehovah Refuses an Oracle to the Elders. Vv. 1–3 state that in 591 B.C. the elders seeking an oracle through Ezekiel are rebuffed (cf. 8¹ 14¹); vv. 4–31 give the reason for the rebuff: Jehovah chose Israel, revealing himself to them in Egypt (cf. on Ex. 3). He swore to bring them into the promised land if they purged themselves from Egyptian idolatry. Because they did not, he was minded to reject them. For his own sake, not theirs, he refrained, bringing them out of Egypt into the wilderness. At Sinai he gave them statutes by obeying which they might escape his anger, and so live. Ezekiel singles out the Sabbath as a sign marking off Israel from other nations: this idea became prominent during the Exile, when circumcision and Sabbath-keeping distinguished the Jews from their neighbors. Had the Hebrew Sabbath been derived directly from the Babylonian shabbattu, this distinction would have been vague, and, though there is doubtless some connection between the words, direct derivation is unlikely. So intimately is the Sabbath connected with Jehovah that it must have been adopted as his festal day when he was adopted as Israel's God.

The people reject this second chance, and again Jehovah is minded to destroy them. But, lest he should seem to the nations to have been baffled, while he denies that generation entrance into Palestine, he gives its successors another opportunity. They are equally recalcitrant, and, though for his own sake he does not destroy them, he dooms them to dispersal among the nations. Moreover, he gives them statutes, the observance of which would incur his anger, so that they might die. The custom of child-sacrifice is an example of these. The story of Abraham and Isaac and the incident of Jephthah's daughter suggest that this rite was not unknown in early Israel (cf. p. 368a). No doubt those who practiced it supposed they were pleasing Jehovah (cf. 16²⁰).

Statutes of death in contrast with statutes of life recall food and water of death which the Babylonian Adapa legend contrasts with food and water of life, as gifts of the gods. That Jehovah should give statutes luring Israel to disaster, however inconceivable to us, is quite in harmony with the O.T. idea of God as the creator alike of good and evil (Amos 3⁶). The elders who seek an oracle have imitated the treacherous conduct of their ancestors; therefore Jehovah rebuffs them. 4. Judge—cf. 22² 23³⁶. 6. Lifted up my hand=swore an oath; espied—better, gave, with Syriac and Targum (cf. v. 15). 7. The abominations of his eyes=the idols he regards. 11. In—read mg. 22. Hand, i.e., uplifted to punish. 25. Read mg. 26. Desolate—rather, appalled; what follows should probably be deleted with LXX. 29. The meaning here is obscure, and the connection with context precarious. The Hebrew contains a play on words which cannot be reproduced in English.

32-44. An Eschatological Appendix. These verses connect harshly with what precedes. What is meant by that which cometh into your mind? (V. 32) Schmidt suggests that it is a project for building a temple in Babylonia; cf. the Jewish temple at Elephantine (p. 703b). The section assumes that all Israel is in exile, and therefore implies a date subsequent to 586 B.C. It was probably added later to vv. 1-31.

Jehovah will demonstrate that no god of wood and stone, but he only, has power over the exiles. He will, in his anger, bring them into the Syro-Arabian desert, and convict them of their sins, as he had brought their ancestors from Egypt into the Egypto-Arabian desert for a like purpose. As a shepherd who separates goats from sheep with his rod, so will he separate from their midst the rebels, who shall not return to Palestine. Israel may serve idols now, but the time is coming when all Israel shall serve Jehovah in his holy mountain (cf. Isa. 23 Mic. 42). Then shall his chosen people be filled with shame for their past misdeeds. All this will he bring about, not because they deserve mercy, but to prove his might in their eyes and in the eyes of the nations. 36. Pleaded—cf. 17²⁰, note. 37. Bond of the covenant—text and meaning are doubtful: LXX has simply number; "refiner's crucible" has been suggested. 40. The word translated serve is used specifically of priestly functions (cf. Ex. 19⁶).

45-49. Prophecy Against the Forests of the South. Closely connected with ch. 21; indeed, 20⁴⁵-21³² in English constitute ch. 21 in Hebrew. The section contains five separate oracles, four of them being linked together by the use of the term "sword." The subject matter has affinities to that of ch. 7, and the text has suffered considerably. Ezekiel is told to set his face against (43) the forest of the south, and proclaim that Jehovah will kindle a fire in it. Beginning in the dry undergrowth, this will consume even the green trees (Judg. 9¹⁵) and burn the whole forest. All faces will be scorched by its flames. (It would be natural to interpret this of the spectators' faces, but it may refer to the trees—metaphor within metaphor.) The world will recognize that none but Jehovah can have done this.

46. Delete of the field, with support in versions. Three different words are used for south; probably Jerusalem, sanctuaries, of Israel in 21² correspond to these; drop, literally, dribble; cf. Amos 7¹⁶ Mic. 2⁸, 11. 47. Delete flaming.

CHAPTER XXI

1-7. Jehovah's Sharpened Sword. In 20⁴⁹ Ezekiel interjects that the people call him a speaker of riddles; so Jehovah gives him the interpretation, explaining figure by figure as though to mock those who bring this complaint. The fire becomes the sword of Jehovah—possibly the change of image, so frequent a phenomenon in dreams, gives us the clue as to the way in which Ezekiel received the revelation. It will destroy good and bad alike—green tree and dry. The prophet is bidden to utter a heart-broken cry (this fairly paraphrases with the breaking of thy loins, v. 6), to symbolize the sorrow now on its way, which shall cause the bravest to faint with fear in face of the inevitable doom. This impending disaster is Nebuchadrezzar's advance against Jerusalem before its capture in 586. 2. For the sanctuaries read with LXX their sanctuaries. 3. Contrasts glaringly with the doctrine of ch. 18, as fact often does with theory. LXX feels this so strongly that it deliberately substitutes unrighteous for righteous.

8-17. The Song of the Sword. This passionate outburst may well have been uttered in a state of prophetic frenzy that caused it to be in part incoherent; much of the text is now unintelligible, through the misunderstandings of scribes and the intrusion of glosses. The main sense is, however, still discernible. Into the hand of the slayer Jehovah has given a sharp, glittering, sword, whose victims are to be Jerusalem and her princes. By crying and howling Ezekiel is to symbolize the imminence of the doom, clapping his hands in sardonic satisfaction. The sword is to be doubled and trebled, i.e., it is to do the work of three swords. Jehovah himself will clap his hands in glee. It has been suggested that in delivering the oracle Ezekiel himself brandished a sword symbolically. The historical situation is the time immediately preceding the final attack of Nebuchadrezzar (the slayer, v. 11) upon Jerusalem.

10. The expression shall we . . . tree is corrupt; tree suggests a gloss connecting this oracle with the preceding one. 12. Cf. smite . . . thigh with Jer. 31¹⁹. 13. This is corrupt and unintelligible. 14. To smite . . . together is a gesture of hostile exultation; for the third time read and trebled, with Vulgate. What follows is unintelligible; mg. compasseth them about is preferable. 15. Possibly the original in v. 15a was "That all hearts may melt, and the fallen be many at their gates, I have appointed the slaughter of the sword." 16. This is an exhortation to the sword to sweep on every side.

18-27. Which Road Will the Sword Take? Ezekiel is to trace on the ground a land (Babylon) from which two roads fork, setting at the fork a direction-mark indicating that one road leads to Jerusalem, the other to Rabbah, the capital of Ammon, at this time leagued with Judah against Nebuchadrezzar. Nebuchadrezzar, now definitely named, is pictured as halted at the fork, consulting the oracles to decide which road he shall take. Two arrows are shaken in a quiver; the one drawn out by the king will decide. He also consults the teraphim (cf. p. 372b), and inspects the liver of a sacrificial victim—the most common method of divination in Babylonia. He draws the arrow which indicates "Jerusalem," raises the battle-cry, and sets off to besiege the city. The citizens of Jerusalem (v. 23) discredit the divination, still hoping that Rabbah will be Nebuchadrezzar's objective, so that they may have time to obtain succor from Egypt. But vain is their hope, says Jehovah: their wickedness has sealed their fate.

The day of doom has dawned also for that profane rascal (Zedekiah) the prince. Turban—symbol of priestly functions—and crown are to be stripped from him. Everything shall be turned upside down; the city shall be ruined and so remain until the Messiah of Jehovah's appointing shall appear (vv. 24-27.)

19. After one land read set up a mark showing the road to either city, to Rabbah . . . 20. For the defenced read in her midst, with LXX. 22. Omit the first to set battering rams. 23. The meaning of v. 23b is obscure; he is referred variously to Nebuchadrezzar, Jehovah, and Zedekiah. Kraetzschmar sees a reference to the incident of Jer. 34³. 27. For it; this also shall be no more read, with LXX, her; woe to her! thus shall she be ("her"=Jerusalem). The end of the verse echoes Gen. 49¹⁰.

28-32. For Ammon, too, the Sword! This short oracle is probably the work not of Ezekiel, who treats of Ammon in ch. 25, but of a redactor who wishes to see in this context a punishment for Ammon parallel to that of Judah. It is largely a mosaic of phrases from what precedes, and is in detail very obscure. In v. 28 reproach has in view Ammon's taunt (25³). V. 30 has been variously interpreted as Jehovah's sword or Ammon's. Brutish men (v. 31) probably refers to marauding Bedouin.

CHAPTER XXII

1-16. The Sins of the City. Ezekiel is to arraign Jerusalem, city of bloodshed (cf. 24^{6, 9}, and, of Nineveh, Nah. 3¹), and pronounce her doom. Her conduct has been such as to procure her woeful end; she shall be the derision of nations far and near. The scions of the royal house have set the example of wickedness, which the rest of the inhabitants have copied. Reverence for parents, kindness to unprotected folk like the resident alien, the orphan and the widow—the old Hebrew virtues—have been discarded. Things sacred to Jehovah, such as the Sabbath, have been profaned. Slandrers have procured the deaths of their victims. Infractions of the cultus and sexual sins have abounded. Citizens have been the victims of bribery and usury. Jehovah claps his hands (21¹⁷) and taunts Jerusalem; even her effrontery will fail in the day of doom when he exiles her inhabitants and thus destroys the corruption which has profaned him among the nations.

3. A city—better, with LXX, Woe to the city. 4. Days—better, day, on basis of Targum; and art come . . . years—rather, and hast brought about the time (=limit) of thy years, with some MSS, and versions. 5. For tumult cf. Amos 3⁹. 7. On this cf. Ex. 20¹² 21¹⁷. 8. The verse apparently breaks the context and may be an insertion. 9. Cf. Lev. 19^{16, 26} Jer. 62⁸ 93; upon the mountains—cf. 18⁶, note. With 10 cf. Lev. 12² 187¹⁹ 20¹¹; with 11 cf. Lev. 18¹⁵ 20¹²; with 12 cf. Ex. 22²⁵ 23⁸. 16. For and thou shalt be profaned in thyself read, with support in versions, through which I am profaned in thee.

17-22. Oracle of the Furnace. As mixed metals are smelted in a furnace with a fierce heat, so shall the various classes of the inhabitants of Jerusalem and its environs suffer in the city under the fierce heat of Jehovah's wrath. The reference is to the siege. In v. 18 delete of silver, and insert silver before brass; cf. v. 20.

23-31. An Arraignment of the Several Classes in the Community of Jerusalem. This indictment arraigns ruling princes, priests—the position of these, next to the ruling house, shows Ezekiel's estimate of their importance—officers, prophets, and finally—like priest like people—the common folk. The latter part of the oracle suggests that the disaster may already have befallen the city, and the oracle may have been added later to the two preceding ones, which presumably date from before the end of the final siege.

24. For cleansed read rained upon; rained upon which follows is a stronger synonym of this. 25. For there is a conspiracy of her prophets read, with LXX, whose princes are; the prophets are dealt with in v. 28; souls = men. 27. Princes—a different word from that suggested for v. 25, and used of less exalted persons, almost = officers; wolves rather than lions. 28. Cf. 13¹⁰⁻¹⁶. 30. Cf. 135.

CHAPTER XXIII

Oholah and Oholibah. The main theme of this chapter, with which cf. ch. 16, is the political alliances of Samaria and Judah, who figure as two sisters, Oholah and Oholibah. These alliances are regarded as disloyalty to Jehovah, and in the figure become adultery. The clearness of the figure is blurred by a secondary theme, the acceptance of the religious practices of the allies, also regarded as adultery. The text contains numerous glosses and corruptions; the ancient versions differ considerably from the Massoretic text.

1-4. The Youthful Sins of the Two Sisters. Samaria and Judah are pictured as sisters in 16^{45f.}, where Sodom makes a third. It is noteworthy that v. 3 appears to regard them as existing separately during the Egyptian sojourn: this is in a sense true, for the division of the kingdoms was fundamentally due to a division between the Judah and Ephraim tribes which went back to earliest times. The whoredoms in Egypt (cf. 16²⁶ 208) must be religious rather than political disloyalty, though either is difficult to reconcile with v. 4, according to which it is subsequently that Jehovah takes the two sisters to wife. This last is a surprising feature in the allegory, because Lev. 18¹⁸ prohibits a man from marrying two sisters; but it was a custom in the patriarchal period (cf. the case of Jacob). The names Oholah and Oholibah probably mean exactly the same thing—"one who possesses tents for (idol) worship" (cf. 16¹⁶). Schmidt thinks the names come from a folk-story adapted by the prophet—a theory which might account for some of the discordances in the chapter—and that no stress should be laid on their meaning. The date of the earlier part of the chapter may be the same as that of 22¹⁻²². 3. A preferable reading here is were bruised for they bruised. 4. And as for . . . Oholibah is probably a (correct) gloss.

5-10. The Further Sin and Punishment of Oholah. Samaria, fascinated by the military prowess of the Assyrians, enters into political relations with them, consequently contaminating the worship of Jehovah by adopting Assyrian religious practices. (Assyria entered into relations with Samaria in the reign of Menahem; cf. 2 Kings 15¹⁹.) Jehovah punishes her by handing her over to the Assyrians, who besiege her—discovered her nakedness, v. 10, may refer to the razing of the walls—and deport her citizens. 5. Delete neighbors or emend to men of renown; the Assyrians were not neighbors, but came from far (cf. v. 40). 6. For blue read, rather, violet-purple. It is possible that the references to the Assyrians are (correct) glosses.

11-21. The Further Sins of Oholibah. The fate of Oholah did not deter her sister, who contracted alliances with Assyria (vv. 12f.), Babylon (vv. 14-18), and Egypt (vv. 19-21). Assyrian cults appear in Judah from the time of Ahaz (cf. 2 Kings 16^{10f.}), and especially after the death of Hezekiah (cf. on 2 Kings 21³⁻⁶). The references to Babylon may have in view the incident in 2 Kings 20^{12f.} Kraetzschmar thinks of an embassy after the defeat of Pharaoh-nechoh at Carchemish, 605 B.C. Jerusalem remained faithful to Babylon but three years (cf. 2 Kings 24¹), and then reverted to her Egyptian love. Our knowledge of the political history of the period is fragmentary.

12. On neighbors cf. note, v. 5; most gorgeously—rather with violet-purple. 14. The reference here is to pictures in relief—probably upon walls—outlined in vermilion (cf. the pictures of gods, 8¹⁰). Foreign art is anathema to the prophet. 15. Instead of exceeding in dyed attire, render with swelling turbans; possibly all after look upon is a gloss. 20. Asses and horses were proverbially lustful (cf. 16²⁶ Jer. 22⁴ 58 1327). 21. The change to second person is difficult; the verse is probably interpolated. In the place of for read to press (cf. v. 5.).

22-30. The Punishment of Oholibah. Oholibah, like her sister, is to be delivered into the power of the lovers she had learned to loathe. With a great army shall the Babylonians come up against Jerusalem, and execute Jehovah's judgment upon her; she shall suffer the atrocities usually inflicted upon defeated foes by the Babylonians. 23. This is probably an interpolation; Pekod, Shoa, Koa: names of nations east of Babylonia, appearing in Assyrian as Pukûdu, Sutû, Kutû. 24. Weapons—an unknown word; read a multitude of; LXX has "from the North." 25. The first residue here would naturally mean "descendants." If so, the latter part of the verse must be deleted; the sons and daughters cannot be slain and then deported; the second residue seems to refer to the buildings destroyed by fire; the word is not likely to have been used in such different senses in one verse. 26. Comes too late, and should be deleted, or removed to another context. Vv. 28-30 furnish a parallel to the preceding verses stating the punishment in more general terms. 28. Will—better, am about to. 29. Labor—render earnings. A full stop should be placed after discovered; then read, joining to v. 30, Thy lewdness and thy whoredoms have done this for thee.

31-35. The Cup of Bitterness. The punishment is now pictured as the drinking of a cup filled with bitterness, a favorite metaphor in the Bible (cf. Jer. 25¹⁵ Psa. 75⁸ Mt. 26³⁹ Rev. 16.) 32. Here delete thou shalt . . . derision, with LXX and Old Latin. 33. Drunkerness is an unnatural parallel for sorrow; many would emend to destruction. 34. The meaning of gnaw the sherds thereof is uncertain; the text may be corrupt.

36-49. The Sins and Punishment of the Two Sisters. This section, largely a mosaic of fragments from earlier passages, is of later date, and not Ezekiel's. Judah and Samaria were not, as is here assumed, punished simultaneously. Hölischer even suggests that a writer who desired to obscure the harsh judgments on Samaria and Judah represented Oholah and Oholibah as real women, punished as an example to their fellows. In vv. 38f. probably delete (in) the same day, with LXX. 41. Stately—LXX reads spread with a coverlet (cf. Prov. 7¹⁶). 42. This is incurably corrupt in the middle. 45. On the usual interpretation righteous men refers to Assyrians and Babylonians as executing the righteous decrees of Jehovah. But this seems forced.

CHAPTER XXIV

1-14. The Stew in the Rusty Caldron. In order to guarantee his having received the intimation in a supernatural way, before the news could have reached Babylonia, Ezekiel is directed to record a certain day as that upon which Nebuchadrezzar has invested Jerusalem (2 Kings 25¹). He is also to speak a parable of a caldron in which choice pieces of meat and bones are stewing over a fierce heat (vv. 1-5). 2. For the day . . . selfsame day read simply this day. 4. For the pieces thereof read with LXX and Syriac pieces. 5. For pile perhaps read kindle; for the first bones read wood; for make it boil well read boil its pieces.

In vv. 6-8 it is made clear that the caldron represents Jerusalem; the stains of blood shed in Jerusalem are represented by rust in the caldron. The choice pieces and bones are the leading citizens who, after suffering the pains of the siege, represented by the fire, are to be removed en masse; vv. 7f. may be inserted to explain that the blood shed is that of children sacrificed: it is an old Semitic idea that shed blood cries out to heaven for vengeance (Gen. 4¹⁰). Were the exiles after the first siege selected by lot? (V. 6.) Jehovah will cause Jerusalem to suffer the heat of his wrath (vv. 9-12), because she can in no other way be purged of her bloodstains, even as the rust of the caldron can be removed only by setting it empty upon the fire till it becomes a mass of molten metal. 10. Make thick the broth is in Hebrew spice the spicing. A slight emendation, with some support from LXX, gives empty out the broth; LXX omits and let the bones be burned. 12. LXX also omits She hath wearied herself with toil. The remainder of the verse is misplaced here. 13, 14. These give a statement in general terms of Jehovah's unalterable intention to purge the city in the fury of his wrath.

The order of vv. 1-14 is illogical, the two themes of the stewing meat and the rust being entangled. Rearrangement of the verses has been proposed to improve the logical sequence. Some think that the stewing refers to the siege of 597 B.C., the melting of the empty pot to the final disaster in 586.

15-27. Ezekiel's Abstention From Mourning His Wife's Death—a Symbol. Jehovah announces that Ezekiel's wife is about to die suddenly, but forbids him to perform the customary mourning rites. Next morning he is to speak to the people (cf. v. 18, note). When they ask an explanation of his unnatural conduct, he says Jehovah is about to profane his sanctuary—as precious to them as Ezekiel's wife to him. They too must abstain from mourning. The day of the Temple's destruction will release him from his dumbness (cf. 32⁶). He will now be free to prophesy and not limited to special occasions when Jehovah definitely instructs him to open his mouth. 16. Stroke—a word used of sudden death; we cannot suppose that Jehovah causes the death merely to use it as a symbol. 17. Not aloud, i.e., gently, in contrast to the customary loud wailing; headtire—cf. Lev. 10⁶; cover . . . lips—it was customary in mourning to veil the lower part of the face and the beard; for men read mourning, with Syriac and Vulgate. 18. For so I spake read and thou shalt speak. Probably instructions as to what the prophet should say have been lost from the text. 21. For will read am about to; for your soul pitieth read you are concerned for—the meaning of set their heart (v. 25). 22. Men—cf. v. 17, note. 22f. These are a gloss on or parallel to v. 24. 25-27. The day would naturally be that of the Temple's destruction. But 33²² dates the termination of Ezekiel's dumbness to the later day when a fugitive from Jerusalem reaches him. Some would delete v. 26 and to him which is escaped (v. 27) as insertions to harmonize this discord. Ehrlich takes that day as about that time, which is unlikely.

CHAPTERS 25 TO 32: ORACLES AGAINST FOREIGN NATIONS

CHAPTER XXV

Oracles Against Four Neighboring Peoples.

These follow a clockwise geographical order, beginning in the northeast and working round to west. Ammon, Moab, and Edom were closely allied by race and language with Judah; Philistia was a near neighbor in the southwest. The date of the oracles is later than the fall of Jerusalem.

1-7. Against Ammon. Ammon appears early as a foe of Israel, in the stories of Ehud and Jephthah. When Jehoiakim rebelled against Nebuchadrezzar, Ammon and Moab, presumably as Nebuchadrezzar's agents, attacked Judah (cf. 2 Kings 24²). On the other hand, Jer. 27¹¹ shows Ammon, Moab, and Edom seeking the alliance of Zedekiah (cf. Jer. 27¹, mg.). In Jer. 41¹⁰ we find Ammon backing Ishmael, who murdered Gedaliah, and Jer. 49¹¹ tells us that Ammon profited by Judah's distress and succeeded in annexing some of her territory. Even Judas Maccabæus found Ammon still hostile. Ammon's crime is malicious joy at Judah's discomfiture (cf. Obad. v. 12). Her punishment is devastation by hordes of Bedouin. 3. Unto—render regarding. Aha—an exclamation of hostile glee. 4. For will read am about to. 5. Rabbah—Ammon's chief city; for children read cities; for ye shall read thou shalt. Vv. 6f. form a separate oracle.

8-11. Against Moab. For early strife with Moab cf. Ehud (Judg. 3^{12f.}). Moab's crime is scorn of Judah because the latter's misfortunes had disproved her claim to be a "peculiar people." Moab's territory is to be opened to the marauding Bedouin. 8. Delete and Seir, with LXX. Seir=Edom, dealt with in the next oracle. 10. To go against—render as well as (the land of); emend the second the children of Ammon, to read they, i.e., the Moabites.

12-14. Against Edom. Edom, more closely akin to Judah, is the more bitterly reproached for profiting at Judah's expense. Teman, Dedan (v. 13)—extreme north and south points; v. 14 may be interpolated; Ehrlich emends to make Jehovah, not Israel, the avenger, as in the preceding oracles.

15-17. Against Philistia. Our knowledge of Philistia is fragmentary; she was allied with Judah against Assyria. The charge against her is obscure, the penalty vague. Cherethites (v. 16)=Philistines; the synonym possibly hints at a Cretan origin.

CHAPTER XXVI

Tyre is the theme of 26^{1-28¹⁹}. Tyre was at this time the chief Phœnician state. Her action in seeking alliance with Zedekiah (Jer. 27¹⁻³) against Nebuchadrezzar would condemn her in Ezekiel's eyes; he regarded the enemies of Babylon as opposing the will of Jehovah. (No oracle against Babylon appears in Ezekiel.) Her luxurious civilization would also be an offense to the prophet. Her island situation made her almost impregnable. In 701-696 B.C. Sennacherib deprived her of her territory on the mainland, but failed to capture Tyre herself. In 585 B.C. Nebuchadrezzar began a siege of Tyre that lasted thirteen years, but failed to take the city, though he reduced its power. Alexander the Great in 332 B.C. at last took the city by making a dam from the mainland to the island.

1-6. Tyre's Mockery of Jerusalem to be Punished. Tyre has gloated over the fall of Jerusalem because an important trade rival has been removed (?). Therefore Jehovah will bring many nations (v. 3) against her; they are the peoples compelled to march in Nebuchadrezzar's army. Her buildings shall be destroyed, and even the dust of the debris swept into the sea that encircles her, so that her site will be bare enough for the spreading of fishermen's nets. The number of the month has been accidentally omitted in v. 1; the date must be subsequent to the fall of Jerusalem. 2. Gate—this is plural in Hebrew; Rothstein emends to "trade," or "trafficker." The Hebrew word is not one likely to be used for "a channel of commerce," and evidence, on the whole, does not suggest that Jerusalem was an important commercial city. The interpretation given above is therefore dubious. I shall . . . that she: LXX and Targum, "she that was full." 6. Daughters . . . in the field—the mainland towns belonging to Tyre.

7-14. Nebuchadrezzar and His Armies. The many nations (v. 3) are now definitely explained as Nebuchadrezzar's army, and the siege-warfare is described in detail. Ezekiel assumes that cavalry will be as terrifying to Tyre as to the Hebrews; how horses and siege-trains are to be brought to the island he does not say. There were two famous pillars (v. 11) at the entrance to the chief temple, similar to but more splendid than those of Solomon's Temple (1 Kings 7¹⁵⁻²²). 7. Nebuchadrezzar—this is the more correct form of the Babylonian king's name. After horsemen emend, with LXX, and an assemblage of many nations. 8. Buckler—a large wicker structure for protection against missiles hurled from walls. 9. Azes—cf. mg., swords. It seems (Ex. 20²⁵) that "sword" may be used for "iron tool." 11. For go read he cast. 12. For they read he each time, with LXX; and for waters read sea.

15-21. Universal Consternation and Lamentation. The maritime peoples will tremble, seeing in the fate of the seemingly invincible city the forerunner of their own downfall; their rulers will perform appropriate mourning ceremonies. When Jehovah causes the army of Nebuchadrezzar to raze Tyre to the ground as clean as though the hungry waves surging round had devoured her, he will bring her (now personified) down into Sheol (cf. p. 173), the place of shades, and she shall vanish forever from the life of earth.

15. The isles—as in Deutero-Isaiah, the word includes the Mediterranean coastlands. 17. Lamentation—a qinah, or dirge (cf. p. 710a); delete art thou destroyed with LXX; for that wast . . . men read art thou ceased from the sea, with support from versions. 20. And I will set glory is corrupt; read (?) so that thou remainest no more in thy place.

CHAPTER XXVII

1-9a. Splendor and Glory of Tyre. Vv. 1-3 are introductory. Ezekiel is instructed by Jehovah to utter a dirge for Tyre, which prides herself on her incomparable beauty. Her boast is true! Bounded on all sides by the sea, she is like a fair ship built of the most costly materials. Her planks are of fir-tree from Hermon (cf. Deut. 39), her mast of Lebanon cedar. Oak of Bashan (cf. Isa. 213) are her oars. Her boards are of ivory and cypress from the far Mediterranean isles. Her sail is Egyptian linen of checkered colors, the awning of her cabin purple from Elishah. As her materials are most splendid, so are her mariners most skilled: Sidon and Arvad furnish rowers, Semer (for Tyre, v. 8) pilots; the ship's carpenters are the elders of Gebal.

3. Entry—Tyre's natural situation made her the gate through which the commerce of the Mediterranean flowed into Asia; isles—cf. 26¹⁵, note. 4. Borders—rather strange of a ship: perhaps we should accept Bertholet's conjecture "they [the builders] made thee great." 6. Boxwood—the teashsur tree (= cypress?); Kittim is usually supposed to be Cyprus, but probably includes other territories. 7. Delete that it might be to thee for an ensign; flags were not used for ships at this time; Elishah=Carthage(?). Cf. Gen. 104. 8. Zidon, or "Sidon," a neighboring Phœnician town, at this time overshadowed by Tyre; Arvad, the island Ruad, eighty miles north of Sidon; for Tyre probably read Semer, a town northeast of Tripolis.

9b-25. See below, following vv. 26-36.

26-36. Destruction and Resulting Construction. The majestic ship—Tyre—has been rowed into raging billows, and broken up by an easterly gale. Cargo and crew alike fall into the depths of the ocean. The drowning mariners' cries resound over the sea. The terrified sailors in other vessels, abandoning their ships, seek the shore and mourn bitterly for Tyre. They raise for her the death-dirge; she, the incomparable, is brought to doom! In her days of prosperity her wares had supplied the nations and enriched their kings, but now her wares have sunk with her sailors in the ocean depths! The portent fills peoples and kings with horror. But rival trading peoples exult triumphantly over her fate—she is become a legend of terror, and shall be seen no more. 26. Great=tempestuous; cf. Psa. 77¹⁹. 27. This verse is overloaded with details from vv. 9b-25. 28. Suburbs—the text is corrupt and unintelligible. 30f. On these cf. 718 1 Sam. 412 Job 28. 12. 32. For brought to silence read, with versions, destroyed.

9b-25. Nations Trading with Tyre. This catalogue of nations trading with Tyre, and their exports, breaks the figure of Tyre as a ship, and is evidently a later insertion. It may come from Ezekiel, who loves detailed minutiae. It shows us the magnitude of Tyre's commercial activities, and that for luxury her civilization compared with that of Babylon. The text contains many rare—and some unintelligible—words, and has suffered in transmission.

9. In the place of occupy read mg. 10. Persia—the earliest mention of Persia in the O.T., and, if correct, strengthens the suspicion that the passage is not Ezekiel's. Herrmann argues that an African nation is intended, perhaps the Pharusii of classical writers; Lud is probably near Egypt (cf. Gen. 10¹³), rather than the Lud=Lydia of Gen. 10²²; Put is Abyssinia. 11. With thine army—another proper name would be expected here; an easy emendation would give "and of Hilakh," a people named in cuneiform documents; for the Gammadim LXX reads watchmen. 12. Tarshish=Tartessus in Spain. 13. Javan=Ionia, or Greece; for Greeks as slave-traders cf. Joel 3⁶; Tubal and Meshech—the Tabali and Mushki of Assyrian records, the former dwelling southeast of the Black Sea, the latter, their Eastern neighbors. 14. The house of Togarmah—render

"Beth-Togarmah," a people dwelling in the Taurus, a noted horse country. 15. Dedan appears again in v. 20; read here, with LXX, Rodan, but whether this is Rhodes is dubious. 16. For Syria the name Edom, read by MSS., and supported by versions, should be substituted; Damascus—Syria appears in v. 18; emeralds—perhaps malachite; purple, broidered work, and fine linen—out of place between the precious stones. Nor would Tyre import purple, for which she herself was renowned. Therefore read emeralds and topaz, as suggested by LXX; for the erroneous coral read ramoth-stone.

17. Minnith is in Ammon, not Judah (cf. Judg. 11³³). Read with Cornill (cf. mg.), wheat and spice (tragacanth gum) and wax and honey (cf. Gen. 37²⁵ 43¹¹). 18. For and while wool read and of Zimmin. Cornill notes that "wine of Helbon" is mentioned on an Assyrian wine list and on a cylinder of Nebuchadrezzar; "wine of Zimmin" also appears on the former. Helbon lies northwest of Damascus. 19. For Vedan and Javan read they traded for thy wares, joining to v. 18, and continue, from Uzal wrought iron . . . (cf. Gen. 10²⁷). 20. Dedan, in northwest Arabia. 21. Kedar, the Syro-Arabian Bedouin. 22. The traffickers of—an obvious error for a place-name. Cornill proposes "Havilah" (Gen. 21¹); Sheba, in southwest Arabia; Raamah, in Arabia (Gen. 10⁷). 23. Haran in the middle Euphrates district; Canneh—a people called Kannu appears in cuneiform records; Eden—the district Bit-Adini in Babylonia; the traffickers of Sheba—an accidental repetition; read, with LXX, thy traffickers they were. For Chilmad read all Media. 24. Chests of . . . merchandise perhaps should be "carpets woven in colors and strongly bound skeins." 25. Ships of Tarshish, i.e., ships fit for long-distance voyages. Toy compares "argosies," derived from "Ragusa" (=going) ships (cf. Jonah 1³). This verse forms a transition to the following part of the oracle, which part may, indeed, include v. 25b.

26-36. See above, following vv. 1-9a.

CHAPTER XXVIII

1-10. Against the Ruler of Tyre. The king of Tyre at this time was Ithobaal II. How far the charge against him is personal, and how far it treats him as the symbol of the national pride we cannot say. His proud seat in his secure island dominion induces him to liken himself to a god sitting on an inaccessible throne. He thinks himself supreme in the wisdom which he has employed to the increase of the traffic of Tyre and his own enrichment. His wealth has made him arrogant. But God will bring against him the Babylonians, most terrible of nations in the ruthlessness of their military activities; they shall destroy the brilliant splendor of his city. Far from sitting upon the throne of a god, he shall be slain and thrust ignominiously down to Sheol. There let him boast his divinity before his executioners!

3. Daniel—cf. 14¹⁴, note. The following words are obscure. Herrmann reads and no wise men are thy equals, with some support in LXX. 4. Treasures—render rather treasure-houses. 7. Will—"am about to." 8. Pit—a synonym for "Sheol"; deaths—an intensive plural. 9. Instead of him that woundeth read them that pierce through. 10. Deaths of the uncircumcised—cf. note, v. 8. Like the Hebrews, the Philistines were circumcised. The phrase is commonly thought to mean that after death the prince will be no better off than the scorned uncircumcised. But probably the Hebrew word ('arelim) is connected with "Arallu," the Babylonian equivalent to "Sheol," and the phrase is equivalent to "death(s) of the inhabitants of the underworld."

11-19. Against the King of Tyre. Behind this oracle lies a myth concerning the primeval man who dwelt in the garden of the gods, resembling in some features the story of the Garden of Eden, though its points of contrast are even more significant. It probably goes back to primitive Semitic lore, but the references are too vague to dogmatize on the subject. The king of Tyre is likened to the primeval man, made in the divine image and dwelling, together with the cherub, in the garden of God. But through sin he has lost his original likeness to God and is expelled from the holy mountain. Because of his pride and iniquity God has laid him low before conquering kings, who gloat over him. He profaned Jehovah's sanctuary; therefore Jehovah caused fire to come forth from it and consume him. His terrible and irrevocable fate makes him a byword.

12. Sealest up the sum—an obscure phrase. Herrmann interprets it as meaning "art made in the divine image"; cf. Gen. 1²⁷; full of wisdom—omitted in LXX; perhaps a gloss on the preceding words. 13. The list of precious stones here (cf. Ex. 28^{17f.}) is probably interpolated. The remainder of the verse, save the last clause, is unintelligible. 14. Read, on the basis of LXX, with the cherub I set thee on the holy mountain . . .; the anointed and that covereth are obscure words, possibly inserted to connect the cherub with the cherubim of 1 Kings 6^{23f.}; mountain of God—in Semitic mythology the dwelling-place of the gods is a mountain in the far north; the garden will be on the mountain. Stones of fire—the meaning of this allusion is unknown, and likely to remain so until the underlying myth is recovered. 15. The opening words probably mean "Thou retainedst thine original felicity unimpaired." 16. Omit by the multitude . . . violence as an interpolation spoiling the figure; for I have destroyed . . . cherub read and the cherub hath destroyed thee, on the basis of LXX. 18. In the unrighteousness of thy traffic—delete as gloss on the preceding words; for thy sanctuaries read my sanctuary; for midst of the read, with Ehrlich, midst of it.

20-24. Against Sidon. At an earlier date Sidon (=Sidon) had been more important than Tyre, but was at this date subordinate to the latter city. There is no record of any conflict between Sidon and the Hebrews. No reason is assigned in the oracle for Sidon's punishment; perhaps the mere fact that she was an opponent of Babylon would be sufficient to account for an oracle against her. The concluding verse of the oracle gives the reason for these oracles against Judah's neighbors: they must be reduced to impotence so that none of them may be able to trouble the restored Judah to which Ezekiel looks forward. For they (v. 22) read thou, with LXX; in vv. 22f. for her read thee, with LXX.

25, 26. A Prophecy of Restoration. When her ancient enemies have been rendered harmless God will restore Israel to Palestine, where her people will be so free from alarm that they may build and plant for permanent occupation. The oracle may be later than the series of denunciations which it interrupts; v. 24 may have led to its insertion.

CHAPTER XXIX

Chapters 29-32 are devoted to oracles against Egypt. Except 30¹⁻¹⁹ these oracles are all dated: 29¹⁷⁻²¹, inserted later where it now stands, is dated 571 B.C.; the others range from 588 to 585 B.C., being uttered in the months immediately preceding and following the fall of Jerusalem. The position of the small Palestinian states, between the great empires of Assyria and Babylon on the one side and Egypt on the other, caused Egypt to regard them as a first line of defense against her powerful rivals. She constantly incited them to oppose Assyria and Babylon, and attempted to seduce them from allegiance to her rivals by promises of support. But her promises came to little. She failed to sustain her weaker allies against Sargon (Isa. 20^{5f.}), Sennacherib (2 Kings 18²¹), and Nebuchadrezzar (Jer. 37⁵⁻⁸). For her persistent attempts to divert Judah from the path which the prophets believed to be chosen of Jehovah Egypt incurs their sustained hostility (cf. Isa. 30^{1f.} 31^{1f.} Jer. 23⁶).

1-16. Oracle Against the Pharaoh. Seven months before the fall of Jerusalem the prophet receives this oracle against the Pharaoh—the reigning Pharaoh was Hophra—and Egypt. The Pharaoh is likened to a huge crocodile, claiming to be the creator of the Nile in which he lives. Jehovah will catch him with hooks—a method practiced, according to Herodotus, by the Egyptians—and throw his body on the desert sands, where he will inevitably perish. There is probably looming before Ezekiel's vision a coming battle between Nebuchadrezzar and Hophra, to be fought in the desert. The Pharaoh's carcass shall lie unburied, to be consumed by vultures and wild beasts. Rather grotesquely, the Pharaoh's subjects are pictured as little fishes adhering to his scales and sharing his fate. Thus shall they learn the power of Jehovah, who is incensed at their treatment of his people. Egypt is like a walking-stick made of hollow cane, which—so far from sustaining—breaks and pierces the hand that leans upon it (cf. 32¹⁻¹⁰).

Jehovah will bring an army against Egypt, and all living creatures therein shall be destroyed. For her arrogance she shall become a desolate untrodden wilderness, from the extreme northern to the extreme southern boundary. Her inhabitants are to be dispersed, like the Jews, among the nations; but after forty years Jehovah will bring back the descendants of the exiled Egyptians, and they shall establish a kingdom confined to the southern part of Egypt, a kingdom so insignificant that it will never more seduce Israel, or, by causing Israel to sin, call Jehovah's attention to that sin.

The change from Pharaoh to Egypt as subject is possible, on the ground that the king is the symbol for his country: but it must be admitted that the passage seems hardly to be a consistent unity. It is difficult to reconcile vv. 8 and 12. Herrmann feels that vv. 13-16 are so much out of keeping that he attributes them to Ezekiel's old age, and accordingly deletes forty years from vv. 11f. Whether they belong at all to Ezekiel is extremely doubtful.

1. LXX has a later date than is given here, probably supposing that the passage must be later than 26¹. 3. The crocodile was worshiped in Egypt, and appears as a symbol on late Egyptian coins; rivers—a peculiar word, used in singular and plural specifically of the Nile; delete for myself, with versions. Herrmann proposes to retain the suffix thus rendered, and translate I have made myself—a phrase used by the Egyptian god Ra. This would be very dubious Hebrew. 5. For gathered read buried, with MSS. and Targum (cf. Jer. 2533). 6. For they have versions read thou hast. 7. For thy read the, with MSS. support; for shoulders read hands, with versions support; for be at a stand read mg. 9. For he hath read thou hast, with versions. 10. Read mg. Migdol is the northernmost town; Syene, the modern Assouan, the southernmost. 14. Pathros—the southern part of Egypt, from which the Egyptians originally came; base=lowly; cf. 17¹⁴.

17–21. Egypt Shall Be Nebuchadrezzar's Prey. Dated 571, the oracle must have been inserted here, possibly by Ezekiel himself, after the other oracles had been collected. Nebuchadrezzar failed in his thirteen years siege to capture Tyre, though his soldiers labored till their helmets had worn off their hair, and their burdens chafed away their skin. But in this campaign he was acting as Jehovah's agent: he must not be denied his wages. So the wealth of Egypt shall be looted by him in a victorious campaign (cf. Isa. 433). Appended is a verse promising prosperity to Israel—the horn, v. 21, probably has no Messianic significance—in that day, when Ezekiel, who seemed discredited by the failure of his prophecy against Tyre, would be able to speak again, because this new prophecy was fulfilled. 19. LXX omits and he shall carry off her multitude. If the words are retained, render wealth for multitude. 20. Delete because they wrought for me, with support from versions. 21. Horn—cf. Psa. 132¹⁷; opening of the mouth—cf. 16⁶³.

CHAPTER XXX

Vv. 1–19 consist of a series of five undated oracles. The passage probably embodies scattered material collected from various sources and inserted here.

1–5. A Day of Doom for Egypt Is at Hand.

3. Of clouds; “cloudy” is a standing epithet of the “Day of Jehovah,” but whether that idea is in view here is doubtful. By a simple emendation Ehrlich gets “of peoples”—an excellent parallel to what follows, where for heathen render nations. 4. And they shall take away her multitude—probably delete; cf. 29¹⁹, note. 5. Put, Lud—cf. 27¹⁰, note; for mingled people perhaps read Arabians; Cub—unknown; error (?) for Lub=Lybians; land that is in league—an unintelligible expression. Comparison with versions suggests “Cretans,” but the whole verse is probably interpolated.

6–12. Egypt Shall Be Utterly Destroyed and Made Desolate. In v. 6 read mg.; in v. 7 for they read she, with LXX. 9. Ships—LXX suggests “haste”; careless—delete, with LXX. According to vv. 10–12 Nebuchadrezzar shall be the instrument causing Egypt's doom. 12. Rivers—render Nile. The drying up of the Nile would in itself suffice to make Egypt a desert.

13–19. The Cities of Egypt Shall Know the Vengeance of Jehovah. The cities are named without regard to geographical order; several of the names are corrupt, and it is improbable that the passage belongs to Ezekiel. 13. For idols read with LXX great ones—a good parallel to what follows, where prince should be princes (so LXX); Noph=Memphis; and I will put a fear in the land of Egypt—delete, with LXX. 14. Pathros—cf. 29¹⁴, note; Zaan=Tanis; No=Thebes. 15. Sin=Pelusium. 16. The repetition of names here is suspicious: for Sin perhaps read Syene, with LXX; and Noph shall have adversaries in the day-time—undoubtedly corrupt; Cornill emends and her walls shall be razed. 17. For Aven read On=Heliopolis; Pi-beseth=Bubastis. 18. Tehaphnehes=Daphnæ (cf. Jer. 21⁶); for withdraw itself read mg.; for yokes read scepters, with LXX.

20–26. Oracles Against Pharaoh. The date is 587 B.C. The reference in v. 21 may be to the abortive attempt of Egypt to relieve Jerusalem from the grip of Nebuchadrezzar (cf. Jer. 37^{5f.}; cf. 34^{21f.}). With v. 22 begins another oracle based on a similar figure, but this time both Pharaoh's arms are to be broken, and the king of Babylon is named as his opponent. The words the strong, and that which was broken, v. 22, should be deleted as an infelicitous attempt to weave the two oracles together. 21. Roller=bandage. 26. This, save for its last clause, is a duplicate of v. 23; vv. 22–26 read like two parallel versions of one oracle interwoven.

CHAPTER XXXI

Warning Against Pharaoh. The strange blending of symbol and reality in this allegory is almost inconceivable if we regard the chapter as a literary production; it recalls the kaleidoscopic changes of a dream, and its incongruities may perhaps be explained on the ground that the oracle was received in vision. The past tenses of vv. 10–12 are “prophetic,” representing, as often in Hebrew, an event certain to occur as having already happened.

1–9. Pharaoh's Exaltation. The oracle is dated just before the fall of Jerusalem. Ironically the question is put to Pharaoh—who is comparable in greatness with him? He is like a teasshur tree, so mighty in growth that his top pierces the clouds. The subterranean ocean waters his deep roots, whereas other trees must content themselves with mere rills.

His branches furnish nesting-places for the birds and shade for the beasts. He was more magnificent than the trees in God's garden, and the object of their envy.

3. The Assyrian—the force of this would be that as great Assyria had perished so would Egypt. Though Ehrlich defends the reading, it is generally agreed that we should emend to a teasshur tree. This tree, rendered "box," forms the climax to lists of trees, Isa. 41¹⁹. 60¹³, and in the latter passage is associated with Lebanon (cf. 27⁶, note); was a cedar in Lebanon—probably a gloss on teasshur; and with a shadowing shroud—omitted in versions, dubious Hebrew; for thick boughs read mg., with LXX. 4. Deep=the primeval subterranean ocean; for her plantation read his plantation, with LXX and Syriac. The point is that, whereas his roots run deep into the subterranean ocean, the other trees receive merely small channels of water: this explains the first statement in v. 5. In this verse (5) probably delete when he shot them forth, with LXX. 6. And under his shadow dwell all great nations—a (correct) gloss, explaining what is meant by the birds and beasts.

10–14. The Punishment of His Pride. His magnificence has made him arrogant. Now the figure is replaced by the reality for which it stands—the Pharaoh is delivered into the power of Babylon. In v. 12 the figure is resumed: the branches of the felled tree cover mountains and valleys—possibly the reality symbolized is the covering of the land by the corpses of Pharaoh's soldiers. The birds now rest, not on his branches, but on his fallen trunk—the meaning of ruin, v. 13—while the beasts crush his branches. Here is a lesson for all trees to avoid such arrogance! All trees alike, i.e., all nations, must come at last to the shades of Sheol. 10. For thou art read he is, with Syriac and Vulgate; thick boughs—cf. v. 3, note. 11. For will even deliver read have delivered; he shall surely deal with him—corrupt and unintelligible; I have driven him out for his wickedness seems misplaced here, and would be more suitable in 28^{13f}. 12. Here all that follows land should possibly be omitted (cf. v. 6, note). 14. Thick boughs—cf. v. 3, note.

15–18. The Mourning and Dread of His Compeers. As the coastlands mourned for Tyre, so the waters and trees mourn for the fate of the mighty tree. In v. 16a the reality replaces the symbol—the nations tremble at Egypt's fate; v. 16b returns to symbol—the trees already in Sheol are consoled to think that their fate is no worse than that of the nation they envied. The oracle then returns to the ironic question of v. 2, and briefly reca-pitulates Pharaoh's doom. 15. I caused . . . deep for him—delete I covered, with LXX, and read I caused the deep to mourn for him. 17. The text is corrupt, and the latter part is probably a gloss connected with the glosses in vv. 6 and 12. 18. The uncircumcised—render "the inhabitants of the underworld" (cf. 28¹⁰, note). The final sentence reads like a scribe's comment.

CHAPTER XXXII

1–16. An Oracle of Pharaoh's Doom. Ezekiel is to utter a dirge for Pharaoh—though what follows is rather a threat than an elegy. Pharaoh is likened to a monstrous dragon—by which we are to understand a crocodile—spouting water through his nostrils, and trampling the mud of his river until it becomes turbid. But Jehovah will take him in a net and throw him upon the land, where, removed from his element, he will die. Birds and beasts will batten on his carcass. So huge is the monster that his flesh will cover the mountains and his blood fill the streams. This hardly fits the figure, but probably the poet has in mind the reality—the bodies of Pharaoh's army—for which the symbol stands. In the dread hour of doom darkness will cover Egypt as during the plagues. Nations and kings will be appalled at Pharaoh's terrible fall. When they behold Jehovah brandishing his terrible sword—the sword of Nebuchadrezzar—they will fear for themselves. Egypt shall be plundered by the Babylonians, and bereft of man and beast. No creature shall survive to make the waters turbid with trampling—the surface of the Nile shall be unbroken. By her fate shall Egypt be made to recognize the power of Jehovah. 1. Some MSS. and versions read "eleventh year" for twelfth, which fits better into the sequence of dates: this would give 586 B.C. 2. Thou wast likened unto a young lion of the nations seems out of harmony with the figure of the crocodile. Many emendations have been proposed, but none is convincing. The figure of the net (v. 3) suits a lion; crocodiles were caught with hooks (cf. 29⁴, note); for breakest forth with thy rivers probably read spurtest forth water from thy nostrils; for their read thy, with LXX. 3. Delete with a company of many peoples as gloss on net; for they shall read I will, with LXX. 5, 6. Bertholet aptly compares with the boast of Tiglath-Pileser I—"The corpses of their warriors I heaped in heaps upon the mountains; the blood of their warriors I caused to flow over the clefts and heights of the mountains." Height—an unknown word; LXX has "blood." Perhaps read worms

(=carcass). Wherein thou swimst—Hebrew, "thy outflow"; possibly thy blood is a gloss on this; for thee read thy blood. 7. Extinguish—dubious. Possibly and when 1. I shall extinguish thee should be deleted. 9. For destruction read captives, with LXX. 12. The terrible of the nations=the Babylonians. 16. Daughters of the nations—professional wailing-women were employed to mourn (cf. Jer. 91^{7f}. Mt. 92³). Each nation is a single person in the figure.

17–32. Pharaoh's Descent Into Sheol. Again Ezekiel is bidden to utter a dirge for Egypt and the nations, and such is the efficacy of the prophetic word that by his mere utterance he is said to thrust them down. The text that follows is so disordered and complicated with glosses that it is simpler to describe the main features of the picture than to explain it. In the gloomy underworld there are still distinctions: the heroes of old have a position of pre-eminence, resting with their swords as pillows, their shields as covering. Inferior to them are the "uncircumcised" (cf. 28¹⁰, note)—the ordinary dwellers in Sheol. Pharaoh's humiliation is in being relegated to this latter class. Each nation is depicted as occupying a special region. The king—Asshur stands both for king and nation, as "Norway" in Hamlet—is in the midst, surrounded by the graves of his people. So Assyria, Elam, Meshech and Tubal, Edom, the Sidonians, are pictured. The great nations had been sources of dread in the land of the living; now they lie powerless and despised in the nethermost recesses of Sheol. Pharaoh's poor consolation is that they are as badly off as he is (cf. Isa. 143–20, which may be based on this passage).

17. Insert here "in the first month," with LXX. A mention of Pharaoh would be natural in 18, since he is the main subject; but king and nation appear to interchange. Probably even her . . . nations is a gloss. 19. This is inserted by LXX in the middle of v. 21, as the speech of the mighty ones to Pharaoh. 20. V. 20b is corrupt. 22. Asshur—Assyria fell to the Babylonians in 612 B.C. 23. Which—means not the sword, but the Assyrians. 24. Elam—conquered by Assyria cir. 650 B.C., though it became independent again at the fall of that empire; shame—the disgrace of being assigned to the inferior place in Sheol. 26. Meshech and Tubal—cf. 27¹³, note. 27. For that are fallen of the uncircumcised read, with Cornill, the giants of antiquity, with support in versions; iniquities . . . their bones gives no meaning, the simple emendation "shield" for iniquities (Cornill) is almost certain. V. 28 seems to be the end of the oracle; vv. 29–32 look like a later supplement.

CHAPTER XXXIII

1–9. The Responsibility of a Prophet. The date of this oracle is uncertain; some think it was given during the ecstatic experience of v. 22, but that is improbable. The substitution of the mild children of thy people for the earlier form of address, "rebellious house," points to a time subsequent to the news of Jerusalem's fall reaching Ezekiel. The passage may be prefixed to the prophecies of salvation which follow, as a restatement of the prophet's responsibility, for even these are not without their warning note.

The inhabitants of a city appoint a watchman to sound the alarm when the foe approaches the city wall. If he blows the alarm signal, he has done his duty: the citizen who ignores it must pay the penalty of his slackness. If the watchman neglect his duty, the citizen may be slain, but in that case God will hold the watchman responsible. Thus Ezekiel will be responsible only for warning the wicked of the penalty that follows sin, and held guiltless, whatever the wicked may do, provided he has given the warning. The oracle would seem almost to be a message of comfort to the prophet, despondent because his warnings were so little heeded. 2. For among them Ehrlich would render their ablest man. 3. Cf. Amos 3⁶. 5. V. 5b should be emended but he who has given the warning has saved himself (from penalty). The word soul means "self," and is rightly rendered person in v. 6. 6. Read mg. and similarly throughout. 7–9. Cf. vv. 17–19. 8. Delete O wicked man.

10–20. The Responsibility of the Individual. This oracle is closely connected with the preceding, and repeats the teaching of ch. 18. The exiles realize that they are suffering the penalty of their sins; they are rotting—the literal meaning of pine away, v. 10—and have no hope of renewed life. Ezekiel is bidden once again to speak to them the heartening message that no man is the helpless victim of his own past. Not an arithmetical calculation balancing the good and evil deeds of life will determine a man's destiny, but the actual religious condition of the man, as evidenced by his conduct, at the time of judgment. The judgment is, of course, one in this life: there is no conception of immortality involved. Conversely, no man must presume on past right-doing as giving him license to turn to evil ways. The sins specified are, be it noted, ethical. 12. Delete here neither shall . . . sinneth as a parallel to the clause beginning, The righteousness. 13. For that he shall read thou shalt, with support in versions; alternatively render "concerning the righteous," and "concerning" for unto in 14, there changing thou shalt to he shall, with Ehrlich. 15. Of life—i.e., the observance of which saves from the penalty of death.

21-29. An Oracle Against the Survivors in Judah. Some six months after the city's fall the news reaches Ezekiel. On the previous evening he had been in a prophetic trance. When he hears the news his dumbness passes. Some time later, as v. 23 implies, he utters this oracle. The Jews in Palestine flatter themselves that, as the only heirs of Abraham left on the estate, all that Jehovah had promised to him and his descendants is now theirs. But, says Jehovah, their ritual and ethical sins utterly disqualify them from possessing the inheritance. His three plagues—sword, wild beasts, and pestilence—shall devour them. The land of promise, flowing with milk and honey, shall be made an uninhabited desolation, and the survivors shall thus know that Jehovah is not to be trifled with. The oracle shows clearly that Ezekiel regarded the exiles as the true inheritors of the promises. 21. Read, with support in MSS. and versions, "eleventh" instead of twelfth; the news may have taken six (cf. Ezra 7⁹), but hardly eighteen months to reach Babylon; one—the Hebrew word may be collective, and may refer to the deported captives. Schmidt thinks of a messenger sent by Gedaliah at a later date. 22. Until—difficult; probably read when (cf. 24²⁷, note). 25. With the blood—cf. 18⁸, note. 26. Stand upon your sword—obscure; the meaning may be "use methods of violence." 28, 29. Astonishment—render devastation.

30-33. An Oracle Concerning the Exiles. The fulfillment of Ezekiel's prediction of the fall of Jerusalem causes him to be talked about when men gather in the cool shade of the walls and porches, and they come in crowds to hear his oracles. Yet they are but hearers, not doers, of his words. His predictions of hope sound pleasant in their ears, but they are deaf to the demand for righteous conduct as a preliminary to the realization of those hopes. A purging judgment is in store for them, and when it comes they shall know that Ezekiel is in truth a prophet. 30. One to another and the following clause are doublets. 31. As the people cometh—an obscure phrase, possibly meaning "in crowds"; shew much love—render speak flattering things; LXX and Syriac read lies; gain—the Hebrew word always implies "got by injustice or violence." 32. Very lovely song—rather, singer of love-songs.

CHAPTER XXXIV.

1-16. Against the Rulers of Israel. In Babylon and Assyria, as by Homer, a king was called the "shepherd of his people." The shepherds of this oracle are the pre-exilic rulers of Judah. They have used the flock to their own profit but have neglected all the duties of a shepherd to his flock: "the hungry sheep look up and are not fed," and now are partly devoured and partly scattered—a reference to the siege and Exile. Jehovah himself will now take the place of these unworthy shepherds. He will gather the dispersed flock and bring it back to his pasture in Palestine. In plain words, Jehovah will be the only king of the exiles, and will restore them to the promised land. The oracle is based on Jer. 23¹⁻⁴, and is an anticipation of the N.T. figure of the Good Shepherd. 2. Even to the shepherds is a gloss. 3. Fat—we may reprint the Hebrew word and render milk, with LXX and Vulgate. 4. But with force and read, with LXX, and over the strong. 12. That he is among his sheep—the text here is dubious. Cornill emends of thunder-storm, and deletes that are scattered abroad: this last is an impossible rendering of the Hebrew, which may, says Ehrlich, be rendered, on Arabic analogy, "wounded by wild beasts." 13. For inhabited places read, with Ehrlich, best; cf. Gen. 47⁶. 16. Destroy—most moderns emend guard, which has support in versions. The Hebrew is certainly out of harmony with the rest of the oracle, but possibly correct: for the verse may be a supplement linking the preceding with the following oracle, where the idea would be in place. If the emendation is accepted, render in the proper way for in judgment; if not, render with judgment.

17-22. Against the Arrogant Aristocracy. The flock suffers not only from wicked shepherds, but also from sturdy sheep who, not content with eating the best of the pasture and drinking the clearest water, trample and foul what remains. The good shepherd will save the weak sheep from their thrusting fellows. The reference is obviously to the wealthy citizens who oppressed their poor neighbors. Ehrlich's suggestion to connect the concluding words of v. 17 with v. 18—"To the rams and he-goats Jehovah saith 'Seemeth it . . .'" is attractive.

23-31. A Messianic Prophecy. Jehovah will appoint as deputy-shepherd a prince such as David was. In v. 25 the figure is blended with the reality: Jehovah will make a new covenant with his people; evil beasts—which symbolize the marauding neighboring nations—shall be no more. Rains—the essential basis of prosperity in Palestine—shall be regular and abundant, and the country shall flourish. When Jehovah has delivered them from their captors they shall know—not through his fierce anger, but through his gracious kindness—that he is Jehovah. In Ezekiel's prediction the Messiah appears after the restoration, not as its instrument.

23. David—Ezekiel does not contemplate a resurrection of David, but the appearance of one who shall have the traditional qualities of David. It will be observed that he is to be prince, not king. In contrast to Jeremiah, Ezekiel has no room in his future theocratic state for a king. One shepherd may point to a reunited kingdom of Judah and Samaria. 26. V. 26a should probably be emended And I will send them abundance of rain; the Hebrew is certainly corrupt. 27. Broken—he will not stay to loosen the yoke, but suddenly break the bars which hold it together. 29. Plantation for renown—emend, with Ehrlich, a staff of bread (cf. 4¹⁶ 5¹⁶ 14¹³).

CHAPTER XXXV

An Oracle against Edom. This is a fuller expression of the thought in 25¹²⁻¹⁴. At first sight it would seem to be more in place with the oracles against foreign nations than here. But it is placed here as foil to ch. 36—doom for Mount Seir in contrast to blessing for the mountains of Israel. That Edom had lent assistance to the Babylonians in their attack on Jerusalem and had profited by her pitiful plight was a crime never forgiven by the Jews (cf. Obad. v. 10 Psa. 137⁷). Here three charges are brought against Edom: (1) her assistance of the Babylonians (v. 5); (2) her attempts to add the territory of the conquered Judah and Samaria to her own (v. 10); (3) her malicious rejoicing over Judah (vv. 12f.). Her punishment is to be desolation.

2. Mount Seir=the land of Edom. 3. Astonishment—render devastation. 5. With this cf. Amos 1¹¹: the perpetual enmity may be traced back to the respective ancestors, Jacob and Esau; in the time of their calamity—LXX omits; iniquity of the end—read mg.: the meaning is “the final punishment of Jerusalem.” 6. Delete here I will prepare . . . and pursue thee, on basis of LXX; for hast not hated blood read art blood-guilty, with LXX. 7. Astonishment and a desolation—render desolation and devastation; the use of the third person suggests that the verse is interpolated. Hence the changes in persons in subsequent verses. 8. Delete his mountains, with LXX; from his slain delete his, with LXX: hills and valleys are objects to fill. 9. For ye shall read thou shalt, with LXX and Syriac. 10. Two=Israel and Judah; for we read I, with versions; whereas the Lord was there—the countries were not ownerless, but still the property of Jehovah.

Ehrlich, however, may be right in emending “but the Lord was listening” (cf. v. 13). 11. Do—add to thee, with support in versions; for among them read in thee, with LXX. 12. For all perhaps read the noise of. 13. Read second person singular throughout; and for have multiplied your words read have spoken impudently; LXX omits these words. 14. V. 14b is a duplication of v. 15a, and should be deleted. 15. For even all of it possibly read a destruction; desolate, literally “a desolation”; for they shall read thou shalt, with LXX.

CHAPTER XXXVI

1-15. An Oracle for the Mountains of Israel. In contrast to the desolation foretold for Mount Seir (ch. 35) prosperity shall come to the mountains of Israel. Their foes—Edom is particularly in mind—have mocked at their fate and encroached upon them. But Jehovah, incensed at this conduct—especially on the part of Edom, which was left by the Babylonians in possession of its territory (the residue, v. 5)—proclaims that these foes shall themselves become objects of such jeering as they had used against Israel. The latter, on the other hand, he will restore to abnormal fertility, and its inhabitants will multiply until not only the recent prosperity of the kingdom but that of the earlier golden age will be exceeded. The frequent repetition of the formula, “Thus saith the Lord,” suggests that a number of smaller oracles are here combined.

2. Ancient high places—LXX, “the ancient waste places.” It is true that Ezekiel would be unlikely himself to use in this connection the abhorrent term “high places,” but he might use it in the speech of Israel's detractors. 3. For made you desolate read snorted at you, or, even closer to the Hebrew, rejoiced (Ehrlich). 5. To cast it out for a prey—corrupt and unintelligible. Vv. 10, 12 are probably expansions of the text; vv. 13-15 change the address from the mountains (plural) to the land (singular), and may be a postscript. 13. For you read thee, with LXX and Syriac; thy nation=thine own inhabitants. 15. Delete neither shall thou cause . . . more, with LXX.

16-32. A Promise of a New Heart and Renewed Prosperity. The oracle is a review of Jehovah's dealings with his people, and a philosophy of his ways. In their own country Israel, by bloodshed and idolatry, had polluted the land. So for penalty Jehovah exiled them among the nations. But their sorry plight was a scandal to him among the nations, who, believing that a god was inseparably bound up with his people and stood by them, right or wrong, saw in Jehovah's chastisement of his people only his defeat by more powerful gods. For his own sake, then, not for theirs, he must bring his people back. They must be cleansed from their impurities, and given a heart of flesh instead of a heart of stone: that is, they must be made tractable instead of stubborn. Then they will do his will. The consequence will be not only material prosperity but the awakening within them of a sense of shame for their past sins. We miss here the note of Jehovah's love for his errant people that is found in other prophets: all is done for the sake of Jehovah's name. The change of heart is brought about by Jehovah's own activity: his people are passive in his hands. While this may be a one-sided view, it yet emphasizes a very important truth: men may in one sense work out their own salvation, but in another sense salvation is always the gift of God. Ezekiel's teaching here approximates to that of Paul.

17. Uncleanness—cf. 18⁶, note, Lev. 15¹⁹, and, for the general idea, Jer. 27. 18. Some versions omit for the blood . . . idols. 20. Profaned, i.e., their disasters reflected, in the eyes of the nations, disgrace upon Jehovah. 23. Sanctify—the reverse of profane (v. 20). 25. Sprinkle—render dash. Lustration with water is a prominent feature in Babylonian cult. For Hebrew usage cf. Ex. 30¹⁷⁻²¹. 26. Cf. 11¹⁹. 29. Cf. Hos. 2^{8f.}, 21^{f.}. 30. Reproach—famine is evidence of anger felt by a nation's god.

33-38. Two Pendants to the Preceding Oracle. Palestine, now desolate, shall again be tilled and be miraculously fertile, her cities rebuilt, walled anew, and repopulated. The nations will then recognize the power of Jehovah. The reduced numbers of the exiles shall, on their return, be so multiplied as to remind the prophet gratefully of the thronging crowds of sheep brought to Jerusalem for sacrifice on a great feast-day—a characteristically priestly thought. Isaiah loathed the reek of the many sacrifices (Isa. 11¹⁻¹⁵).

CHAPTER XXXVII

1-14. The Valley of Dry Bones. In ecstatic vision Ezekiel is transported to the valley where earlier he had seen (3²²) the glory of Jehovah, and is made to pass up and down in it that he may see how full it is of dry bones—the bleaching bones of a slaughtered army (cf. slain, v. 9). Jehovah asks “Can these become living men again?” The idea of resurrection had not yet dawned upon the vision of the Hebrews. That it was possible for a departed spirit to enter the body it had just left and near by which it was still hovering was conceivable—probably that was why

Elisha shut the door (2 Kings 4³³) to prevent the spirit from going off. But that spirits should return to bodies from which they had departed so long that the very bones were bare and bleached—impossible! Ezekiel's thou knowest is really a way of avoiding the answer “No!”

Jehovah bids him prophesy to the bones: he will cause spirit to enter into them, they shall be clothed with human bodies, and live. The prophet—thus bidden to “launch out into the deep”—obeys. The dead bones stir with a rattling noise, each finding its fellow, and their bodies are re-formed. Yet they lack life. The prophet at Jehovah's bidding summons spirit from the four winds—the bodies pulsate again with life, the army stands once more in serried ranks as before its destruction. Then Jehovah explains the vision. The bones are Judah and Samaria. The exiles are wont to say, “We are as nations almost dead—so near to death, reduced almost to bleached bones, that we can never live again.” But Jehovah will renew their life and establish them once more in Palestine. Very noteworthy in this splendid vision is that the miraculous result is achieved not by direct fiat of Jehovah but through the instrumentality of the prophetic word, so mighty that its utterance insures the result.

5. Will—“am about to”; breath—render as mg., and so throughout the passage (cf. Gen. 27); for and ye shall live read, with LXX, of life, attaching to breath. 7. There was a noise—probably delete; earthquake—render “rattling.” 9. Wind—in Hebrew one word expresses the ideas of wind, breath, spirit. Render “spirit”; except after four. 11. The whole house—the Northern as well as the Southern Kingdom; hope is lost—cf. 19⁵. 12. Graves—the exile—a flaw in the figure. LXX and Syriac omit O my people, which should probably be deleted here and in v. 13.

15-28. The Symbol of the Two Sticks. Ezekiel is to take two sticks—probably shaped like scepters, or (so Schmidt) the two pieces of a scepter-shaped stick previously broken—inscribing on one “Judah and the southern tribes,” on the other “Joseph and the northern tribes.” He is to join them together, and, when asked the meaning of this symbolic action, to say that it foreshows the reunion by Jehovah of Israel and Judah. They shall be one kingdom with one king, a new David. They shall be cleansed and righteous, and they and their descendants shall dwell forever in Palestine. Jehovah will make a new covenant with them, prosper them, and show the world that they are his chosen people, by establishing his sanctuary permanently within their borders. 16. The stick of Ephraim should probably be deleted. 19. For mine hand read, with LXX, the hand of Judah. 23. Read mg. 25. For your read their, with LXX and Syriac. 26. For place read plant or, with Targum, bless. 28. Sanctify=set apart as mine.

CHAPTER XXXVIII

Chs. 38 and 39 contain oracles against Gog. These very difficult and obscure chapters raise many problems too intricate for discussion here, a loss the less serious in that few of them have been solved. The general theme is that, after Israel's settlement in Palestine, when the neighboring peoples have been rendered harmless, Jehovah will entice the far-distant peoples of the North to invade the country, and will overwhelm them in a disaster so terrible that none shall remain to challenge the peace of Israel, and Jehovah's power shall be universally recognized. This theme may come from Ezekiel, but has been elaborated by later hands.

1-9. Attack Upon Israel by Gog. Jehovah will entice Gog with his mighty army, which includes subordinate nations, to prepare an invasion of the mountains of Israel, where the returned exiles are dwelling in peace. Gog will descend upon the land like a devastating storm. But the sinister intent of Jehovah is evident in the initial, I am against thee. No wholly satisfactory explanation of Gog has yet been found, though many have been attempted. Some assume that it is a mythical name, but v. 2 tells against that view. It is best to regard Gog as typifying the "foe from the north" associated with the eschatology of the Day of Jehovah (cf. p. 681a). 2. Delete of the land of Magog; Rosh—unknown; many critics prefer mg.; Meshech, Tubal—cf. 27¹³, note, 32²⁶. 4. And put hooks in thy jaws—cf. 29⁴; the phrase, out of harmony with the context, is probably a gloss on the preceding verb. 5. Herrmann deletes this (cf. 27¹⁰) as interpolated. 6. Gomer—cf. Gen. 10²; possibly a Cappadocian people; house of—render Beth, cf. 27¹⁴, note; hordes—render bands (12¹⁴); probably=divisions of an army. 7. Guard—meaning dubious, perhaps "agent"; for them read me, with LXX. 8. Visited—better, summoned.

10-16. Attack Upon the Mountains of Israel. A parallel to the foregoing. Here Gog is represented as himself planning the attack on the Israelites, who are so confident of their safety that they dwell in unwallled cities. This is not necessarily inconsistent with v. 4, because Jehovah might be regarded as causing these plans to arise in Gog's mind. Gog's motive is plunder, and, if v. 13 be part of the text, other nations watch the invasion with interest, hoping to trade for the spoil of goods and slaves. But Gog will take "no gain of money"; he is being lured on that Jehovah may be glorified in his destruction. 11. To—render against (twice). 12. For thine read my, with LXX; middle—Palestine is regarded as the center of the earth (cf. Mic. 4¹). 13. Young lions—corrupt; a parallel to merchants would be expected. 14. For know it read stir thyself up, with LXX.

17-23. The Doom of Gog. Gog has been the subject of earlier prophecies—this may refer to "the foe from the north." When he comes into Palestine he will be confronted not by a peaceful people but by the wrath of Jehovah, manifested in physical convulsions, and reducing him to panic. Pestilence and slaughter will be Jehovah's weapons. He that descended as a devastating storm on the land shall be the victim of a storm of hail, fire, and brimstone. 17. For art thou read thou art, with versions; instead of for many years read and in those years, with versions, or delete. 22. For plead read contend (A.S.V., enter into judgment).

CHAPTER XXXIX

1-10. Defeat of Gog. This oracle opens (cf. 38^{3f.}) with an announcement of Jehovah's purpose to allure Gog to invade Israel. But Jehovah will strike his weapons from his hand, and his soldiers shall lie unburied, a prey to vultures and wild beasts—most terrible of fates to the Semites, who believed that tolerable conditions after death were possible only to those whose bodies were properly interred (cf. Amos 2¹). The threat, v. 6, that Jehovah will send fire on Magog (cf. Amos 14, 7, 10, 12, 14 22, 5) seems out of harmony with the context, and may be an interpolation. The discarded weapons of Gog—no longer of use to Israel, since the last enemy is vanquished—will furnish sufficient wood to kindle Israel's fires for seven years. This hyperbole is probably a later elaboration. 1. Cf. 38², notes. 6. Magog—the country of Gog.

11-16. The Multitude of the Slain. This is another elaboration, contradicting the previous threat that the bodies of Gog's soldiers shall remain unburied. The Israelites shall bury the corpses in a valley, because, in a ritual sense, a corpse defiles the land. So numerous are they that the task takes seven months. To make sure that not a single bone remains to pollute the sacred territory, definitely commissioned men shall then search the land and erect a mark by any bone they discover, so that the burial parties may remove it into the valley.

11. Them that pass through—repointing the Hebrew gives "Abarim" (cf. Num. 27¹²), the name of a mountain range in Moab, which may have been given to a neighboring valley. This would fit the following words, for the sea is the Dead Sea; it shall stop them that pass through—corrupt and unintelligible. 13. People of the land—in contrast to the priests (cf. 44²⁵). 14. Bury—probably read search for; that pass through—delete, with LXX and Syriac. 16. The first clause is an obscure gloss.

17-24. The Great Sacrifice. With v. 17 the figure changes, and the slaughtered army of Gog is represented as a great sacrifice. The victims of an ordinary sacrifice furnished a feast for those who offered it and their guests. The prophet is bidden to invite the birds and beasts as guests to partake of these victims, who are compared to the finest cattle used for sacrifice (cf. Isa. 34^{6f.}). Israel shall recognize the power of Jehovah, and the nations shall learn that it was through no lack of might in Jehovah that Israel went into exile. He deliberately punished his people in that way for their treachery. 18. Bashan—noted for fine pasture and fat cattle (cf. Deut. 32¹⁴ Psa. 22¹² Amos 4¹). 20. For chariots read horsemen. 23. Trespassed against—render were treacherous unto.

25-29. Promise of Restoration. This short oracle has no connection with the threats against Gog, but would fittingly follow ch. 37. It is a promise of restoration for all Israel, Samaria and Judah alike. 25. Bring again the captivity—render restore the fortunes. 26. Here bear may have the sense of realize: another possible rendering is forget; trespasses, trespassed against—render treachery, were treacherous unto. 29. Poured—cf. Joel 2²⁸.

CHAPTERS 40 TO 48. THE ECCLESIASTICAL ORGANIZATION OF THE RESTORED TERRITORY

In the preceding chapters Ezekiel expresses a threefold hope: (1) the spiritual regeneration of a remnant; (2) the destruction of the nations hostile to Israel, including those now occupying the promised land; (3) the restoration of the regenerated people to Palestine. In chs. 40-48 the prophet describes the organization of the restored community, so that the intimate relations between the people and their God may be maintained. On the significance of this description, see the introduction, section on "The Father of Judaism," p. 715a.

CHAPTER XL

The first part of this "constitution" deals with the Temple and the Temple area (chs. 40-43).

1-4. The Prophetic Vision. On New Year's Day, 573 B.C., Ezekiel is thrown into ecstasy. In his trance-vision God leads him to Mount Zion—risen now above the mountains of the earth (cf. Isa. 2² Mic. 4¹). There he beholds the Temple of the restored people, its buildings so extensive that they resemble the frame of a city (v. 2). An angel with a measuring-line for large measurements and a reed for smaller ones is waiting to conduct him over the Temple; he is to take careful note and tell what he has seen to the house of Israel. 1. Thither—LXX and Syriac omit. 2. Brought he me—LXX and Syriac omit; for on the south read in front of me, with support in versions.

What follows describes the details of the prophet's vision.

5. The Encircling Wall. The whole of the Temple buildings are included in house. The measuring unit is the longer cubit of Babylonia, a handbreadth more than the ordinary cubit (see p. 79).

6-16. The Outer Eastern Gate. 6. Here delete the last seven words, with LXX. 7. For lodge read mg. (throughout); for space read pillar, with LXX. 8. Delete with MSS. and versions. 9. Delete and the porch . . . house, with LXX; for posts read mg. 10. For eastward read chamber opposite chamber, with LXX. 14. This is very dubious. He made seems quite out of place. 16. Palm trees—carved symbols, replacing the trees which anciently were objects of worship.

17-49. Courts, Tables, Gates, Chambers of Various Sorts. Every detail of the Temple arrangements passes before the eyes of the prophet: The great outer court, with thirty chambers, possibly provided for participators in festal meals (vv. 17-19); the outer northern gate (20-23); the outer southern gate (24-27); the inner southern gate (28-31); the inner eastern gate (32-34); the inner northern gate (35-37); tables for washing and slaying the sacrifices (38-43). The text here is very corrupt. The chamber (v. 38) is probably by the eastern gate. Two chambers (so, with LXX, for chambers for the singers, v. 44) for the priests (44-46); the court and altar (47); the porch, or entrance to the Temple proper (48, 49).

CHAPTER XLI

The text of ch. 41 is very corrupt, and in places admits of no certain translation. For the contents cf. 1 Kings 6^{f.}

1, 2. The Entrance—to the main Temple building. Delete, in v. 1, which was the breadth of the tabernacle, with LXX.

3, 4. The Holy of Holies—a square chamber, empty. Note that Ezekiel does not enter this.

5-11. The Buildings at the Sides—in three stories, v. 6.

12-14. A Building—the use of which is not defined, to the west of the Temple.

15-26. The Interior of the Temple. This is covered with wood, both floor and ceiling. The walls and doors are decorated with alternate palms and cherubs, the latter having each two faces, one a lion face, one a human face, in contrast to the four faces of the "living creatures" of the divine chariot. The small altar of wood (v. 22) may be the shewbread table.

CHAPTER XLII

The text of ch. 42 also is corrupt, and in places unintelligible.

1-14. The Cells in the Inner Court. These serve as refectories in which the priests eat the holy food (v. 13), and as dressing rooms, where they doff their clothes, which acquire holiness by contagion, ere they leave the inner court (cf. 44¹⁹, note). Vv. 13f. seem misplaced in a context which is concerned with measurements and may be a later addition.

15-20. The Measurements of the Sides of the Whole Inclosure. V. 20 apparently contradicts 48¹², according to which the land beyond the inclosure was holy: nor does the usual explanation that there were degrees of holiness help much.

CHAPTER XLIII

1-9. Jehovah's Solemn Entry Into the Temple. As before Ezekiel had in vision seen Jehovah depart from the defiled Temple by way of the east gate (cf. 10^{18f.} 11^{22f.}), so now he sees him return in glory through the same gate. In the days of the monarchy the Temple had been a royal chapel, almost an appurtenance to the palace. Kings had been buried near to it. Now Ezekiel hears the voice of Jehovah from the inmost shrine, promising that he will dwell forever in the Temple, but demanding that such encroachments shall no longer be permitted. 3. Read v. 3a: And the vision was like the vision which I saw when he came to destroy . . . 5. For the spirit read spirit; for this is read thou hast seen, with LXX. 6. For a man read the man, with versions. 7. Delete in their high places.

10-12. The Law of the House. Ezekiel is to show his plan to the people, and, if the sight of it bring repentance, to give them written instructions for regulating all concerning it. 10. Read the last clause and its measure and its pattern.

13-27. The Altar. This section comes in abruptly, and may be a later insertion. Vv. 13-17 give the measurements. Some of the terms used are obscure, and detail is therefore uncertain. The altar appears to have been formed of four squared stones, one above another, in descending sizes, and approached by steps. 14. For settle read ledge. 15. Upper altar is the same word as that rendered altar hearth, and should be so rendered; horns—cf. Ex. 29¹² Lev. 47 1 Kings 16^{0f.} The horns of the altar may possibly be associated originally with the bull which appears as a symbol of Jehovah. Vv. 18-27 describe its consecration. 18. For sprinkle read dash. 19. Levites—cf. 44¹⁰, note. 21. For he read one (A.S.V., it shall be burnt). 25. If seven is right, then eighth, in v. 27, should be "ninth." It is altogether unlikely that the thou of this passage (v. 25) means Ezekiel. Herrmann's suggestion that it is due to imitation of the legislation in which "thou" means Moses is plausible.

CHAPTER XLIV

Chapters 44-46 are devoted to instruction concerning Temple servants and festivals.

1-3. The Closed Gate. The gate through which Jehovah re-enters the Temple is never to be opened again; but the prince—there is no longer to be a king exercising priestly functions—may be suffered to eat a sacrificial meal in its porch. 2. For the Lord (Jehovah) read he, i.e., the angel-guide. Jehovah is referred to in the third person (v. 2b).

4-9. Exclusion of Foreigners from the Temple. Foreigners, though such had been previously employed in subordinate offices in the Temple, are to be rigidly excluded. 5. For the Lord read he (cf. v. 2, note). 7. For they read ye, with versions. 8. After set insert "them as."

10-16. Degradation of the Levites. The menial offices are to be discharged by Levites, who, because they had connived at idolatrous practices, are degraded from the priesthood. In earlier times "priest" and "Levite" are practically interchangeable terms. Deut. 18^{0f.} directs that the Levites, whose functions at the local sanctuaries disappear when only the central sanctuary is recognized, shall be allowed to minister at the Temple; but 2 Kings 23⁹ shows that the Jerusalem priests succeeded in excluding them from this privilege. Priestly functions in the restored Temple are to be restricted to the Zadokite priests (cf. 1 Kings 23⁵ 44).

17-31. Regulations as to the Conduct, Duties, and Rewards of the Priests. 19. Sanctify—the priestly garments acquire holiness, which is contagious, and would infect laymen with holiness so that they too would be subject to various taboos (cf. p. 283a). Contact with a corpse defiles (v. 25). Note the omission of "wife"; the exceptions permitted all concern blood relations. Behind the regulations probably lies a protest against the worship of the dead. 28. For an read no, with Vulgate. 31. This restriction is in Ex. 22³¹ universal.

CHAPTER XLV

1-8. Assignment of Territory to Priests, Levites, and Prince. A rectangle of 25,000 by 10,000 cubits, in the midst of which is the Temple, is reserved, as specially holy, for the priests. A similar rectangle north of this is to be reserved for the Levites. On the south a rectangle of 25,000 by 5,000 cubits is allowed for the city itself. These together make a square. The further territory included by prolonging the north and south sides of the square to the Jordan and the Mediterranean Sea is the portion of the prince. 1. For ten read mg. 2. Suburbs, i.e., common lands. 5. Read mg.

9-12. The Currency Shall Not Be Depreciated. Coined money is not contemplated. Weight of metal is paid for weight or measure of goods. The prince and his successors shall not depreciate the currency by manipulating units of measurement. On the units see p. 78. 12. The text here is corrupt. Perhaps read five (shekels) shall be five, and ten shekels shall be ten, and fifty shekels shall be your maneh.

13-17. Dues to Be Paid to the Prince. These enable him to provide the costly sacrifices.

18-25. Days of Atonement, etc. These shall be celebrated on the first day of the first and of the seventh months. They introduce feasts that correspond to the Passover (v. 21) and the Feast of Tabernacles (v. 25). No feast corresponding to the Feast of Weeks is recognized. The point of v. 20 (read mg.) is that in the restored community no one will sin deliberately.

CHAPTER XLVI

1-10. Regulations for Sabbath and New Moon. These feasts are so closely associated in O.T. that it is natural to think that the Sabbath is based on a lunar reckoning; it may have been originally the Full Moon festival. The New Moon seems to be more important even than the Sabbath to judge from the extra sacrifice of a bullock. Note that even the prince may not pass into the inner court. Vv. 4-7 break the connection between v. 3 and v. 8, and may be a later insertion. 10. Possibly we should read, with Syriac, As for the prince in their midst, by the gate through which he entered shall he depart.

11-15. Further Regulations for Offerings. V. 11 is quite general, and seems misplaced here. For the prince's freewill offerings the gate (v. 1) is to be opened as on New Moon and Sabbath. Vv. 13-15, treating of the daily offering, have the same form as 45¹⁸⁻²⁰ (see note). Some versions, however, have "he" for thou.

16-18. Regulations as to the Land Reserved for the Prince. The prince may give to any of his sons—though doubtless in any case the estate was treated as a family possession rather than an individual holding—part of his reservation as a permanent possession, but any gift he may make from it to a courtier automatically reverts to the prince at the year of release—undoubtedly the seventh year (cf. Ex. 21² Deut. 15¹² Jer. 34¹⁴), rather than the fiftieth (cf. Lev. 25¹⁰). The prince may not take from private persons their property, as Ahab took Naboth's vineyard, in order to give it to a courtier.

19-24. The Temple Kitchens. These verses form part of the itinerary last mentioned in 44⁴, and would fittingly follow 42¹⁴. On v. 20 cf. 44¹⁹, note. In v. 22, for inclosed read small, with LXX and Syriac.

CHAPTER XLVII

1-12. The Life-Giving River. This beautiful description of the life-giving stream comes into the rather arid detail of these last chapters with almost as refreshing a power as the stream itself came to the waters of the Dead Sea. The meaning is clear, and needs little comment. Ezekiel is taken about a mile and a third before the miraculous river reaches an unfordable depth. Even to-day there are no fish in the Dead Sea (v. 9). Though the idea of a miraculous stream in connection with the dwelling-place of God is a recognized feature of description (cf. Psa. 46⁴), Ezekiel probably means this to be taken literally. 8. Arabah—the depression below sea level through which the Jordan flows down into the Dead Sea; for into the sea . . . made to issue forth read simply the bitter waters; healed—cf. 2 Kings 22². 9. Rivers—read, with versions, the river. 10. En-ge-di—approximately in the middle of the west shore of the Dead Sea; En-eglaim is unknown; for their fish read its fish, i.e., the Dead Sea's fish; great sea, i.e., the Mediterranean. 11. The one good feature of the Dead Sea—the production of salt—is not to be lost. This verse may be interpolated. 12. Meal—render food (as in A.S.V.; cf. Rev. 22²).

13-23. The Boundaries of the Land. No territory east of the Jordan is included, though Israel had at times possessed considerable holdings there. The northern boundary is difficult to trace, as some of the places named are unknown. Roughly, it seems to run from some point north of Tyre to the Lebanon range. 19. The brook of Egypt is the Wady El-arish. Tamar is presumably south of the Dead Sea. With the passage cf. Num. 341-12. Resident aliens who settle and bring up families are to share in the allotment of the land (vv. 21-23). This is an advance upon any position accorded to them elsewhere in the O.T.

CHAPTER XLVIII

1-7, 23-29. The Location of the Tribes. North of the land reserved for sanctuary, priests, Levites, city, and prince (451-8) are to dwell in parallel strips, reckoning from the north down, seven tribes—Dan, Asher, Naph-tali, Manasseh, Ephraim, Reuben, Judah; south of it, five—Benjamin, Simeon, Issachar, Zebulun, Gad.

8-22. Details as to the Sacred Reservation. Given more fully than in 451-8. The city's population is representative of all the tribes.

30-35. The Gates of the City. Each side of the city has three gates, these being named after the twelve tribes. Since Levi appears among the twelve, Manasseh and Ephraim are united under the name "Joseph." In the passage in Rev. 21, based on this passage, the Temple disappears and the glory of the gates is enhanced. A new name (v. 35) implies in Semitic thought a new corresponding character. (On the significance of the idealized city and temple of chs. 40-48, see intro., section on "The Father of Judaism," p. 715a.)

DANIEL

By PROFESSOR HERBERT L. WILLETT

INTRODUCTION

Name and Place in the Canon. The name of the book in the Hebrew Bible is the name of the hero of the book who, according to tradition, was also its author. In the English O.T. it is the last of the so-called Major Prophets; in the Hebrew Bible it is one of the Writings. In other words, in the Hebrew Bible it belongs to the third division rather than to the second, in which are found all the other prophetic books of the English Bible. Various explanations have been suggested to account for the separation of Daniel from other prophetic books. But, if the book was written subsequently to 170 B.C., as is now generally thought, this fact in itself is sufficient to explain its position among the "Writings," for the prophetic canon was fixed about 200 B.C. (see art., The Formation of the O.T., pp. 93-7).

In the LXX there are several additions to Daniel as given in the O.T., such as "The Song of the Three Holy Children" (following 323 of the Aramaic text), "The History of Susanna," and "The History of the Destruction of Bel and the Dragon" (the latter two recounting stories of which Daniel is the hero). These are ordinarily included among the apocryphal books (see art., The Inter-testamental Literature, p. 194).

Purpose of the Book. Daniel appears to have been written in the days of the bitter persecution of the Jews by Antiochus Epiphanes, king of Syria, who reigned from 175 to 164 B.C. In his efforts to compel the faithful in Jerusalem to abandon their practice of the Mosaic precepts and their worship at the Temple, he partially destroyed the city, defiled the sanctuary, and rendered the maintenance of service impossible until it was cleansed. Many Jews gave up their religion and apostatized to the pagan religion of the king. The Maccabæan movement was a patriotic effort to save the national faith. (See art., History of Hebrew People, p. 71; cf. p. 192.) Another effort was made by the author or authors of the book of Daniel. It was their endeavor to keep their fellow Jews loyal to the traditions of their fathers, even at the cost of martyrdom. They believed firmly that within a brief time (referred to often as three years and a half) the trouble would be over, the tyrant dead, and the happy age of deliverance and triumph for the Jewish people would come. In setting forth this hope and making this appeal, they employed the venerable figure of Daniel, a Jew of ancient days, either the Babylonian Exile (586-538 B.C.) or the still earlier Assyrian deportation of the ten tribes (721 B.C.). The prophet Ezekiel mentions such a man, along with Noah and Job, among the worthies of the past (Ezek. 14¹⁴ 28³).

Contents of the Book. The first half of the book, chs. 1-6, is devoted to the stories of Daniel and his three friends in the Babylonian exile, the latter, however, appearing only in chs. 1 and 3. In these narratives the courage, wisdom, and loyalty of Daniel and his fellow confessors are pointed out, as also the place of importance to which he was promoted as chief of the wise men of Babylon. He interprets King Nebuchadrezzar's dreams and predicts the destruction of the world powers, the four heathen kingdoms, and the establishment of the kingdom of the saints of the Most High, i.e., the Jewish nation.

The second section, chs. 7-12, is devoted to a series of visions witnessed and described by Daniel, in which the general ground of the dream of ch. 2 is several times traversed, and the four kingdoms—the Babylonian, the Median, the Persian, and the Macedonian or Grecian—are described in terms which leave no doubt of their object, the description and doom of the "little horn," Antiochus the tyrant. The author employs the device of having the hero of the book predict the events of the years from his own time in the past to the period in which the book was prepared, that device being explained by the sealing up of the revelation till the events predicted were about to be fulfilled. This plan of pseudepigraphic authorship and the employment of the form of prediction for the narration of history was common with the apocalyptic writers, and was a most effective means of accomplishing their purposes (see p. 188a).

Type of Literature. The book of Daniel belongs to the apocalyptic literature of the Bible, a type of writing that took form in the later periods of persecution of the Jews and Christians, from about 200 B.C. to 150 A.D. It was designed to uphold the courage of the people of God during dark days, and made use of striking forms of speech, symbolic figures and numbers, and descriptions of political events in the form of predictive language. The most distinctive examples of biblical apocalyptic are the books of Daniel and Revelation, though there is an extensive extra-biblical literature of the same nature, including Enoch, Fourth Esdras, Baruch, the Assumption of Moses, etc. Some of them were Jewish and some Christian. (For details see arts., Inter Testamental Literature, pp. 197-9, and Backgrounds, p. 843; cf. intro. to Revelation, p. 1364.)

Authorship and Date. Perhaps no book in the O.T. contains more definite indications of its date than does the book of Daniel. In view of this fact it may appear strange that there has been the widest divergence of opinion with reference to the authorship and date of the book. On the one hand, there have been many who insisted that the book was written by Daniel, the hero of the book, who was carried away from Jerusalem during the reign of Jehoiakim, and who subsequently attained a position of prominence at the court of Nebuchadrezzar and of his successors on the throne of Babylon. (The arguments commonly used to prove that Daniel is the author are outlined and criticized in Eiselen, The Psalms and Other Sacred Writings, pp. 256-263.)

At the present time scholars are generally agreed that the arguments usually brought forward to establish the claim that Daniel wrote the book are in no sense conclusive. On the other hand, they have discovered evidence of various kinds to convince them that the book is a product of the Maccabæan crisis, during the reign of Antiochus Epiphanes, who, as has been pointed out, sought to stamp out Judaism. Among the many considerations that have led scholars to this conclusion the following may be mentioned:

(1) The book is not included among the "Prophets" in the Jewish canon of the O.T., but is placed with the later collection called the "Writings."

(2) The language of the book, both the Hebrew and the Aramaic, is of a much later date than the Exile.

(3) The use of Persian and Greek words in the book suggests a date much later than the Exile.

(4) The historical surveys given in chs. 2, 7, and 11 show only vague familiarity with events belonging to the period of the Exile and the early postexilic age; they increase in accuracy and definiteness as they approach the times of the author, and culminate, in each case, with the figure and fate of the Syrian ruler.

(5) The important theological ideals and conceptions expressed in the book resemble much more closely the teaching of the Jewish writings of the second and first centuries B.C. than they do the thought of other O.T. books.

Summing up the available evidence, it would seem that all of it, without a single exception, points to a date not earlier than 300 B.C., while most of it points to a date after 200 B.C., during the reign of Antiochus Epiphanes. The exact date during that reign can, perhaps, not be determined, but there are some indications that fix it within narrow limits. Evidently the cleansing of the Temple, which took place in December, 165 B.C., was still in the future (814), as also the death of Antiochus (1145). A date between 167 and 165 B.C. would satisfy most completely all the facts in the case.

In passing, attention may be called to the fact that the book of Daniel as we have it is in two languages—the Hebrew from 1¹ to 2⁴ and from 8¹ to the end of the book; and Aramaic, a relatively late dialect of the Semitic tongue, in the middle section of the book, i.e., from the words "in Syriac" in 2⁴ (or "in Aramaic," Moffatt and Smith; cf. mg.) to 7²⁸. No wholly satisfactory reason has ever been discovered for the use of the two languages. Perhaps the author, familiar with both languages, began to work in Hebrew and changed to the more familiar Aramaic at the point where the speech of the "Chaldeans" begins, whose language was thought to have been Aramaic. (See notes on 117-20.) In ch. 7 Aramaic is continued because of the similarity of the subject matter to that of ch. 2, and in the final visions the Hebrew is resumed as more suitable for prophetic themes. (For other explanations see Eiselen, The Psalms and Other Sacred Writings, pp. 283-288.)

Teaching and Permanent Value. The purpose of Daniel, like that of other apocalyptic books, is primarily didactic. The author seeks to impress upon his readers some great religious truths, in order thereby to sustain their faith in God and in the ultimate triumph of his kingdom in the face of present disasters and persecutions.

(1) The principal idea of the book is the ultimate triumph of the kingdom of God. Earlier prophets looked with equal assurance for the establishment of the divine rule; and, like these men, the author of Daniel expected the reign of righteousness to begin in the near future. But while the Kingdom in the earlier expectation was little "more than a continuance of the existing state of society, only purged by a judgment from sin and freed from trouble," the book of Daniel marks a transition from this to the idea of a heavenly kingdom as it appears in more developed form in later apocalyptic and N.T. writings.

(2) The teaching concerning angels marks an advance in several details over the idea expressed in other parts of the O.T. (a) Here for the first time appears in definite form the doctrine of patron angels, determining the destinies of individual nations. (The angels or "princes" of Persia, Greece, and Judah are mentioned in 10¹³, 20, 21 12¹). (b) For the first time names are given to angels (Michael, the guardian angel of the Jews, 10¹³, 21 12¹, and Gabriel, a heaven-sent interpreter, 8¹⁶ 92¹). (c) Distinctions in rank among angels also appear for the first time in Daniel (10¹³ 12¹).

(3) The most definite reference to resurrection is found in 12². The general O.T. conception of life or existence after death is hazy and, on the whole, gloomy and full of despair. But here and there rays of hope appear (see Eiselen, The Christian View of the O.T., pp. 184-187; art., Religion of Israel, p. 173; cf. pp. 210-3). Sometimes the hope is expressed that Jehovah may keep his saints from entering Sheol (e.g., Psa. 168¹¹); at other times, that, though they may have to enter Sheol, they may be raised again to life (e.g., Isa. 26¹⁹). Dan. 12² adds two ideas to the earlier teaching: (a) the resurrection of the wicked, which is clearly taught here for the first time; (b) the doctrine of rewards and punishments in the after-life, though the nature of these rewards and punishments is not defined. But even with these additional elements certain limitations remain. The context makes it clear that the author does not include non-Israelites in the promise of the resurrection; and the expression "many of them that sleep in the dust" suggests that not even all the Israelites are to be raised.

The influence of Daniel has been widespread and profound. The fact that the faith of the Jewish community was kept alive through a time of deep distress was due to the combined effects of the Maccabæan revolution and the reading of this book. So much a classic did it become that even after the crisis of Syrian persecution had passed, it retained its popularity and served to prepare its readers for other emergencies in the later days, e.g., the Roman war of 68-70 A.D. Jesus quoted its familiar words in commenting on the approach of that time of fresh calamity (Mt. 24¹⁵ Mk. 13¹⁴). It has remained through the centuries one of the favorite portions of holy Scripture.

CHAPTERS 1 TO 6: EXPERIENCES OF DANIEL AND OF HIS COMPANIONS

The first six chapters of the book present narratives of the experiences of Daniel and three of his Hebrew friends at the court of Nebuchadrezzar and his successors, Belshazzar, Darius the Mede, and Cyrus the Persian. The loyalty to the law and customs of their race, the devotion and heroism shown by the four youths, were intended as an example to the Jewish people in a time of persecution, when they were being tempted to renounce their faith and embrace the heathenism of the Syrian king, Antiochus.

CHAPTER I

1, 2. Conquest of Judah by Nebuchadrezzar. Jehoiakim was a son of Josiah (639-609 B.C.) and was placed upon the throne by the king of Egypt after the brief reign of his brother, Jehoahaz (2 Kings 23³¹⁻³⁴). There is no mention elsewhere of this siege of Jerusalem, and the statement is one of the historical perplexities of the book. In Jer. 25¹, it is said that Nebuchadrezzar became king in the fourth year of Jehoiakim, and in 2 Kings 23³⁶ it is stated that the latter reigned eleven years in Jerusalem. The words of the text may rest on a mistaken combination of 2 Kings 24^{1, 2} with 2 Chr. 36^{6, 7}. Nebuchadnezzar—an incorrect spelling of "Nebuchadrezzar," the form which appears generally in Jeremiah and Ezekiel, the prophets who were contemporaries of the king. The Babylonian form of the word is Nabu-Kudurri-usur ("Nebo protect the boundaries"). Shinar (Gen. 11²) is used in the O.T. as equivalent to Babylon.

3-5. The School of the Palace. Certain youths were selected from the best families of the various subject nations and given instruction in the branches of learning that would fit them to become members of the guild of wise men, soothsayers, and interpreters of mysteries. The word Chaldeans is used in the later literature to denote the members of the body of magicians, astrologers and diviners consulted by the king at need. (See on vv. 17-20.)

6, 7. The Four Hebrews. In accordance with custom the Hebrew names of the four Jewish youths were replaced by Babylonian names. Belteshazzar and Abed-nego (an evident error for Abed-Nebo, "servant of Nebo") contain the names of Bel and Nebo, leading gods of Babylonia (Isa. 46¹).

8-13. Daniel's Request for Simple Food. The Hebrew laws restricted the diet of the people, and forbade much of the food that would be regarded as desirable among the heathen (Lev. 11, Deut. 14:3-21, notes). Daniel's request for pulse ("vegetables," v. 12, cf. mg.) instead of the king's dainties and wine, was not merely because the royal food was pleasant but because it might contain unclean ingredients (Bevan, The Book of Daniel, p. 57), or might have been offered in sacrifice to idols (Charles, Daniel, p. 10). The officers who had them in charge feared to disobey the royal order and were not sure the young men might not suffer by the use of the meager fare. But Daniel proposed a trial of ten days.

14, 15. The Successful Test. Daniel's opinion was completely justified by the experiment. There was no further difficulty in the use of vegetables. A narrative of this kind would make a strong appeal to Jews who were in danger of giving up their observance of the Mosaic law regarding food. That was the chief mark of loyalty to the customs of their fathers.

17-20. Masters of Chaldean Learning. As the result of their abstemious and devout conduct, God gave these four Hebrews unusual command of the subjects of their studies, and to Daniel in particular the mastery of the secrets of Babylonian lore, the interpretation of dreams, and the power of divination. These were the chief functions of the caste of wise men, or "Chaldeans," the title now applied to them. It had been formerly the designation of the people of Chaldea, or southeastern Babylonia, but had come to stand for the class that perpetuated the ancient mysteries of the land. At the end of their three years of training, the four were presented to the king along with the other graduates of the school, and on examination by the king, none were found so competent as they. So they became the personal attendants of Nebuchadrezzar.

21. The First Year of Cyrus. The conquest of Babylon by Cyrus the Persian occurred in 538 B.C. The actual succession of rulers in Babylon, as disclosed by records and monumental sources, was as follows: Nebuchadrezzar, 605-561 B.C.; Evil-Merodach (2 Kings 25:27), 561-559 B.C.; Neriglissar, 559-556 B.C.; Labashi-Marduk, 556-555 B.C., who was assassinated after a reign of nine months; the conspirators placed on the throne Nabu-naid, or Nabonidus, one of their own number, a native Babylonian, and unrelated to the line of Nebuchadrezzar. He ruled from 555 to 538 B.C., when Cyrus conquered the land and took the sovereignty. The succession as recorded in the book of Daniel is somewhat different. It is as follows: Nebuchadrezzar (chs. 1-4), Belshazzar (chs. 5, 7:1 8¹), Darius the Mede (5:30, 31 6:1-28 9:1 11¹), Cyrus, king of Persia (6:28 10¹). The reason for these variations from the historical order is probably to be looked for in the lack of any regular chronological system among the Hebrews, and in the length of time that had elapsed between the days of these earlier kings (605-538 B.C.) and the time in which the book was written (about 165 B.C.) The problem will be discussed more fully at the appropriate places in the following chapters.

CHAPTER II

Nebuchadrezzar's Dream and Daniel's Interpretation. Dreams were believed to be portents, significant as conveying the will of the gods, and therefore not to be disregarded. The practice of employing astrologers and diviners, whose business was the interpretation of dreams and other omens, prevailed throughout antiquity, and was still in vogue until recent years in the courts of Oriental princes. The fact that the king could not recall his dream made all the more significant the service which Daniel was able to render him.

1-3. The Royal Diviners Summoned. These were the men who had been trained to interpret dreams and give auguries. From the statements of 1:9, 20 that Daniel and his friends were the most skillful of the number it seems surprising that they were not present when the king asked for counsel. It will be noted that the word "Chaldeans" is used in its later and technical sense of magician or sorcerer.

4-6. The Forgotten Dream. With v. 4 the Aramaic section of the book begins with the words in the Syrian language (Moffatt and Smith translate "in Aramaic"). Aramaic was a Semitic dialect similar to Hebrew and was the ordinary tongue of Palestine from the third century B.C. If the diviners really had power to interpret dreams, it was not unreasonable to suppose that they could also discover the dream itself.

7-13. The Wise Men Doomed. Of course the diviners were helpless. Their profession gave them cleverness in finding meanings for dreams that could be recalled, as with modern fortune tellers. But beyond this they could not go. Their only recourse was to put off the matter till it should be forgotten, or some method devised to satisfy the king. But the mood of Nebuchadrezzar was peremptory, and the edict went forth for their execution.

14-16. Daniel's Request. As with the chief eunuch (1¹⁹), so with the captain of the guard, Daniel was on good terms, and this proved the means of securing a personal interview with the king, and of gaining time for an attempt to solve the mystery.

17-24. The Secret Revealed. Daniel at once sought the help of his three friends in prayer for light, the only means of saving their own lives as well as those of the other wise men. Their petitions were heard, the king's dream was made known to Daniel, and in overflowing gratitude he poured out his soul to God, much as did Hannah in her hymn of praise (1 Sam 2¹⁻¹⁰). It is a model prayer of thanksgiving. Prepared thus, Daniel informs Arioch that the king's decree of death is unnecessary, and that he is ready to make known the royal secret.

25-30. The Captive before the King. No time was lost. From among the humble exiles of Judah had come a master of the magicians. Instantly Daniel was taken before the king, who demanded of him, addressing him by his Babylonian name, whether he could tell him his dream and its meaning. The response of the Hebrew was that the thing asked is beyond the power of any man, even the most gifted diviner, but that there is a God who, unlike the impotent deities of Babylon, is able actually to reveal the deepest secrets; and from him had come the answer to the king's word. It had to do with the future, the long future, of the kingdom and its people, i.e., the times in which the writer of the book lived. The secret was not made known because of Daniel's superior wisdom, but through the power of God and for the comfort of the king.

31-35. The Dream. The king had seen a great figure in human form, gigantic, terrifying. The head was of gold, the breasts and arms of silver, the body of bronze, the legs of iron, and the feet of iron mixed with clay. The declining value of the materials is a token of the author's view of the growing evils in world affairs. A stone dislodged from a neighboring mountain (see v. 45) struck the image on the feet and ground it to dust, which was blown away. The stone then became a mighty rock that filled the earth.

36-45. The Interpretation. Daniel informed the king that he, Nebuchadrezzar, was represented by the head of gold. Three kingdoms would follow, presumably the Median, the Persian, and the Macedonian or Greek. This last—under the rule of Alexander the Great—would be formidable, crushing, but of variable strength, and like the legs of the image, divided, referring apparently to the two states, Syria and Egypt, nearest to Palestine, that followed the break up of Alexander's empire. They were ruled by a succession of kings, some weak, some strong (ch. 11). Alliances formed by marriage and otherwise would be futile (v. 43). At that time God, the God of the Jews, would establish his own kingdom (represented by the stone, v. 45; cf. v. 35), the rule of his people in the earth, which would supersede and destroy all these world empires and endure forever. It would not rest on military strength, but on divine power.

46-49. God Acknowledged and Daniel Honored. The king, convinced of the correctness of Daniel's disclosure and interpretation of the dream, adored the prophet, confessed that his God was supreme among the gods, and promoted Daniel to the double position of viceroy of the provinces and master of the royal astrologers. At his request the three other Hebrews were given important offices under him.

CHAPTER III

Tried by Fire. Another lesson of fidelity and courage was taught by the story of the three Hebrew friends of Daniel, who, confronted with the king's command to worship the image of gold he had set up, refused, and braved the fiery death, from which they were miraculously delivered.

1-7. The Image, the Assembly and the Mandate. It was not unusual for monarchs to set up images of themselves or their gods as tokens of their power or as objects of worship. The remarkable proportions of this image are evident. A crowd of officials of every rank, and of the mixed population of the province, was assembled for the dedication of the statue. The signal for worship announced by the herald was the blast of music from the many instruments, including the horn, pipe, lyre, trigon (a four-stringed harp), psaltery (a triangular shaped harp) and bagpipe. Three of these words are Greek—an added reason for a date long subsequent to the Exile. The threat of death by flame brought the multitude to its knees at the signal.

8-12. The Three Jews Denounced. Daniel is not mentioned in this narrative, for what reason is not stated. The Chaldeans, or members of the guild of astrologers, would naturally be jealous of the unusual honors bestowed on the four Jewish youths. They were quick to see that the king's mandate was disregarded by Shadrach, Meshach, and Abed-nego.

13-18. Before the Angry King. Nebuchadrezzar was furious at the slight put by the three men upon his idol and his command. He would give them one more chance, since they were high officers of his realm. But they needed no further time, and they made no apology. Their answer was bold and to the point. They said: "We need not waste any words in discussing this matter with you" (Smith's version). If the God they worshiped were able or willing to deliver them from the fire, he would do so. But even if not, they were resolved neither to serve the gods of Babylon nor prostrate themselves before the king's image. This is one of the noblest defiances ever uttered to a false faith (cf. Jer. 268-15 Acts 418-20 527-29).

19-23. Cast into the Furnace. The king's fury was heightened by the bold words of the three confessors. He ordered them thrown into the furnace, heated to a tremendous degree. Bound just as they were, they were seized by strong men and thrown into the flames, which were so hot the executioners themselves were overcome and perished.

24-27. The Jews Uninjured, the King Alarmed. Nebuchadnezzar, looking into the furnace, saw a portent. Four men were walking unbound and unharmed in the fire. Rising in haste and alarm, the king demanded the reason of the fourth figure in the flame, who resembled a son of the gods, i.e., a godlike being (the A.V. rendering, "the Son of God," is incorrect). Approaching the door of the furnace, he called to the martyrs to come out. When they emerged from the fire the king and his officers saw that they had suffered no injury of any sort.

28-30. The Royal Doxology and Decree. Astonished and thrilled by the miracle, the king praised the God of the Jews, affirming that the fourth figure in the furnace was an angel, sent for the deliverance of the faithful three. Further, an order was issued that no disrespectful word be spoken against this God, on pain of dire penalties. Still higher honors (cf. 249) were then conferred on the delivered confessors. Such a narrative of heroism must have done much to strengthen the spirits of the Jews who were passing through a period of dire persecution at the hands of their Syrian oppressor, Antiochus. For the nature of these persecutions, see First and Second Maccabees, passim, and Heb. 1133-38 (consult art., Inter-testamental Literature, p. 192b).

CHAPTER IV

The Dream of the Great Tree. This narrative is given in the form of a public document issued by King Nebuchadnezzar, reciting a dream of his and its interpretation by Daniel, much after the manner of ch. 2. The dream signified the malady that was to befall the king, reducing him to the state of a beast and depriving him of his throne for seven years. At the end of that period his reason was restored, and he was reestablished on his throne, whereupon he honored the King of heaven, the Most High.

1-3. The King's Proclamation. It is assumed in the narrative that Nebuchadnezzar was ruler of the whole earth, to whose people he made his declaration, praising the God of the Jews for the lesson taught him by the dream and its fulfillment, which are described in the rest of the chapter.

4-9. Impotent Diviners; a Confident King. As in the former case (21, 2), the king, terrified by his dream, summoned his wise men, whose function it was to interpret such omens. When they failed, Nebuchadnezzar turned with confidence to the man who had on that former occasion given him the answer he sought (225-45). He had named him Belteshazzar, honoring thus both his god Bel and the Jewish youth (17).

10-18. The Royal Dream. The king beheld a gigantic tree, reaching to heaven, and visible from all parts of the earth. It was beautiful and it fed and sheltered all beasts, birds, and men. (A similar representation of the Assyrian king is given in Ezek. 313-9.) Suddenly an angel descended from heaven and ordered the tree hewn down, leaving only its stump and roots in the ground. In the middle of v. 15 the figure changes abruptly (let it . . . let his) from a tree to a man—the king—confined with a metal band like a maniac, living with the beasts and like a beast, for seven years. It was to be a lesson to the ruler who thought himself the equal of God.

19-27. Daniel's Interpretation. It was not easy to make known to an autocrat like Nebuchadnezzar the sinister meaning of his dream. But encouraged by the king the prophet began by wishing its meaning might be to the royal enemies. The tree, of course, represented Nebuchadnezzar himself. On him was pronounced the doom of a seven-years' exile from his throne and from sanity, until he learned the lesson of becoming humility. The seer closed with an appeal to the king to repent and redress the wrongs he had wrought.

28-33. The Sentence Executed. The doom fell upon the king as predicted, after a year's time. In the midst of his pride he was stricken; a voice repeated his sentence, he was banished from his royal estate, and became like a beast in body and behavior. The narrative of this chapter is one of the historical perplexities of the book of Daniel. There is no record in the inscriptions or in the history of Babylonia regarding such a malady as is here described. It is probable that some popular tradition regarding Nebuchadrezzar and the conquest of his kingdom by Cyrus forms the basis of the account (Farrar, Daniel, pp. 198f.) Whatever its historical value may be, the purpose is clear. It was to teach the futility of human pride and of opposition to the will of God. He will humble those who exalt themselves in pride and oppress his people.

34-37. The King Restored. Among the most difficult features of the book of Daniel are the accounts of the acknowledgment of belief in Jehovah, the God of the Jews, by heathen kings like Nebuchadrezzar (247 328, 29 437) and Darius (625-27). Even if there be little in the way of historical evidence for such representations, the motive is clear, and the desire of a Jewish writer to include such confessions by the worshippers of other gods can easily be understood.

CHAPTER V

The Feast of Belshazzar. At a banquet given to a thousand of his lords and his harem, Belshazzar, here represented as the son and successor of Nebuchadrezzar, ordered the golden vessels, taken from the Temple at Jerusalem, to be brought and used. A hand appeared, writing upon the wall words which the wise men could not interpret. Daniel was summoned and read their meaning—that the days of Belshazzar's kingdom were numbered, and it was to be divided and given to the Medes and Persians. Daniel was rewarded, and the same night Belshazzar was slain.

1-4. Belshazzar's Impiety. The reference to this man as king is one of the historical difficulties of the book. Nebuchadrezzar had no son Belshazzar, nor was there such a king of Babylon. (See notes on 121.) Three kings related to the ruling family followed Nebuchadrezzar. Then came Nabunaid, or Nabonidus, unrelated to the royal family, and his reign was brought to an end by the conquest of the land by Cyrus the Persian in 538 B.C. Nabunaid had a son named Belshazzar, who never came to the throne, but is referred to in the inscriptions as "the king's son." Babylon surrendered to one of Cyrus' lieutenants, Gubaru (Gobryas), and the Persian soldiers entered the city without fighting. Nabunaid was taken prisoner. Later on, Cyrus entered Babylon and proclaimed peace to the city. Belshazzar, the king's son, still held out in some fortified place. But in a night assault by Gubaru he was slain. These statements are contained in the "Annalistic Tablet," the writing of a contemporary. (See Driver, Daniel, p. xxviii.) The rule passed directly from the Babylonians under Nabunaid to the Persians under Cyrus. (For dates, etc., see art., Chronology of O.T., p. 111.) But the writer of Daniel understood that the succession was from Babylonians to Medes, and from Medes to Persians. It is with his outline of history that we have to do in the book. The gold, silver, and bronze dishes and implements of the Temple were carried to Babylon after the capture of Jerusalem in 586 B.C. (2 Kings 25¹³⁻¹⁷), and were impiously used by Belshazzar in his feast.

5-9. The Mystic Hand and its Message. At the height of the revelry a hand appeared, writing words on the wall opposite the king. He was terrified, and summoned his diviners to make known the meaning of the portent. As in the earlier instances (2^{10 47}), the wise men were unable to interpret the mystery. This left the king and his guests deeply troubled.

10-12. The Queen's Wise Counsel. In this crisis the queen mother advised the king to call in Daniel, now an old man, who had served Nebuchadrezzar years before in such emergencies (225f. 418).

13-17. Daniel Before the King. When brought in the seer was questioned as to his ability to read the writing, and was promised a third part of the authority in the kingdom, with the appropriate symbols of his rank, as a reward. He declined these honors, but promised to give the interpretation of the writing.

18-24. The Lesson Unheeded. Fearlessly Daniel took the opportunity to remind Belshazzar of his father's experience (44-26), his pride, his fall, and his exile to the estate of a beast until he was ready to acknowledge the authority of the Most High. He then pointed out the arrogance and impiety of the king, and the reason for the sending of the mysterious hand.

25-28. The Writing and its Meaning. The words mene, mene, tekel, upharsin would seem to refer to three weights in common use, the "mina," the "shekel" and the "half mina." There would be little satisfaction to the diviners in such an inscription, but the words might suggest a more significant meaning, i.e., "numbered," "weighed," "divided." The two forms of the writing (vv. 25, 28) really mean the same (mg.). The Medes and the Persians were the two peoples who joined in the conquest of the Babylonian Empire, the Median soldiers having deserted Astyages their king in 549 B.C. and joined Cyrus.

29-31. Daniel Rewarded; Belshazzar Slain. The king kept his promise (see v. 16), and conferred on the seer the honors offered if he should interpret the writing. That night of revelry saw the king slain by the invaders. Of a Darius the Mede nothing is known. It would seem that the writer understood that the rule passed from the Babylonians to the Medes, and that Darius was the first king of the new dynasty. No Median kingdom is known to the historians as intervening between the Babylonian and the Persian. As for Darius, it may be that the writer had in mind Darius Hystaspes (521-486 B.C.), the father (not the son, 91) of Xerxes (Ahasuerus).

CHAPTER VI

Daniel Delivered from the Lions. In the organization of the kingdom by Darius, Daniel was made one of three chiefs, and was about to be promoted to the leading place in the realm, when the other princes, jealous of his honors, conspired to destroy him. Unwillingly, the king was compelled to sanction their evil design. But by a miracle Daniel was saved, his enemies were destroyed, and his God received the reverence of the king.

1-3. Daniel's Promotion. Already it has been recorded that the three friends of the seer were given high offices in the province (249 330) and that Daniel himself was held in special honor by Nebuchadnezzar (249), and made one of three chiefs by Belshazzar (529). Darius now planned to make him supreme. It may be that the idea of 120 satrapies, of which nothing else is known, was suggested by the 127 provinces mentioned in Esth. 11 89.

4-9. The Conspiracy Against Daniel. Filled with jealousy against the man whom the king planned to place over them, the other officials schemed to take advantage of Daniel's well-known habit of prayer, and rushed into the royal presence with their petition. This was flattering to the king's vanity, and without suspicion he signed the decree.

10-15. The Praying Prophet and the Plotting Princes. Daniel soon learned of the cabal against him, but undisturbed he continued his practice of praying thrice daily (Psa. 5517) before his open window, that faced west toward Jerusalem, the city of his God. In the same way cathedrals are built with their altars at the eastern end so that the worshiper faces Jerusalem (Psa. 57), and the Mohammedan prays with his face toward Mecca. Finding themselves baffled, the plotters rushed again to the king with their accusation, and demanded that the penalty be enforced. Though alarmed for Daniel's safety, the king was bound by the edict.

16-27. Thrown to the Lions, but Saved. The sentence was carried out, to the grief of Darius, who passed the night in deep anxiety. Early in the morning he hurried to the lion pit, and called to Daniel in a distressed voice to know if he was safe. The prophet answered that he was. So he was taken unhurt from the den and the conspirators were punished with the same fate they had prepared for him.

25-28. The King's Decree. As in the former instances (329 41), the royal reverence for the God of Daniel is registered in an edict to all the people of the realm. Cyrus the Persian (see on 121) is understood by the writer to have followed the Median Darius.

CHAPTERS 7 TO 12: VISIONS OF DANIEL

The second half of the book (chs. 7-12) is of much greater importance in the thought of the author than the first (chs. 1-6). The first part narrated the experiences of Daniel and his three friends as a series of exhortations to constancy and courage. The second half relates a series of visions in which Daniel is made to predict the events of the period from his own day to that of the writer of the book, nearly four hundred years. The purpose was to teach that God has a program of history which cannot be thwarted and which he can make known to his servants. The recital of past events, familiar to the readers, would give them confidence that the short future regarding which actual predictions are made could likewise be trusted. The two sections of the book are held together by the striking similarity—indeed, the practical identity—of chs. 2 and 7, the story of the four world kingdoms, ending in the triumph of the kingdom of God.

CHAPTER VII

1-8. Daniel's Vision of the Four Beasts. The first year of Belshazzar takes the reader back to a time earlier than the events described in ch. 5. Out of the sea, symbol of the agitated world of mankind, four different beasts came up. The first was a lion with vulture wings, strong and swift, but soon changed to a human form and character. This referred, of course, to the Babylonian kingdom and its great ruler Nebuchadnezzar, and corresponds to the gold head of 232, 38. The second beast was like a bear, fierce but less swift, with three ribs in its mouth, denoting conquered nations. Like the breast and arms of silver of the image (232, 39), it represented probably the Median kingdom, which, as the author understood, followed the Babylonian (531). The third beast was like a leopard, with four wings and four heads, swift of movement, and facing all quarters in its victorious career. This would point to the Persian rule, symbolized by the bronze of the image (232), its first king being Cyrus the Great (121 628). But the fourth beast was far more terrible, hardly to be pictured save in imagination (cf. v. 19). It had ten horns, among which another came up, small, but uprooting three of the ten, and having eyes that saw and a mouth that spoke. This non-descript beast seems to represent the Macedonian or Greek kingdom of Alexander with the kings who succeeded him, culminating in Antiochus Epiphanes, the Syrian persecutor (175–164 B.C.). It corresponds to the iron legs of the image (233), the two kingdoms of Syria and Egypt. Of the governments into which Alexander's kingdom was broken up, these two were nearest to Palestine. The little horn of this vision and that of 89 unmistakably signify Antiochus, whose impious and cruel deeds filled the Jews with terror in this period (see notes on 89–12).

9–12. The Judgment. Suddenly the scene changed. Seats for a court were placed, and an aged judge with white raiment and hair took his place. This was the divine court with God as the Judge. Multitudes attended and the books of record were opened. Judgment was pronounced upon the fourth beast, and it was destroyed by fire. The other beasts lost their dominion, though their people still survived. Thus the vision pointed out the divine condemnation of the rule from which arose the persecuting tyrant.

13, 14. The Human Figure. While the seer looked on, one came with clouds like a son of man, a human being, contrasted with the beasts. He was brought to the aged judge, and the power and authority that had formerly belonged to the various kingdoms represented by the beasts were given to him as an enduring and world-wide rule. This figure, as is clearly shown in vv. 18, 22, represents the saints of God, i.e., the ideal and purified Jewish race, with whose fortunes the author was alone concerned. For a later application of the term, see p. 846.

15–28. The Interpretation. Daniel was worried by his vision. Of an angel who stood near he asked the meaning of what he had seen. The answer was clear: The four beasts represented four kings, the heads of four kingdoms. But it is to the saints of God, the holy race, that the enduring power shall be given. As to the fourth beast, it is here described more fully as a ferocious and persecuting power, making war against the chosen people until God interfered and judgment was rendered in favor of the harassed people. The Babylonian, Median and Persian kingdoms would be followed by the Greek, which would thresh the nations and master all the earth. A succession of kings would arise, ten in number, either actual or symbolical of the Syrian dynasty. But one in particular, Antiochus Epiphanes, making his way to the throne at the expense of three others, would be the arch enemy of God and his people, ruling regardless of law or right, and succeeding for a brief time—three years and a half. Then would come the end of his arrogant and devastating rule. To the holy people the dominion would be given, for the kingdom belongs to God and his saints. With this the angel's explanation ceased. But naturally the seer was greatly disturbed. The device of the writer of the book is skillful and effective. By making Daniel, the ancient seer, predict a series of events which all knew to have taken place, he was able to encourage his readers to wait a little longer for the end of the tyrant's career, when the dark days would be over, and the time of peace and victory for the Jewish people would be ushered in. This is made still more evident in the next chapter.

The earlier commentaries of Daniel understood the fourth kingdom to be Rome, for the reason that the expression son of man (v. 13) was believed to refer to Jesus Christ. But it is evident from the repeated identifications of this human figure with the saints of the Most High (vv. 18, 22, 25, 27) that it is not the Messiah, but the new Jewish state which is meant. The apocalypse is a Jewish and not a Christian message.

CHAPTER VIII

The Ram and the Goat. In this chapter a shorter period of time is covered, the first or Babylonian section being omitted; but the same device of prediction is employed, animal figures are used, and the same objective is reached—the outrageous conduct of Antiochus Epiphanes, and his impending fall.

1–8. Daniel's Vision of the Ram and the Goat. This scene is placed in the third year of Belshazzar, two years after that of ch. 7. The prophet was at Susa (Shushan), the capital of Elam, one of the chief residences of the Persian kings (Neh. 11 Esth. 12). He saw a ram, the symbol of the Medo-Persian power, standing beside the river. It had two horns, both high, but one higher than the other, and the higher came up last (or "behind the other," Smith's version). The shorter horn represented the Median king or kingdom and the longer one the Persian (see v. 20). While the ram was pushing his way resistlessly farther and farther, a goat with one horn suddenly appeared from the west, i.e., from Europe, and with incredible speed hurled himself upon the ram, overthrowing him and breaking his horns. This is the description of Alexander's rapid and victorious career, coming out of Greece, and overthrowing completely the Persian Empire (334-323 B.C.). But at the climax of his power the horn was broken and four horns came up in its place. Students of history recognize at once the meaning of this part of the vision. Alexander, having conquered the world of his day, died in his early manhood, sighing for other worlds to conquer. There being no son who could succeed him, his empire fell to four of his generals, Cassander (Macedonia), Lysimachus (Thrace), Seleucus (Syria and the East) and Ptolemy (Egypt).

9-12. The Little Horn. From one of these four, Seleucus of Syria (312-280 B.C.), arose at length Antiochus IV (175-164 B.C.), called Epiphanes, "the manifest," or "evident," i.e., the god, arrogating to himself, after the manner of Alexander, the attributes of deity. But so erratic and violent was his conduct at times that he was given, especially by the Jews, the nickname of Epimanes, the "madman," or "madcap." He was the eighth of the Syrian line. His ambitions were the conquest of Egypt, the rival kingdom to the south, and the submission of all the peoples of his realm to the Greek religion. In this plan he met resistance from the loyal Jews in Palestine, the glorious land (v. 9). The author writes that in his pride Antiochus thought himself capable of plucking the stars from their places, he defied God himself, he defiled the Temple at Jerusalem and caused the suspension of its services for more than three years (1 Macc. 120-50 444-61), i.e., from 168 to 165 B.C. During this unhappy time the faithful Jews were subjected to great hardships and their rights of worship were suppressed. The final sacrilege was the erection of a heathen altar, and probably also a statue of Zeus, upon the altar of burnt-offering (1 Macc. 154). This was the horrible thing that necessitated the cessation of all use of the shrine till it could be purified. It was the abomination that made desolate the holy place (v. 13; cf. 927).

13, 14. Length of the Evil Time. The seer heard two angels conversing. One asked the other how long the desecration of the sanctuary was to continue. The answer was twenty-three hundred evening-mornings, or eleven hundred and fifty days, a little less than the three years and a half (1,260 days) usually designated as the time of affliction (725 127 Rev. 12¹⁴).

15-27. The Interpretation. As in former instances (716), the meaning of the vision was made clear to Daniel by an angel. This proved to be the angel Gabriel, also named as a messenger of God in 921, 22 and Luke 119. Roused from a swoon of terror, the seer was told that the vision referred to the end of the age, a long time in the future, i.e., the time of the persecution by Antiochus, and the triumph of the Jewish nation that was to follow. Then the various features of the vision were explained in language so explicit that no one could mistake it. Three of the four kingdoms of ch. 2 and ch. 7 were meant by the two horns of the ram and the he goat. They were Media-Persia and Greece or Macedonia. Alexander and his weaker successors were symbolized by the horns of vv. 21, 22. Much later, toward the end of this Greco-Syrian dynasty, would arise the king represented by the little horn (see v. 9; cf. 78, 11, 20, 24-26). He is described as defiant, designing, crafty, destructive, boastful and prosperous, against the holy people and even their God. Up to this point the career of Antiochus, familiar to the author, has been sketched. The rest is prediction, based on unwavering confidence that God will deal with the persecutor as he deserves. His success was only for a time. Suddenly he was to be cut off by divine visitation (vv. 23-25). Antiochus died on an expedition in Persia in 164 B.C. The seer was told that the vision was not to be revealed. This would account for the fact that it had been unknown all the years since the life of Daniel, and had been only just disclosed in the author's day. This was a favorite device of apocalyptic writers (Enoch 12 104¹³ etc.; see further art., Intertestamental Literature, pp. 188-9). So alarming did the disclosure seem to the seer that he was ill for some days, and never quite understood it (vv. 26, 27).

CHAPTER IX

The Seventy Weeks. In the prophetic book of Jeremiah, who preached in the last days of Judah and into the Babylonian Exile (i.e., from about 625 to 575 B.C.), references are made to seventy years during which the Jews were to be in exile, at the end of which period they were to be restored to their land (Jer. 25^{11, 12} 29¹⁰ 30¹⁸ 31³⁸⁻⁴⁰). The author of Daniel, living in the days of Antiochus Epiphanes (175-164 B.C.), was troubled by the fact that no such restoration had occurred as the prophet had predicted, though more than four centuries had passed. It was his purpose to show that it was not seventy years that were meant by Jeremiah, but seventy weeks of years, or 490 years. That would place the date of fulfillment in his own days or later, and safeguard the prediction of Jeremiah from the appearance of failure. The author's scheme of years is not very definite, for the Jews had no exact system of chronology till they came under the Syrian authority in the third century B.C. In fact, of the many that have been proposed, no explanation of the seventy weeks has ever fitted accurately the chronology of the period as it is known to historians. The writer was using the best information he had, but his figures are general rather than precise. His purpose is evident, however. It was to show that the fulfillment of Jeremiah's prophecy was to be expected in his own age, the age of Antiochus, and not in the past at the end of seventy years from the time when the prophet spoke. To do this he divides the seventy weeks of years into three sections, the first of seven weeks of years, or forty-nine years; the second of sixty-two weeks, or 434 years; the third of one week, seven years, half of which (three and one half) is already past; another like period (three and one half years) will see the end of persecution, the fall of Antiochus, and the beginning of the time of hope and happiness for the Jewish race.

1, 2. Daniel's Study of Jeremiah's Prophecy.

This angelic communication to the seer is placed in the first year of Darius the Mede, whose reign is represented as following that of Belshazzar (530 61. 28, notes). The books here referred to are the writings of the prophets, which together with the books of Moses (Genesis-Deuteronomy) already formed a collection, or canon of sacred writings, in the second century B.C. (Ecclus. 11, and cf. p. 95a; for the passages in Jeremiah, see introductory paragraphs to this chapter.) Seventy was less a specific than a general number among the Jews, much as a hundred is with us.

3-19. Daniel's Prayer of Confession and Entreaty. It was a prayer for light upon the perplexing problem of the nation's continued failure to achieve its destiny of restoration and service. The causes for this lay in the sins of the past, and of these sins Daniel makes humble confession on behalf of his people. They had merited the curse uttered long ago by Moses (Deut. 28¹⁵⁻¹⁹). Yet in spite of these offenses, the seer pleads for Judah, that God may restore his favor to Jerusalem and the sanctuary. With passionate and pathetic fervor he prays for the renewal of Zion's ancient glory.

20-23. The Angel's Comforting Words. Two angels are named in the book, Gabriel, the divine messenger (81⁶, and evidently also the speaker in 10^{5, 6}; see also Luke 12⁶), and Michael, the heavenly champion of Israel (10^{13, 21} 12¹). The former came close to the seer, charged with a message of comfort for him, as beloved of God and worthy of an answer to his perplexity.

24-27. Seventy Weeks of Years. Now comes the interpretation of Jeremiah's prophecy regarding the seventy years. Seventy weeks of years, i.e., 490 years, are assigned as the time for the ushering in of the new age of peace and the consecration of the holy place. From the day when Jeremiah announced the future restoration of Jerusalem, i.e., from 586 B.C., to an anointed one, a prince, i.e., Cyrus the Great (538 B.C.) would be seven weeks, i.e., forty-nine years. This was the date of the formal close of the Exile by the decree of Cyrus, forty-eight years from the destruction of the holy city. There would follow sixty-two weeks (434 years) during which Jerusalem was to be rebuilt with streets and open spaces, but not without experiencing many troubles. At the end of that time an anointed one is to be cut off and deprived of all he has. This seems to refer to the deposition and murder of the beloved and honored high priest, Onias III, an event not mentioned specifically in the O.T., but of very great significance to the Jews of the time (2 Macc. 31. 31-40 47f. 23f.).

This is not a reference to the Messiah of the N.T., as some of the early translations would seem to imply. The application is not to our Lord, but to an O.T. crisis and a martyred priest. The prince that was to come with an armed force to devastate the city and pollute the Temple is Antiochus Epiphanes, but his end was inevitable. He would be swept away as with a flood. To the end of the final week, seven years, his warfare against the holy people would continue. With the help of apostate Jews he would work his will. Half way through that week he would cause the discontinuance of the Temple services. In the place of the holy sacrifices, i.e., on the altar of burnt-offering, would be set up the abominable pagan altar, so appalling to pious Jews that the place had to be abandoned until purified. At the end the destined doom would be poured out upon the desolator (i.e., Antiochus, or the heathen altar). Thus the vision reaches the same object as in the former chapters, namely, the detestable conduct of the Syrian king, and his providential overthrow.

It is easy to see that the numbers employed in the vision (i.e., sixty-two week-years, 434 years) do not fit the facts of history. Neither does any other scheme that has been proposed by the commentators. The writer's chronology is too uncertain to be squared with the events of those centuries as they are now known to the student of history. But the purpose is sufficiently clear, the certainty that the reign of terror instituted by Antiochus was soon to cease, and the blessed consummation was soon to be ushered in. The impression produced by these references to the persecution and these predictions of its end must have been profound. They were not forgotten in later crises, like the Roman siege of Jerusalem, in anticipation of which our Lord quoted the words of the book of Daniel, with their fresh application to the impending tragedy (Mt. 24¹⁵ Mk. 13¹⁴, notes).

CHAPTER X

The Struggle of the Kingdoms. The final vision is found in the last three chapters of the book. For three weeks the seer had been fasting. He was then confronted by a celestial being of transcendent brilliance, the sight of whom overwhelmed him. Roused from his stupor, he was told of angelic contests in which the fortunes of the holy people were at stake. Then there was given him a long and detailed recital of events from the times of Cyrus the Great to those of Antiochus Epiphanes, who is the objective in every one of the dreams and visions. This recital is given in the form of a supposed prediction, after the manner of all apocalypses. In the earlier portion it is rapid and general. As it approaches the author's own time, the period of Antiochus, it becomes more precise and vivid. But as it comes to the actual time when the book was written, and seeks to portray the last days and downfall of the oppressor, it takes on again a more vague and uncertain form. This is the actually predictive portion of the vision. The details are obscure because unknown to the seer, but the central fact, the divine judgment on the foe of the sacred people, is made perfectly clear. Then comes the end of the age, marked by portents, and the resurrection of the Jewish race, some of them good and some evil. The revelation thus made is to be kept secret till the end of the age—i.e., of Antiochus—approaches. That end was to come a little less than three years and a half (1,260 days) from the desecration of the Temple. Happy would they be who survived to the new age of Jewish triumph, the Messianic time beyond.

1-9. The Heavenly Messenger. This vision in the third year of Cyrus follows appropriately that of 9^{1f}. in the reign of Darius, according to the author's understanding of the history (6²⁸). It had to do with a period of difficulty and hardship that was to follow the days of Daniel. In his anxiety about his people and the coming time of trouble he fasted for three weeks. Then by the banks of the Tigris came the vision of the shining herald from heaven whose appearance and words struck down the seer in terror.

10-21. Celestial Struggles. Roused by the angel's friendly touch, Daniel was told that he was to be informed of the future, in accordance with his anxious desire. The angel guardian of Persia, one of the hostile nations, had sought to prevent the revelation to the seer, but Michael, the angel champion of the holy people, had come to assist the messenger, who was therefore no longer detained there, but had come to enlighten Daniel. The idea of angel guardians for the different nations is hinted in earlier portions of the O.T. (Psa. 82¹ Isa. 24²¹), and is plainly set forth in this book of Daniel (10¹³, 20, 21 11¹ 12¹; see also intro., section on "Teaching and Permanent Value"). The vision to be disclosed by the angel pertained to events of the distant future, i.e., the times of Antiochus. Prostrated afresh by these experiences, Daniel is strengthened by another angel who seeks to reassure him, and thus encouraged, he waits for the revelation. The angel herald, before giving his message, adds a further word regarding the events mentioned in v. 13. He says that as soon as he has given his disclosure to Daniel he must return to his conflict with the hostile angels of Persia and Greece in which he and Michael are engaged. As far back as the first year of Darius the Mede he had come to Michael's aid in defense of the fortunes of Israel.

CHAPTER XI

1-4. Xerxes and Alexander. It is too bad that the chapter division and v. 1 interrupt the thought. In v. 2 the vision proceeds. Three Persian kings, Cambyses (529-522 B.C.), Gaumata (7 months), and Darius Hystaspis (522-485) are to follow Cyrus (538-529), the reigning king (10¹). Then will come a fourth, Xerxes (485-465), whose great expedition against Greece ended in disaster at Salamis (480 B.C.). Next in this list comes Alexander (336-323), the conqueror of Persia, whose brief career is to be followed by the break-up of his empire and its division among his four generals and others (see notes on 8¹⁻⁸).

5-20. Kings of Syria and Egypt. Attention is now fixed upon the two kingdoms nearest Palestine, namely Syria and Egypt, whose capitals were Antioch and Alexandria. The characters described but unnamed in these verses are easily identified by the student of history. The story is too long to be told here, but it is easy to understand that the fortunes of Palestine and the Jewish people were profoundly affected by the struggles between the two neighboring kingdoms to the north and the south, each of which claimed the right of sovereignty over them. These verses give in vivid form the leading features of the reigns of the seven kings of Syria, from Seleucus I

(312–280 B.C.) to Antiochus Epiphanes (175–164), and of the ten kings of Egypt, from Ptolemy Soter (322–285) to Ptolemy Philometer (164–146; for these kings, see art., Chronology of O.T., p. 112). In a general way these rulers are symbolized by the ten toes of the image in 24², 43 and the ten horns of the beast in 7⁷, 20, 24. The facts were apparently well known to the writer of Daniel, and contrast in their dramatic character and detail with the less definite and exact features of the earlier period (vv. 2–4). For the historical facts forming the basis of this recital, see Farrar, Book of Daniel, pp. 299–318; Bevan, Book of Daniel, pp. 171–200; Driver, Daniel, pp. 163–199; Charles, Daniel, pp. 118–138; Montgomery, Daniel, pp. 420–467.

21–39. The Career of Antiochus Epiphanes. With these verses the author comes to his main subject, the tyrant who is in his very day carrying on his campaign of impiety and persecution. There are given at length the facts of his reign in the customary guise of prediction—his rise through intrigue, his success in war, his deposition and destruction of Onias III, the Jewish priest-prince, his treachery, his gigantic bribes, his first successful expedition against Egypt, his insincerity in dealing with his nephew, the defeated Ptolemy Philometer, and his return with great spoil from this first phase of his southern campaign. Already the hostile attitude of Antiochus had been shown toward the faithful Jews in Palestine, but after his mortifying treatment by the Roman legates who, arriving in ships from the west, ordered him to withdraw from Egypt which he had again invaded, he appears to have vented his rage on the Jews and their religion. In this he used such apostates as had yielded to his flatteries and bribes and abandoned their national faith. It was at this time that the forces sent by him attacked Jerusalem, defiled the Temple, set a Syrian garrison over it, and erected the crowning infamy, the heathen altar, which rendered the ritual sacrifice impossible. This was the devastating outrage, the abomination that made desolate the house of God. (The story is told in 1 Macc. 1; cf. ch. 6.)

In spite of the most violent acts of persecution, great numbers of the Jews gave evidence of their invincible faith, even to the point of martyrdom. Of these facts the books of Maccabees are the eloquent record. In this hour of need arose the romantic and successful revolution of the Maccabees, which for a brilliant moment rescued the nation from foreign oppression. Probably the author of Daniel did not expect much from this enterprise, for he speaks of it somewhat slightly as a little help (v. 34). But it was the means at last of breaking the Syrian power in Palestine. The remainder of this paragraph sets forth still further the monstrous arrogance of the king, his self-exaltation to godhead, his disregard of all gods but Jupiter, the god of strongholds, and his assignment of honors and rewards to his partisans.

40–45. The Time of the End. The author now comes to the moment when he is to describe the final stage in the career of the Syrian king. Up to this time he has followed with measurable accuracy the facts of recent history. Now he undertakes to predict the end of the drama. Of one thing he is perfectly certain—the tyrant is soon to fall. In this his prophetic vision is not at fault. But the details are quite different from the closing events of Antiochus' reign. Of such events as are related here there is no record. The king died not in Palestine, but in Persia.

CHAPTER XII

Final Words. At the end of the age, the time of the downfall of the evil king, Michael, the angel who defends the holy people, will be needed, for a period of bitter trouble will come. But the faithful, whose names are written in the book (see 7¹⁰), shall be delivered. There shall be a resurrection of many (v. 2), presumably Jews, to an enduring experience either of joy or of sorrow. In all probability the resurrection experience is expected to come to only some of the Jews, the martyrs who had given their lives for the faith—these are to be rewarded in the after life; and the apostates who betrayed the faith—these will receive the punishment they deserve. (See intro., section on "Teaching and Permanent Value".) In that time the wise and the righteous shall shine like stars (v. 3). But the words of the prediction must not be disclosed till their fulfillment approaches. Two angels were standing by the river. One of them asked the angel clothed in white how long it would be until the time of the end. The answer was given with assurance that it would be three years and a half. As soon as the tyrant was destroyed, all would be over (vv. 5–7). Wishing to know more of the matter, Daniel made further inquiry. He was told to let the matter rest. It was enough to know that from the date of the desecration of the Temple to the expected end would be somewhat more than three and a half years (1,290 days). Happy would be the ones who lived through that time, and survived till the days of glory (1,335 days). But Daniel was to depart and rest in the grave till the time of the consummation (vv. 8–13).

HOSEA

BY PRINCIPAL H. WHEELER ROBINSON

INTRODUCTION

The Prophet. Hosea ranks with Jeremiah as the most human of the prophets, which explains why he, like his spiritual kinsman, knows so much of the divine secret—the deathless love of God for man. The tragedy of the prophet's home life was the spring of his prophetic message, and perhaps of his prophetic activity. Like Longfellow's "Gasper Becerra," he carved his masterpiece from the brand that burned in the fire on his domestic hearth:—

"O thou sculptor, painter, poet!

Take this lesson to thy heart:

That is best which lieth nearest;

Shape from that thy work of art."

His book forms a fitting sequel to that of Amos, following it in time-order, and enlarging its teaching; and the introduction to that book (p. 775) should be read for a picture of the social and religious background of Hosea's prophecies. The brief prophetic activity of Amos may have belonged to any one year of the decade 760-750 B.C.; that of Hosea began toward the close of the reign of Jeroboam II, i.e., some time before 743, and extended over the next decade or more of Israel's history.

Hosea and Amos. Like Amos, Hosea addressed the Northern Kingdom; unlike Amos, Hosea himself belongs to the people he addresses (7⁵); he is, in fact, the only prophet belonging to the Northern Kingdom whose ministry has left a clear literary monument. As we compare his testimony with that of his predecessor, we cannot miss its characteristic differences, even when Hosea is dealing with the same evils as Amos. There is a changed emphasis, springing not so much from changed conditions (though these were not wanting) as from a difference of temperament, character, and personal fortunes between the two men. Amos dwelt on social evils, and incidentally described the abuses of the religion practiced in Jehovah's name at the high places. Hosea also insists on right conduct toward other men as essential to the true worship of Jehovah (41-6 6⁸ 10¹²), but he says far more about the immorality, actual and figurative, of the contemporary worship, and his chief emphasis falls on the idea of religion as a right inward relation to God.

We might say that Amos presents religion in terms of morality, while Hosea presents morality in terms of religion. There can be no question as to which is the higher conception. Schleiermacher, in a metaphor drawn from music, has finely suggested the true relation between morality and religion. "A man's special calling," he says, "is the melody of his life, and it remains a simple, meager series of notes unless religion, with its endlessly rich variety, accompany it with all notes, and raise the simple song to a full-voiced, glorious harmony." The melody of Amos was harmonized by Hosea. This must be our sufficient compensation for the undoubted fact that Hosea is the most difficult of all the prophets to understand, because of his wealth of allusive imagery, his swift emotional transitions, and the frequent and deep-seated corruption of the text.

The Historical Background. Hosea in the north, like Jeremiah (later) in the south, interprets and justifies the decline and fall of a kingdom. His allusions to contemporary events confirm the testimony of the Second Book of Kings (ch. 15) that the period after the death of Jeroboam II, 743 B.C., was one of anarchy and social disorder. Zechariah, his son, after reigning for six months, was killed through a conspiracy promoted by Shallum, who succeeded him. But Shallum's reign was even briefer than his victim's, for he was slain by another usurper, Menahem, after a single month's reign. Menahem managed to keep on the throne for ten years, probably because he secured the support of Assyria by a heavy tribute. His son, Pekahiah, after two years, was overthrown by one of his military underlings, Pekah. This man, being anti-Assyrian in his policy, speedily suffered the loss of the northern part of his kingdom, and the deportation of its inhabitants. He was killed by Hoshea, an Assyrian protégé, who was allowed to rule until his rebellion against Assyria ended in the overthrow of the Northern Kingdom (722 or 721 B.C.).

This bewildering succession of plots and murders, bringing six men to the throne within a score of years, is reflected in Hosea's prophecies (7⁷ 8⁴ 13¹⁰, 11). Hosea abhorred the political scheming and the unprincipled alliances which were being sought with Assyria on the one hand, and with Egypt on the other (7¹¹ 10⁴ 12¹). In the noble confession outlined for a truly penitent Israel in the closing chapter, one line is significant of this; Israel will say at long last, "Assyria shall not save us." Such a renunciation of worldly policy is as vital, from the prophet's standpoint, as the words, "What have I to do any more with idols?"

Religious and Political Apostasy. Hosea's historical perspective is longer than that of Amos. Israel's political paralysis in both domestic and foreign relations is traced back to those deeds of blood in Jezreel through which the dynasty of Jehu, with the approval of Elisha, mounted the throne. Before Jeroboam's death, and the beginning of the times of anarchy, Hosea calls his first-born child "Jezreel," as a sign that Jehovah "will avenge the blood of Jezreel upon the house of Jehu, and will cause the kingdom of the house of Israel to cease . . . and will break the bow of Israel in the valley of Jezreel" (14, 5). With a similar instinct for dramatic symbolism, characteristic of Hebrew prophecy, he calls his second child "Uncompassionated," and his third, "Not my people." By these names he is expressing Israel's alienation from Jehovah, the result of its past and present history. In more extended form, he describes it under the metaphor of a wife's infidelity to her husband. This is, indeed, the dominating figure of his book, and it became the classical expression for the prophetic condemnation of the popular religion. Like the naming of Hosea's children, the figure is closely connected with his family life. We must not think that when Hosea married his wife, she was already dishonored. (The marriage of Hosea is discussed fully in Eiselen, The Prophetic Books of the O.T., vol. ii, pp. 373-377.) The prophetic way of stating consequences is often to read them back into the events from which they issued, and to speak of the seed as if it were the flower. The seven years covered by the first chapter of the book began in a normal marriage. But when Hosea's wife became unfaithful to him he saw a divine significance in the whole course of events. (See introduction to Amos, p. 776).

The Divine Love. His undestroyed love for the woman who had left him not only inspired Hosea to seek her out and to reclaim her, but it enabled him to enter into the very heart of God. Did not Jehovah feel toward Israel as Hosea himself felt toward Gomer? Was there not the same commingling of righteous indignation and compassionate pity? Was not Jehovah's love for his bride, Israel, at once her condemnation and her ultimate ground of hope? Thus does Hosea enrich the old idea of a marriage between a god and his people with a profound moral content. This is the contribution to the theology of the O.T. which Hosea was enabled to make from his own bitter experience; it is this which creates the depth and atmosphere of the picture he paints. Through the conspiracies of the capital city, the immorality and externalism of the worship at the high places, the idolatry which he seems to be the first to attack, the unkindness and deceit and violence of common life, we catch glimpses of God, pleading and expostulating with all the warmth of that passionate human heart which the prophet lent to its Maker (cf. especially 6⁴ 11⁸, 9).

Punishment and Restoration. Thus Hosea conceived the relation between Jehovah and Israel to be much closer than did Amos, as the predominant figure of marriage itself suggests. Amos looks around the whole horizon, and sees the God of righteousness active among the surrounding peoples as well as in Israel. Hosea looks up and sees the God of love, Israel's Saviour from the beginning (13⁴). This does not mean that Jehovah will not punish the infidelity of his people; the contemplated penalty is exile to Egypt or Assyria (9³ 11⁵, 6). But Hosea is much more definite than Amos in his hope, or rather, his confidence, of the outcome, which will be the victory of God's patient and persistent love, in a new and spiritual betrothal (21⁹, 20). The too facile penitence of those who lightly said, "Come and let us return unto the Lord" (6¹) will be followed by that deeper repentance, when Israel shall ask for the removal of its sinful spirit, shall repudiate its worldly expediencies and confidence in the instruments of war, and shall have no more to do with the idols its hands have fashioned. In that day it will humbly confess, as the result of its discipline and chastisement, "In thee the fatherless findeth mercy" (14³). The words recall that other great figure of Hosea's experience, for he was a father as well as a husband—the figure of the Fatherhood of the God who called his son Israel out of the captivity of Egypt, and taught the little feet to walk, until the wearied child had to be picked up in the strong arms of the father (11¹¹).

The primary evil in Israel's relation to Jehovah is the sinful spirit (41² 54), not those external acts which are its result. This is what underlies the worship of Jehovah as a mere Baal, the local giver of fertility, and inspires all the evils which cluster round the worship of God on the Canaanite high places—the sexual immorality (41³), the superstition (41²), the futile formalism (56 81³), the use of material images (84 105 132), the vested interests of unworthy priests (48). "Because Ephraim hath multiplied altars to sin, altars have been unto him to sin" (811). So Hosea anticipates the day when "the thorn and the thistle shall come up on their altars" (108), a visible token of penalty, but destined to open a new chapter of history in which that evil past is left behind. The only Baal or "lord" worshiped on and around these altars in Hosea's day was Jehovah; yet the worship was utterly alien from him, for it belonged to that religion of "nature" which is always and everywhere at issue with the religion of "spirit." In the new day all alien elements will disappear—worship will be restored to its pristine purity and will be inspired by a deep sense of the abiding presence of God.

The Book of Hosea. The book falls into two distinct, but closely related, parts. The first three chapters contain the life-story of the prophet, the second chapter being a sermon-poem on the metaphor it has suggested. The remaining eleven chapters contain detached oracle-poems, in which the same ideas of infidelity and penalty constantly recur, without sensible progress, except that the book culminates in a confession of sin and a promise of divine grace. In the brief commentary that follows, only a few of the evident corruptions of the text can be indicated, and none of them can be fully discussed.

Until very recent times the book in its present form was commonly ascribed to the prophet whose name it bears; few, if any, passages were questioned as later additions or interpolations. However, with the advance in critical scholarship an increasing number of passages have come to be questioned. The alleged secondary elements, apart from words and sentences of minor importance, may be grouped as follows: (1) References to Judah; (2) passages picturing the glories of the future; (3) "phrases and sentences of a technical archaeological or historical character, inserted by way of expansion or explanation"; (4) miscellaneous glosses and interpolations for which no special motive may be discovered. The complexity of the problem makes it impossible to deal with it in the limited space available here (see for a detailed discussion, Eiselen, The Prophetic Books, vol. ii, pp. 357-365). Here it may be sufficient to say that while the book is not entirely free from later interpolations (see comments below), the later elements are by no means as numerous as some recent writers seem to think. Moreover, the later additions do not modify in any fundamental way the teaching of the prophet Hosea.

CHAPTER I

1. Title. The heading, which is probably a late editorial addition, dates a northern prophecy by a northern prophet under (1) four southern kings, covering 789-693 B.C. as maximum, and 740-720 as minimum; (2) one northern king (782-746). The contents enable us to fix the date fairly accurately. The first three chapters suggest the latter part of Jeroboam's reign, while the rest of the book reflects the disorder of the next decade. There seems to be no reference to the Syro-Ephraimitic war and the capture of Gilead by the Assyrians in 734, so that we may take 750-735 B.C. as Hosea's prophetic period. Nothing is known of him beyond the facts that may be learned from the book.

2-9. Israel's Infidelity Like Gomer's. When Hosea looked back on the earlier years of his marriage, knowing that the wife he had married in love and trust had proved unfaithful to him, and when, further, he had seen how like his marriage was to the relation of Jehovah and Israel, he relates his experience as if it were all known and interpreted to him from the beginning, just as a traveler writes up his day-by-day record in the light of the whole journey when completed. Thus Hosea makes the prophetic impulse (in part perhaps a product of this experience) to begin with his marriage, when in fact those events did begin which he subsequently re-interpreted by "prophetic symbolism."

He calls his first-born "Jezreel" in memory of the scene of Jehu's bloody massacre (2 Kings 9, 10), in requital for which Jehu's dynasty, and with it the Northern Kingdom, will cease to be. As a matter of fact, the kingdom survived the dynasty, which ended with Zechariah, its fifth representative, the son of Jeroboam; but the six kings between 743 and 721 B.C. had a precarious tenure of the throne. The bow (v. 5), i.e., the power, of Israel is to be broken (by Assyria) in the place of the century-old massacre (as might well have happened, since the plain of Jezreel is a natural battlefield). The second child is called "Uncompassionated," to express Israel's position in the eyes of Jehovah. (A contrast with Judah, perhaps added after the escape from Senacherib in 701 B.C., is drawn in v. 7). The third child is called "Not my people," to the same effect. Weaning (v. 8) might be deferred for three years (2 Macc. 7²⁷), so that the events of this chapter would cover about seven years of Hosea's life. Its continuation is described in 31-3.

10, 11. The Reversal of the Judgment. (See also 21.) This is expressed by the change of the second and third names from negations into affirmations, and by the re-interpretation of the first; great will be the day of "God's plantation" (Jezreel, see on 22², 23). The two kingdoms will be reunited, and shall "go up" from exile (Ezra 2¹ 7⁶ Neh. 12¹) in unnumbered hosts. This reads like an interpolation of later date; in any case, it would more naturally follow 22³. The living God means the real God, as in 1 Sam. 17²⁶ (cf. Num. 21²⁹ for the idea of a nation as the offspring of a god).

CHAPTER II

1. See under 110, 11.

2-13. Israel's Infidelity. The allegory discovered in the actual events of the prophet's life is here developed on its own account. The "children" of Israel are bidden to strive (not "plead") with their mother, whose harlotry, with its penalty, descends upon them. The stripping of the adulteress (as in Ezek. 16³⁹) belongs to the figure; the destruction of Canaan's fertility is to be literal fact (v. 3). The harlotry with which Israel is charged is spiritual, not physical (except so far as religious prostitution might be involved, as in Amos 27). Israel has forsaken Jehovah, her husband, not, indeed, in name, but in fact. She has worshiped him at the sanctuaries of the local Baals (the "lovers" of v. 5), the supposed givers of the land's fertility, and therefore according to the Canaanite cult. Hosea's protest concerns (as we should say) Israel's idea of God; the erroneous idea of Jehovah (who seeks the moral qualities of v. 19) is allegorized into an actual abandonment of him—as, of course, it is (Elijah raised a different issue a century earlier, when he called Israel to choose between the worship of the Tyrian Baal, Melkart, and that of Jehovah; 1 Kings 18²¹). The character and emphasis of our worship reflect our idea of God, and two inconsistent ideas of God may mean in reality two Gods. The corn and wine and oil were the typical products of Canaan (Deut. 7¹³); the silver and gold, made into an image (v. 8 mg.), would come from Spain, Egypt, India, Arabia, by way of commerce. With v. 11, cf. Amos 8¹⁰. The hire (v. 12) is that of the prostitute

(91; cf. Gen. 38¹⁷), here represented by the fertility of the land.

14-23. The New Betrothal. Adversity will banish these false ideas and practices (v. 14 mg.); then Jehovah's compassion will lead Israel to make a new beginning (v. 15), in which she shall enter Canaan for the second time far otherwise than by the ill-omened entrance through the valley of "Troubling" (due to Achan, mg.). That valley (leading down from the hill-country to the Jordan valley by Jericho) shall become an entrance of better omen—a door of hope this second time. Jehovah has been worshiped as "Baal," but in the new age the very name shall be banished (Zech. 13²) because of its heathen associations. In the new prosperity neither beast nor man will have the power or the desire to do hurt (v. 18); outer welfare will correspond with the inner betrothal of spirit. The best comment on vv. 21, 22 is Wordsworth's "The Primrose of the Rock," where flower, stem, root, rock and earth are shown as upheld at last by God; Jehovah responds to the cry of the heavens and releases the rain, which moistens the earth and makes the vegetation to grow; so that "Jezreel" ("God sows") now becomes a name of good omen (cf. 14).

CHAPTER III

1-3. The Redemption of the Faithless Wife.

This chapter continues the story of Hosea's life from a point somewhat later than that reached in 10. In the intervening period, his unfaithful wife has openly left him, and has sunk to the level of a slave. Nevertheless, Hosea's love for Gomer inspires him to redeem her by the payment of a ransom, though he cannot yet restore her to her old position. The friend of v. 1 should be "paramour" (as in Jer. 31, where translated "lovers"). Cakes of raisins were an article of food (2 Sam. 61⁹ Isa. 16⁷ Songs 2⁵); they may have been some feature of the vintage festival in Canaanite cults (cf. Jer. 71⁸). The male or female slave was estimated at thirty shekels of silver; here the value of the barley (twelve bushels) may represent the other fifteen. Chinese girls were bought up at thirty shillings each by the Salvation Army in 1922, to save them from a life of shame.

4, 5. Israel to Return. The pillar denotes a common object at Canaanite sanctuaries, a survival of stone-worship; the ephod is usually thought to have been an image of deity (Judg. 8^{26f.}), but there are grounds for thinking that the primitive form of it was a loin-cloth with pockets from which the oracular lot was drawn or shaken; the teraphim were the penates, or household gods, of the Israelite (1 Sam. 1913, 16 Gen. 31¹⁹, 34^{f.}). Apparently, Hosea shows no disapproval of any of these, since he regards deprivation of them as being part of the penalty for Israel's disloyalty.

CHAPTER IV

Immorality due to False Religion. Hosea pictures the moral corruption of the Northern Kingdom, which will be punished by drought (v. 3). The priests are primarily responsible for all this (vv. 4–10); they have failed to teach the true knowledge of God, and have encouraged a false externality of religion in their self-interests (v. 8). The people (vv. 11–19) stupidly resort to divination; their life is wrong because their inner spirit is wrong (v. 12). Their worship of Jehovah (patterned on the tree-worship of Canaan, v. 13) is no true religion; sacred prostitution encourages and condones immorality in ordinary life. They are devoted to their sanctuaries, where there is idolatrous worship of Jehovah (v. 17); but these shall not save them from punishment.

1–10. The People's Corruption Due to the Priests' Faithlessness. The controversy of v. 1 is forensic (Mic. 62 79). Note the characteristic depth of insight into causes, implied in the reference to the want of the knowledge of God (v. 1, cf. vv. 6, 10, 12). In v. 2, we get a glimpse of the disorder of the decade after the death of Jeroboam II. In v. 4, as they that strive with the priest should probably read (by a redivision of Hebrew consonants) with you is my controversy, O priests. In v. 5, thy mother may refer to the whole clan of priests, rather than to the nation (as in 22); the stumbling (cf. 55) means the overthrow of priest and prophet who have failed in their task (cf. Ezek. 4423, for the function of the priests as teachers). The reference in v. 8 is not to the actual consumption of the (later) sin-offering by the priests, but to their vested interests in religiosity. The priest is no better than the people (v. 9).

11–19. Religious Practices Condemned. The lack of true guidance in religion drives the people to divination by wooden rods and diviner's wands (v. 12). They themselves (v. 14) is masculine, and refers to the fathers, not to the daughters. (All mgs. in vv. 13–19 are preferable to the text, as usual; one of the ablest revisers used to say that the margins contain the scholarship of the R.V.). Beth-aven (house of iniquity, v. 15) is a contemptuous play on "Bethel" (house of God); for this and Gilgal, see on Amos 44 55; for oaths by local cults, see Amos 814. V. 16b is best taken as a question. Hosea constantly uses the name Ephraim (Gen.

4152, etc.) for the northern kingdom (v. 17). The doubtful text of v. 18 must be taken to mean that after their carousal they give themselves to sexual indulgence.

CHAPTER V

1–7. Priests and Rulers Have Misled the People. In this oracle, the leaders are made responsible for the false worship at the sanctuaries, where the attraction of the cult has been like a hunter's snare to the people. These are zealous in worship, but in vain, because the inner spirit is wrong. We note again (v. 4) the characteristic emphasis on the inner spirit, anticipative of the Sermon on the Mount (see previous oracle). Mizpah ("outlook-point," v. 1) is probably that in Gilead (Judg. 1017 Gen. 3149); Tabor (Judg. 46) is in Galilee (see the Bible Dictionaries, under "Hunting," for the figures of snare, net, and pit; cf. Amos 35 1 Sam. 2620 Psal. 109 112). V. 2a is obscure and corrupt; it should perhaps read, "the pit of Shittim they have made deep," with reference to the seat of the immoral Moabite worship of Baal-peor (Num. 251). Note the contrast, in vv. 3, 4, between "I know Ephraim" (pronoun emphatic) and "they know not Jehovah." In v. 5, the pride of Israel refers to the arrogance expressed in ritual, as a witness against him. With the readiness to offer sacrifice in v. 6 cf. Mic. 66^{f.}; with Jehovah's refusal to hear, Mic. 34. In v. 7, the marriage figure is revived; the infidelity of the bride leads to the illegitimacy of the children; they are strange, in that they do not worship Jehovah truly. The result is (v. 7b) that they and their property will quickly be destroyed.

8–15a. Penalty Issuing in Penitence. The approaching (military) attack is signaled from central places; but the overthrow of Israel by the enemy is certain, because Jehovah has determined it. It is the penalty of false worship, seen in the rottenness of the state. Appeal to foreign aid is futile; the only useful appeal is to God who waits for his people's penitence. Beth-aven (v. 8) is Bethel, ten miles north of Jerusalem (see on 415); Gibeah and Ramah are on heights midway between it and Jerusalem; R.V. text in v. 8b is a warning to Benjamin from the bordertown of Bethel; R.V. mg. refers to the ancient war-cry of the tribe. The landmark (v. 10) was often put under religious sanctions; cf. the Roman god Terminus (Warde Fowler, The Religious Experience of the Roman People, p. 82); Babylonian private boundary-stones bear dedications to gods (cf. Deut. 1914). Follow R.V. mg. (vanity) in v. 11. Nothing is known of King Jareb (v. 13; cf. 106), but the name means "he who strives," so that it might mean "the fighting king" (i.e., of Assyria). With Jehovah as a lion attacking Israel (v. 14) cf. Isa. 52⁹ (refers to the nations). Jehovah's place is heaven (Mic. 13). V. 15b belongs to the next oracle, as in LXX and Syriac version. The most recent German commentary (Sellin's) would refer 5³⁻⁶ to the Syro-Ephraimite war of 735-4 B.C.

CHAPTER VI

1-3. Israel's Return to Jehovah. With these verses should be taken 5^{15b}. Distress drives the people to a facile penitence; they are too sure that God is on their side. In he hath torn, the pronoun is emphatic. In v. 2 the two days . . . the third day is an idiomatic expression of "shortly" (cf. the "three-four" of Amos 13). With the anticipated revival, contrast the "death" of 13¹. To live before God is to be under his protection (Gen. 17¹⁸ Jer. 30²⁰). The going forth of Jehovah is from his heavenly "place" (5¹⁵; so of the sunrise, Psa. 19⁶). The rain is the heavy winter rain, December to February (Songs 2¹¹); the latter rain is that of the spring (March and April), just before harvest. Israel counts on the passing of Jehovah's anger with the certainty of the phenomena of nature—i.e., it has not yet learned to interpret its disasters ethically, and therefore is not yet truly penitent.

4-11a. Shallow Penitence and Deep Sinfulness. Jehovah distrusts this transient temper; he asks for an inner loyalty rather than an outer observance. Violence and sexuality go ill with "religion." The morning cloud is a fitting figure of transiency, for it soon vanishes in the heat of Palestine, together with the dew, here probably the night-mist brought up from the sea. The word of the prophet has objective efficiency; it is instrumental to its idea (v. 5; cf. Jer. 23²⁹). In v. 5b read as mg. God's judgment shall be unmistakable, seen by all, like the light. V. 6 is the keynote of the whole prophecy (cf. Mt. 9¹³ 12⁷). The same word for "mercy" (but see A.S.V.) is rendered "goodness" in v. 4; it denotes "duteous love," the loyalty to God which springs from a genuine inner devotion, here parallel with that knowledge of God which is more than an intellectual possession, and implies a volitional response. In v. 7, Israel's disloyalty to this covenant-love is what might have been expected of (common) men (mg.) without Israel's advantages, but not of a people favored like Israel. Gilead (v. 8), "foot-tracked with blood," is perhaps Ramoth-gilead (Judg. 10¹⁷); Shechem was a sanctuary (Josh. 20⁷ 21²¹), here apparently abused by the actual brigandage of depraved priests (the verse is corrupt). The second part of v. 11 belongs to 7¹ (LXX).

CHAPTER VII

1-7. The Wickedness and Internal Disorder of Ephraim. God's instinct of compassion is checked by the moral disorder of the Northern Kingdom revealed in the fall of one ruler after another (v. 7). The country is helpless, and ignorant of its true helper; it turns instead to foreign alliances, doomed to fail. The general sense is plain, but the text, especially vv. 4-6, is undoubtedly corrupt. Samaria (v. 1) is here the country, rather than the capital (1 Kings 16²⁴). With v. 2b, cf. Psa. 90⁸. The oven in vv. 4-7 was and still is a large earthenware jar, with the fire at the bottom of it; thin cakes of bread are baked by spreading them on the heated surface, when the fire has burned down. The figure of the present text is best referred to the smoldering and revival of lust, but the details are obscure, and the original reference may have been to the long succession of conspiracies and assassinations (2 Kings 15^{8f.}); e.g., v. 5 might refer to the (unknown) events of some festival or coronation. Originally, v. 6 may have read For their inward part is like an oven, their heart burneth in them, while the meaningless sentence about the sleeping baker may have been (cf. R.V. mg.) their anger smokes all the night, maintaining the figure of the oven.

8-16. The Futility of Ephraim's Foreign Policy. When we turn (v. 8) from internal tumult and plotting to external relations, Ephraim is described as "a half-baked cake" of bread, to express the ineffectiveness of its life and policy (cf. v. 11); for the round flat cake baked on hot stones, cf. 1 Kings 19⁶. Similarly, he is pictured as in the weakness of old age (and therefore needing the more such help as is described in Isa. 46⁴), though unconscious of his senility. With v. 10a cf. 5⁵. The last clause of v. 12 must be taken to refer to such prophecies as those of Hosea. In v. 13b, "I" and "they" are emphatically contrasted in the Hebrew. Upon their beds (v. 14) should probably be "beside their altars"; in v. 14b, read as mg. Downfall by the sword of Assyria will provoke the scorn of the Egyptians, whose aid they have sought (v. 16).

CHAPTER VIII

Israel's Statecraft and Worship Disowned and Punished. The Assyrian comes to execute divine vengeance on a people that claims to know God; but both its politics and its religion are foreign to him. He spurns the bull-image of Samaria as a representation of himself (vv. 5, 6), and the many altars that dishonor him (v. 11); Israel's buildings shall be destroyed, and the people banished. The chapter is again difficult, because often corrupt, and its poetry is interrupted by prose glosses. The trumpet (v. 1) is the "horn" (in 5⁸ rendered "cornet") that gives the alarm signal of an enemy's approach; the eagle, or rather, vulture, represents Assyria (cf. Deut. 28⁴⁹; in Jer. 48⁴⁰ 49²², of the Babylonians). The house of the Lord is really the land, as in 9¹⁵. The calf of Samaria (v. 5; cf. 10⁵ 13²) was a small bull-image (overlaid with gold) by which Baal was represented among the Canaanites, but which was taken over by Israel as a representation of Jehovah. For the poetic comparison of Jehovah with the wild-ox, see Num. 23²² 24⁸. Such bull-images were set up at Dan and Bethel (1 Kings 12^{28f.}) as a natural form of divine representation, prior to the higher prophetic teaching. Here the image is declared to be without divine warrant (v. 6, "from Israel is even this" calf).

The lonely wild ass (v. 9) represents the wilderness of Israel, since this creature usually goes in droves; its Hebrew name affords a play on "Ephraim." The "gathering" of v. 10 is a threat, not a promise; v. 10b would refer to the burden of the tribute paid by Menahem (2 Kings 15²⁰), but LXX reads more naturally, "and they shall cease for a little from anointing kings and princes." For the range of meaning of law in v. 12, see on Amos 2⁴; the verse implies that there were written laws—e.g., the Book of the Covenant, Ex. 20²²–23¹⁹—but proves nothing as to the existence of the "Torah" in the later sense, i.e., of the entire Pentateuch (see art., Formation of O.T., p. 92; and cf. pp. 145f.); indeed, the present context contrasts prophetic teachings (LXX reads the plural) with the ceremonial observances (developed so fully in the later "Law") which find no acceptance with God (v. 13). With the threatened return to Egypt cf. 9³, 6, and Deut. 28⁶⁸.

CHAPTER IX

1-8. The Sorrows of Desolation and Exile.

False worship will bring not fertility but exile (vv. 1-3), when there will be no longer an opportunity for (true) worship (vv. 4, 5). The desolation of the land is the inevitable outcome of the attitude displayed toward the prophets sent by God (vv. 6-8). Israel's infidelity is of ancient date, as well as shown at contemporary sanctuaries; barrenness and exile is its portion (see vv. 9-17). Note the continuous use of the figure of sexual, to express religious, infidelity (v. 1), though the actual practice of religious prostitution at the sanctuaries gave a realistic color to the figure. Israel has sought agricultural fertility by zealous worship—of the wrong kind, and shall not find what she sought (v. 2). The generality of the prophecy of exile in v. 3 is seen by the parallelism of Egypt and Assyria; it is the certainty of the penalty, not its precise mode of exaction, that matters to the prophet (cf. 8¹³, and for the unclean food, Amos 7¹⁷). The bread of mourners (v. 4) is ceremonially "unclean," because death is a strong taboo (Num. 19¹⁴ Deut. 26¹⁴); there will be no means of consecrating food to Jehovah in a strange land (v. 4; read mg.). The destruction of v. 6 is that of the devastated land where weeds grow over the cast down and abandoned silver gods; Memphis, one of the oldest and most important cities of Egypt, ten miles south of the present Cairo. V. 7 shows us what the average man thought and said of such a prophet as Hosea.

9-17. Israel's Long History of Sin and Crime. The present corruption has its counterparts in Israel's early history. Gibeah (v. 9): see 10⁹ and cf. Judg. 19. Baal-peor (v. 10): cf. Num. 25; the shameful thing is Baal, which it replaces for theological reasons. V. 13a yields no good sense as it stands; LXX is better, viz., "Ephraim—his children are destined to be a prey." The sanctuary of Gilgal (v. 15, cf. 4¹⁵) is named because the false cult there and elsewhere is the central point of Hosea's denunciation. In the Hebrew of these poems there are frequent plays on words, which cannot be reproduced; e.g., in v. 15, all their princes are revollers is kol sarehem sorerim.

CHAPTER X

1-8. Overthrow of Israel's Altars as the Harvest of Wickedness. There are many altars, as a result of prosperity; yet Jehovah has been slighted and his name dishonored in false swearing (vv. 1-4). Therefore the "golden calf" of Bethel will be carried as booty into Assyria, and men will seek death as escape from suffering (vv. 5-8). "Whatsoever a man soweth, that shall he also reap" (vv. 9-15). The pillars (v. 1) are part of the apparatus of worship at the sanctuaries (34). That the heart (i.e., the mind and the will) is smooth (so mg. in v. 2) means that it is deceitful, insincere; there is no straight thinking, no true religious spirit to correspond with the outward observance. In v. 3, we fear not Jehovah looks like a gloss, for it contradicts the context about excessive though external religiosity. The verse appears to reflect the disturbed political conditions (cf. 7¹⁻⁷). In v. 4a, the divine judgment is represented as the poisonous plant that grows from the seed of sin; cf. Emerson's essay on "Compensation." The calf (sing. with LXX and Syriac in v. 5) of Bethel (4¹⁵) is captured by the enemy; the temple treasure and adornment of the idol—its glory—are appropriated by him (cf. the tribute paid by Menahem, 2 Kings 15¹⁹). The sufferings of the invasion will be such that men will cry to the very hills on which they worshipped Jehovah falsely to end their lives (v. 8).

9-15. Israel's Sin Reaps Retribution. From v. 9 the text is specially corrupt and obscure. Gibeah, cf. 99; there is possibly a reference to the resistance of the Benjamites (Judg. 20). The two transgressions of v. 10 are the "calves" of Dan and Bethel. The privilege of the heifer (v. 11) treading out the corn was to eat freely (Deut. 25⁴); she is now to be yoked to do harder work (I have passed over is better taken as "I have spared" hitherto). In vv. 12, 13, it is natural to regard the reaping as the recompense for the sowing, whether it be good or evil, but reap according to mercy might refer to God's mercy or man's "piety" (cf. 66); the latter is more probable, in view of the parallel in v. 13, ye have reaped iniquity. The close of v. 12 should probably read with the LXX "to the end that the fruit of righteousness may come to you" (note parallel in v. 13, "the fruit of lies"). For the figure of the fallow ground cf. Jer. 43. The historical reference in v. 14 is obscure (cf. Amos 6²). Nothing is known of a place Beth-arbel; Shalman might be Shalmaneser V, who besieged Samaria, 723-1 B.C. (the clause then being a later addition); with v. 14b, cf. Gen. 32¹¹ 2 Kings 8¹². At day-break (v. 15) means "suddenly" (cf. Psa. 49¹⁴ 90⁵¹).

CHAPTER XII

The Divine Father Unable to Destroy Israel Utterly. Israel is the child of Jehovah, whom he has taught to walk, carrying the tired child in his arms (cf. Deut. 13¹). But the child has ungratefully turned from his father to the deserved penalty of the "far country" (cf. Lk. 15¹³). Even so, the fatherly compassions of God are too deep to allow him to abandon his child, and he will gather the scattered Israelites as birds that fly to their homeland (v. 11). It is unfortunate that this fine passage is so marred by textual corruptions that some of it cannot be translated, e.g., v. 7, of which the literal Hebrew is "my people is hung up to my backsliding . . . and upward they call him . . . together he will not exalt. . . ." But the principal thought is clear, and no one who grasps the meaning of the chapter will deny to the O.T. the doctrine of a suffering God.

Israel is now gray-haired (79), but Jehovah's love was active from the days of servitude in Egypt (v. 1). In v. 2, as it stands, the reference is to the prophets' calling, but LXX suggests, "when I called them, they went away from me"; graven images, see on 13². In v. 4 the figure changes to that of the kindly driver, suiting the harness to human weakness and divine affection, the last clause being, rather, I inclined (my ear) unto him to feed him. The not of v. 5 is a corrupt fragment of v. 4, and should be omitted; they turn to Egypt and Assyria, instead of to me. The bars (v. 6) are those of city gates (Jer. 51³⁰, cf. Job 17¹⁶). In v. 8 deliver (in A.S.V. cast off) should be surrender; Admah and Zeboim were cities overthrown with Sodom and Gomorrah (Gen. 14² Deut. 29²³). G. A. Smith describes vv. 8, 9 as "the greatest passage in Hosea," which is saying much, though not too much (read as A.S.V.). Jehovah as a lion (Amos 12³⁸) calls the young lions after him (v. 10); they hurry home with the speed of birds (v. 11). V. 12, see 12¹ below.

CHAPTER XII

Israel Contrasted With His Ancestor, Jacob. The accusation (cf. v. 2) which Jehovah brings against Israel is that of disloyalty, shown in seeking foreign alliances (v. 1). How different was the conduct of Israel's ancestor, who wrestled with God. Israel is confident in his commercial prosperity (v. 8), but that will not save him (v. 9). How much more care (through the prophets) has been lavished on Israel than on his ancestor (vv. 12, 13).

In 11¹² (=12¹ in Hebrew) read as mg. Oil (12¹) was a natural product of Palestine (Deut. 8⁸), here sent as a present to Egypt (Isa. 57⁹), which lacked it. The point of the contrast with Jacob is the earnestness of his striving with God (mg. in v. 3); he strove from the very womb (Gen. 25²², 26). The root from which the name "Jacob" comes means to follow at the heel, to overreach; but originally it may have meant that God "follows" and rewards its bearer, as in the Assyrian name Ya'kub-ili. In v. 4, read he strove with the angel (as in v. 3 mg.); the detail of weeping and supplication is not given in the extant story of Penuel (Gen. 32²²⁻³²). The incident of Bethel (Gen. 28^{10f.}) here comes in a different order. In v. 7, read as mg.; the translation derives "trafficker" from the fact that the Canaanites (cf. the Phoenicians) were traders, just as "Chaldean" came to mean "astrologer"; to this level Israel has sunk. Labors (v. 8), i.e., "products"; the verse gives Israel's reply to the charge that he is a mere Canaanite.

The dwelling in tents (v. 9) is a threat, not a promise; it will be like—yet unlike—the Feast of Booths, when people joyfully camped out. The prophetic ministry is characterized in v. 10 as mediating Jehovah's voice, through visions and symbols. Gilead (v. 11), see 68; the district was captured by Tiglath-Pileser III in 734 B.C. (2 Kings 15²⁹). The heaps of stones are no more than those taken from a plowed field; once they were altars (there is a play on the Hebrew name for "heaps," namely gallim, with Gilgal, cf. 415). Vv. 12, 13 seem a subsequent addition to the previous Jacob references, recalling Gen. 27⁴³ 29¹⁸ 31⁴¹. Jacob was once but a wandering Aramean (Deut. 26⁵), yet how great he became! His descendants have been escorted by a prophet (Moses) and instead of "keeping" sheep have themselves been "kept" (v. 13 mg.)—yet how low they have fallen.

CHAPTER XIII

1-8. Jehovah's Anger Over Israel's Ingratitude. Israel's pride has gone before a fall (v. 1), and idolatry brings extinction (vv. 2, 3). In prosperity, Israel's benefactor is forgotten (vv. 4-6). So Jehovah prepares to attack, like a wild beast (vv. 7, 8), and Israel will be helpless before the Assyrian, who executes God's just vengeance (vv. 9-16). The glory of Ephraim's past is pictured through the anxious respect shown toward him (trembling; cf. Job 29⁷, 8); his decline and fall is due to the guilt (v. 1 mg.) of his false worship. The molten images (v. 2), alone prohibited (Ex. 34¹⁷), were cast in metal, and were doubtless derived from Canaanite art and usage; they are to be distinguished from the "graven images" (112) carved from wood or stone. On the extent of Israelite idolatry at this time, see Isa. 28; for the kiss as a sign of homage or adoration, see Psa. 21² 1 Kings 19¹⁸ Job 31²⁷. Chimney (v. 3) should be lattice, or window, by which escaped the smoke of the charcoal or wood burned in a brazier (Jer. 36²²). Mg. is better in v. 4; in v. 5, the I is emphatic—it was I, and not another; with v. 6, cf. Deut. 32¹⁵, 18. Caul (v. 8), properly meaning "covering," here denotes the breast, as the "cage" or inclosure of the heart.

9-15. Inevitable Doom. The obscure v. 9 perhaps once read: He hath destroyed thee, O Israel—then who shall help thee? With v. 11, cf. the attitude toward the monarchy shown in the (later) story of Saul's election (1 Sam. 8, 10¹⁷⁻²⁴, 12); the statement here is collective ("I give thee kings . . . I take them away"). The iniquity (v. 12) is bound up and stored for punishment, as in Job 14¹⁷. In v. 13, Israel is both the travailing mother and the unborn child (Isa. 37³); read for now he standeth not [ready] in the mouth of the womb. The next verse (14) should be taken as rhetorical questions, implying a threat, not a promise: "From the hand of Sheol shall I ransom them? from death shall I redeem them?" The answer is an emphatic No! Note the quotation of v. 14b, with reversed meaning, in 1 Cor. 15⁵⁵. The figure of v. 15 (fruitful) is suggested by the meaning of the name "Ephraim"; the destructive sirocco is the Assyrian army.

CHAPTER XIV

Israel's Penitence and Jehovah's Promises. The prophet frames a liturgy of confession for penitent Israel, acknowledging the past folly of seeking help from Assyria and of idolatry (vv. 1-3). God promises forgiveness and fertility (vv. 4-7). This fine chapter might be called a preacher's program, for it appeals to the discipline of experience, makes articulate the inarticulate, affirms the evangelical patience of God, and the gift of new life from God, culminating in a dialogue of the soul's fellowship with God (v. 8). The words of v. 2 are to be those that follow, truly and sincerely expressing a change of heart; v. 2b is meaningless; read with LXX, and we will pay the fruit of our lips (cf. Psa. 51^{16f}, 69^{30f}). Asshur (v. 3) is simply the transliteration of the Hebrew word for "Assyria." Alliance with Egypt meant the provision of cavalry (17 10¹³ Isa. 30¹⁶ 31¹; cf. 1 Kings 10²⁸); hence the reference to horses. In the discovery of its own self-willed orphanhood (v. 3) Israel discovers also the divine fatherhood. Smell as Lebanon (v. 6), because of the cedars and other aromatic trees (Songs 41¹) of its forests. V. 7 is obscure and corrupt; his shadow most naturally refers to God, but cf. Ezek. 31⁶ (nations under the shadow of Pharaoh); there is no ground for rendering memorial (mg.) as scent. In v. 8 we have a dialogue, in which it is not certain how we should distribute the parts, but it is perhaps best to assign I am like a green fir tree to Ephraim, and thus get four alternating utterances.

The closing expression (v. 9) of piety is due to a wise man among the readers of the roll, and falls outside these precious but tantalizing poem-oracles of Hosea. It is an exhortation addressed to anyone seeking the way of life to learn from the book of Hosea.

JOEL

BY PROFESSOR W. GLADSTONE WATSON

INTRODUCTION

Author. Of the author we have no direct information beyond his name and that of his father, Pethuel (more probably "Bethuel," LXX). His prophecy is concerned only with Judah (2²³ 31, 6, 8, 20), and it seems clear that he was a native of Jerusalem. The Temple (2¹⁷), the priests (1⁹, 1³) and the daily sacrifice (1⁹, 1³ 2¹⁴) are the things with which he is familiar. He also speaks of the locusts climbing the wall and entering the houses, presumably of the city (2⁹). He seems to have great respect for the priests, but it is unlikely that he was one himself (1¹³ 2¹⁷). He was a literary man of religious and studious habits. His style is the poetical style of the earlier prophets, but lacks the originality and vigor of an Amos or an Isaiah. He had evidently studied the great literature of the past and had reflected deeply upon it, so that its imagery and ideas had left a deep impression upon him. In this short book of only seventy verses there are no less than twenty quotations from other O.T. writers.

Date. The question of date is of great importance in connection with the proper interpretation of the book. The older commentators regarded Joel as the earliest of the writing prophets and assigned him most generally to the ninth century, during the minority of Joash (836-796 B.C.), but the evidence for such an early date is altogether inconclusive, and more recent commentators are practically unanimous in agreeing that a post-exilic date satisfies the conditions better. There are no references to kings, high places, or idolatry, silence concerning which would be strange in a pre-exilic prophet; the interest of the book in sacrifice is entirely opposed to the attitude of all pre-exilic prophets (Isa. 110-17 Amos 521-24 Mic. 66-8). Moreover, it would be very difficult to explain the attitude of Amos (518-20) toward the day of Jehovah if Joel had preceded him. On the other hand the book fits admirably into the post-exilic age, and may be assigned with a fair degree of confidence to the Persian period about 400 B.C., or even later. During this period the Jewish community was confined to a small territory around Jerusalem; the rule of the Persians was not oppressive and the Jews were left free to manage their own affairs under the elders and priests; the people constituted a religious community, of which the Temple was the center, with the Law as the rule of faith and practice; priests, not prophets, were the leading religious figures; prophetic teaching was giving place to apocalyptic hopes (see intro. to Ezra-Nehemiah, pp. 458f.; cf. p. 70). Such a situation suits Joel very well. It accounts for the leadership which he gives to the priests, his interest in the Temple and his concern about the cessation of the daily sacrifices; the apocalyptic character of the book also suits this age, but is entirely out of place in pre-exilic thought. There are other features that clearly point to a post-exilic date: The reference to the scattering of Israel among the nations (3²) finds no adequate explanation except in the destruction of Jerusalem in 586 B.C., and the Exile and Dispersion which followed; and the bringing again of the captivity of Judah (3¹) is most naturally explained as referring to the restoration from the Exile or from the Dispersion; the Greeks (3⁶) are not mentioned in the Bible before Ezekiel and the Exile.

The numerous parallels with other books are easily explained if they are quotations. Ezekiel was the most influential of all the prophets during the Exile and later, and there are many features of Joel which seem to have their origin in Ezekiel: The gathering of the nations and their destruction before Jerusalem (31-3) is based upon the destruction of Gog and his hordes (Ezek. 38, 39); the fountain issuing from beneath the Temple hill (31⁸) finds its explanation in Ezek. 471-12; similarly, the outpouring of the Spirit and Jehovah's jealousy for his land find their counterpart in Ezekiel. Other parallels are most naturally explained as quotations; the most instructive illustration is 2³², which is presented in the usual formula of a quotation; the original appears to be in Obad. v. 17, a relatively late passage.

Occasion and Contents. A terrible scourge of locusts, in successive waves, had visited Judah and had brought an unprecedented famine upon the people. This was accompanied by drought and fiery heat. The vintage and harvest had been destroyed, cutting off the food of man and beast; and what seemed more terrible still, the daily offerings in the Temple. Joel, who had been deeply influenced by the apocalyptic side of Ezekiel's teaching, interpreted these disasters as the prelude to the day of Jehovah, which entirely occupies his thought in the latter half of the book.

The book falls into two parts. The first part (12-227) consists of a graphic description of the invasion of the locusts and the consequent suffering of the people. In the first chapter the description is that of a calamity which has already happened "before our eyes," a calamity which has affected all classes, and which may be regarded as a divine judgment. It can be met only by fasting and prayer. In the second chapter it seems that a still more terrible scourge of locusts is just at hand, which will be a veritable day of Jehovah. It pictures the irresistible advance of the army of locusts with Jehovah at their head. But even this calamity may be averted by a thoroughgoing repentance, so that the prophet urges the observance of a solemn day of national humiliation and supplication that Jehovah would "spare his people." This was observed and Jehovah's favor was restored. The prophet then goes on to announce the immediate return of prosperity, and the section closes with a description of a satisfied people rejoicing in Jehovah's presence and praising his name.

The second part (228-321) is apocalyptic in character and deals with what shall come afterward. Jehovah will pour out his Spirit upon all flesh (Jews only), giving to all ecstatic experience and illumination such as formerly only the prophets had. This will be accompanied by portents of the day of Jehovah—the final judgment. The pious Jews from the Dispersion will be joined with those already in Jerusalem, and more abundant blessings will be poured out upon them. The Gentiles will be gathered in the valley of Jehoshaphat where they will be annihilated.

The marked difference between the two sections of the book, one concerned with a scourge of locusts, the other with the final judgment, and yet both parts relating to the day of Jehovah, has created difficulty for interpreters. The early Fathers and some moderns sought to avoid the difficulty by treating the first part as allegory, the locusts representing an enemy, or, rather, four heathen empires, but this view has now been abandoned. A more recent way of getting over the difficulty is to attribute the book to two authors, or to regard all references to the day of Jehovah in the first part as interpolations (ad loc., International Critical Commentary). However, the latter method of solving the difficulty is still on trial. The difficulty is avoided if it is assumed that the day of Jehovah manifests itself in successive stages (see Wade, Joel, pp. liv-lxi).

Teaching. The religious teaching of the prophecy gathers around the day of Jehovah. The first reference to the day of Jehovah in prophetic literature occurs in Amos 5¹⁸, a passage which shows that the idea was not new. It was popularly assumed that, in virtue of Israel's election by Jehovah, it would be a day in which Jehovah would manifest his power in a decisive victory over the enemies of Israel, who because of their hostility to his people were also his enemies. Thus the day of Jehovah would be primarily a day of glory for Israel. Amos shattered this view and announced that it would be a day of judgment upon all sinners, including the chosen people; indeed, that it would fall first upon apostate Israel. In all pre-exilic prophecy the judgment upon the sinners in Israel was emphasized. The pre-exilic prophets also held that, after the execution of judgment upon Israel, there would be left a purified remnant, which would form the nucleus of the new kingdom of God, and that upon this remnant would be poured out great blessings both material and spiritual. However, from Isa. 104-34 Zeph. 3⁸ and Jer. 25⁹ and other passages it becomes evident that the day of Jehovah included also a judgment upon other nations.

The destruction of Jerusalem and its attendant sufferings could not help but modify the outlook of the prophets. They felt that in these events the terror of the day of Jehovah had been visited upon Israel. They had received "double for all their sins" and might now look for the restoration of Jehovah's favor. On the other hand, the time was ripe for a judgment upon the nations which again and again had caused suffering and hardship to God's people. But the weary years after the Exile rolled on without noticeable change in the prosperity of Israel, and with the heathen nations still dominant. In consequence of this disappointment there settled upon the Jews a feeling of depression which found utterance in the cry, "How long, O Lord, how long?" Surely, the day of deliverance for Israel and of judgment upon the Gentiles could not long be delayed!

It was in such a religious and intellectual atmosphere that Joel lived. It is not strange, therefore, that he should interpret the visitation of the locusts as a divine judgment, a harbinger of a still more terrible judgment near at hand. The coming judgment would fall upon both Jews and Gentiles, but the effects would not be the same. The Jews had thought that the divine wrath against their sins had exhausted itself in the sufferings endured during the Exile; to Joel the locust plague showed that for some reason the displeasure of Jehovah still rested upon them; hence the first thought which arose in his mind was the necessity of repentance on the part of his people. It is remarkable that he does not mention the sins of which they were to repent, but on this point he himself may not have been clear; nevertheless, he could not doubt the fact of their sinning: (1) The suffering caused by the locusts was infallible proof of sin; for Joel shared the commonly accepted opinion that sin and suffering were inseparable. (2) The cutting off of material needed for the daily sacrifice was conclusive evidence that Jehovah had turned against his people. Such reasoning on first thought may appear strange; Joel seems to put mere ritual observance above human needs and a right heart (contrast Mic. 6⁸⁻⁸ Mk. 227 Jas. 127). But for Joel the daily sacrifice was the means whereby fellowship with God was maintained, and this fellowship meant more to him than life itself. The withholding of the materials of sacrifice meant that God himself had broken off fellowship with his people, and was making it impossible for this fellowship to be restored.

The attitude of God could be explained only on the assumption that there was sin in the Jewish community; hence the urgent appeal for repentance. In language that has become classic he shows that no mere outward or formal signs of grief will suffice; repentance must spring from a broken and contrite heart; it must be a real inward change of heart, a turning with mind and will unto God. His faith that God will receive the penitent who turns to him in this spirit is based upon the unsurpassed description of God's gracious character, which was revealed to Moses on the Mount (Ex. 34⁶). However, in harmony with current ideals, repentance finds outward expression in the observance of a day of national humiliation and prayer. In the prayer which Joel puts into the mouth of the priests, he again sounds the depths of religious insight. Like the Lord's prayer it puts the glory of God in the first place (217; cf. Mt. 69); the petition for deliverance and prosperity is secondary.

According to the thought of that day, Jehovah's sovereignty could not be seen apart from the blessedness of his people. Hence the answer to the prayer is the removal of the locusts; and from this the prophet goes on to promise rain and fruitful seasons. The return of Jehovah's favor will lead the people to praise God for his goodness and to rejoice in the presence of Jehovah in their midst. So far as the immediate future is concerned, this will be the happy ending of their troubles and it will vindicate both Jehovah's justice and his grace toward Israel.

Thus once more the day of Jehovah as a judgment upon Israel is past; surely now the day of Jehovah as a judgment upon the Gentiles may be expected, a judgment in its most terrible and final form. It will manifest itself in the annihilation of the Gentiles, while marvelous spiritual and material happiness will be the portion of the Jews. Both of these results will come by the direct action of Jehovah. Thus will ensue a new earth in which will dwell a purified and Spirit-filled people, and the transformation will constitute the complete vindication of Jehovah.

Permanent Values. When Joel thinks of this victory as the glorification of the Jews and the destruction of the Gentiles he shows that he is but a child of his age, sharing its limitations and prejudices. He has failed to grasp the universality of the grace of God. Joel's view was probably the prevailing one of his age, but it was not the only view. In Isa. 22-4 it is anticipated that Gentiles may come up to share with the Jews in their religious privileges. Deutero-Isaiah and Jonah went further and thought of Israel as the missionary to the Gentiles. The universalism of these prophets is irreconcilable with Joel's narrow nationalism. His view is also opposed to that of Paul and the general attitude of the N.T. To-day the household of faith includes vastly more Gentiles than Jews. It may therefore be confidently affirmed that Joel's prediction of the day of Jehovah can never be fulfilled as he conceived it. But we cannot leave the matter here. Behind his narrow nationalism there is a great and permanent truth. Joel illustrates a profound faith both in the justice and mercy of God. There must ultimately be a complete victory of righteousness over unrighteousness; the righteous must be rewarded and the wicked must be punished. The sovereignty of God must be recognized and established.

CHAPTERS 1¹ TO 227: THE LOCUSTS, THE HARBINGER OF THE DAY OF JEHOVAH

CHAPTER I

1. The Title. The prophet is introduced in an ordinary prophetic formula.

2-12. The Invasion of the Locusts. Successive swarms of locusts have overrun the land and left it a waste. The destruction is of such an unprecedented character that even the oldest inhabitants can recall no parallel, and the memory of it will be handed on to future generations. All classes are called upon to mourn. The drunkards, who represent the luxurious classes, are called to weep and howl, because the destruction of the vines has cut off their supplies. The locusts, likened to an irresistible army with teeth like lions' teeth, have devoured all vegetation, even stripping off the bark from the fruit trees and leaving them bleached and bare.

The community, personified as a woman, is called to mourning because the daily sacrifice in the Temple has been interrupted. The corn, the wine and the oil, which were used in the offerings, have failed. The priests are heartbroken and the very land mourneth. The husbandmen are in despair. Their crops are ruined and the joy of harvest is withered away. Famine has dried up the means of living. The prophet's reference to the cessation of the daily sacrifice is worthy of note (v. 9). For him, influenced by post-exilic religious standards, it meant the cutting off of fellowship with God. In this high regard for sacrifice he stands in marked contrast with the pre-exilic prophets, who had little or no use for these outward observances; they placed the emphasis rather upon justice, mercy and a humble walk with God (Amos 5²¹⁻²⁴ Hos. 6⁶ Mic. 6⁶⁻⁸).

13, 14. Call to Repentance. The situation calls for penitence, for the only conclusion to which Joel could come was that Jehovah was angry because of the people's sin. He, therefore, calls upon the priests, the religious leaders of the people, to proclaim a day of public fasting and prayer in the Temple for the entire community. The sins to be repented of are not mentioned (contrast Amos 2⁶⁻⁸); which is characteristic of the prophets of the post-exilic age.

15-20. Terrors of the Day of Jehovah. The scourge of the locusts is the precursor of a still more awful calamity. It is the beginning of the judgment day—the day of Jehovah. The famine has cut off the means of sustenance, but, worse than all else, it has cut off public worship, the surest indication that Jehovah is about to destroy the world. Drought and fiery sun have added to the calamity. The prophet cries out in prayer for mercy; even the beasts of the field, lowing in thirst and hunger, are represented as praying. (It will help the reader to appreciate the awfulness of the locust scourge to read the stories of them told in Driver, or Eiselen, or G. A. Smith.)

CHAPTER II

1-11. Vivid Description of the Coming Judgment. This section opens with a call to blow the trumpet, to give warning of the approaching judgment (cf. Amos 3⁶). In the first chapter the description was that of an actual calamity; in this chapter the prophet looks forward to a still more terrible visitation; hence the description of the locusts, while still referring to real locusts, assumes an apocalyptic coloring. It opens with a quotation from Zeph. 1¹⁵; the language, which is highly figurative and evidently had already become stereotyped as a description of the day of Jehovah (cf. Amos 5¹⁸⁻²⁰), is intended to produce terror. The quotation ends with darkness; the next clause should be read: "as the dawn there is spread—a great people," the great mass of fluttering insects dimming the light of day. As they advance they leave as it were a trail of fire behind them, and the fruitful garden is turned into a desolate waste.

The advance of the locusts is like the oncoming of a mighty army—horsemen running, chariots rattling on the hills with noise like the crackling of a prairie fire. Nothing can resist them; the people are in panic and their faces pale with fear. Neither walls nor weapons are of any avail to check their advance; the city and its houses afford no protection. In vv. 10, 11 the description becomes even more idealized. The locusts are represented as accompanied by earthquake and storm, and Jehovah himself as advancing at the head of his locust army. Jehovah's voice breaks forth in thunder. Truly this calamity is no ordinary event; it is a supernatural visitation, the great and terrible day of Jehovah.

12-17. Exhortation to Repentance. But even yet it is not too late to avert the calamity. If the people will truly repent Jehovah may restore his favor; however, no mere formal repentance will do. There must be a genuine conversion, a turning with mind and will to God. Repentance is not mere outward expression of grief, but a breaking up of the hard and stony heart, making it responsive to the divine influence (cf. Ps. 51¹⁷). It is to be noted that the expressed hope is that Jehovah will restore a blessing, i.e., the fruits of the earth, so that again the daily sacrifice may be offered. This will re-establish fellowship with him and be the sure mark of his restored favor. Again Joel issues a call to observe a fast and hold a solemn religious service, to which all the people are to come, old men and babes, nursing mothers and the newly married. The priests are to stand in the inner court of the Temple, while the great multitude are assembled in the outer court. As representative of the people the priests are to offer the prayer which Joel formulates. The plea is to spare his people, lest his own name should be disparaged. The reproach (reading the mg. of v. 17, use a byword) was that the heathen should conclude that Jehovah was not able to save his people (cf. notes on vv. 25-27 below). The sovereignty of Jehovah was the great consideration. It is, in a way, parallel to the idea that the supreme disaster was the cutting off from fellowship with God, through the cessation of the daily sacrifice.

18-27. The Prayer Answered and the Restoration of Prosperity. In v. 18 it is assumed that the day of fasting and prayer has been observed and that Jehovah has given a gracious answer. Two motives are given for Jehovah's change of purpose: the first, his jealousy—the dishonor done to his name must be forever removed; the second, his pity, which has been stirred by the penitence of his afflicted people. As a result Jehovah promises to give the corn, the wine, and the oil in abundance; never again shall the Gentiles have an opportunity to dishonor his name because of the poverty of his people.

The reference to the northern army in v. 20 is obscure. Locusts do not come from the north, and yet the term must apply to them. Probably the best explanation is that "northerner" had become a fixed term describing the executioner of the divine judgment on the day of Jehovah. In Jer. 14 10²² (notes) the evil threatening Judah is said to come from the north, and in Ezek. 39. 2 Gog (though part of his hordes are from Africa) is represented as coming from the north. It would seem then that "the northerner" had come to be used as a symbol of the agency of judgment without any reference to geography (cf. in English the use of East-Indian for any ocean-going merchantman). The announcement of the destruction of the locusts in the Dead Sea (eastern sea, v. 20), the Mediterranean Sea (western sea) and the southern desert is not to be taken literally; it is due simply to the carrying out of the figure of "the northerner." Note the contrast between the last clause of v. 19 and the last clause of v. 20—the day of the locusts has passed away, the day of Jehovah has come.

In v. 21 the prophet bursts into song as he calls upon the land, the beasts, and the people to rejoice in the restored favor of Jehovah. In faithfulness to his promise (v. 23, in just measure, R.V. text), literally, in righteousness, mg. Jehovah is giving the rain, which is the necessary condition of fertility. The former rain comes in October-November and opens the agricultural year, while the latter rain comes in March-April, when the grain is filling out in the ear. (The Hebrew text is in some confusion and v. 23 cannot be translated smoothly, but the general sense is clear). In vv. 25-27 the prophet speaks as if he were Jehovah. He promises a full compensation for all the ruin the locusts had wrought. The people will praise Jehovah for his wondrous bounty and will have assurance that he is with them, and that he will continue to be their helper and defender forever. The renewed prosperity gives renewed confidence in Jehovah's presence and is the best answer to the reproach of the Gentiles in v. 17.

CHAPTERS 228 TO 321: THE DAY OF JEHOVAH

28-32. The Outpouring of the Spirit. The bestowal of the material benefits having produced a spirit of gratitude, and having created a confidence that Jehovah's presence with his people will never again fail, the prophet goes on to announce the coming of a still greater blessing. The ecstatic spiritual experience and illumination which hitherto had been confined to exceptional individuals like the prophets is to be given to all Israelites, irrespective of age, sex or condition. The prayer of Moses that all Jehovah's people be prophets (Num. 11²⁹) is to be realized. Dreaming dreams and seeing visions are the familiar channels through which revelations came to the prophets. While the prophets were the bearers of important moral messages, they were generally, if not always, the subjects of deep religious emotion and ecstasy, and in this passage the emphasis is on the latter. These spiritual gifts are to be accompanied by marvelous portents in the heavens and on the earth—blood, fire, and smoke. These may be due to eclipses, fiery meteors or a dust-filled sky; or they may be accompaniments of war—bloody slaughter and burning cities. The figures used had become stereotyped forms of expression descriptive of all kinds of phenomena that inspire fear and alarm. The thought is that God will usher in the greatly to be feared day of Jehovah with terror-inspiring signs.

Peter saw in the experience of Pentecost the fulfillment of Joel's prophecy (Acts 21⁶⁻²¹). The profound feelings and deep convictions of that day gave to the apostles great freedom of speech and enabled them to speak in the universal language of the human heart, so that their message came to the hearers with great converting power, and thousands were caught up into the same ecstatic experience. This may be regarded as a proper fulfillment of the prophecy; but the important point is that these profound religious emotions, which had formerly been confined to the few, have been poured out upon the whole body of disciples. Moreover, the most powerful proof that the early disciples were filled with the Spirit is not to be seen in these ecstatic outbursts, but in their changed character and spirit, their love, gentleness, and goodness. The fearful signs of vv. 30, 31 will have no terrors for the Jews. In spite of the all flesh of v. 28 and the whosoever of v. 32, only those in Jerusalem and the Jews of the Dispersion who shall be called to share with them in salvation are meant. For the Gentiles there is nothing but a fearful judgment.

CHAPTER III

This chapter describes the destruction of the Gentiles and the glorification of the Jews.

1-3. The Wrongs Done to the Jews to Be Avenged. This section follows immediately upon 2²⁸⁻³², and explains how the Jews being assembled in Jerusalem will escape the judgment which is to fall upon the Gentiles. To bring again the captivity of Judah may refer to the return of the Jews who were still scattered abroad in heathen lands; or it may mean, without reference to return from exile, a restoration of good fortune, material and spiritual; if so, the former might still include the restoration of the scattered people. At the same time the Gentiles are to be gathered for judgment in the valley of Jehoshaphat. The identification of the valley is of no importance, though it must have been thought of as near Jerusalem. The name means "Jehovah judges" and is used symbolically. The idea of the assembling of the nations for judgment is common in late prophecy (Isa. 66¹⁶⁻¹⁸ Zeph. 3⁸ Ezek. 38, 39; cf. Mt. 25³¹⁻⁴⁶ Rev. 20¹¹⁻¹⁵). The judgment falls on the Gentiles because they had taken Judah, and scattered its people into exile or slavery. Probably the reference is to the destruction of Jerusalem in 586 B.C. by Nebuchadrezzar. Captives taken in war were divided by lot among the soldiers, and here it is charged that they were later cheaply disposed of to gratify the sensual passions of the conquerors. See also vv. 9-17 below.

4-8. Judgment Upon Phœnicia and Philistia. This passage is probably an insertion. It breaks the continuity of the argument and is written in prose, while both that which precedes and that which follows is in poetry. It also predicts a different punishment, namely, slavery, whereas in the rest of the chapter the entire heathen world is condemned to annihilation. It may have been written about the same time. There was no uniformity of opinion among post-exilic Jews as to the fate of the Gentiles, but we should at least expect uniformity in the work of one writer. Phœnicia and Philistia have apparently been guilty of some act of spoliation of the goods and persons of Judah, or it may be that they have received them from others. Jewish slaves had been sold to the Grecians. This implies a late date for the passage, for the Greeks are not mentioned in Jewish literature until the Exile. Jehovah promises to restore the Jews to freedom and to visit the deeds of the Philistines upon their own heads. The Philistines shall be sold into slavery by the Jews to the distant land of Sheba, the other end of the world from Greece.

9-17. The World Judgment. This is the continuance of vv. 1-3. The Gentiles are called upon to prepare for the struggle with Jehovah; but it will be of no avail, for they are to be exterminated. Sanctify war (v. 9, mg.): in ancient times war was a religious act, for the gods of the contending peoples were at war too, and were thought of as leading their people. Hence soldiers were prepared by religious rites. In v. 10 the Gentiles are urged to make the best possible preparation in words which are just the opposite of those in the famous passage Isa. 22-4, which was no doubt in the mind of the prophet. They are to come down to the valley of Jehoshaphat where Jehovah sits not only to judge but also to execute the judgment. In v. 13 the heavenly host is addressed and the slaughter is set forth under the figure of treading grapes. In v. 14 the prophet calls attention to the enormous multitude involved in the judgment. The terrifying character of the judgment is like that caused by eclipses. In v. 16 the significant words of Amos (12 34, 8) are quoted, Jehovah is likened to a lion just springing upon his prey. In contrast to the imminent destruction of the heathen world is the deliverance and protection of the Jews. Jehovah will continue to abide in Jerusalem forever. With the destruction of the heathen world Jerusalem can never again be polluted by their presence, and thus its holiness will be secured. Holy (v. 17) is used here, not in an ethical sense, but in the sense which it has in Ezekiel and other late prophets, namely, freedom from contact with heathenism in any form, and complete dedication to Jehovah. (See art., Religion of Israel, pp. 174-5.)

18-21. Great Fruitfulness for Judah. After the judgment upon the world and the salvation of the Jews, there will be remarkable fertility. Judah was deficient in water, but henceforth it is to be abundantly watered. The fountain is suggested by the Virgin's spring which bursts forth into the Kidron valley from the Temple hill. The idea first appears in Ezek. 47¹⁻¹²; it became a favorite expectation in late prophecy, and is referred to again in Zech. 14⁸ and in Rev. 22^{1, 2}. The valley of Acacias (v. 18, mg.) is unknown, but is probably some arid wady in the wilderness of Judæa. Acacias grow in dry places. Even the wilderness is to be redeemed. In contrast with the fruitfulness of Judah, Egypt and Edom are to become desolate wildernesses. It is probable that the Hebrew text of v. 21 is corrupt and that we should read I will avenge their blood, which I have not avenged (cf. mg.); that, at least, is in accord with the general tenor of the passage.

AMOS

BY PRINCIPAL H. WHEELER ROBINSON

INTRODUCTION

The Prophet and His Call. What made Amos, a countryman of Tekoa, leave his sheep and his fig-mulberries and the solitary places of his home, to intone rhythmic oracles of Jehovah at some crowded pilgrimage-festival of Bethel, a score of miles north, and in another land? It was not his professional calling; he was a layman, not a "cleric." But the passion of a true prophet burned within him—the passion of social sympathy and keen resentment against social injustice, and the passion of faith in Jehovah as a God demanding the right relation of man to man as the beginning of a right relation to himself, and a God able to enforce his demand by the events of history. Something more, however, was needed to make a prophet in those days, and Amos had this also; the prophet must be a man of abnormal psychological experience, who could see visions and hear voices and feel strange physical compulsions which gave to his personal convictions a divine authority in his own eyes and in those of others.

Economic Background. Let us try to see the social and religious life of the people to whom he is speaking. They live in small towns and villages, their one-roomed houses clustered on the hillside. Below is the village well, to which the women come morning and evening; at the gate the men meet to talk over common business; above the houses, near the hilltop, would be the "high-place," the local sanctuary. Most of the people work on the land, though some are now beginning Israel's future world-career of trading, under the guidance of the Canaanites. On the hillside there are grapes and olives to tend, and rock-presses in which to trample out their juices; down in the valley grow the wheat and barley, to be carried in due season to the threshing-floor, up near the hilltop and the "high-place." In the little houses, the oil and meal are kept in earthen jars, and are supplemented by various fruits; flesh is eaten very rarely, on festival days. Their clothing is of the simplest—a close-fitting tunic and an outer cloak, used as a sleeping-cover.

Social Background. The social organization of these village groups was hardly more elaborate than their manner of life. It centered in the family, over which the father ruled, and in the local assembly of male citizens, under the leadership of the elders. The king counted for little, except in time of war, or when his agents collected a tax. The priest at the "high-place" was much more important, for he frequently gave oracles or advice on practical difficulties; the prophet was a more irregular and occasional factor. The community was controlled by customs, local and national, rather than by formal codes of law. The local group was at once judicial, military, and religious; a citizen might be called on to act in any one of these three capacities at any time.

Religious Background. The religious life of the town or village centered in the "high-place." There was the altar, somewhat developed from its more primitive form of a rough block of unhewn stone, and near it, perhaps, some ancient and sacred tree; at any rate, there would be the Asherah, a wooden post, and the Mazzebah, stone pillar, these being survivals of more primitive tree and stone worship. There may have been an image of Jehovah, the ox being the favorite symbol, because of its strength. To such a sanctuary people of the district came in great numbers at the agricultural festivals, to a less degree at new moons and Sabbaths, and also on private visits, when they brought some gift and asked some favor. If an animal sacrifice was offered, the oldest method was to drain its blood on the altar, as belonging to the deity, while the family and their friends feasted on the flesh, and so realized communion with their God. (See art., The Religion of Israel, pp. 166-7.)

Moral and Religious Corruption. What, then, did Amos find wrong in this simple life? Chiefly three things. First, it was not the simple life for everybody; luxury and extravagance among the wealthy had replaced the older simplicity—the reign of Jeroboam II brought much prosperity and wealth. There were houses of hewn stone, furniture inlaid with ivory, cushions of silk, costly and elaborate dress, the drinking of wine from bowls, the eating of flesh every day, drunkenness and gluttony. The rich had turned from the good old simple ways of nomad life which the Eritan Rechabites maintained for centuries (Amos was virtually a Rechabite in spirit). Second, it was difficult for those not effectively represented in the local tribunal to get justice. Women who were wives or daughters might get protection through husbands and brothers; but the widow, the orphan, and the alien had nobody to speak up for them. The wealthy man had an enormous "pull" in his power to bribe the judges of a case. It was a hard thing to be poor in the Israel of those days; you might have to sell, not only your land-holding, but also your own person or that of your child, to get food for the rest of the family. In this way the smaller land-holdings were being absorbed into larger estates, and a "proletariat" was replacing peasant-proprietors. Third, the conditions of religious life were such as to antagonize fresh eyes trained to a desert-vision of the stern moralities and the absolute convictions. The method of worshipping Jehovah practiced at the "high-places" had been taken over from the Canaanites, with all its furniture and all its accompaniments. The Baal, or "lord," of each district was worshiped as the giver of its fertility; he was honored accordingly by sexual immorality. As Israelites gradually dispossessed Canaanites, Jehovah became heir to the worship and the sanctuaries of the Baals, and was regarded as the local Baal, his people settling down to agricultural life and needing a God of agriculture. Thus the God of the desert came to be worshiped even through "sacred" prostitutes, and the religion of Jehovah was becoming a nature-cult. This, then, was the triple deterioration against which the oracles of Amos are directed—the growing luxury, the cruel injustice and dishonesty, the flagrant immorality of religion, or, at least, the divorce of its ritual from morality. (For the relation of Amos and other prophets to religious ritual see art., The Religion of Israel, p. 168; cf. also intro. to Jeremiah, pp. 677–9.)

Political Background. The deplorable moral, social, and religious conditions were in large part the result of the external prosperity prevailing in Israel in the days of Amos. According to 11 Amos prophesied in the days of Jeroboam II (see comment on 11), one of the most successful rulers of the Northern Kingdom. The reigns of Jehu and Jehoahaz during the latter part of the ninth century had proved disastrous; but under Joash or Jehoash the fortunes of Israel began to turn (2 Kings 1325). In part the victories of Israel at this time were made possible by the advance of Assyria, which compelled Syria to withdraw her forces from the southwestern boundary and concentrate them against the powerful foe in the southeast.

The successes of Israel continued under Jeroboam II; he became a "saviour" of Israel (2 Kings 1427), recovered all the territory that had been lost, and added to it in every direction; he even captured Damascus (2 Kings 1423–29). These triumphs in war, issuing as they did in the revival of commerce and in the new development of internal resources, raised Israel to a pitch of power and prosperity greater than had been enjoyed since the days of Solomon.

Teaching of Amos. The marvelous prosperity of Israel brought great moral, social, and religious evils in its train. As a result the religion of Jehovah was endangered by two perils: (1) The moral and religious corruption described in the preceding paragraphs, which was due to a wrong conception of the character of Jehovah; (2) the successes of the Assyrians, which were to the great mass of people an evidence of the superior strength of the Assyrian deities, and might lead to apostasy from Jehovah. All four prophets of the eighth century—Amos and Hosea in Israel, Isaiah and Micah in Judah—were convinced that both dangers could best be met by a statement or restatement, on the one hand, of the true nature and character of Jehovah; on the other, of the proper relation between Jehovah and Israel, as also between Jehovah and the other nations. This need Amos and his contemporaries in the prophetic office sought to supply. With reference to Jehovah he teaches that he is the one and only true God. "No one," says Marti, "can fail to observe that in this belief of Amos monotheism is present in essence if not in name." Concerning this one God he holds: (1) He is a person; (2) he is all-powerful; (3) he is everywhere present; (4) he knows all things; (5) he is merciful; (6) above all else Amos insists that Jehovah is a righteous God, whose favor can be secured only by a life of righteousness.

These truths Amos does not discuss abstractly but in their practical bearing upon the past, present and future history of Israel; but while he deals primarily with the Israel of his own age, he gives expression to several religious and moral truths that are of permanent significance. Of these the more important are: (1) Justice between man and man is one of the divine foundations of society; (2) privilege implies responsibility; (3) failure to recognize responsibility will surely bring retribution; (4) nations and, by analogy, individuals are under obligation to live up to the measure of light and knowledge granted to them; (5) the most elaborate worship is but an insult to God when offered by those who have no mind to conform to his ethical demands.

The Book of Amos. The plan of the book is straightforward, and raises few literary or textual problems. There is an Introduction, (chs. 1 and 2) in which Amos surveys surrounding peoples and condemns some characteristic sin of theirs—that he may fulminate with more effect against the sins of Israel. There are three Addresses (chs. 3, 4 and 5-6), which start from Israel's privileges, to infer her special penalties, denounce the sins which have just been indicated, recall the warnings which have been neglected, and proclaim the mourning of that "Day of Jehovah" when the Assyrian invaders will execute the righteous indignation of God. There are five Visions of Judgment, symbolized by locusts (71-3), fire (74-6), plumb-line (77-9), summer-fruit (81-3, expanded in vv. 4-14), the smitten sanctuary (91-89). They suggestively indicate how a prophet worked up into rhythmical poetry some initial impulse, such as the idea of locusts as the devouring agents of Jehovah. An interesting paragraph of narrative (710-17), which a modern editor would put first of all, tells us about Amos and his experiences at Bethel. Finally, there is an Epilogue (98b-15) of later date, promising the restoration of prosperity.

CHAPTER I

1. Title. This (editorial) heading tells us that Amos (of whom nothing is known beyond what this book tells us; cf. 710f.) was a native of the Southern Kingdom (Tekoa is twelve miles south of Jerusalem), and that he prophesied about the northern one. Uzziah (i.e., Azariah, 2 Kings 151-7, 8, 13) dates about 789-740 B.C., and Jeroboam II (2 Kings 1423-29) about 782-743. The Dead Sea region is volcanic, hence the earthquake; the disturbance here referred to must have been severe, for it was remembered centuries afterward (Zech. 145).

2. The Preface. This verse strikes the fundamental note of judgment (cf. Joel 316) characterizing the book. The effect of the divine sentence of judgment, terrible as a lion's roar and as thunder (cf. Ps. 29), will be the desolation of the land, the drying up of its most essential and most striking verdure (so prolific on Mount Carmel).

CHAPTERS 13 TO 216: INDICTMENT AGAINST ISRAEL AND ITS NEIGHBORS

Amos in this section denounces, in an impressive and repeated formula, each of six surrounding nations, namely, the Aramæans of Damascus to the northeast (vv. 3-5), the Philistines of the southwest (vv. 6-8), the Phœnicians of the northwest (vv. 9, 10), the Edomites of the south (vv. 11, 12), the Ammonites (vv. 13-15) and the Moabites (21-3) of the east. He then directs the same formula against Judah (24, 5) and finally Israel (26-16), the surprising goal of his prophetic pilgrimage. He says in effect, "As God judges each of these nations for some typical sin, so he will judge you, his prosperous protégé" (32).

3-5. Damascus. Damascus was the capital of the most important Aramæan kingdom, and here represents the entire nation. It had dominated Israel in the ninth century, when Hazael had invaded Gilead (east of Jordan); he is said to have destroyed many Israelite prisoners, making them like dust of threshing (2 Kings 1032 137). Benhadad III was his son and successor (2 Kings 133). The repeated phrase, "for three . . . for four" means in Hebrew idiom "for many," "for more than enough." The punishment is the devouring fire of war, the breaking of the bronze or iron bar that secured the city gate; this threat was amply fulfilled by the Assyrian Tiglath-Pileser III in 733-732 B.C. Aven (or On) may refer to the temple of Baalbek in the valley between Hermon and Lebanon; the house of Eden may be Bit-Adini on the Euphrates; for the site of Kir, the original home of the Aramæans, see 97.

6-8. Philistia. Four of the five Philistine cities are named, the fifth being Gath. Their position was favorable to slave raids, for which they are here denounced. From the time of Tiglath-Pileser they suffered in successive Assyrian campaigns.

9, 10. Tyre. Tyre, the most important Phœnician city (Isa. 233), is accused of similar deeds (Ezek. 2713), and also of wronging its own (Phœnician) brethren. Tyre had to pay tribute to Tiglath-Pileser, but its chief disaster was the siege and capture by Alexander the Great (332 B.C.), when thirty thousand of its people were sold into slavery.

11, 12. Edom. Edom was the mountainous district on both sides of the Arabah, south of the Dead Sea; its people were traditionally regarded as the descendants of Esau (Gen. 361). Their unbrotherly conduct toward Israel ("Jacob") was chiefly exemplified long after the time of Amos, when Jerusalem was destroyed in 586 B.C. The Edomites subsequently occupied south Judæa, and were ultimately dispossessed of their former territory by the Nabatæan Arabs (cf. p. 785a). Teman, the north district of Edom (Ezek. 25¹³); Bozrah, capital of Teman (Isa. 34⁶), perhaps Busaireh, twenty miles southeast of the Dead Sea.

13-15. Ammon. Ammon, east of Jordan, south and west of the river Jabbok, and south of Gilead, was easily open to their invasion. For another example of their "methods of barbarism" see 1 Sam. 11². David conquered their capital, Rabbah, and put the inhabitants to hard labor (2 Sam. 12³¹, mg.). The motive of their invasion—not specially connected with the barbarity named—was territorial gain (cf. Judg. 11^{2, 13}). The shouting of battle is that of the assailants; the attack is figuratively described as a tempest. The words their king (Hebrew malcam) should perhaps be read, with some versions, as a proper name, Malcam or Milcom being the God of the Ammonites (1 Kings 11⁵).

CHAPTER II

1-3. Moab. Moab, east of the Dead Sea, is better known than the rest through the "Moabite Stone" (see p. 117b). Nothing is known of this particular tomb-desecration. Ancient peoples regarded dishonor to the dead as even more grievous than dishonor to the living, since it made the ghost or spirit to suffer and prevented rest in Sheol. Hence the maledictions on ancient tombs against their possible desecrators. Kerioth (site unknown) is named on the Moabite Stone. Moab was made tributary with the rest by Tiglath-Pileser.

4, 5. Judah. The only other references to Amos' own country are 12 6¹ 712^f. 911. The important word rendered law has a variety of meanings; it may denote teaching in a general sense (Isa. 11⁰), technical instruction given by a priest (Jer. 18¹⁸), a written code of law (Ex. 24¹² Deut. 15 Neh. 8¹), and "the Law" as the first part of the Hebrew canon (Psa. 119). Here it must mean religious and moral teaching given in Jehovah's name by priest or prophet. Lies stands for lying gods, i.e., idols or idolatries.

6-16. Israel. In these verses Amos comes to his main work, the rebuke of Israel, with which the rest of his prophecies are concerned. The sins condemned in this paragraph are bribery, a characteristic fault in the Oriental administration of justice (v. 6), the tyrannical oppression of the poor by the rich (v. 7), sexual immorality practiced in the name of religion (v. 7), the self-indulgent use of what has been wrung from the helpless (v. 8). Yet Jehovah deserves the gratitude shown in obedience, for it was he who dispossessed the former inhabitants of Canaan in favor of Israel, whom he led up to possess it. Besides this material gift, there was a spiritual one, for it was Jehovah who raised up inspired men to lead Israel, though his gift was scorned. So they will no more escape from the deserved judgment than a heavily laden cart can move swiftly; they will be held down to it, where they are. The form of the judgment will be defeat in battle; the enemy (obviously the unnamed Assyrians), after overthrowing the surrounding peoples, will finish with the northern kingdom, Israel.

Righteous (v. 6) is a forensic term, meaning "innocent"; a judge will give an unjust verdict for so small a bribe as a pair of sandals (1 Sam. 12³, mg.; there may be a reference to the symbolism of land-transfer, Ruth 4⁷ Psa. 60⁸). The obscure phrase in v. 7 (pant after, etc.) probably once read crush the head of the poor on the dust of the earth. The same verse refers to the sacred prostitutes found in the worship of the Baals, as of other nature-deities (Hos. 4¹⁴); the point of the reference is that this thing is done openly, as by father and son, not that both resort to the same prostitute. The clothes taken in pledge (v. 8) ought to have been returned to their owners before night (Ex. 22^{26f}). The fines extorted by injustice are spent in self-indulgence (v. 8). The whole attitude of Amos suggests the Rechabite protest against the civilization of Canaan (Jer. 35^{1f}. 2 Kings 10^{15f}). In vv. 9, 10, the "I" is emphatic; while you have done that, I have done this. Amorite is used generally for the ancient inhabitants of Canaan (Gen. 15¹⁶ 48²²); aborigines are often pictured as giants (Num. 13²² Deut. 12⁸ 21⁰, 20 31¹).

With the figure of the tree (v. 9) cf. the curse on Eshmunazar's tomb, "May he have no root beneath or fruit above" and our phrase, "root and branch." The Nazirites (cf. Rechabites) originally, like Samson (Judg. 13⁵. 7. 14 16¹⁷) and Samuel (1 Sam. 1¹¹), assumed the vow for life, perhaps as a protest against Canaanite innovations in Israel's life. In the later law, Num. 6²⁻²¹, the obligation is temporary; at the close of it the hair was sacrificed. They were "total abstainers" not only from intoxicants, but also from hair-cutting and the touching of corpses. In v. 13 the text expresses the impossibility of Israel's escape from the penalty; it may have read originally, I will make you creak [groan] as a heavily laden cart creaks, or even I will make you totter, etc.

CHAPTERS 3¹ TO 6¹⁴: DISCOURSES OF WARNING AND EXHORTATION

CHAPTER III

1-8. Privilege and Penalty. A new utterance, belonging to some other occasion, now begins, the first of three addresses (chs. 3-6). Israel's punishment will be proportionate to its privilege (vv. 1, 2); the prophet makes an important moral revaluation of the doctrine of divine election. (The reference to "the whole family" or clan shows that Judah is included, though the center of gravity of the whole people was in the north.) Here we see clearly the great change wrought by the eighth-century prophets; they denationalized religion by ethicizing it, for the truly ethical is the universal. The six rhetorical questions (vv. 3f.) lead up to the seventh (v. 6), and also to v. 8. All of them are illustrations of what we should call "cause and effect": Nothing happens without a cause; therefore, when you suffer, it is because Jehovah is punishing you, and when a prophet interprets it to you, it is because he is under compulsion to speak. The illustrations at the same time artistically prepare for the reference to the doom, by suggesting peril, except possibly the first (v. 3 mg.); this may refer to the need for an appointment when two are to come together, to avoid traveling alone on the lonely, robber-infested roads of Palestine. With the reference in v. 8 to the prophetic compulsion, cf. Jer. 20⁹ 23¹⁸, 22.

9-15. The Judgment of Samaria. In view of this approaching judgment, the very heathen of Philistia and Egypt are bidden to come and look on the disorder and oppression of Samaria; even they, men of violence as they are, will be shocked at what they see. Here, as elsewhere, it is the conduct of the rulers and upper classes which the democratic Amos has in view. The city of Samaria was built on an isolated hill, three hundred feet high, surrounded and overlooked by the mountains on three sides, and with a valley view of the sea (twenty-three miles) on the west. The position was almost impregnable, hence the long siege of 723-721 B.C. The special character of the site is indicated also in the phraseology of Isa. 28¹, where the walls of the city on this hill are compared with a drunken man's garland at a festival. It is, of course, the gains of "violence and robbery" that are stored up (v. 10). The threat of the prophet is that few of the wealthy will escape the judgment of war.

Amos looks on the luxury of the upper classes from the standpoint of the "proletariat"; even apart from moral issues, he seems to show a certain satisfaction in the prospect of its destruction. So complete will this be that nothing worth saving will be left (v. 12); according to the Book of the Covenant (Ex. 22¹³), a shepherd had to produce the remains of an animal torn by wild beasts in order to exonerate himself; thus the figure is drawn from the customs of the time. The corner of a couch is still regarded in the East as a place of honor; the silken cushions are expressed in the Hebrew by almost the same word as "Damascus" (mg.), of which city they are conjectured to be the product. In the coming judgment, of which the justice will be acknowledged by the on-lookers, both the sanctuary and the palace will perish. Bethel was that important and royal sanctuary of the Northern Kingdom ten miles north of Jerusalem at which Amos uttered his message, and called down the wrath of the priest, Amaziah (7^{10f.}). God of hosts (v. 13) refers to the abundant agencies and servants of God, probably his heavenly hosts, the angels (1 Kings 22¹⁹) and the stars (Deut. 4¹⁹), which were conceived as quasi-animate (Job 38⁷). Amos significantly refrains from ever calling Jehovah "the God of Israel."

The reference to the horns of the altar (v. 14) implies that the right of sanctuary (1 Kings 1⁵⁰ 22⁸) will be lost. Originally the skin of the sacrificial victim with horns attached may have been spread on the altar (literally, "place of sacrifice"). In later usage, there were four horns, i.e., artificial projections at the four corners of the altar (Ex. 27²) on which the blood of the victim was smeared (Lev. 4⁷). The winter house with the summer house seems to denote the (single) luxurious building which has an upper story or higher structure on the roof, for use in hot weather (Judg. 3²⁰, "upper chamber of cooling," R.V. mg.; in Jer. 36²², Jehoikim is said to have a brazier burning in his winter house). In an Aramaic inscription of Zinjirli of about this date a royal tomb is described as both a winter house and a summer house. The houses of ivory are those decorated with it (Psa. 45⁸ 1 Kings 22³⁹); similarly, in 6⁴ Amos inveighs against "beds of ivory."

CHAPTER IV

1-3. The Luxurious Women of Samaria. The women, addressed as kine of Bashan, next arouse the prophet's wrath. These women of the "smart set" oppress the poor through their husbands, who have to get the wealth, by hook or by crook, which their wives demand for their own self-indulgence. Bashan is the fertile and extensive district east and northeast of the Sea of Galilee, noted for its pastures (Mic. 7¹⁴) and, therefore, for its flocks and herds (Ezek. 39¹⁸: "rams, lambs, goats, bullocks, all of them fatlings of Bashan"). These fatted animals—the pampered ladies of Samaria—are to be dragged out of their luxurious palaces like fish out of the water. Through the breaches made by the besiegers in the city wall before they captured it, they will be driven out, a train of captives, allowed to turn neither right nor left.

(The Assyrians actually did lead captives by a ring through the upper lip.) Residue is meant to suggest how few will escape, even so. Harmon is unknown, and the whole clause is dubious. The holiness of God by which he swears has been insulted by Israel's sin; the note of majesty and inviolable separateness is always found in the term "holy," in addition to the moral content given to it by the prophets.

4-13. Neglected Warnings. The prophet now turns from the ruling classes to rebuke the futile religiosity of the common people, who flock to the sanctuaries. They have neglected the five warnings of famine (v. 6), drought (vv. 7, 8), blight and locusts (v. 9), pestilence and slaughter (v. 10), earthquake (v. 11), here described, with the identical refrain, "yet have ye not returned unto me." "Let Israel, therefore, now prepare for judgment." For Bethel see 314; Gilgal, the "circle" of stones near Shechem (Deut. 11³⁰ 2 Kings 21⁴³⁸). A glimpse of periodic (annual) visits to a sanctuary is given in 1 Sam. 1; the present reference may be purposely exaggerated sarcasm: sacrifice every morning instead of every year, pay tithes every three days instead of every three years (Deut. 14²⁸). Leaven (v. 5) was forbidden in Hebrew sacrifice (Ex. 23¹⁸ Lev. 21¹⁶¹⁷).

V. 7 means that the heavy rains of winter, normally beginning six months before harvest, i.e., in November, have been withheld until January or February; the local irregularity of the rainfall, such as it was, made the warning more significant. The fullest account of a locust-plague (v. 9b) is given by Joel (14^f); after the manner of Egypt (v. 10), because Egypt was notorious for diseases and epidemics (Deut. 28²⁷); the stink of your camp is due to the unburied corpses. The "overthrow" of v. 11 is that of earthquake, cf. 1¹ and Gen. 19²⁵ (same verb); as a brand plucked out of the burning (Zech. 3²) means that they barely escaped complete destruction. V. 12 is a threat of doom, thus referring to an undefined penalty in the future, though the mission of the prophet as a whole implies a call to repentance. For high places, i.e., mountains, as trodden by Jehovah, cf. Mic. 1³.

CHAPTER V

1-17. Israel to be Punished; A Righteous Remnant. In v. 2 is the "dirge" of Israel, which is to be destroyed in battle (v. 3); not the sanctuaries but Jehovah alone can save (vv. 4-9). The fruits of oppression will not be enjoyed (vv. 11-13). Do justly, and Jehovah will be gracious (vv. 14, 15); as it is, the "dirge" shall be sung by Israel in mourning (vv. 16, 17). The "dirge" of v. 2, written in the regular Kinah rhythm of 3:2 beats, is the death-song of the nation; cf. Ezek. 28¹², and the two dirges of David over Saul and Jonathan (2 Sam. 11^{7f}.) and Abner (333, 34). The army of v. 3 is mustered by cities, every citizen having his military duty. For Bethel and Gilgal, see 44. Beersheba (Gen. 21³¹ 26²³¹), twenty-eight miles southwest of Hebron, was regarded as the most southern point of Canaan, as in the phrase "from Dan to Beersheba." There is a play on names in the Hebrew of v. 5, somewhat as though we said, "Gilgal shall glide into gloom; the house of God shall be a house of gore" (this, however, is not a translation).

The house of Joseph (v. 6) is the Northern Kingdom, its central unit, Ephraim, being traditionally descended from Joseph's son. Wormwood (v. 7), a bitter herb (Prov. 5⁴) here used figuratively of bitter things. Vv. 8, 9 (which read like an interpolation) point to two conspicuous sights of the sky by night (Job 9⁹ 38³¹) to illustrate Jehovah's creative power, also seen in the succession of day and night, and in rain floods (Job 36²⁷⁻³⁰, mg.) drawn up from the sea. The gate (vv. 10, 12) is where justice is administered (Ruth 4^{1f}. Prov. 31²³). With v. 14, as ye say, cf. Mic. 3¹¹. V. 15 anticipates Isaiah's characteristic doctrine of the righteous remnant. In the coming doom the unskilled and the skilled in the professional lament will join together (v. 16b), the vineyard songs of joy will become wails of sorrow (v. 17). For the professional mourners, still employed in Syria, see Jer. 9¹⁷. The passing through of Jehovah (v. 17) will be like his passing through Egypt (Ex. 12¹²) when he smote the first-born.

18-27. The Day of Jehovah. The first of two Woes (cf. ch. 6) is directed against those who desire the intervention of Jehovah in misplaced confidence that God is on their side (contrast Lincoln's anxiety to be on God's side). Amos is here ethicizing the current eschatology; the "day of Jehovah"—i.e., the day on which Jehovah will manifest himself in the destruction of his enemies and the exaltation of his friends—will enforce the demand for justice and social righteousness, in place of elaborate religiosity. In the doom that is coming escape from one peril will only reveal another, either without or within the house (v. 19). The feasts (v. 21; cf. 8¹⁰) are pilgrimage-festivals (Ex. 23¹⁴), such as that of Ingathering (1 Kings 12³²) instituted by Jeroboam I; for a similar condemnation of assemblies in the Southern Kingdom, see Isa. 1¹³. The burnt-offerings (v. 22), wholly consumed on the altar, and the peace-offerings, forming the material for a communion feast, were the two chief forms of pre-exilic sacrifice; the third kind of sacrifice here was probably vegetable. The viols (v. 23) or harps were used both for sacred (Psa. 332) and secular music (Amos 65).

V. 24 is the key verse of the entire book: Justice, not sacrifice. The question in v. 25 is a rhetorical one, expecting the answer, "No." In the golden age of Israel's desert youth there were no such sacrifices as you now offer, yet I cared for you then (cf. 29. 10, and contrast Psa. 95¹⁰). This is the common prophetic view; cf. Jer. 7²²: "For I spake not unto your fathers nor commanded them in the day that I brought them out of the land of Egypt, concerning burnt-offerings or sacrifices." It would be very hard to explain such passages, if the elaborate sacrificial law had really come by Moses. The obscure v. 26 appears to refer to Assyrian (Babylonian) star-worship, "Siccuth" and "Chium" both designating the planet-god, Saturn; Israel shall take its false gods with it into exile (mg.). The R.V. rendering gives the sense much better than A.S.V. (For a more detailed discussion of this difficult verse see larger commentaries.) But the verse is probably a gloss, as Amos nowhere else refers to worship of other gods, but only to the false worship of Jehovah. Beyond Damascus, i.e., into Assyria, lying to the northeast of it.

CHAPTER VI

1-6. Selfishness and Luxury. The selfish luxury of Samaria's rulers (vv. 1-6), described in the second "Woe," will be punished by exile, as the culmination of a siege of terrible suffering (vv. 7-11). The moral perversity of Israel (vv. 12, 13) has caused Jehovah to send this invasion. With the opening characterization of luxury (v. 1), cf. Isa. 32⁷; v. 2 gives historical examples of the might of Assyria, from which Israel can have no hope of escape. Calneh may be the Kulunu near Babylon conquered by the Assyrians in 738 B.C.; Hamath, one hundred and fifty miles north of Damascus on the Orontes, was taken by Sargon in 720; Gath was taken in 711 (cf. 2 Chr. 26⁶, of an event about 760 B.C.). Either the reference is to earlier disasters to these cities of which we do not know, or, as is perhaps more likely, the verse is a later addition. Another less probable view regards these cities as examples of prosperity; Israel's is greater. Beds of ivory (v. 4; cf. 3¹²), i.e., decorated, inlaid, with it. Sennacherib in 701 B.C. took from Hezekiah as part of his tribute "couches of ivory." The reference to David certainly suggests that in the time of Amos he was famous for secular rather than for sacred music; they think themselves second Davids. They drink from bowls, because cups will not satisfy their greed. The affliction (literally, "wound") of Joseph (v. 6) is the evil of his present condition, presaging disaster.

7-14. Sufferings of Exile. Those who were foremost in luxury shall be foremost in going into exile (v. 7). The pride of Jacob (v. 8, mg.) is the material prosperity of which Israel was so proud (cf. the parallel, "palaces"). The pestilence that accompanies the siege will destroy the mere handful left in some palace. The enigmatic v. 10 means that when a man's uncle, as next of kin, comes to bury him, and burn spices in the funeral rites (2 Chr. 16¹⁴ 21¹⁹ Jer. 34⁵), only one survivor is found, lurking terror-stricken in the remote parts of the palace, who begs that Jehovah be not invoked (as in lament or prayer) lest further disasters from him be provoked. This coming ruin will fall alike on great and small (v. 11). V. 12 describes Israel's conduct as unnatural, as unnatural as the running of horses on crags, the plowing of the sea with oxen (so render by a re-division of the Hebrew letters). The reference in v. 13 to a thing of naught conceals the place-name "Lo-debar," and that to horns the place-name "Karnaim"; these insignificant places east of Jordan (2 Sam. 94¹. 17²⁷ Josh. 13²⁶ 1 Macc. 526, 43¹.) were perhaps captured by Jeroboam II; Amos here puns on their names. The entrance to Hamath (v. 14; cf. 62) is the pass between the Lebanons; the brook of the Arabah may be the Wady el-Ahsa, flowing into the Arabah three miles south of the Dead Sea.

CHAPTERS 71 TO 98a: FIVE VISIONS OF JUDGMENT

The "Visions" of Amos, forming the third part of the book, are not literary devices, though poetically developed; they come from the psychic experiences which the prophet regarded as "objective" or external fact. Psychologically, they are shaped by his own consciousness and experience; philosophically, they represent the mysterious point of contact between human and divine personality. The first vision relates to the springtime, and the locust plague already named (49) as a warning. The second relates to the drought (also previously named, 47) of the summer heat, so that Amos seems to be speaking in the autumn, perhaps at the autumnal festival. The third vision, on the other hand, refers to a coming judgment by the plumb-line, not to be checked, like its forerunners, by the divine mercy and the prophet's appeal, but final and complete. The two remaining visions show the end itself, first by a symbol that suggests the word "end," and also represents Israel as ripe for destruction, and second by the spectacle of Jehovah actually destroying the temple of Bethel.

CHAPTER VII

1-3. The Vision of Locusts. Jehovah is seen creating the larvæ of locusts, which become full-grown locusts (so LXX) by the time the spring crop (latter growth) has yielded the customary tribute of the king's mowings (cf. 1 Kings 47 1 Sam. 8¹⁵, 17, of tithe). Part of the spring herbage was collected to feed the royal horses (cf. 1 Kings 185). The Romans taxed Syrian pasture ground in the spring for their cavalry (W. R. Smith, Religion of the Semites, p. 246).

4-6. The Vision of Fire. A forest and field fire, frequent and dangerous in Syria, especially after long drought (cf. Joel 1¹⁹, 20); here the fire is so intense that even the subterranean waters (the great deep, Gen. 7¹¹), from which all springs and fountains are fed, are dried up. If the phrase called to contend is original, it uses the figure of a forensic controversy, Jehovah's representative being irresistible fire (Isa. 66¹⁶ Hos. 41 Mic. 62).

7-9. The Vision of the Plumb-line. This differs from the two preceding visions, which referred to the past, by its reference to a coming judgment, through Assyrian invasion (the sword, v. 9). The prophet has no longer an opportunity to intercede. The vertical wall, supposed to be built in true perpendicular by the aid of a plumb-line, is now tested, and found to be out of plumb (Isa. 28¹⁷ Zech. 4¹⁰). God will no longer pass by them in forgiveness (Mic. 7¹⁸). Isaac (cf. v. 16) is used for Israel by Amos only, perhaps it points to a claim of the Northern Kingdom to go back beyond the Jacob-Edom stage of history. The high places and the sanctuaries are not denounced by Amos as illegitimate rivals of the one sanctuary in Jerusalem (cf. Deut. 7), but because the worship is either immoral or nonmoral; here, with the house of Jeroboam (cf. Hos. 14), they are symbols of the nation's power and pride.

10-17. Amos at Bethel. This narrative interrupts the series of five visions, but at the most suitable point, since the prophet has just named the reigning king, so that the interruption may represent an historical fact. Amaziah (not elsewhere named), the priest of this sanctuary only, sends to the king (probably to the capital, Samaria, twenty-four miles north); but after sending a messenger he feels free to proceed on his own initiative. He addresses Amos by the old name for "prophet," namely "seer" (1 Sam. 99; cf. 2 Sam. 24¹¹, here possibly=visionary), telling him to earn his living (eat bread) in his own land of Judah

(cf. 1 Sam. 97, 8 Mic. 3¹¹). Amos disclaims professional prophetic status, without any contempt for it (cf. 21¹, 12 37. 8). He does not belong to the professional guild (v. 14, mg.); he is a herdsman who also treated sycamores (properly the fig-mulberries, Psa. 78⁴⁷), which grew below Tekoa, by puncturing or nipping the figlike fruit, so that insects infesting it might escape. An harlot in the city (v. 17) is a strong phrase describing capture and open abuse by the Assyrians, whose land is described as unclean from the standpoint of the worshipers of Jehovah; they thought of him as more or less bound to his own land (1 Sam. 26¹⁹).

CHAPTER VIII

1-3. The Vision of the Basket of Summer Fruit. The Hebrew word for summer fruit (kaitz) suggests the Hebrew word for "end" (kelz), while the ripeness of the fruit itself suggests that Israel is ripe for destruction (cf. the similar play on the word for "almond-tree" in Jer. 1^{11f}. mg.). With the vision in general we may compare Jeremiah's vision of two baskets of figs (ch. 24), good and bad, representing the Jews of Babylon and Judæa respectively. The Hebrew consonants in v. 3a should be rendered "the singing women of the palace shall howl"; follow mg. for v. 3b.

4-14. The Day of Jehovah Again. There follows an address, in the manner of chs. 3-5, denouncing greed, dishonesty, and oppression (vv. 4-6), and portraying the terrors of the "Day of Jehovah" (vv. 7f.), for those who "crush" (rather than swallow up, v. 4) the poor (cf. 27 and versions). The day of the new moon was observed as a religious festival, probably with suspension of trade (2 Kings 423 1 Sam. 205^f. Hos. 2¹¹), and was originally more important than the sabbath (here first named in prophetic literature; cf. Ex. 208). The ephah was a dry measure, estimated at about eight gallons (in Zech. 57 it is big enough for a woman to sit in it); the shekel, meaning "weight," is the weight of silver or gold to be given in exchange for the corn; the Hebrews had no coined money prior to the return from exile, though ingots of known weight circulated. The passage describes three ways of cheating—by short measure, by obtaining more gold or silver than was just through heavier weights, and by using untrue balances. V. 6a seems interpolated (cf. 26); v. 6b names a fourth way of cheating, by depreciation of the quality of what is sold.

The excellency of Jacob (v. 7), that in which he has "pride" (abhorred by Jehovah in 68). For this (v. 8), i.e., the wickedness of Israel. The land is pictured as convulsed, like the Nile in its annual inundation, when its waters become turbid and red. In regard to v. 9, it should be noted that an eclipse was visible from Jerusalem in 763 B.C. The sackcloth (v. 10) was coarse cloth of goats' or camels' hair, worn by prophets (Isa. 20²) and mourners (Isa. 15³)—perhaps as the retention of more primitive costume. The baldness is that artificially produced by mourners (Isa. 15² Deut. 14¹). The result of the helpless terror will be an unsatisfied longing for Jehovah (vv. 11, 12). From sea to sea might refer to the Mediterranean and Dead Seas, but is more likely to mean the sea which is supposed to surround the earth (Psa. 72⁸ Zech. 9¹⁰). The sin (guilt) of Samaria (v. 14) is the "calf," the bull-image of Bethel (Hos. 10⁸); at Dan there was another "calf" (1 Kings 12²⁹). The way of Beersheba is used in an oath like "by the pilgrimage" (to Mecca).

CHAPTER IX

1-8a. The Vision of the Smitten Sanctuary. The fifth and last vision shows Jehovah actually in the act of destroying the sanctuary, presumably that of Bethel. An angel is told to strike at the head of the pillars, bringing down the roof on the heads of the worshipers; any who are not so destroyed will be killed by the sword, without exception; no remotest spot will afford a refuge to any (vv. 1-4). The description of Jehovah's power in vv. 5, 6 may be an interpolation (cf. 4¹³ 5⁸). Israel can plead no prerogative; she shall be treated like other kingdoms whose movements Jehovah controls (vv. 7, 8a).

With the (unnamed) destroying angel of v. 1, cf. the angel of pestilence of 2 Sam. 24¹⁶. The pillars are the capitals, the tops of the pillars enlarged to support the roof; the thresholds here represent the foundations. The reference to Sheol (v. 2, R.V. mg.) as a subterranean cavern in the center of the earth is to be taken literally. While Jehovah states that he will pursue the fugitives as far as Sheol and drag them back, the passage does not mean that Jehovah's rule is yet thought to extend normally to Sheol, as is implied in the late psalm, 139⁸⁻¹² (see p. 173). For the contrast of heaven and Sheol, as upper and lower limits, see Job 11⁸ Mt. 11²³. The top of Carmel (v. 3) is eighteen hundred feet above the sea, with innumerable caves in its limestone, and hiding places in its forests. The bottom ("floor") of the sea is the last refuge of despair, naturally suggested by the promontory of Carmel. The serpent is the mythical sea monster, the dragon of the deep, the Tiamat of Babylonian myth, described in an inscription of 1500 B.C. as "a raging serpent" (cf. Isa. 27¹). In v. 6 we have a summary of Hebrew cosmology; the ends of the solid sky-vault rest on the earth, while above it are built the store-chambers of rain, etc. (Psa. 104¹³ Job 38^{22f.}). The Ethiopians (v. 7) of Nubia were known for their dark skin (Jer. 13²³), and therefore were despised: "you are no more to me than those Negroes." Caphor was probably Crete (Deut. 22³); the Philistine invaders were a non-Semitic people. Kir (cf. 15), named with Elam in Isa. 22⁶, possibly west of the Caspian Sea.

THE EPILOGUE

8b-15. Preservation and Exaltation of a Remnant. I will not utterly destroy. The careful reader will note the transition of thought here from menace to comfort. The reason for regarding the rest of this chapter as probably later than Amos is not that Amos might not have added comfort to his menace, at some later stage of his prophetic activity, but that this comfort is in terms of post-exilic thought and language (see Driver, Joel and Amos, pp. 119f.). The previous moral emphasis is changed into one of material prosperity. The booth (tabernacle) of David (v. 11), i.e., the Davidic monarchy, is described as "fallen," which was not true before 586 B.C. Amos might have prophesied its fall—but hardly its restoration when nobody believed that it would fall. The term "booth" itself suggests the low estate of the Davidic line; it denoted a rough shelter for cattle (Gen. 33¹⁷), for soldiers on campaign (2 Sam. 11¹¹), for watchers in vineyards (Isa. 1⁸). The figure of the sieve (v. 9) transforms Israel's Exile from penalty to discipline. In the sieve of captivity, Israel's true wheat is sifted from the chaff-dust (the sinners of my people, v. 10), which falls to the ground, without loss of a single grain. The reference to Edom (v. 12) brings out the post-exilic enmity to Edom, due to its actions in 586 B.C. (cf. Obadiah, Psa. 60⁸ 137⁷). The phrase called by my name should be over whom my name is called, in ownership (2 Sam. 12²⁸ Deut. 28¹⁰). The lands once conquered for Jehovah by David and subsequently lost shall be again possessed.

In those prosperous days (vv. 13-15), corn will ripen so quickly that there will be hardly any interval between ploughing and reaping; the treading out of the grapes from the September vintage will take so long, because of its abundance, that before it is over it will be necessary to start sowing seed for the next crops. Vines were planted on the mountain slopes (v. 13b); the sweet wine is the pressed-out juice, unfermented. The phrase bring again the captivity may mean simply "change the fortunes" (Hos. 6¹¹, etc.). With this general picture of the future, cf. Isa. 65^{21f.} Ezek. 28²⁶.

OBADIAH

BY PROFESSOR W. GLADSTONE WATSON

INTRODUCTION

The Author and His Message. There are thirteen persons bearing the name Obadiah mentioned in the O.T. but we cannot identify the author of this book with any one of them. The name means "worshiper of Jehovah," and it is possible that the name is not a proper name at all, but simply an appellative noun. The book is the shortest in the O.T., containing only twenty-one verses. It is a prophecy of doom upon Edom, because of its overweening pride and bitter hatred of Judah (vv. 1-14); and of the restoration of Israel and the universal rule of Jehovah (vv. 15-21).

Unity and Date. These two questions must be considered together. In vv. 10-14 there is a reference to the hateful conduct of Edom on the occasion of the capture and spoliation of Jerusalem. There were four occasions on which Jerusalem fell before invaders, but the only one which satisfies the conditions reflected in the book is that of 586 B.C., when Nebuchadrezzar sacked the city and carried off its inhabitants. This would fix the date of the book later than that event. But the question is complicated by vv. 1b-5, which occur in almost identical language in Jer. 49:14-16, 9. Which of these is the original? Or did Obadiah and Jeremiah both copy from some earlier prophecy? The presence of additions in each, and of other differences, has convinced many scholars that both passages are derived from some earlier prophecy. This earlier prophecy may be assigned to the reign of Ahaz, when Edom smote Judah and carried away captives (2 Chr. 28:17; cf. 2 Kings 16:6); but this date is by no means certain.

The difficulty does not end here. The latter part of the book, vv. 15-21, is apocalyptic in character, and its point of view calls for a rather late post-exilic date. The language and style also differ from that of the earlier part of the book. The probability, therefore, is that the present book of Obadiah contains material from three different periods. The original prophecy, vv. 1b-5, may belong to the eighth century; the middle portion, vv. 6-14, would be suitable anywhere in the century following the fall of Jerusalem; the apocalyptic portion, vv. 15-21, may be assigned to the latter part of the fifth century or even later. To which of these sections the name "Obadiah" attaches is purely a matter of conjecture.

Edom and the Edomites. The territory of Edom lay south of the Dead Sea on either side of the Arabah, and was about one hundred miles long by less than fifty wide. The eastern range, though consisting of high rocky ridges with deep defiles, contained considerable good land and was well watered. Its mountain fastnesses made it very difficult of invasion. The original inhabitants were called Horites, which probably means "cave dwellers." They were dispossessed and probably absorbed by the Edomites. According to the biblical story, Esau, the twin brother of Jacob, was the father of the latter. In the Egyptian records the Edomites and Israelites appear for the first time in the thirteenth century. Edom seems to have made a permanent settlement earlier than Israel, for she blocked the road for Israel, while on the way to Canaan. The hostility displayed at that time marked her history to the very end (see Num. 20:14-21 Psa. 60:8 137 Jer. 25:12-14; but cf. Deut. 23:7, notes).

David subdued Edom. Solomon continued to hold it and carried on a flourishing trade through the port of Elath on the Gulf of Akabah, but before the end of his reign Edom rebelled under Hadad (cf. 1 Kings 11:14-22). This does not seem to have interfered with the trade route to the sea, and after the division of the kingdom Judah controlled it for a long time, with some interruptions. In the reign of Ahaz (about 734 B.C.) Edom seems to have taken advantage of Judah's struggle with Rezin of Damascus; it seized Elath, thus destroying Judah's sea trade, smote Judah and carried off captives (2 Chr. 28:17; cf. 2 Kings 16:6).

During the following years, when all the little kingdoms of western Asia were engaged in a life-and-death struggle with Assyria, the enmity between the two peoples did not cease, and when Jerusalem fell, in 586 B.C., the Edomites not only gloated over Judah's calamity, but apparently participated in the plunder of Jerusalem. Shortly afterward the Edomites seized southern Judah and extended their borders northward beyond Hebron. It is conjectured that this invasion was due in part to pressure from the Nabatæans, who in the fourth century were firmly established in Edom, with their capital at Petra. With the establishment of the Nabatæan kingdom the name of the country was changed to Arabia.

Petræa. The Edomites, who had moved into Judah, became known as Idumæans; eventually, in 128 B.C., they were conquered by John Hyrcanus and forced to accept Judaism. The Herods of N.T. times were Idumæans. (See art., History of Hebrew and Jewish People, p. 71b.)

Teaching. The first impression made by the book of Obadiah is that it is a hymn of hate, devoid of any religious lesson. Its theme is the doom of Edom; its spirit is that of vengeful retaliation. No doubt there was some reason for this temper. Israel had many enemies, but there was none so persistent and implacable as Edom. Trade rivalry, especially the struggle for the road to the sea, was a constant source of irritation which kept alive the ancient grudge. That which especially embittered Israel against Edom was the latter's malicious spirit at the fall of Jerusalem. This was aggravated shortly after when Judah was invaded and a permanent settlement effected by the Edomites. Judah was thereby reduced almost to extinction. Nearly all the O.T. passages, which, like the book of Obadiah, are bitterly resentful toward Edom, belong to this period.

G. A. Smith has suggested a deeper cause for Israel's attitude. It lay in the temperament, character, and ideals of the two peoples. In the story of their ancestors, Jacob, in spite of his cunning, was the man of ideals, while Esau would "take the cash and let the credit go." In the history of the two peoples the same differences were perpetuated. Edom was self-satisfied, confident in her isolation and hidden wealth, without pity, and keeping her wrath hot forever (Amos 1¹¹). She was reputed to have wisdom, but her wisdom was merely shrewd worldliness, not the wisdom which has its beginning in the fear of Jehovah. She was the typically irreligious nation. Israel, on the other hand, was the supremely religious nation, cherishing her ideals and yearning after God and the establishment of his righteous rule on earth. She was the people of faith and never was her faith stronger than in the post-exilic age. Though her city and Temple were ruined, her people scattered like sheep among the nations, the name of her God dishonored, yet in her suffering and humiliation under the tyranny and insolence of the heathen she still believed in God and in the ultimate triumph of his kingdom. To her indignant and passionate heart, the whole heathen world in its opposition to God seemed to be summed up in Edom, and she could not think of its destruction except as the necessary step to the inauguration of God's kingdom. With the destruction of the heathen world there would come the restoration of Israel to her own land, and then the kingdom would be the Lord's. This was the great consummation, and Israel's function in the world was to bear witness to this faith.

Obadiah's eyes were too full of tears to see, his heart too bitter to feel, that the heathen must be included in God's purposes of mercy, but he did believe that, in spite of all appearances, God is sovereign and ultimately the kingdom must be the Lord's. What this prophet saw with such conviction, and yet so imperfectly, finds its fulfillment in Christ and his kingdom—a kingdom without geographical limits or racial distinctions, a kingdom to be won, not by the physical destruction of his enemies, but by the power of the cross, the power of love. Obadiah was a long way from the spirit which could pray, "Father, forgive them; for they know not what they do," but he was on the way, and hence this little book, in spite of its narrow nationalism, finds a place in the unfolding revelation of God.

THE PROPHECY

The book falls naturally into three divisions, vv. 1-9, 10-14, 15-21.

i-9. Condemnation of Edom. The opening sentence is the introduction to the whole book, and implies a communication from God received in an ecstatic state. In vv. 1b-5 there is a prophecy concerning Edom quoted from some pre-exilic source. The prophet hears that a confederacy is being formed against Edom; its success is assured by a divine revelation. Edom's boasted security in her mountain fastnesses will not save her, for Jehovah accepts her proud challenge and declares that he will bring her down. The destruction will be worse than the devastation wrought by the harvesting of thieves or grape-gatherers, for they would leave something, but Edom's destruction will be complete.

Vv. 7-9 describe an overthrow of Edom which may be regarded as a fulfillment of the previous prediction. Her treasures hidden in caves have been searched out and carried away. Her former allies have turned against her, driven her from her land and left her utterly bewildered. This probably refers to the Nabatean invasion (see intro.), which may have taken place in the fifth century. Vv. 8, 9 may be part of the pre-exilic oracle. It announces that the proverbial wise men of Edom shall fail to deliver their nation from disaster. Her mighty men shall fail just as completely. Teman, a district of Edom, stands for the whole land (Jer. 497). The LXX and Vulgate transfer by slaughter to v. 10, "for the slaughter."

10-14. Cause of Edom's Downfall. Edom's hostility to Israel in the day of her calamity is given as the reason for her overthrow. The day when foreigners entered the gates of Jerusalem, carried away her goods and cast lots for her captives was in 586 B.C., when Nebuchadnezzar utterly destroyed it (see 2 Kings 24, 25; cf. Jer. 52). Edom shared in the spoliation (cf. Ezek. 25), as Jeremiah had predicted (Jer. 497-22). The negative imperatives in vv. 12-14 are probably to be taken as representing in a very vivid way what Edom actually did at that time. She rejoiced over the fall of Jerusalem, and showed it either by insulting speech, or by making her mouth large with derisive laughter; she entered into the gates of Jerusalem, gazed with satisfaction upon its calamity and looted its goods; she cut off the escaping fugitives and delivered them into slavery. The latter half of v. 15 is the sequel of this passage, and announces that Edom shall be paid in kind.

15-21. Judgment Upon Edom—Exaltation of Zion. This section, which is from a later hand, is concerned with the day of judgment upon the nations, especially upon Edom. The day of Jehovah was thought of as a day in which his character would be vindicated; which in pre-exilic times meant chiefly the destruction of the sinners in Israel. With the fall of Jerusalem the situation was changed. Jehovah's judgment had fallen with crushing weight upon Israel; it must now fall upon the nations, while the purified remnant of Israel may look for restoration. During the Exile and long afterward, the faith of the Jews was sorely tried. Their enemies were triumphant, they were in much affliction. But faith did not die.

Any disaster that fell upon an enemy was hailed as a sign that Jehovah was at last going to judge the nations and bring consolation to his people. (For fuller reference to the "Day of Jehovah," see commentary on Joel; cf. also pp. 206-7).

In v. 16 the Jews are addressed. They have drunk the cup of suffering; now the nations shall drink it to the dregs. Mount Zion (v. 17) designates Jerusalem as well as the surrounding country. Those that escape—the purified remnant of Israel, including those who return from exile to possess their old territory. To speak of Jerusalem as holy means that no foreigners shall be there (cf. Joel 317). According to v. 18 the two kingdoms of Israel are thought of as reunited; together they are to participate in the destruction of Edom. The translation of v. 19 is uncertain, but the general sense is that Judah will expand in all directions. In the post-exilic age Judah was reduced to a mere parish, but in the day of Jehovah it will include Edom on the south, Philistia on the west, Ephraim on the north and Gilead across the Jordan. Cf. the universalism of Isa. 22-4 Mic. 41-5.

The text of v. 20 is very corrupt; following the LXX, Wade translates "and the captivity of this fortress (Samaria) of the children of Israel shall possess the land of the Canaanites even unto Zarephath." This means that the children of those deported at the fall of Samaria shall return and possess the country northward to Phœnicia. The latter part of the verse means that the exiles from Jerusalem shall repossess the South. Thus the nation once more united will possess practically the old kingdom of David. Sepharad is of uncertain locality. Saviours may refer to strong leaders like the old judges. The kingdom shall be the Lord's—the destruction of Edom, which represents the world hostile to Jehovah, shall establish Jehovah's supremacy. In spite of the narrow nationalism exhibited in this book, and its bitter hatred of Edom, the prophet is reaching out to the day when Jehovah shall be King of kings and Lord of lords.

JONAH

BY PROFESSOR WILLIAM C. GRAHAM

The Literary Form and the Text. The book of Jonah is a story written in limpidly clear narrative prose. At only one point does it depart from this literary style, namely, 22-9, where there stands a poem purporting to be the prayer uttered by Jonah during his incarceration in the great fish. This poem, be it noted, may be lifted bodily from the text without in any way disturbing the unity of the narrative itself. We shall here follow the method suggested by this and consider the poem separately.

While the Hebrew text is singularly free from difficulties, a few textual notes are added to help the exposition.

Salient Points of the Narrative. The narrative is easily followed, but there are certain salient points which may be passed over if not drawn to the attention. They are here briefly suggested together with necessary historical and topographical notes. The text of the tale should now be read with special attention to these points.

There are in the narrative four crises. In the case of the first three of these relief is vouchsafed by a happy turn of events. In the last, or major crisis, or climax of the story, relief is denied, so that it ends on a note of tragedy. By these crises the tale falls into four phases as follows: (1) 1¹⁶, where a tragic fate is averted from the fragile ship and its crew. (2) 2¹⁰, where Jonah escapes by a miracle from what seems like certain, horrible death. (3) 3¹⁰, where Nineveh escapes a terrible fate. (4) 4¹¹, where the repentant Jonah is left unmoved by the divine effort to save him from himself. Let us consider the salient points of the story phase by phase.

First Phase, 1¹⁻¹⁶. Jonah is the recipient of a commission, directly from Jehovah, to warn Nineveh of the consequences of its evil ways (vv. 1, 2). The only other mention of a prophet by the name of Jonah is found in 2 Kings 14²⁵, from which we learn that one so named exercised his ministry in the Northern Kingdom (Israel) during the reign of Jeroboam II (783-742 B.C.). Nineveh was the capital of the Assyrian empire, located on the eastern bank of the Tigris opposite modern Mosul. It was made the capital of Assyria by Sennacherib and was destroyed by the Medes and Persians in 612 B.C. Its area was at most not more than three square miles and its population a good deal under two hundred thousand. Jonah seeks to escape from the authority of Jehovah by flight from Joppa, seaport of Jerusalem, to Tarshish, a Semitic mining colony in the southwest of Spain (v. 3). The storm is sent by Jehovah to frustrate Jonah's design (v. 4). Other events follow in rapid succession; note, especially, the contrast between Jonah's behavior and that of the crew during the storm (vv. 4, 5); the readiness of the captain to accept assistance from Jonah's God (v. 6); the selection of Jonah as the guilty party by what virtually amounted to the modern flipping of a coin (v. 7); Jonah's profession of religion (v. 9); his magnanimity in confessing his fault and readiness to bear the consequences (v. 12); the reluctance of the sailors to cast Jonah overboard in order to save themselves (v. 13); their final yielding to the demands of self-interest (v. 15); the immediate subsidence of the storm and the escape of the mariners (c. 15); the spontaneity and sincerity of their gratitude to Jonah's God (v. 16).

Second Phase, 1¹⁷⁻²¹. 10. Jonah's rescue from certain death by Jehovah's appointment of a great fish to receive him into its belly; the brevity of his stay in these confining quarters (1¹⁷); Jonah's turning again for help to the God he had defied (2¹); Jehovah's immediate release of Jonah (2¹⁰).

Third Phase, 3¹⁻¹⁰. The inflexibility of Jehovah's will; Jonah's original commission is renewed (vv. 1, 2); Jonah's immediate obedience, though all unequipped, in undertaking the long, difficult journey to perform an unpopular mission in a strange land (vv. 3, 4); the amazing effect of his direful message. Note the extravagance and universality of the penance it provoked though it came from the lips of a foreign prophet (vv. 5-9). The mercy of Jehovah toward the Ninevites (v. 10).

Textual Note. 3. Of three days' journey—read with a walking distance of three days.

Fourth Phase, 4¹⁻¹¹. The basic incompatibility between the mind of Jehovah and that of Jonah, and the latter's declaration that this had been the cause of his earlier disobedience (vv. 1-3); Jehovah's demand that Jonah be sure that his chagrin is really great enough to lead him to prefer death to what his pride leads him to regard as humiliation. See textual note on 4⁴. The prophet's misunderstanding of Jehovah's meaning as solicitude for his hurt vanity;—note that he again takes heart, removes himself from the danger of being involved in the destruction which he now again expects, constructs for himself a flimsy shelter outside the walls and settles down to await the fulfillment of his wishes (v. 5); Jonah's appreciation of Jehovah's concern for his comfort (v. 6); Jehovah's greater concern for Jonah's soul, manifested in the removal of the means of his comfort (v. 7). Jonah's touchiness where his own comfort was concerned, and his self-destructive and stubborn persistence in preferring death to concurrence in the manifestation of divine favor to anyone but himself (vv. 8, 9); Jehovah's final and, so far as the story goes, futile effort to reach the perverted mind of his messenger with the truth about the divine character (vv. 10, 11).

Textual Notes. 4. Doest thou well to be angry?—read are you so very angry? 9. Doest thou well to be angry for the gourd?—read are you so very angry over the gourd? For I do well to be angry even unto death read I am enough to die. 11. For persons read infants.

The Poem, 22-9. This poem has many points of contact with the book of Psalms. By consulting Psa. 57 186 3122 427 1201 1423 1434 this will at once become evident. It celebrates the gratitude of one who has been rescued from drowning and who now affirms his determination to acknowledge his debt to Jehovah, his rescuer, by the rendering of appropriate sacrifices and the discharge of the vows he had made when in danger of his life.

As a thanksgiving for deliverance actually uttered by Jonah the poem may appropriately be placed after 2¹⁰ but not after 21. This misplacement, together with its literary dependence on the Psalms, and the fact that the unity of the narrative itself is not at all disturbed by the poem's complete omission, stamp it, in the opinion of many, as a later addition to the book.

The Method of Interpretation. There are before us two possible methods of interpreting this book. These are, first, to interpret it literally, as a historical record of events; or second, to interpret it as a didactic work designed to convey truth applicable to a wider situation than is presented in the story itself. Let us consider what is involved in these respective alternatives and what fruit each method is likely to yield.

(1) The literal method involves not credibility but credulity with regard to miracle. The average reader is prone to think of only one miracle in the story, namely, Jonah's voyage in the interior of the great fish. Yet, interpreted literally, it fairly bristles with the miraculous: the storm; the selection of Jonah by lot as the guilty party; the sudden subsidence of the sea; the great fish whose arrival so perfectly synchronizes with Jonah's plunge into the deep; his survival of his piscatorial sojourn; his ejection, safe and sound, on shore; the gourd, which grew into an effectual shade in a day and perished as suddenly on the morrow—these are all manifestations of the miraculous. There are also other points which place almost as great a strain upon the credulity. How did Jonah make his message intelligible to people who spoke a strange tongue? Why does such a rebellious and self-willed prophet succeed so marvelously where an Amos or an Isaiah or a Jeremiah meets with so little success? Truly the story's tax upon the credulity is very great. Let the reader decide for himself whether his is able to bear it.

(2) The literal method of interpretation involves indifference to the fact that the writer exhibits neither the interests nor the methods of the historian. He is utterly vague upon many points about which a historian would have been specific. Where did Jonah land when ejected from the fish? Who was the Assyrian king and when did he reign? Are we to understand that Jonah remained sulking outside of Nineveh until he died? If not, what became of him? These are some of the queries which the literalist must find it hard to answer.

But suppose one is ready to ignore all these and other unmentioned difficulties, what harvest will he reap? Very largely this: first, that there was once such a stiff-necked prophet as Jonah for whom the Lord did much more than he deserved; and, second, some rather doubtful ground for the belief that God once intervened in the affairs of men in a manner which in our time he has completely abandoned.

And now for the other alternative. What does it involve? Simply the acceptance of the fact that O.T. religious teachers sometimes, like the Great Teacher himself, made use of allegory or parable as a vehicle for the delineation of great social tendencies and the inculcation of truths applicable to them (cf. pp. 19-20).

And what fruit will such a method yield? Let us see!

The Interpretation of the Book as Primarily Didactic in Purpose. There are two stages to the task which now confronts us. First, we must discover what the writer aimed to teach; and second, we must endeavor to identify the situation which stimulated such teaching.

(1) The Teaching of the Book. It must be obvious, even to the casual reader, that the author has drawn a sharp contrast between Jonah, the central character of the story, and all the other persons mentioned. Jonah represents one characteristic attitude to life, while the sailors and the Ninevites represent another. The Jonah of this tale, be it noted, is a real "character." In depicting him the author has been at no little pains to achieve a genuine character study. The careless reader is apt to find little to admire in him, to hold him in contempt as a selfish, whining, religious snob. Yet a catalogue of his capacities and virtues will reveal that Jonah is, potentially, a good man who possesses some of the qualities which make for greatness.

The prophet's individual force is a quality which dominates the entire characterization. He is at least not a nonentity. Whatever his faults may be, he has a mind, a will, a personality which single him out as noteworthy and significant. He is a man of great spiritual capacity, possessing the delicate psychological equipment which enables him to apprehend eternal and universal truth. To him alone God gives commission and message. He is, too, a religious man, that is to say, he confesses, when challenged by the sailors, to an habitual attitude of reverence toward the one true God. Of course the episode here narrated finds him in a mood of defiant rebellion. But that is not his soul's true aspect. When he is himself he is one who at least aims to live his life under the sway of his religious convictions. Because of this religious discipline which has been the habit of his life he has achieved certain virtues. He is capable of self-control in moments of danger. He does not lack moral courage, for he confesses his faith and his fault when such confession threatens to cost him dearly. When put to the ultimate test he displays the altruism which faces death with fortitude rather than jeopardize, through cowardice, the safety of others.

Jonah's one devastating weakness is precisely that to which forceful and highly gifted individuals are, in the nature of the case, prone. His individualism has overbalanced him until he has developed an anti-social mind. The only self-expression which interests him is that which ends in self-gratification. To his fellow men, particularly to all that are not of the same mind and attainment as himself, he is cold, unsympathetic, arrogant, patronizing, proud and cruel. He is a big man tricked by his very bigness into smallness, a good man who consumes his own goodness and becomes a moral bankrupt in the eyes of the world. In him the habit of taking has all but destroyed the impulse to giving. He is one who has labored hard to achieve a colossal moral failure.

Jonah is the only professedly religious character in the story. The sailors and the Ninevites are pagans. It is true they owe allegiance to many gods. But their relationship to them is not a deep and controlling loyalty. It is entirely pragmatic, practical, utilitarian. They turn to their gods only when they are cornered and need help. And even then they are moved by no abiding faith in them. They are, for example, quite ready to turn to other sources of help which are more promising. So sailors and Ninevites alike do not scruple to seek and accept material succor from Jonah's God. The only religion they know is on the plane of materialism. Of communion with God for its own sake they know nothing.

And yet these pagans because, perhaps, of this very religious pragmatism, possess something which Jonah does not possess. They have the social mind. The sailors stand by one another, and even by their troublesome passenger, until the last moment. The Ninevites impose upon themselves most rigorous penances for the common weal. These pagans instinctively think in social terms. Thus Jonah typifies official religion and the Ninevites typify paganism. Or, let us say, Jonah typifies the church and these others the world. What the writer desires to teach is that the church needs the world and the world needs the church. Each has something to give to the other, not only something to give, but something which it dares refrain from giving only at the expense of the fullness of its life. The church has the oracles of God, the secret of self-discipline, the spiritual power which raises human life above the plane of mere existence. These things are not intended exclusively for the church. They belong also to the world. To withhold them is rebellion against God, against the soul of the universe. And the world, what has it to give? An opportunity for loving service. Though potentially great, humanity is frail and helpless; its aching, unsatisfied need of the Infinite ever challenges the compassion and love of those who know God and experience his power. Without that love which it can cultivate only by service to all humanity the church can never worship God in spirit and in truth; it must always be in rebellion against him.

(2) The Historical Situation Which Stimulated the Teaching of the Book. What sort of a situation would stimulate a man to an endeavor to teach these truths? A situation in which a fully developed, self-conscious, religious institution, exhibiting the strong characteristics of good and evil typified by Jonah, was found, in defiance of a universal God in which it professed to believe, denying to a needy, suppliant and tractable outside world the sympathetic mediation of truth which should be the heritage of all men. This, of course, is the situation in which religious Israel, to some degree, found itself from the days of the great prophets on. The first known Israelite to raise the issue and pronounce upon it was Amos (cf. Amos 32). Yet the religious forces of Israel were never integrated into a religious institution, fully conscious of itself as such, until the days of the Babylonian Exile. And this institution, this Jewish Church, originally built up by the exiles in Babylon, was never challenged to define and determine, in real life, its attitude to the pagan world until it essayed the long and difficult task of transplanting itself from Babylon to the home land and the Holy City (cf. pp. 169-70).

Then there arose a very difficult situation. The native population of Judah was composed of many heterogeneous elements. The descendants of those Judeans who had not been carried off into exile had been interpenetrated by people of many different races and religions—Moabites, Ammonites, Edomites, Phoenicians, Egyptians, Syrians, Greeks, and what not else besides. With these they had intermarried and otherwise lived in close contact. The result was a hybrid race with its own peculiar blend of culture and religion.

Meanwhile the Jewish community in Babylon, partly because of the considerable measure of local autonomy they always enjoyed, but more because of the presence among them of a succession of great religious leaders, had contrived to maintain their solidarity and to develop a distinctive ecclesiastical organization, dominated by a highly developed religious spirit. To bring together these now alien groups and make of them a unified community, centering in Jerusalem, was an extremely delicate and difficult task. The Babylonian Jews, by reason of the humiliating experience of the Exile, had developed a profound distrust of foreigners, a hard shell of suspicion and prejudice by which they sought to protect themselves from a cruel world. They naturally attributed the difficulties they encountered in their efforts to restore what they considered a true Jewish regime in Palestine, to the presence, in the native population, of those alien elements which they despised and feared. In the days of Nehemiah and Ezra, then, this question of the relation of the Jewish Church, the true and faithful seed of Jacob, as its members considered themselves, to the Gentile world, was brought to an issue. The church demanded that all ties with foreigners, even the marital relationship, be dissolved. It was such an extreme demand as this which provoked the writing of the book of Jonah with its keen and searching analysis of the play of motives. It is a protest not from the heart of one who lived in the midst of the issue he dealt with and who felt in every fiber of his being the great principles which were involved (see intro. to Ezra-Nehemiah).

That the situation must be historically so placed is substantiated by the sequence of events in the narrative itself, which symbolize the political and religious history of Israel in broad outline: Let Jonah stand for the true Israel, Nineveh for paganism at its very worst, the sea for world politics, the vessel for diplomacy, the polyglot crew for the neighboring nations with which Israel and Judah, to the disgust of the great prophets, were constantly intriguing, and the storm for the disturbance which shook the Near East when Babylon succeeded Assyria as the dominating power, and you have the main movements of thought and trend of events down to the Exile. The pre-exilic prophets bear witness that their people constantly refused to trust and obey their own God, Jehovah, steadily turned away from their spiritual vocation, and stubbornly preferred to work out their own destiny by means of diplomatic intrigue. History likewise witnesses that the nations in which Judah trusted for safety threw her overboard at last just as the sailors did Jonah.

Let the great fish stand for Babylon, Jonah's sojourn within it for the Exile, his miraculous deliverance for the freedom to return granted the exiles by Cyrus, emperor of the Medes and Persians, and the chastened Jonah, who carried out his original commission to Nineveh, for the returning exiles who undertook the difficult task of transforming a paganized Palestine, and you have the main points of what actually happened in history down to the writer's own time.

From that point on the incidents of the story typify the situation of his own day. The extravagant penance of the Ninevites indicates the real desire of the native population to be counted good servants of Jehovah and their willingness to attempt ethical reforms. Jonah, sulking in his pitiful booth, grateful for the gourd, whining over its loss, stubbornly refusing to make God's merciful attitude to the heathen his own, is the Jewish Church, as the writer saw it, pining away in its shabby rebuilt Temple, looking for miraculous interventions on its own behalf, and stubbornly refusing to open its heart to the great heathen world outside through the salvation of which it could, alone, become great in the eyes of posterity and acceptable in the sight of God.

MICAH

By PROFESSOR J. E. McFADYEN

INTRODUCTION

The Prophet. Micah the peasant was a younger contemporary of Isaiah the statesman, as he delivered his message during the last quarter of the eighth century B.C. Quite apart from the superscription (1¹) we know from a very interesting allusion in Jer. 26¹⁸ to his threat against Jerusalem (3¹²) that he prophesied during the reign of Hezekiah, but as he also predicted the ruin of Samaria (16), the capital of the Northern Kingdom, which fell in 721 B.C., he must have begun to prophesy before that date. It is perhaps significant of his rural affinities that he singles out the capitals of both kingdoms as the special objects of the divine wrath: in them the wickedness of the kingdoms seems to him concentrated (cf. 15). As a Judean, living in a little village on the borders of the Philistine country (cf. 11, 14), he devotes his main strength to attacking the vices of Judah.

Historical Background. Micah gives a peculiarly vivid picture of moral and religious conditions in Judah. To him as to Amos (26 5¹¹) the most exasperating offense was the exploitation of the poor, and those who were guilty of it he fiercely denounced as cannibals, "who eat the flesh of my people, and flay their skin from off them, and break their bones, chopping them in pieces as for the pot" (33). We may perhaps infer from 22 that he had himself been a victim of their rapacity; he may have had the bitter experience of seeing his own home and fields annexed by some greedy landlord (22; cf. Isa. 58), who thus helped to build "Zion with blood and Jerusalem with iniquity" (310). Men like these had no scruple in stripping the coat from the back of unsuspecting travelers, or in ruthlessly driving women and children from their homes (28).

These atrocities were inspired by greed of gain, and unhappily not only the civil but the religious leaders of those days were infected by this base passion, which is combated by Micah with an earnestness which reminds us of Jesus. The priests and prophets, to whom the people might well have looked for guidance, were deflected from their duty by mercenary motives (311): the nature of their message was determined by the size of the bite that was put in their mouths (35). Trade was conducted by means of false weights and measures (610^{f.}), the best were bad (74), society was honeycombed with treachery, and dissension reigned in the home (75^{f.}). And all this low morality had its root in a low religion. Worship was conducted with heathen symbols (512-14). The deadly earnestness which the worshipers could on occasion display was devoted only to the externals of religion (66^{f.}), and in keeping with this they fondly imagined that the great Temple at Jerusalem was the guarantee of Jehovah's presence in the midst of them and that he would preserve them from all possible disaster (311). The universal corruption of society fully explains Micah's terrible threat (312). (For a more detailed description of political, social, moral and religious conditions in Judæa in the days of Isaiah and Micah see introduction to Isaiah, pp. 631-6.)

Message of Micah. Over against this degraded religion and morality stands the prophet's own incomparable conception of the divine demand upon men, expressed in terms of elemental simplicity—justice and kindness between man and man, and a humble walk with God (68). That was religion, as Micah understood it (cf. Jas. 127); and well might the man who offered such a definition claim to be inspired. The function of the inspired prophet—and he knew himself to be one (cf. 38)—was, not to predict the distant future, but to stir the popular conscience by confronting it with the moral demands of God.

The teaching of Micah is simple and forceful. In many respects it resembles that of his predecessors; he insists on the holiness of Jehovah and the universality and righteousness of the divine government of the world. This righteous God deals with all nations, Israel included, on the basis of ethical principles. As long as his people do right they will enjoy the divine favor (27), but if they turn against him they must suffer punishment. Jehovah's good will is secured, not by a careful observance of the ritual, or by the bringing of sacrifices, whatever may be their intrinsic value, but by a life in accord with the principles of righteousness, by the diligent practice of kindness and brotherliness, and by a living fellowship with God in the spirit of humility, which should ever govern the intercourse of weak and sinful man with a holy and perfect God (66-8).

The prophet did not deceive himself into believing that his high religious and moral ideals would be sufficiently attractive to bring about a complete transformation in the whole nation. He foresaw that the majority would continue in rebellion and that, therefore, a destructive blow must fall which would make an end of the national existence of both Israel and Judah. But he was just as strongly convinced that a remnant would be saved and that under the Messianic king this remnant would enjoy a life of permanent peace and prosperity. In his description of the Messianic ruler he passes beyond Amos and Hosea, agreeing substantially with Isaiah, except that he adds the birthplace of the ideal ruler (52-6). Through the moral influence going forth from the remnant the knowledge of Jehovah will spread to all nations, and many will flock to him for instruction (41-4).

A comparison of Micah with his greater contemporary, Isaiah, is not without interest. Both prophets cherished lofty conceptions of the character of Jehovah and of the obligations resting upon his people, and both had firmly established convictions concerning the nature and ultimate triumph of the kingdom of God. A comparison of the utterances of the two men reveals resemblances in style, thought, topics and even phrases; but the contrasts between the two in origin, training and sphere of activity are equally marked. One was a city prophet, of high social standing and the counselor of kings; the other, a simple country man, born of obscure parents, and in close touch and sympathy with the peasant class.

The Book. The book of Micah falls naturally into three parts, as follows: chs. 1 and 2, chs. 3-5, and chs. 6 and 7, each part beginning with "Hear ye." Each division contains a description of the present corruption, an announcement of imminent judgment and one or more pictures of a bright future. Of course, the three parts do not represent three connected discourses, but, rather, three collections of the essential elements of the oral utterances of the prophet throughout his ministry. It may even be that in the editorial arrangement elements not coming from Micah were added. (The more important later additions are pointed out in the comments on specific passages.) The principle of arrangement is not chronological but in a sense logical; i.e., the collector or collectors kept in mind the general scheme—corruption, judgment, salvation of a remnant, exaltation—but within the general scheme the separate utterances were arranged with less care and without the introduction of connecting links. As a result abruptness in transition is frequent, and at times it is difficult, if not impossible, to trace the exact line of thought.

CHAPTER I

1. Superscription. Two facts about Micah's date are certain: (1) that he began to prophesy before the fall of Samaria in 721 B.C. (cf. 16), and (2) that he prophesied during the reign of Hezekiah (cf. Jer. 26^{18f.}), which began in 725 or 715 B.C., and ended in 696 or 686. It is significant that this peasant prophet from the little village of Moreseth near Gath (cf. 114), and therefore near the Philistine border, should have singled out the two capitals, Samaria and Jerusalem, for special condemnation.

2-9. The Doom of Samaria and its Justification. Though a Judean, Micah notes the sins and announces the fate of Israel, especially of its capital, Samaria. He is so indignant at what he sees there that he summons all the peoples of the world to listen to his indictment and to the doom which Jehovah from his holy temple in heaven may pronounce upon them as well (v. 2). The doom of Samaria is vividly portrayed in terms of an earthquake, which will split the valleys and melt the mountains on which she is built, pouring down her stones, laying bare her foundations (v. 6) and reducing her to a heap of ruins (v. 5); and this devastation is effected by the angry Jehovah, who no sooner descends from his place in heaven (v. 3) and touches the high places of the earth than the earthquake, with its awful havoc, commences. Why all this wreck and ruin (v. 5)? It is because of sin in Jacob and Israel, i.e., the Northern Kingdom—there is a side-glance at Judah—especially in the capitals Samaria and Jerusalem, where the sin is concentrated. The sin is the sin of idolatry, with its apparatus of images and idols (v. 7: for hires read images)—an idolatry which the prophets (cf. Hos. 25) regard as adultery; these idols, impotent to save their worshipers, will be seized and carried off to an Assyrian temple. At the thought of this impending ruin, this wound incurable (v. 9), the prophet, barefoot and naked like a mourner (cf. 2 Sam. 15³⁰) or a captive (cf. Isa. 20²⁻⁴), breaks into loud and bitter wailing, for he sees the same fate drawing near Judah and Jerusalem (vv. 8f.). These last words may be a later addition, reflecting the experience of Sennacherib's invasion of Judah in 701 B.C.; on the other hand, they may refer to the consternation in Jerusalem created by the fate, just described, of Samaria. In v. 5 for the high places of Judah read the sin of the house of Judah.

The God whom Micah worships is no petty national God, committed unconditionally to the support of his own people, but a God who can be so provoked by sin as to hurl them to destruction.

10-16. Lament Over Judah's Doom. The text of this passage, crowded with proper names, is one of the most difficult and desperate in the O.T. In places it is hopelessly obscure, and resort must be had to the precarious remedy of emendation. But two things are quite clear. (1) The proper nouns are nearly all names of Judæan towns within the Shephelah, the district of low hills and flat valley land west and southwest of Judah lying between the higher Judæan hills and the Philistine plain (for further details see art., The Land of Palestine, p. 54); and (2) on the names of each of these towns there is a word-play, quite unsuspected by the English or American reader and impossible to reproduce in translation; e.g., Aphrah (v. 10) would inevitably suggest to a Hebrew ear the word aphar, which means dust. The prophet means that the town is well named—its name suggests its destiny—and calls upon it to roll itself in the dust: and so with the others. Achziḡ, e.g. (v. 14), suggests achzab = deceptive: that town, true to its name, would prove a deception to the king of Israel. It is as if towns or villages of ours were called Duston (or Dustville) and Deception, and we should attempt to draw a moral therefrom. We have to remember how much more significant names were to ancient men than to us: Jesus, e.g., played upon the word "Peter," which means "rock" (Mt. 16¹⁸). It would scarcely be worth while to describe the location of all the places named—enough that they are in the Shephelah. Just as Isaiah (10²⁸⁻³²) names town after town on the line of the Assyrian advance upon Jerusalem, so Micah here, whether the terror which inspires his lament is due to an imminent Assyrian invasion or is simply the panic spread by the earthquake. Micah's own home is within the region of the doom (11. 14), which creeps on to the gate of Jerusalem (v. 12); and, as in mourning, it is meet that the head and hair should be shorn bald as the vulture's head (v. 16). In v. 13 Lachish is described as the beginning of sin, probably because, as one of Solomon's chariot cities (1 Kings 9¹⁹ 10²⁶), it induced a false confidence in military resources.

It is scarcely possible to translate this section, but it is possible to feel it. Its very obscurities invest it with a weird power of its own, as we watch the inevitable doom creeping on from city to city, a doom sent by Jehovah himself (v. 12).

CHAPTER II

1-5. The Divine Judgment on the Brutalities of Men in Power. In ch. 1 the justification of the terrible doom to fall upon Israel and Judah was not elaborated; only the false worship (17) and the false confidence in things material (13) were touched upon. But no prophet is content to censure these things alone, and Micah now proceeds to his real task, which is to lay bare the moral and social abuses of his time. He pictures the magnates who carry out as soon as it is daylight the plans they had conceived in their beds for robbing the people, as Ahab did Naboth (cf. 1 Kings 21), of the property they covet (vv. 1f.). But Jehovah, too, has his plan; he will bring upon them a disaster, inescapable and crushing (v. 3), and the lament which follows shows that what is meant is the disaster of war, in which their lands will be seized by and divided among the foe. The lament in v. 4 should probably read as follows:

The portion of my people is measured,

There is none to restore it.

Our fields are divided among our captors,

We are utterly ruined.

There will be no more casting of the line to determine the lot, for all will have been seized by the foe (in v. 5 for thou read ye). There is poetic justice in this: they coveted the fields of those who could not defend themselves and took them by violence, now their own are taken from them by one mightier than they.

6, 7. The Scornful Reply to the Prophet's Threat. Such preaching is at once unwelcome and incredible (cf. Amos 2¹² 7^{10f.}). "Don't prate to us," his opponents reply, "of things like these. Shame shall never overtake us. Jehovah is not so impatient, he does not do things like these. Has he not promised to deal graciously with Israel, his people?" Through the obscurities of the text it is only too plain that, lawless and unscrupulous as these men were, they were yet nominal worshipers of Jehovah, trusting to his patience and counting on his blessing.

8-11. The Prophet's Stern Reply. The text of these verses is very uncertain, but they seem to contain allusions to certain acts of callous cruelty which would be readily understood by the prophet's contemporaries. "As for you," he retorts, "you are not my people, nay, you are actually enemies of my people. You strip the garment from peaceful unsuspecting wayfarers as if it were booty of war, you drive the women of my people away from their darling children, you tear the mother from her babe, saying, 'Arise, begone, here you must not stay.' For a tiny little thing you exact a cruel pledge" (vv. 8-10). Here we see that passionate challenge of cruelty and, by implication, that passionate demand for justice and kindness in human relations which was afterward to crystallize in the humane legislation of Deuteronomy. But to insist on these things is not the way to popularity as a prophet; it is the false and empty soul who would preach about wine and strong drink—message of lies!—that would be a welcome prophet to a people like this (v. 11).

This passage finely contrasts the true preacher with the false. The true preacher rebukes that rapacity and violence which would strip the coat from another man's back and tear the mother from the child: the false preacher speaks to the people of wine and drink and the things they love. Here the preacher with the low ideals is satirized for all time: such a man, Micah roundly says, is a liar.

12, 13. The Deliverance. Here is a gracious promise, expressed in terms of shepherd life, that Jehovah will gather together the scattered flocks of Israel like sheep in the fold (not of Bozrah), and everywhere shall be heard the sound of rejoicing men. Then the figure slightly changes, and Jehovah, no longer Shepherd, is likened to the breaker, i.e., the leading ram of the flock, who goes up and butts every door open, i.e., demolishes every obstacle so that the flock can follow. Again a change of figure—Jehovah is King who marches ahead of his people.

It is curious to find so gracious a promise following immediately upon denunciation and threat (vv. 8-11). This, however, is a not uncommon feature of prophecy (cf. Amos 98-15 Isa. 291-8). Sometimes it is open to suppose the promise was appended by a later hand: here, the scattered sheep seem to suggest the Exile, more than a century after Micah's time. Sometimes, however, it may well be the prophet's own (cf. Hos. 14): here, e.g., the remnant may be those who survive the Assyrian invasion of 701 B.C. In any case, whoever added these and similar promises was inspired by the sound conviction that threat and disaster could never exhaust the whole purpose of God. There must be "good news," a "gospel."

CHAPTER III

The Doom of Jerusalem and Her Leaders. This is an artistically constructed chapter, falling into three sections of equal length (vv. 1-4, 5-8, 9-12), and issuing in a terrific climax. It is here that the real Micah is most evident, with his passionate interest in the poor and exploited (cf. 21^{f.}, 8^{f.}); and it is noteworthy that he, like the prophets generally (cf. Amos 64-6), lays the chief blame at the door of the civil and religious leaders. The reference to Jerusalem in v. 12 shows that Jacob and Israel in vv. 1 and 8 mean, not the Northern Kingdom, but Judah, and to this the whole chapter refers.

1-4. The Sin and Doom of the Judges. It was the business of the judges to know judgment, i.e., to care for justice. Instead, however, they indulged in the most ruthless oppression of the poor—e.g., by accepting bribes (cf. Amos 512). As with Amos (515) the good is social justice, and in language of amazing vividness, which reveals the depths to which the prophet's soul is stirred, he describes the oppressors of the poor as cannibals, who eat the flesh of my people: notice that my people are pre-eminently the poor (cf. Isa. 315). When their own hour of need comes, the oppressors will cry to God in vain. The fact that they do cry to him shows that they are nominally religious men (cf. 27).

5-8. The Sin and Doom of the Prophets. Unhappily, the religious leaders are themselves leagued with this unjust social system. Already we have had a glimpse of the popular prophets, with their easy sensuous gospel (211); here we see them again as men whose message depends not upon the eternal moral laws but upon the size of the bite put between their teeth: the bigger the bite, the fairer the prophecy. They proclaim peace, i.e., good luck, when they have a good bite between their teeth, while they declare a holy war against all who either cannot or will not give them a satisfactory bite. Here is satirized the preacher who makes the quality of his sermon depend upon the amount of his salary; and black will be his doom in the great day of the Lord—darkness and not light (cf. Amos 518), shame and mourning, of which the covering of the lips was a sign (cf. Lev. 1345).

In magnificent contrast to these despicable creatures is the true prophet (cf. note on 211), and Micah is not afraid to claim to be such a prophet. He draws his inspiration, not from the prospect of his salary, but from Jehovah his God, and in trenchant and profoundly significant words he defines the function of the true prophet, which is, not to predict the future, but to declare unto Jacob his transgression and to Israel his sin—in modern words, to touch and stir the popular conscience by the exposure of social wrong. This is precisely what Micah has been doing throughout chs. 2 and 3 and what he proceeds to do with equal vigor and solemnity in the next section.

9-12. The Doom of Jerusalem. Here the prophet returns to the attack on the civil and religious leaders, among whom he now includes the priests (v. 11), and the charge he hurls at them all is their love of money: all their professional service is inspired by this unholy passion, and the man of mercenary mind cannot truly serve either the Lord or the people (cf. Mt. 6^{25f.}). Yet all the time they lean upon Jehovah and fondly imagine that, under his protection, no disaster can ever overtake them—nominally religious men (cf. v. 4), yet with souls corroded by the love of money and the guilt of oppressive brutalities, building up Zion with the blood of the poor, which was, as it were, the mortar that held its stones together, and blind to the fact that they were thus infallibly preparing the way for its destruction. For because of their conduct the city of Jerusalem and the very hill of Zion on which the house, i.e., the Temple, was built were doomed to be reduced to a jungle. This terrible threat was remembered more than one hundred years afterward (cf. Jer. 26¹⁸). It shows how courageous and heretical, from the point of view of commonplace contemporaries (v. 11), a prophet could be, and how little the prophets cherished the patriotism whose motto is, "My country, right or wrong." Were not they the truest patriots after all?

CHAPTER IV

1-5. Jerusalem the Religious Metropolis of the World and Dispenser of Peace. The scene changes. From a Jerusalem reduced to a jungle we turn to a vision of the city as the religious capital of the world, fountain of justice and peace. Doubtless this transformation is to be effected in the latter days or, rather, in the after days; but it is unmediated, and at this point in the book it comes as a great surprise. As the same oracle is repeated almost word for word in Isa. 22-4, the question has been raised which of the two prophets composed it; or whether in both cases it may not have been taken from a common original; or, what seems to be more probable, whether it may not be a later addition, a foil to offset the dark picture of Jerusalem which had preceded. Much may be said on the different sides of this question, but the answer to it does not affect the sublime message of the section, to which we now turn.

The true prophet, while fully conscious of the difficulties and wrongs of the present (ch. 3), always looks wistfully forward to the after-days, when some better thing shall be. The writer sees men from all nations streaming to the temple on Mount Zion which is established at (cf. mg.) the head of the mountains—a phrase to symbolize its spiritual elevation. What they want is law, i.e., instruction, guidance, and they are conscious that they will get this in Zion as nowhere else in the world (a fine tribute to the acknowledged religious supremacy of Israel). They need guidance because there has been some international dispute. The swords and spears are not there for nothing; it was by their means that this dispute would have been settled had the nations not been inspired by the wise and happy thought of carrying it to Zion for arbitration. Nor do they travel in vain; they get there the decision for which they had hoped; and then, acquiescing in that decision, they beat into plowshares and pruning hooks the swords and spears for which they have now no more use. Nations that have learned to accept arbitration need learn war no more, can live henceforth in peace the happy life of the country (v. 5, which says that whatever idols other nations may worship, Israel will be eternally true to her own God, is on a less ideal level than vv. 1-4 and is apparently a later addition).

The passage is not an idealist's dream, it is full of practical insight, suggesting as it does the way to world peace. To secure this, there must be (1) a hatred and horror of war—the nations recognize that arbitration is "a more excellent way" than war; (2) a tribunal (here Zion) which the nations can trust; (3) nations willing to submit their case to arbitration and to abide by the result; (4) unquenchable hope—"it shall come to pass." As in his blood-drenched and war-weary world the prophet dared to cherish this confident hope, so may we.

Jerusalem's Changing Fortunes and Ultimate Triumph. This is the theme of 4⁶-5⁹. The section is not continuous, the changes are too abrupt and the contents too conflicting for that. Restoration, e.g., is followed by exile (4⁶, 10); Jerusalem is now weak and in travail, now triumphant (4¹⁰, 13 5³); now victorious, now besieged (4¹³ 5¹). As exile is in some sections presupposed, the passage as a whole is relegated by many scholars to the exilic age: but if it be Micah's, the changing moods will reflect the kaleidoscopic changes in the fortunes of the city in his time, especially during the Assyrian invasion of 701 B.C. (rather than the later Babylonian assault and deportation in 586).

6-8. The Gathering of the Dispersed and the Restoration of the Monarchy. This section would come very naturally after vv. 9f., which threaten exile, but the verses are probably independent in time of origin. Jerusalem is addressed as tower of the flock (cf. Num. 32¹⁶), in which the shepherd kept a look-out against the enemies of his sheep (2 Chr. 26¹⁰): she has lost her former dominion, such as she enjoyed in the great days of David and Solomon, but it is to be restored (v. 8), and better still, Jehovah himself will be her king: he will gather again to Zion his widely scattered flocks, and reign over them for ever.

9-13. Siege, Exile, Restoration and Triumph of Jerusalem. The beleaguered city is in anguish, king and counselors are helpless, exile is certain, but Jehovah shall redeem thee—here again the inextinguishable Hebrew hope—and not only redeem thee, but endue thee with strength to beat in pieces every opponent and stamp upon them, as with brazen hoofs, like an ox treading out the grain.

CHAPTER V

See introductory note in ch. 4 above.

1-6. Judah's Defender, the Messiah. Jerusalem is besieged, her judge, i.e., king (perhaps Hezekiah, cf. 2 Kings 18²⁷), insulted; she is cutting herself (rather than gather in troops) in the intensity of her mourning (cf. Deut. 14¹). But deliverance will come, not indeed from the capital itself, but from the little country town from which David sprang (1 Sam. 17¹²), though it was least among the clans (not thousands) of Judah. This Messianic king was to be descended from an ancient family—from of old, from everlasting imply no more (cf. 7¹⁴, 20; also discussion in art., Israel's Messianic Hope, pp. 181-3)—doubtless that of David. After the birth of this wonderful child whom Isaiah (7¹⁴) had also announced (see comment on Isa. 7¹⁴), the fortunes of the people will change, the exiles will return, and the Messiah will rule the world, not in his own strength but in the strength of his God (vv. 1-4), securing for his people peace, i.e., protection, against the Assyrians when they dare to tread on Hebrew soil (not palaces, v. 5); nay, ravaging the land of Nimrod itself, i.e., Assyria (cf. Gen. 10⁸⁻¹¹) with sword and spear (not in the entrances). Other shepherds too, i.e., leaders, will be raised up, seven, eight, i.e., as many as are needed. The Messiah is to be a conquering King who will bring peace to Judah and whose dominion will be world-wide.

7-9. The Irresistible Might of the Returning Exiles. The exiles, scattered among the nations, depending upon God alone (v. 7b), will be numberless as the raindrops and terrible as the lion—victorious everywhere.

10-15. War and Idolatry will be Abolished. In that blessed day to which the prophet looks forward every instrument of war (including fortified cities) and all the accursed apparatus of idolatry (cf. Deut. 18¹⁰⁻¹²)—stone pillars and asherim (i.e., wooden poles)—will disappear, and drastic punishment will be meted out to disobedient heathen nations. This passage is almost certainly Micah's and may have paved the way for the reformation of Hezekiah (cf. 2 Kings 18⁴).

CHAPTER VI

1-8. Jehovah's Indictment Against the Ingratitude of His People. The mountains and the earth, older than man and witnesses of Israel's history, so crowded with ingratitude, are summoned to listen to the indictment (cf. Isa. 1²). Israel's sin is a sin against love. For, instead of wearying her with burdensome demands, Jehovah had from the very beginning of her history showered upon her his redeeming love, blessing her with great personalities, delivering her from the bondage of Egypt, and from the powerful word of the sorcerer Balaam (cf. Num. 22-24), and bringing her over the Jordan from Shittim (Josh. 3¹) unto Gilgal (Josh. 4²⁰) in the promised land. All this Israel had forgotten (cf. v. 5).

She now acknowledges her guilt, but pleads that she does not know how to approach the great God she has offended, and she is willing to go to any extreme, even to the sacrifice, like Abraham (cf. Gen. 22), of her first born, to placate him—a practice occasionally resorted to both in and after Micah's time (2 Kings 16³ 21⁶ Jer. 7²¹). The prophet's immortal answer (v. 8) shows how the popular and the prophetic conceptions of religion were wide as the poles asunder. Not ritual but righteousness was what Jehovah required of men (cf. Deut. 10¹²), not costly gifts of things but the surrender of themselves in the service of one another. His answer is a marvelous summary of the teaching of his three great predecessors, Amos, Hosea, and Isaiah; the divine demand was for justice (Amos 5²⁴), mercy or kindness (Hos. 6⁶) and a humble walk with God who alone is exalted (Isa. 21¹). The combination suggests that social morality is inseparable from and rooted in religion, and that the true worship of God is the service of man. The O.T. has no greater word than this.

9-16. The Doom of Commercial Dishonesty. Hark! Jehovah calleth to the city, doubtless Jerusalem. Omitting the next clause, which is obscure, the text should read Hear, ye tribe (of Judah) and assembly of the city. Can I forgive treasures of wickedness in the house of the wicked, etc.? Can I count as pure him with wicked balances? It is here primarily the rich men (v. 12) whom Micah, like Amos, attacks, whose palatial houses are filled with treasures acquired by violence and robbery (Amos 3¹⁰); and who acquire their fortunes by selling underweight—an abominable practice (Deut. 25¹³⁻¹⁶) also scathingly denounced by Amos (8⁵). How closely the religion of the prophet touches the intimacies of commercial life! Not only the rich, however, but all the inhabitants (v. 12) are liars and cheats; all social life is honeycombed with deceit, and Jehovah will not tolerate this. Therefore (v. 13) I will begin to smite thee (so LXX), and the blow threatened is the blow of war. In their besieged city hunger (not humiliation) would do its deadly work, no goods could be removed to safety, children would be the prey of the sword, the fruits of their toil would be reaped by the foe (vv. 14f.)—a just judgment, which would earn for them the scorn of the peoples (so LXX, v. 15), because they had followed the cruel policy of Omri and of his better-known son Ahab (1 Kings 16²⁹), who had connived at the murder of Naboth in order to secure his vineyard (1 Kings 21).

CHAPTER VII

1-7. Lament Over the Prevailing Corruption. These verses present a melancholy picture of society. The prophet looks in vain (v. 2) for one who fulfills Jehovah's fundamental demands (cf. 6⁸). He is like a fruit-gatherer at the gleanings, who finds neither grape nor fig (read last clause of v. 1 as in mg.). Brutal egoism everywhere prevails—justice perverted, bribery rampant, the best like briars, "rough and ugly to deal with" (J.M.P. Smith), and—saddest of all—family life is ruined by internal dissension and treachery: evil is the only thing they do well (v. 3). But he, like Isaiah (8¹⁷) in a similar case, looks in faith to the God of his salvation (v. 7), when the day of penal visitation comes, foretold by the watchmen, i.e., the prophets (v. 4).

8-20. The Victory of Zion Over the Heathen World. This theme is treated in three separate poems, which seem to imply a later situation and a broader stage than Micah's: 8-10. Theme—The downfall of Zion's enemies. Now Zion is suffering and in darkness because of her sins (v. 9), but a day of light is coming, when her God will vindicate her, and bring down to the dust those who mocked her and him (v. 10).

11-13. Theme—Restoration and return. In that day her walls, now ruined, would be rebuilt, and her boundaries (cf. mg.) extended far (cf. Zech. 2⁴), her widely scattered exiles would return, and the earth (not the land, v. 13), swarming with Zion's enemies, would be desolated—all but Palestine. 14-20. Theme—Prayer for Jehovah's help. The people are dwelling solitarily in the forest, i.e., in the hill country of Judah; they are near but have no access to Carmel, i.e., the fruitful land (not the mountain). Hence the prayer to Jehovah to shepherd them with his staff and restore them to the pastures of Bashan and Gilead (v. 14) east of the Jordan, which had not been theirs since 734 B.C. (2 Kings 17¹⁻²⁹). In v. 15 read show us, i.e., repeat for us the ancient miracle by humiliating our foes (vv. 16f.). The great v. 18 represents Jehovah as a God whose glory is his readiness to forgive, and he may assuredly be counted on to fulfill his ancient promises to the patriarchs (v. 20; cf. Gen. 28^{13f.}). The ages are linked together by his love.

NAHUM

BY PROFESSOR WILLIAM C. GRAHAM

INTRODUCTION

Theme and Literary Structure. The book of Nahum, like so many discourses of Israel's prophets, was inspired by the imminence of an important political event. This was the fall of Nineveh and the destruction of the great Assyrian Empire of which it was the capital. Here we have recorded the reaction of a member of the prophetic class in Jerusalem to the perplexing events of those days. Here we may learn how one loyal Judæan churchman felt about the approaching disaster to Assyria and what policy he advocated for his own country under the circumstances.

Small though the book is, it abounds in difficult literary problems. These are complicated by the corrupt condition of the Hebrew text, especially in 19-213. This textual corruption has been regarded by many interpreters as sufficient warrant for a practical rearrangement of the prophecy, although none of the ancient versions support the transpositions which are necessitated. In the following commentary an attempt is made to interpret the text without recourse to such a rearrangement.

The heart of the book of Nahum is the record of a public speech in which the prophet joined issue with persons of an opposing mind on the momentous events of the day. This speech is imperfectly recorded in 19-213, and the latter half of it, 23-13, is devoted to an exceedingly spirited, imaginative description of an expected successful attack upon Nineveh.

The original document contained only a second poem on the general theme which absorbed the prophet's interest, the fall of Nineveh. It now stands in ch. 3. There is no ground for doubting Nahum's authorship of this chapter. It may be regarded as a second oracle, delivered possibly a few days later, and aimed at confirming and deepening the impression made by 19-213.

The opening section, 11-8, may reasonably be regarded as a later editorial addition. Its form and content stand in some contrast with all that follows. In form it is an acrostic, or alphabetical psalm-poem. Its thought may not be connected definitely with any historical event. Its outlook is universal, indefinite, eschatological. Yet it stands fittingly here as a sort of text for Nahum's utterances, since the ideas to which it gives expression are Jehovah's vengefulness toward his enemies, his consideration for those who rely upon him and the infinity of the power which he wields. Nahum's own utterances were so concerned with politics that the religious and theological convictions underlying them do not plainly appear. This introductory poem was doubtless placed where it now stands to supplement the religious inadequacy in his utterances.

The Historical Situation in Nahum's Day. Our understanding of the historical situation in Nahum's day has been radically modified by the recent discovery of a portion of the annals of Nabopolassar, king of Babylon at that time (cf. Gadd, The Fall of Nineveh). The principal facts elicited from this record are as follows:

(1) Nabopolassar, a former vassal of Assyria, and Cyaxares, king of the Medes, were openly at war with Assyria as early as 616 B.C. (2) Nineveh fell before the assaults of these allies in 612 B.C. (3) Egypt was involved in these events, during the years covered by the chronicle, as the ally of Assyria. (4) The struggle between these great powers did not end with the fall of Nineveh. The Assyrians moved their capital to Harran, which in turn also was lost to the foe in 610 B.C.

At this point the record breaks off. We know from other sources, however, that the struggle was not finally concluded until 605 B.C., when Pharaoh Necho of Egypt, presumably with the last remnants of the Assyrian forces, was defeated at the battle of Carchemish by Nebuchadrezzar, crown prince of Babylon.

When, in the light of this knowledge, one considers 2 Kings 2329 and 2 Chron. 3520-24, one is inclined, until other evidence is forthcoming, to reconstruct the historical situation which Nahum knew as follows: As early as 616 B.C. the civilized world was divided into two hostile camps, Medes and Babylonians on one side, Assyria, supported for sound considerations of policy by Egypt, on the other. The prize in dispute was the domination of the Near East. The struggle was stubbornly contested but began to go against Assyria. In Judah pro-Babylonian sentiment gained ground with Josiah and the court party, who hoped that Judæan independence might follow as a result of Assyria's downfall. In 608 this pro-Babylonian party came to grief when Necho, learning the truth about their attitude, paralyzed any action they might have taken against his interests,

This happened when he was on his way to the East for the prosecution of the campaign. He summoned Josiah to appear before him at Megiddo and then assassinated him. It is difficult to prove any collusive communication between Judah and Babylon when this movement was developing at the Judæan capital. But Jeremiah, shortly after 605 B.C., addressing Jerusalem, says: "What wilt thou say if he (Jehovah) shall set over thee those whom thou hast accustomed to thee as familiar friends, for a head?" (Read thus for Jer. 13²¹.) If, as is possible, Jeremiah is here predicting Babylonian domination of his country, the terms which he uses would indicate that he knew of former friendly relationship between Judah and Babylon.

We can now understand the position taken by the prophet Nahum, speaking probably between 614-612 B.C., after the Medes and Babylonians began to close in on Nineveh. He was an Assyrophobe and his influence was cast on the side of those who proposed a policy of alliance with Babylon, the policy which cost Josiah his life. Holding such views he undoubtedly found himself in opposition to Jeremiah, for despite the latter's stand a few years later, he was never a pro-Babylonian but always held the true prophetic position that salvation must come not through fortuitous circumstance but by moral regeneration. Because this was his position Jeremiah would see at this time that the expected victory of Babylon would mean no more to Judah than a change of masters (cf. p. 679a).

The Teaching Values of the Book of Nahum. As has been maintained above, this book emanates from the dominant religious elements of Jerusalem in Josiah's later years. It is an expression of the religious and political mind of the court party which, a few years earlier, had sponsored Josiah's religious reforms. As such its religious values may not, as is sometimes done, be lightly passed over.

(1) Positive Religious Values. Underlying Nahum's attitude to Assyria are two clear religious conceptions which all prophetic thinking supports. The first is the adequacy of God's sovereignty. The second is the existence of a moral order in the universe. Nahum gives little prominence to these doctrines as such. With him they are axiomatic. What he does do is to assert vigorously, on the basis of these beliefs, that Assyria, which in its relations with other nations has ignored these conceptions, must pay the price demanded of all who run counter to the eternal verities. The moral indignation of Nahum against Assyria needs no condonation. The truth that nations may not transgress the great conceptions of ethical religion with impunity; the conviction that mere physical strength is impermanent and evanescent; the certainty of the existence of a "higher court" before which nations must ultimately answer for their policies—these are ideas which the world needs in every age. And the fate of Assyria, so picturesquely predicted by Nahum, is a classical illustration of their truth.

(2) Negative Religious Values. These are equally important. Nahum has grasped certain great truths. But from them he had been led by his emotions, prejudices, human interests, to arrive at certain unwarranted conclusions. Sympathy with his people led him to conclude that Assyria's downfall meant Judah's happiness. Nationalistic prejudice led him to assume in Jehovah a special, unmoral interest in his own people. Considerations of personal interest must have influenced him to ally himself with the popular party and so to refrain from all moral criticism of his own nation.

Consequently, Nahum provides an outstanding example of arrested religious development. He makes particular applications of universal truths, which is to say, he fails to apply to himself and his people the standards by which he measures others. He was all right as far as he went, but, morally and spiritually speaking, he did not go far enough. It was this inadequacy in himself that made him the foe instead of the ally of Jeremiah. The mistake which Nahum made is a timeless error. We all make it. Our religious development is constantly diverted and perverted by our emotions, prejudices, and consideration for personal interests. Perhaps no truth stands in more need of continuous emphasis than this, that all moral and spiritual truth is applicable chiefly, and in the first instance, to ourselves. For the inculcation of this truth Nahum's book has definite value.

CHAPTER I

1. Editorial Superscription. A statement of the theme of the book, described as an oracle on Nineveh (see mg.), and of its authorship. The name of the author, Nahum, signifies "Comforter." So appropriate is this name to one who declared to Judah the downfall of oppressive Assyria that it may have been specially bestowed by a later editor. Since nothing is indicated concerning the prophet's genealogy he was doubtless an obscure person until his participation in the discussions of the day. Elkosh, according to the least difficult tradition, was located near the southwest border of Judæa. The prophet's utterances, however, were in all probability made at Jerusalem, just as Amos traveled to Bethel to deliver his oracles at the great shrine of the Northern Kingdom.

2-8. Jehovah's Irresistibly Implacable Vengefulness Toward His Enemies. 2. Avenge—read an avenger; for the Lord avengeth read an avenger is Jehovah, and is full of wrath; literally, a master of wrath. Cf. Gen. 37¹⁹, where Joseph is described as a master of dreams (see mg.), i.e., a dreamer par excellence. The expression here used of Jehovah emphasizes very strongly his propensity to wrath; for the Lord taketh vengeance on his adversaries, and he reserveth [wrath] for his enemies read Jehovah is an avenger to his foes, and a gaoler is he to his enemies. The point made here is that the divine wrath is inescapable. 3. And great in power, and will by no means clear [the guilty]—read but for greatness of power he will not at all acquit; i.e., Jehovah, though patient, will not allow mere strength to nullify his moral sovereignty. The object of the verb must be understood to be "his enemies" (v. 2). 4. Bashan languisheth, and Carmel—read Bashan and Carmel wither. 5. Is upheaved—read is laid waste; omit yea. 7. The Lord is good—read Jehovah is good to those waiting for him; for and he knoweth read Jehovah knoweth. 8. But with an overrunning flood—read and in an overflowing flood (he delivers them), and join with the last clause of the preceding verse which requires this treatment for the maintenance of the parallelism. He will make a full end of the place thereof—read a full end will he make of his adversaries.

Literary Note. Contrary to many interpreters, the writer believes that the acrostic psalm-poem ends at 18, which carries it to the letter Kâf, the exact middle of the Hebrew alphabet. The first letter, Âlef, heads three lines; all others one only. In the case of the fourth, seventh, and tenth letters slight and allowable alterations in the text are necessary to restore the acrostic. There is no valid reason why the first letter should not carry three lines since it expresses the major idea of the poem, the implacable vengefulness of Jehovah toward his enemies; nor is there any reason why an acrostic poem, complete, for its purpose, in itself, should not end at the middle of the alphabet. Compare on these points the acrostic Psa. 9, which also ends at the letter Kâf and allots two lines to each letter except Yôdh, to which it gives only one, and Kâf, to which it gives three. The attempt to reconstruct the acrostic past v. 8 has resulted, in the writer's judgment, in obscuring the significance of 19¹.

The most important idea of this poem is that it is Jehovah's nature to visit the full weight of his wrath upon his enemies, who can never, no matter what their power, escape it. The poem begins and ends with this idea. Conversely, those who are in right relationship to him will find him able and willing to extricate them from the direst calamity. The nature of the calamity which the poet has in mind, however, is cosmical and not political, to be inflicted by miraculous, divine intervention and not by armed human forces. Storm, tempest, cloud, drought, earthquake and fire are the word-colors which he uses to paint his picture of the day of wrath.

The emphasis which the poem places upon Jehovah's supernatural power also renders it peculiarly suitable to its position at the head of Nahum's prophecy. This prophet's judgments, in the crisis which he interpreted, were based upon religious and theological convictions rather than upon a canvass of the facts. He supposed that Jehovah would punish his enemies and rescue those who relied upon him. But his mistake lay in thinking that he and his people belonged to the latter class. As a matter of fact, as Jeremiah saw, Nahum and all who followed him were not relying upon Jehovah at all, but on the prowess of Babylonian armies. The poem serves admirably to conceal this fact from the casual reader.

9-15. Nahum Proclaims the Certainty of Nineveh's Fall and Attacks Those Who Differ With Him. (See also 21. 2.) 9. Omit he will make a full end; cf. v. 8b. Affliction shall not rise up the second time—read he will not take vengeance distressfully a second time. 10. Read thorns cut and dried . . . they shall be consumed like dry stubble. 11. Read out of thee hath one come forth scheming against Jehovah, a fellow citizen who counsels ruin. 12. Even so shall they be cut down, and he shall pass away—read yet shall they vanish. 14. Read Jehovah has commanded concerning thee: There shall be sown of thy name no longer. From the house of thy God will I cut thee off. I will make thy grave a dishonor. 15. The wicked one—read the destroyer; omit he is utterly cut off.

CHAPTER II

1, 2. (19-15 continued.) 1. Read a shatterer has come up in front of thee, keeping guard, watching the road, strengthening the rear, reinforcing with the utmost strength. 2. Read surely Jehovah will restore the prestige of Jacob, likewise the prestige of Israel; for the wasters will waste them and their branches they will destroy. The section 19-22 is an imperfect report of a speech made by Nahum, in Jerusalem, between 614-612 B.C., when the Medes and Babylonians were closing in on Nineveh (cf. intro.). At some moment when feeling ran high, possibly after such an utterance as that found in Jer. 73-15, Nahum takes up the cudgels for the anti-Assyrian court party. His opponents attribute evil to Jehovah. But he will not inflict on his people a second punishment, such, e.g., as that when Samaria fell in 721 B.C. On the contrary, "they" (the Assyrians and Egyptians, 110, 12) will be destroyed.

Next Nahum turns his attention to some leader of his opponents (might it not be Jeremiah?). From thee (i.e., Jerusalem) has come forth one who schemes against Jehovah and counsels ruin. But the enemy is not too strong for Jehovah, whose attitude toward his people has undergone a sudden change. Far from the possibility of disaster, the hour of freedom has struck.

Nahum now makes a personal attack upon his opponent. (For similar situations cf. Isa. 2215-25, Amos 714-17.) The latter is to suffer all possible indignity. Having dealt thus adequately with him, Nahum turns to his audience at large to urge upon them his own views. Already messengers are at hand with glad tidings (the news of Assyria's defeat) which means peace for Judah. It is true that a "shatterer" (Necho, on his way up the coastal plain on one of his several expeditions in support of Assyria) has just passed before Judah's face (cf. 21). But "the wasters" (a peculiarly appropriate name for the wild Scytho-Medean horsemen) will waste them (the Assyrians) and destroy their branches. The term here translated "branches" is also employed to designate the "suckers" which grow up out of the roots of a tree and divert to their own sustenance its sap. Nothing could better describe Egypt's relation to Assyria at this time, nor could there be more strikingly expressed Nahum's conviction that Egyptian power would end with Assyria's defeat. As a result of this victory of "the wasters" Jehovah will restore the former glory not only of Judah (Jacob, cf. Isa. 431 441 463 Obad.18) but also of Israel.

The Attack of "The Wasters" and the Fall of Nineveh. Immediately upon his prediction of the turn events will take, Nahum launches into a stimulating description of the attack of "the wasters" on Nineveh.

3-5. The Attack. 3. Read the shield of his warriors is reddened and the fighting men are made scarlet by the flame of the torches. The chariots are prepared on that day, the chargers prancing the while. 4. Streets—read fields; broad ways—read open spaces; run—read speed ahead. 5. He remembereth his worthies; they stumble in their march—read his officers are summoned: they pull themselves up short; for is prepared read is placed in position.

The prophet describes the swift, wild, but well disciplined approach of the attackers to the walls of Nineveh. While it is still dark, on the day appointed, their camp is a bustle of preparation, the bodies and shields of the warriors glowing redly in the flare of their torches. With day the prancing steeds are harnessed to the chariots. Then away they rage in what looks like wild confusion but is a well-directed, irresistible onslaught. As the walls are approached comes an order. The leaders check the wild charge, dismount, and proceed to place in position the great mantelet under cover of which the walls are to be breached.

6-9. The Fall and Sack of the City. 7. And Huzzab is uncovered—read Belit is driven forth into captivity. 8. Read and Nineveh—like a pool of waters are her defenders, and as they flee, "Stand fast! Stand fast!" (one cries), but no one turns. 9. Omit the glory of all pleasant furniture.

Nahum expects a swift and easy conquest of the city. Its weak point is "the gates of the rivers." The various possibilities offered by the features of Nineveh's topography are admirably discussed by J. M. P. Smith, Commentary on Nahum, pp. 318f. The city's most vulnerable point lay on the northeast quarter, where there entered the River Khusr, from which Nineveh derived its water supply. The text suggests treachery, sudden entry, and the collapse of the defense, the headquarters of which would be in the palace. The besiegers now carry away Belit, i.e., the female consort of the god Ashur, while her female devotees mourn for the shame which has descended upon her and upon them. The defenders break ranks with unmanageable, panic-stricken force. They can no more be held together than a pool which breaks its banks. It is hopeless to try to rally them. The victors, unhindered, spoil the world's greatest treasure house.

10-13. The Prophet's Taunt. 10. Read

as a series of exclamations, e.g., Emptiness! And void! And waste! etc. 11. Feeding place—read cave; for where the lion and the lioness walked read whither the lion went to enter. 12. Read where the lion tore prey sufficient for his cubs and rended for his lionesses and filled his dens with prey and his lair with booty? The question in v. 11 is continued in this verse.

The victors utterly ruin Nineveh. But the contemplation of that eventuality draws from Nahum's embittered soul only a taunt expressing his satisfaction. The infamous den of the lion among nations is emptied. Finally the prophet links up this event with his own religious faith. One cannot at the same time believe in the real existence and power of Jehovah and expect any other result. Assyria's fate is divinely decreed. So likewise is Judah's restoration to prosperity. To doubt either of these propositions would, in the eyes of a man like Nahum, be tantamount to blasphemy (cf. 1^o, 11).

CHAPTER III

The Degradation of Nineveh the Harlot. In a later address Nahum expands the general theme of 23-13, laying emphasis upon the idea of the degradation of Assyria's great capital. The change of the figure under which Nineveh is characterized from rending lion (ch. 2) to harlot (ch. 3), suggests that this is a distinct composition.

1-4. The Fall of the Harlot. 1. It is all full of lies and rapine—read wholly false, replete with plunder; for the prey departeth not read prey ceases not. 2, 3. Read as a series of exclamations, e.g., Crack of whipl! And rumble of wheel! And galloping horses! etc. The horseman mounting—read the rearing horseman. Omit they stumble upon their corpses.

Nahum has the prophetic intuition for an arresting opening sentence. Vituperation was a weapon commanded by all the prophets. The very daring of such an utterance about the still powerful Assyria must have drawn an audience which would be well repaid by the bold, colorful, impressionistic word-picture of fallen Nineveh which followed. From a literary standpoint the prophet's power of compression is notable. In the twenty odd words of vv. 2, 3 he gives us a picture of the conquerors raging through the streets of Nineveh, leaving piles of dead in their wake. But v. 4 is by all means the most important. Nahum's conviction of Nineveh's doom has a moral basis. She is doomed because her Harlot-like lust has wrought evil doom for many nations.

The appositeness of the figure of the harlot as applied to Nineveh may be called in question. Nineveh is, of course, representative of Assyria, and Assyria had worked the will of Nineveh upon the world by brute force rather than seductive charm. Nahum, perhaps, had particular reason for the choice of this figure. Jeremiah used it prominently (cf. Jer. 220-24 31-3, 6-8, etc.). But in his case this odious characterization was applied to Judah and Jerusalem, where, indeed, the metaphor is more apt.

5-7. Jehovah Puts the Harlot to Shame Before Her Victims. 6. And make thee vile—read and treat thee with contempt. 7. And it shall come to pass that—read so that; for whence shall I seek comforters for thee? read whence can I seek comforters for her?

Once again Nahum repeats the source of his authority. Nineveh's fall is one of those things which in a divinely ruled world are inevitable. Jeremiah would doubtless have agreed with this. But there was this difference between them: Jeremiah was acutely conscious of the sins of his own people, whereas Nahum was conscious, rather, of their sufferings. Jeremiah, therefore, was not particularly interested in the fate of Nineveh. He saw no hope for Judah save in a psychological transformation. But Nahum, the nationalist, could and did gloat over the prospect of the humiliation of his country's oppressor. He wishes to see Nineveh placed, figuratively, in the position in which a condemned harlot was placed under the customs of the day. The implacability of his vengefulness appears in v. 7. There is to be no pity in all the world for Nineveh in the hour of her shame.

8-10. The Fate of One of the Harlot's Victims. 8. That was situated among the rivers—read that sat by the great Nile; omit that had the waters round about her. For and her wall was of the sea read whose wall was water? 9. Ethiopia and Egypt were—read Ethiopia was; omit and it was infinite; for thy helpers read her helpers.

As a most conspicuous example among Nineveh's many victims Nahum selects No-Amon (Thebes), situated on the east bank of the Nile about one hundred and forty miles north of the first cataract. From 2100-945 B.C. Thebes was the greatest city in the Near East. In 661 B.C. it was captured by Ashurbanipal of Assyria, who carried home from it prodigious plunder. At that time Egypt was ruled by an Ethiopian dynasty, which was on friendly terms with Libya. But, as Nahum points out, though behind Thebes lay the strength, not only of Egypt which it itself represents, but also of Libya and Put (a land whose location is not now known), these did not suffice to save her.

This strophe is an example of Nahum's daring irony. By selecting Thebes as an example, he was able, while ostensibly illustrating the possibility of Nineveh's fate, to direct a verbal shaft at Necho, who, by the strange vagaries of politics, found himself supporting the very nation which only half a century previously had laid in ruins the most magnificent city of his kingdom.

11-13. Nineveh's Fate Will Parallel That of Thebes. 11. Thou shalt be hid—read thou shalt be faint. 12. Shall be [like]—read are; for with the first-ripe figs read thy people are first-ripe figs. 13. Read behold thy people are as women in thy midst; they have altogether laid themselves open to their enemies.

The meaning of the text is so obvious that no exposition is necessary. It is notable, however, that Nahum here again suggests a low valuation of the material and moral strength of the Assyrian people as a whole. Apparently, the Egyptians did not share his opinion, and Nahum's contemptuous attitude may be put down either to the effect of Babylonian propaganda or to that disposition which opinionated people usually exhibit to undervalue the odds against any theory or cause they espouse. Assyria was by no means an easy conquest, and the stubbornness of her struggle for existence indirectly cost king Josiah his life and Nahum's party its control of the Judæan government.

14-17. An Ironical Challenge to a Hopeless Defense. 14. Make strong the brick kiln—read lay hold of the brick mold. 15. Omit it shall devour thee like the cankerworm.

16. Thou hast multiplied—read increased. Omit the cankerworm spoileth, and flieth away.

17. Crowned—read sacred officials. For marshals read scribes; for in the hedges in the cold day read in the walls in the cool of the day. Omit where they are.

Ironically the prophet urges Nineveh to prepare for a hopeless defense. The picture he draws is of the feverish activity of a city preparing for siege. The water supply and the forts and towers along the walls must be made ready. The walls of Nineveh being one hundred feet high and fifty feet thick, great gangs of men are set to work to make sun-dried and burned brick, the chief material then in use in Assyria and Babylon for construction. Re-enforcements pour into the city, among them swarms of merchants come to take care of their interests. Temple officials and civil servants dash here and there in officious preoccupation. But it is all of no avail. Behind the thickest walls fire and sword will search them out. And the busy officary will vanish into thin air when it suits their convenience as a swarm of locusts flits from the shelter of a protecting wall when the warmth of the sun makes it advisable.

18, 19. A Later Addition to the Text. Omit O King of Assyria. A dirge, with a prosaic addition (v. 19c), over the fallen city. It adds nothing to the thought of the poem which precedes. On the clause all that hear the bruit (mg. report) of thee clap the hands over thee, cf. Isa. 55¹² Ezek. 25⁶ Psa. 47¹. The strongest objections to the inclusion of these lines in Nahum's original poem are their lack of conformity to the apparent strophical plan and their decidedly retrospective tone.

HABAKKUK

BY PROFESSOR J. E. MCFADYEN

INTRODUCTION

Origin and Purpose. Opinion with regard to the origin and background of this book has undergone a marked change within recent years.

(1) A Prophecy against Babylon. Before this change, which began with Duhm's epoch-making book in 1906, Habakkuk was universally recognized as a contemporary of Jeremiah, his prophecy falling roughly about 600 B.C. The perplexing sequence of its various sections was explained by different scholars in different ways, of which the following seemed on the whole the most reasonable. In 12-4 the prophet complains to God of the prevalent injustice and brutality within Judah, perpetrated perhaps, but not certainly, by the ruling classes of Judah, and asks how long this is to continue. For answer (15-11) he is told that the Chaldeans (i.e., the Babylonians) are being summoned to avenge this wrong, and a vivid description is given of their military equipment and their irresistible advance. But (12-17) as the prophet becomes better acquainted with their cruel and aggressive methods, the solution which he seemed to have found only heightens the horror of his problem. So (21-4) in his perplexity he climbs his tower (of faith), where he receives from God a deeper solution in the form of an assurance that, despite all seeming, the divine purpose is hastening on to its fulfillment, and that the moral constitution of the world is such as to spell the ultimate defeat of cruelty and pride, and the ultimate triumph of righteousness—an assurance which was justified in less than seventy years by the fall of the Babylonian Empire. Then follows a series of woes upon the haughty conqueror (25-20), detailing his crimes and confirming his doom. The brilliant poem which follows (ch. 3), descriptive of Jehovah's coming for the salvation of his people (313), was usually believed to be from a different hand than Habakkuk's. (For a fuller discussion of this view and others representing various modifications, see Eiselen, The Prophetic Books of the O.T., vol. ii, pp. 510-514.)

(2) A Prophecy against Greece. The interest of this view of the book is that in it we see a prophet driven by the pressure of events from a simple to a more radical solution of his religious problem. But this view has lately been challenged by another which has already found considerable acceptance. For reasons which there is no space to detail, e.g., the inapplicability of the description in 15-11 to the Babylonian army, another historical background for the book has been sought and found by the substitution in 16 of Kittim for Chaldeans, which is supposed to have displaced it. The reference would in that case be, not to the Babylonians of the seventh century, but to the (Macedonian) Greeks of the fourth, and the world-conqueror denounced and doomed in 25-20 would be Alexander the Great. The advantage of this view is the unity with which it invests the book; all the havoc and perplexity reflected in its various sections—12-4 no less than the others—would be that created by Alexander's victorious army. Ch. 3 could also be authentic; it is the vision of the world-conqueror's defeat at the hands of a mightier than he, even the ancient Jehovah.

It may seem unfortunate for this view that it rests upon an emendation of the crucial word Chaldeans, the one definite historical allusion in the book; but there is much to be said for it, and it will be a fine exercise of the critical judgment for the reader to go through the book carefully, keeping both these possible interpretations in view. On the second view of the book, the sorrow which stirs Habakkuk's heart is not a national but a great world-sorrow; and on either view the book suggests that the secret of patience in perplexity is an indomitable faith in the purpose of God and in the ultimate defeat of evil and triumph of good. "Though it tarry, wait for it; for it is sure to come, it will not lag behind" (23f.).

The Prophet and the Significance of His Message. The question of Habakkuk's date, as already suggested, is closely bound up with that of interpretation. If the book is interpreted as a message against the Chaldeans the date would be around 600 B.C., and the historical background would be the same as that reflected in at least a part of Jeremiah (see intro. to that book, p. 677). If it is directed against Greece the O.T. contains only incidental references or allusions to the conditions inspiring it (e.g., Isa. 24-27; Zech. 9-14, in part, etc.), and most of the information would have to be secured from extra-biblical sources.

The book itself throws little light on the person and life of the prophet, and the rest of the O.T. is silent concerning him; numerous legends have grown up around his name, but all are of rather doubtful historical value. Internal evidence shows that Habakkuk, like the other prophets, was a keen observer of his environment, but the things he saw, instead of furnishing him a message to his contemporaries (except the woes in ch. 2), inspired him to challenge the righteousness and holiness of Jehovah. He, like many other pious souls, was troubled and perplexed by the apparent inequalities and inconsistencies of life, which he found difficult to harmonize with his lofty conception of Jehovah. Nevertheless, he did not sulk; boldly he presented his perplexity to his God, who pointed the way to a solution, so that the prophet came forth from the struggle with a more intense faith in Jehovah and the ultimate triumph of his people.

Two great and permanent truths expressed by the prophet deserve special mention. (1) The universality of the divine government of the world. The prophet accepts a special Divine Providence over Israel, but he insists with equal emphasis that the destinies of all nations are in his hands. Temporarily the foe may worship other gods and prosper; but Jehovah is from everlasting and will attest his supremacy by utterly destroying the boastful conqueror with his idols. (2) The righteous shall live by his faithfulness. In other words, righteousness, fidelity, steadfastness constitute elements of permanency which endure forever. The assertion of confidence and faith in 3¹⁷⁻¹⁹, which, however, may be a later addition, is unsurpassed elsewhere in the O.T. But even without the support of this passage Habakkuk may well be called "the prophet of faith."

CHAPTER I

1. The Superscription. This reminds us that Habakkuk was a prophet (burden=oracle), for the opening complaint (vv. 2-4) and also vv. 12-17 suggest the skeptic rather than the prophet. It is well to remember that even prophets were not always on the heights (cf. 2¹) but that they could be tortured with doubts like other people.

2-4. The Prophet's Complaint. Wrong is on the throne, law is paralyzed, justice is perverted (v. 4), the wicked have it all their own way, and—worst of all—Jehovah looks on (v. 3) in silence and will not hear when Habakkuk cries to him for help (v. 2).

5-11. Jehovah's Answer. Assuming that the word Chaldean in v. 6 is correct, we have in this section Jehovah's answer to the complaint in vv. 2-4; it is that Jehovah is raising up that people (Chaldeans practically=Babylonians) to punish the wrongdoing (in Judah) just described, and the special reference may be to Nebuchadnezzar's defeat of the Egyptians at Carchemish in 605 B.C., which made him master of Western Asia (as Assyria had been till her capital, Nineveh, fell in 612). The appeal in v. 5 is to the treacherous ones in Judah (so LXX reads, instead of among the nations; cf. also the quotation in Acts 13⁴¹): the work they are invited to look upon is the deadly work that will be done by the Babylonian armies—so terrible as to be almost incredible.

Then follows (vv. 6-11) a vivid description of their irresistible power and military methods and the havoc they work wherever they go—read that implacable and impetuous people (v. 6), with their fierce swift horses (v. 8) that scour the earth on conquest bent (v. 6), that frightful imperious people (v. 7), to whom kings and castles are but a laughing stock, who capture cities with ease by throwing up a mound of earth against their walls and advancing along it (v. 11; cf. 2 Sam. 20¹⁵) and, sweeping by like the wind (v. 11), gather their captives as the sand (v. 9). With them might is right; the sum of their offense is that they make might their god (v. 11; for pass over and be guilty read passes on and makes his might his god).

A growing body of scholars, however, believing that the foregoing description is not strictly applicable to the Babylonians, and arguing that v. 9 can only mean "their faces are set eastward," emend the word Chaldeans in v. 6 to Kittim, which they then take to refer to the (Macedonian) Greeks and the Asiatic campaigns of Alexander the Great (336-323 B.C.). In that case this section would not be an answer to the preceding complaint, but another description of the wrong there complained of, which would then be, not a wrong within Judah, but a world-wide wrong (see intro.).

12-17. A New Riddle. Assuming the correctness of the traditional reading Chaldeans in v. 6, this section is one of peculiar interest. In vv. 5-11 Habakkuk had welcomed the Babylonians as the "rod" with which the "angry" Jehovah would punish Judah, exactly as in the previous century Isaiah (10^{5f.}) had welcomed the Assyrians. Terrible as had been that answer to his complaint, it had brought with it a certain moral satisfaction; but the satisfaction was destined to be short-lived. It soon became only too clear that the instrument of Jehovah's purpose was not in sympathy with that purpose, for might, not right, was his god (cf. Isa. 10¹²⁻¹⁹). His zeal in executing the divine commission, of which he was unconscious (cf. Isa. 10⁷), was inspired only by a sense of ambition and self-aggrandizement. The remedy he brought was worse than the disease, and the prophet is again perplexed. His faith is staggered by the problem of the moral government of the world, and he appeals again, as he had appealed before (12), to Jehovah the holy God of his own people.

His perplexity grows as he watches the cruel havoc wrought by the Babylonians. He sees the nations like a shoal of fishes—leaderless, unorganized (v. 14)—swept into their all-devouring net (v. 15). He sees them dealing treacherously, swallowing up a nation like Judah which, bad as it is (vv. 2-4), is relatively far more righteous than the Chaldeans. He believes indeed that God ordained them to execute justice upon Judah, and for her discipline (v. 12); but he sees them behaving without mercy or moderation, drawing the sword (rather than net, v. 17) for ever, slaying nations mercilessly evermore, and actually deifying the weapons which had won them their rich conquests (v. 16), making very literally their might their god (cf. v. 11). And—saddest of all—the holy, everlasting, immortal God (v. 12: for we shall not die read who dieth not) looks on in silence upon all this treachery and brutality; he says nothing, does nothing. The answer to the prophet's prayer has only raised a fresh perplexity and made faith in God and in the moral order harder than ever.

Those who, reading Kittim in v. 6, take the reference to be to Alexander and his Greeks, regard this section simply as a fresh description of the march of his irresistible all-conquering armies (see notes under vv. 5-11).

CHAPTER II

1-4. The View from the Watch-Tower. In his distress Habakkuk climbs his tower to listen for some other sounds than the stroke of cruel Babylonian swords and to win a wider view of the purpose of God which is fulfilling itself in history. The watch-tower (v. 1), which some take literally, may be only a figure for some spiritual vantage-point where, in communion with his God, his spirit may become calmer and his vision clearer; from this he looks forth to see what God will say to him and what answer he will get to his complaint (v. 1). Nor does he climb in vain, for there Jehovah answered me (v. 2), and the answer is so important to others as well as to himself that he is told to engrave it on tablets, so that everyone may be able to read it fluently. There was a time when the prophet expected the solution of his problem to come in his own day (cf. 15), but now that he gets a more spacious view of God's purpose from his tower, he sees that the solution lies in the future. It has its time appointed, and it hasteth (or panteth) toward the end, but the end may be far away. Nevertheless, however far, it is certain; it will not deceive, and it will not be late. It will come, if not in Habakkuk's time, yet in God's time: therefore, though it tarry, wait for it, for it will assuredly come, it will not lag behind (v. 3). It is a magnificent counsel of patience and of faith, "By your patience ye shall win your souls" (Lk. 21¹⁹). God is patient, because he is eternal (cf. 11²), and man would be more patient could he see things in the light of the eternal purpose.

Unhappily, the meaning of the great verse which follows (v. 4), which seems to be the very heart and climax of the vision (v. 2), is far from clear. The second clause is fortunately plain enough, but the text of the first is obscure and uncertain. His soul is puffed up; whose soul? Clearly—in contrast with the righteous—the soul of the Babylonian; it is an inflated soul, not upright, or, rather, not straight and plain. But the context seems to demand something stronger than this; the promise in the second clause suggests some condemnation in the first clause; and with the help of LXX we may restore thus: As for that inflated one, my soul has no pleasure in him, but the just shall live by his faithfulness (rather than faith), i.e., by firmly trusting Jehovah, despite all experiences that evoke impatience and disappointment. This is assuredly a word worth writing on tablets, to be read and remembered forever. In history it is not the empire of might (cf. 11¹) but of right that shall live: it is the just man and nation that lives, and he lives by his union, through faithfulness and faith, with God; he is immortal as God himself (cf. 11²). There is something wonderful in the collocation of these three words—justice or righteousness, life, faithfulness. In the end it is the just that live, not the Nebuchadrezzars or the Alexanders, and they live by virtue of their faithfulness. The whole secret of religion is there. "He that believeth hath eternal life" (Jn. 6⁴⁷).

Woe to the Oppressor. (Vv. 5-20.) This section, describing the sins and the doom of the world-conqueror, is an expansion of v. 4a. The woes are dramatically represented as being pronounced by the nations whom he had crushed (v. 6).

5-8. Woe Upon His Lust of Land. The one thing certain about the difficult v. 5 is that wine, here utterly irrelevant, is wrong. It has been emended to mean Woe (to the treacherous dealer), but one hardly expects the woe till the taunt-song has been mentioned (v. 6a), and there is much to be said for the view that it conceals the word Greek, which is very like the word for wine. This tends to strengthen the view that the conqueror throughout the book is Alexander and his Greeks. Keepeth not at home should perhaps be unsated; and the verse would describe the Greek as imperious, insatiable, greedy as death and hell, i.e., the underworld (v. 5), loading himself with pledges, i.e., tribute, from every nation (v. 6), but doomed to the fate of spoliation (vv. 7, 8), which he had inflicted on others. There are significant word-plays here; pledges also means thick mire and biters (v. 7) means also creditors. The point is that the tables will be turned, there is a Nemesis in history; and songs of mockery will be sung when the spoiler has been spoiled.

9-11. Woe Upon His Palatial Buildings. He had built lofty palaces (cf. Jer. 22¹³⁻¹⁷) with ill-gotten gain (cf. Amos 3¹⁰) to preserve the treasures he had stolen from other countries (v. 9), he had shortened his life (Alexander died young) by this course of sin which could only end in shame (v. 10), for the very stone and timber would cry out against his rapacity. Their silent accusing voices would be everywhere. His would indeed be a haunted house.

12-14. Woe Upon the Cities He Has Built. His cities, like Jerusalem (cf. Mic. 3¹⁰), had been built with blood and established by iniquity—built perhaps by the appropriation of the property of those who had been judicially murdered, or (if blood is not to be pressed) by the labors of conquered peoples, and established by the iniquitous withholding of the wages of the workmen (cf. Jer. 22¹³). But such labors are destined to end in vanity, i.e., in nothing, and to be consumed in the fire (cf. Jer. 51⁵⁸). How foolish and futile it all is! For in the end the earth is to be filled with the knowledge of the glory of Jehovah: over it all his kingdom is to come. That is the divine destiny of the world. The world-conqueror is not Nebuchadrezzar or Alexander, but Jehovah; the world-empire is to be not Babylonian or Greek, but divine.

With these verses (or with vv. 9-11) should possibly go v. 17, which shows where and by what cruelty the material for the building had been acquired. Lebanon had been ransacked, her glorious cedars had been destroyed and the beasts that roamed her forests had been slain.

This was a wrong done to it and to them. The beasts and the land have their rights and those who wantonly assailed them to gratify their own ambition and vanity would be punished in kind.

15-17. Woe Upon His Unholy Banquets. If these verses are to be taken literally and not simply as a metaphor for contemptuous cruelty (cf. v. 17), the reference will be to the court-banquets of the world-conqueror, at which wine was offered and drunk immoderately and for immoral ends. That addest thy venom thereto (v. 15) should perhaps read out of large bowls, and be as one uncircumcised (v. 16) should be reel or stagger. The immoral conqueror (v. 15) is another Ham or Canaan (Gen. 9^{21f.}); and the point is, as before (v. 8), that there is a Nemesis in history. Jehovah too has his cup from which the conqueror must drink, and whose contents will send him staggering to shame. (On v. 17 see under vv. 12-14.)

18-20. Woe Upon His Idolatry. Idolatry is at once the secret and the climax of the conqueror's folly. His absurd conception of God (cf. 11¹) explains the monstrosity of his practice. Creed profoundly affects conduct. The Hebrews were tireless in their ridicule of the folly of idolatry (cf. Isa. 44⁹⁻²⁰ Psa. 135¹⁵⁻¹⁸). The idols were dumb, could give no response, no teaching or direction, like Israel's God (cf. Isa. 23); there was no breath, spirit, energy in them. In glorious contrast with them is the great God of Israel whose palace was the heavens and whose due it was to receive the homage of all the earth.

Such was the message (23-20) that came to Habakkuk upon his watch-tower (21) and that he carried with him into his individual and international perplexities.

CHAPTER III

The Day of Jehovah's Coming. This brilliant poem represents the vision from the tower (2²)—what Habakkuk saw as 24-20 represents what he heard. As the "Woes" of 25-20 expand the thought of the doom of the arrogant conqueror in 24^a, so ch. 3 expands the thought of the preservation of the righteous in 24^b. Jehovah goes forth for the salvation of his people (v. 13) and the scene and manner of his action are described throughout in terms which recall his deliverance of Israel from Egypt in the olden time.

1, 2. Habakkuk's Prayer. V. 1 is simply the heading. The prayer is in poetic form; both in the heading and at the close liturgical notes are formed. Shigionoth is a word of uncertain meaning. LXX reads "on the stringed instruments"; see comment on v. 17. He begins with the prayer that the ancient work, i.e., deliverance, be repeated, and that Jehovah would again make himself (not it) known, for the present crisis calls for divine interference.

3-11. The Splendor and the Terror of Jehovah's Coming. Habakkuk saw God, as of old (cf. Deut. 33² Judg. 5⁴), coming from Teman in the northwest of Edom, and Paran, between Sinai and Edom—with dazzling light about him and rays on either side (cf. mg.), attended by Pestilence and fiery bolts, i.e., Fever. The moment he touched the earth, it shook (not measured), nations trembled (not drove asunder, v. 6), i.e., neighboring peoples like Midian (v. 7 curtains=“tent-hangings”). He comes as a warrior, riding his chariot of storm-cloud, with bow and arrows (i.e., the lightning) and spear (for the oaths . . . word read thou didst fill thy quiver with shafts).

12-16. He Comes to Deliver His People. Wherefore this angry (v. 12) advance? (V. 8.) It was to crush the foe, to pierce the head of their warriors with his shafts (v. 14) and thus to save his people (v. 13: for neck read rock). Well might the enemy be terrified, for the sight had terrified the prophet himself (v. 16). But with this divine Warrior on Israel's side he can look to the future with calm confidence, and on this note he concludes: in patience I will wait for the coming of that day of distress upon the nation that now assaileth us.

17-19. The Triumph of Faith. These beautiful verses probably formed no part of the prophet's vision, which ends with v. 16; but they helped to adapt this poem, set to Shigionoth (perhaps=dithyrambic poem; cf. v. 1), for use as a prayer. They are, however, peculiarly appropriate, for they are inspired by the same spirit of patience and hope (cf. 23^{f.}) as the message and the vision from the tower. In fruitful fields and flocks men had been taught to look for the presence and blessing of God (cf. Deut. 71^{2f.}); but here is a man who can dispense with all that, who can believe where he cannot see, who loves God not for his gifts but for himself, who can dispense with them if he has but him (cf. Psa. 73^{25f.}), and who can not only be patient but glad with a joy which no man can take from him (v. 18), so glad that he can walk upon the heights nimble and sure and happy (v. 19). This writer has entered into the innermost secret of spiritual religion and has bequeathed to us one of the most precious words in the O.T.

ZEPHANIAH

BY PROFESSOR WILLIAM C. GRAHAM

INTRODUCTION

Theme and Literary Structure. In the form in which the book of Zephaniah has come down to us it deals with the imminent approach of Jehovah's day of universal judgment and Israel's survival of that supreme test. Down to 3¹³ the prevailing spirit is that of pessimism. Where a more hopeful mood does break through it is yet subdued and always charged with ethical earnestness. From 3¹⁴ on the outlook is vigorously optimistic and breathes the spirit which accepts as axiomatic Jehovah's partisanship for Israel. The transition which occurs at 3¹⁴ is so marked that scholars are quite generally agreed that this concluding section is a later, post-exilic addition.

Setting aside 3^{14f.}, it will be seen that the remainder of the book is dominated by recurring predictions of a great catastrophe which is to sweep away the existing world order. Woven into this major and dominant theme are two closely related, specific applications of it. The first applies the coming judgment to Judah and Jerusalem, the second to the international political order. The ideas most prominent in the prophet's treatment of his own nation are disloyalty to Jehovah and susceptibility to foreign influences. When this is grasped it is easy to see the relationship of his utterances on these subjects to his predictions concerning foreign nations. His thought is that Judah, careless of Jehovah's will, and entangled in the meshes of pagan influence, faces the inevitable fate of being swept away in the crash of a decadent civilization. This is a common theme of practically all the writing prophets.

Here and there, in the pessimistic portion of the prophecy, we encounter isolated verses or verse-groups which interject notes of optimism into the composition. Are we to conclude that like 3^{14f.} all these previously occurring optimistic verses are later additions? In other words, are we to believe that Zephaniah holds out no gleam of hope to his contemporaries? Or are we to conclude that the presence of such passages in 1¹-3¹³ justifies the view that not only they but also 3^{14f.} are authentic utterances of the prophet?

Original Utterances of Zephaniah. The truth of the matter probably does not lie in either of these extreme views. Some of these optimistic verses are beyond doubt by Zephaniah. Some, but not all. For others may be shown to be, like 3¹⁴⁻²⁰, later corrective additions.

This commentary attributes to Zephaniah 12, 3, 7, 10a, 12a, 14-18, 22 35ab, 8, which furnish the dominant theme; 14-6, 8, 9, 10b, 11, 12b, 31-4, which apply the catastrophe to Judah; 21, 4, 5, 12-14, which deal with the international order; and 23(?), 6, 7b 311b-13, which touch on the new order which is to follow the catastrophe. Later writers have developed the optimistic outlook in 27a, 7c-11 39, 10, 11a, 14-20. Other later additions include 113(?) 215 35c-7.

Zephaniah's Outlook. To be able to understand the prophet Zephaniah or to be able to present him to a modern class one must gain a reasoned opinion on at least three points. (1) What did Zephaniah think? (2) Why did he so think? (3) How does his thought bear on modern life?

The first of these questions must be answered from the text of the prophecy itself. Zephaniah believed that the civilization of the world of his day was intolerably corrupt; that his own nation, as such, was hopelessly involved in it; that since things could not be better until they were first worse, Jehovah would shortly sweep away the whole existing order; and that there would succeed it a new era wherein what few good people remained in the world would live a life of simplicity and harmlessness as in the good old days of long ago before men entered upon a life of competitive nationalism.

Why Zephaniah thought such thoughts as these must be sought in the book and in the sources of contemporary history. The prophets are never ordinary men and Zephaniah, as his utterances show, is no exception. To read his book is to see that he was highly sensitive to his surroundings and that imagination and emotion played a large part in molding his judgments. Next in importance to these characteristics of his own nature is the fact that he was rooted and grounded in the religious outlook upon life. The greatest of all realities to him was Jehovah, and his ideas of the character of God had much to do with determining his reaction to life. What were his ideas of God? That is a question which should be carefully pondered.

Zephaniah, like all of us, was much influenced by the world in which he lived, particularly by the social and political tendencies of his times. It is desirable to supplement his impressions of these as they have come down to us in his book by knowledge drawn from other sources.

Historical Background. Zephaniah prophesied during the first half of the reign of Josiah. It must be remembered that the latter's father, Amon, and his grandfather, Manasseh, had fostered policies of expediency in the realm of both religion and politics. In these policies they were not without opposition from a puritanical, monotheistic, nationalistic element in society, in which, no doubt, the finer prophetic spirits were prominent. A most significant event was the assassination of King Amon. And it is of even more importance that a popular uprising against those who assassinated him was necessary to secure the succession of his young son, Josiah, then only eight years old. So far as the policies of the nation went there was no change for at least eighteen years after the young king was crowned. When, however, Josiah was about twenty-six (621 B.C.) we find him throwing in his lot wholeheartedly with the puritan party, and reversing the traditional policies of his immediate ancestors in a great attempt at religious reform which had also, however, political significance. It is allowable, therefore, to infer that during the early years of Josiah there went on an intense internal struggle in Judah between parties espousing radically different religious and political principles. Zephaniah's ministry must be placed in this period while the puritan party was still in opposition, because the conditions of which he complains are those which Josiah later endeavored, with some temporary success, to rectify. It makes Zephaniah's utterances more vivid if we understand them to be those of a member of the opposition party, a record of the emotions and judgments of a puritan, himself of royal birth, who had thrown in his lot with the opponents of the then dominant elements in his own house. An understanding of these conditions throws, too, a flood of light on the prophet's pessimism. It is the pessimism of a leader of the opposition party. For the most reliable biblical source bearing on all this, cf. 2 Kings 21-23³⁰.

The international situation is also important. Assyria was still the dominant world-power, but just about Zephaniah's time there began to happen a series of events which resulted at last in its downfall. A great horde of barbarians commonly known as the Scythians swept down from the steppes of central Asia and overran the civilized world to the very borders of Egypt, massacring, burning and loot-ing as they went. Although Zephaniah never mentions them by name it is inconceivable that he did not know of this threat to civilization. It may be taken as certain that it had much to do with his assurance that the existing order was about to be swept away. As a matter of fact, these barbarians did so weaken the great empire that a combination of Medes and Babylonians was able at last to break Assyrian power and to capture Nineveh in 612 B.C. In its death struggle Assyria was assisted by Egypt, and it is altogether possible that king Josiah was assassinated by Pharaoh Necho in 608 B.C. on suspicion of intrigue with Babylon against the Assyro-Egyptian cause (cf. p. 69a).

Teaching of Zephaniah. The teaching closely resembles that of the earlier prophets: Jehovah is the God of the universe, a God of righteousness and holiness, who expects of his worshipers a life in accord with his will. Israel is his chosen people, but on account of its sins it must suffer severe punishment. Wholesale conversion seems out of the question but a remnant may escape. He adds little to earlier teaching but attempts, with much moral and spiritual fervor, to impress upon his contemporaries the fundamental truths of the religion of Jehovah. There is, however, one point that deserves special mention, namely, the prophet's emphasis on the Day of Jehovah. Earlier prophets had spoken of it; Amos had described it in language similar to that employed by Zephaniah; but the latter surpasses all his predecessors in the emphasis on this terrible manifestation of Jehovah. Indeed, his entire teaching centers around this day, and in his utterances are found the germs of apocalyptic visions which are so common in later utterances of an eschatological nature (see especially 12, 3, 14, 15, 17 24, 15 311-13). The promises of a bright future are further developed by later writers, whose world-outlook is even broader than that of the original sections and who give a sublime picture of the glories of the Messianic era (see especially 314-20).

Permanent Significance. In two respects especially Zephaniah is of significance for modern life. His ethical idealism which comes out in his reaction to the social phenomena of his time is timeless and eternal. His pictures of conditions in Jerusalem, making all due allowances for the exaggerations of partisanship, passion and strong emotion, are applicable to any society in any age. The tendencies which he combated are with us to-day. Wherever the spirit of infidelity, of pride, of oppression, of selfishness exists his book is entirely up to date.

The same can hardly be said of his pessimism and his catastrophic expectations. A study of these will show that they proceed from imagination and emotion, stirred by the historical and religious background in which he lived. They constitute the only motivation which the prophet, with his view of God and of the world in which he lived, was able to suggest in his effort to make his contemporaries realize their situation and turn from their ways. His ideas of God in his relationship to man stand in just as sad contrast to the glorious gospel in the N.T. of divine Fatherhood and human brotherhood, as his conception of a natural order subject to sporadic interferences from an enraged Deity stands to the modern scientific view of the universe.

CHAPTER I

1. Editorial Superscription. The historical reliability of this editorial note is generally admitted. Zephaniah means "Jehovah is protector." His lineage is the longest recorded of any prophet and is derived from a certain Hezekiah, probably the king of that name who reigned in Judah during the later years of Isaiah's ministry. Certain features of the prophet's outlook seem to indicate that he enjoyed a position of rank and privilege.

2, 3. Announcement of the Major Theme: Universal Catastrophe. For and the stumbling-blocks with the wicked, read yea, I will cause the wicked to stumble. Opening with the announcement of the divine intention to sweep away all things, the scope of these words is defined in v. 3 to cover all orders of living creatures. In the last two clauses of the reconstructed text the verbs and their objects are, in effect, through parallelism, synonymous. The prophet thinks of mankind as a corrupt race very much as did the author of the Flood story in Genesis. Later on he modifies this estimate slightly. (Cf. 26, 7b and 1 Kings 19:14-18.)

4-12. First Application of the Major Theme: to Judah and Jerusalem. The text of these verses has suffered, and has undergone various expansions. The following emendations have been suggested: 4. Omit with the priests. 5. Omit which swear to. 8. Omit it shall come to pass in the day of the Lord's sacrifice. Princes . . . king's sons—i.e., members of the royal house in all its branches. 9. Leap over the threshold—read dance attendance at the threshold.

11. Howl, ye inhabitants of Maktesh—read and a howl from the Maktesh; for they that were laden with read they that weigh out. 13. Omit the whole.

This section comprises four pungently suggestive sketches of contemporary conditions in Judah and Jerusalem, each introduced by a recurring allusion to the day of doom. The effect produced by the interweaving of the major theme is that of involving Judah inextricably in the anticipated visitation of Jehovah's punitive wrath.

4-6. These verses present a sketch of the religious life of the Judæan people. The nation has failed to achieve that spiritual unity and moral solidarity which lie in unswerving devotion to one God only. Several types of religious infidelity are suggested: (1) Remnant of Baal. A heathenized cult resulting from the popular identification of the local Baals of the ancient Canaanite fertility cults with Jehovah. Zephaniah satirically calls the priests of this impure rite Chemarim, or pagan priests. The prophets are the traditional enemies of this eclecticism (cf. 1 Kings 17f., Hos., Isa.), which nevertheless persisted down to the Exile (cf. Jer., Ezek.). (2) Worship of the heavenly bodies, a common Semitic nature cult. (3) The cult of Milcom, god of the Ammonites. (4) Open apostasy from Jehovah. (5) Divided allegiance to Jehovah. The mental and moral confusion resulting from this religious inebriety is graphically presented in the concrete suggestion of the devotees who bow down to Jehovah yet swear by Milcom, which is as though a confessing Christian were to solemnize an oath in the name of Thor or Odin.

7-9. The second sketch is introduced by an attempt to create the atmosphere of tense expectation which precedes the consummation of some great event. The event expected is, of course, Jehovah's great final day of judgment, which is described under the figure of a sacrifice for which the victims have been prepared and the guests assembled and ritually cleansed (cf. 1 Sam. 165). It is futile to attempt to determine from this figure of speech who are to be the guests and who the victims in the coming day of doom. All that can with certainty be said is that this verse makes it clear that the so-called "upper classes" of society are to be included as victims. The charge against this ruling caste is that of aping foreign fashions, a phenomenon symptomatic of a decline in loyalty to the national genius. These rich and powerful people are surrounded by a class of social parasites, whom the prophet satirizes as dancing attendance at the threshold of their patron while utterly unscrupulous about the methods they employ in serving him.

10, 11. Introduced again by a reference to the approaching catastrophe, we have here, in all probability, the specific inclusion of the commercial and financial classes in the disaster. Four topographical terms are introduced—fish gate, second quarter, hills, Maktesh. On the actual significance of these we can only speculate, but the poetic form suggests two sets of balancing antithetical terms which, taken together, are inclusive of the city's business life in its social as well as in its commercial aspects. That these terms were early connected with the business classes appears from v. 11bc, whether it be regarded as a gloss or not. For the use of the term Canaanite for "merchant" cf. Hos. 12⁷ (see mg.) Isa. 23⁸.

12. Now the prophet gives us a picture of Jehovah searching Jerusalem with a lamp for men that are settled on their lees. This metaphor is very striking. In the process of ripening, wine must be poured "from vessel to vessel" (cf. Jer. 48^{11, 12}). Left too long it becomes fit only for wasting. This expresses the prophet's judgment on most of his contemporaries. If the reader will concentrate his attention on these sketches of Judæan life, he will find impressive evidence of the prophet's artistic ability to suggest, by concrete examples, the whole spiritual atmosphere of the society in which he lives.

13-18. Emphasis of the Major Theme: The Terrors of Jehovah's Day. For a better understanding of the prophet's thought the following textual notations may be made. 14. Read the great day of the Lord is near, it is near and hasteth greatly; near at hand is the bitter day of the Lord, hastening faster than a warrior. 17. Omit because they have sinned against the Lord. 18. Omit in . . . jealousy; for land read earth.

Beginning with yet another reminder of the proximity of the great final catastrophe Zephaniah passes on to enlarge upon the unmaning horror of it. It is to be inflicted directly by Jehovah through (1) disturbances in the natural order, wasteness, desolation, darkness, gloominess, clouds, thick darkness, and (2) disturbances in the political order, wrath, trouble, distress, trumpet, alarm. If, as is probable (cf. intro., section on "Historical Background"), Zephaniah had the Scythians in mind, it seems clear from 23, 6, 7b and 38, and from what is known of the nature of these people, that they would be included by him among the victims. What the prophet expects here is a day when a corrupt international order will dissolve in the confused self-destructive conflict of its various elements and be swept away by calamitous manifestations of natural forces. Cf. art., Inter testamental Religion, pp. 206-7.)

CHAPTER II

1-15. Second Application of the Major Theme: to the Existing International Order.

1. For this verse, where the present text is insoluble, read conspire together, O ye nations! 2. Read for this verse before ye become like fine dust, like chaff which passes away (cf. Psa. 21-3, 9 and Ezek. 38, 39). 3. Deleted by most critics, but quite possible as a word of Zephaniah if the genuineness of vv. 6, 7b be admitted. 5. Cherethites (cf. 1 Sam. 30¹⁴ Ezek. 25¹⁶). Omit the word of the Lord is against you; omit Canaan; for the land read O land. 6. Read for this verse, And thou shalt become pastures for shepherds and folds for flocks. 7. For this verse read only By the sea shall they feed, in the houses of Ashkelon shall they lie down in the evening. 8. On reproach and revilings cf. Ezek. 253, 6, 8 Jer. 4826, 30 Obad.¹² 9. On Sodom and Gomorrah cf. Deut. 2923 Isa. 19 Jer. 23¹⁴ Amos 4¹¹ Mt. 10¹⁵, etc. 11. For similar visions of Jehovah's world-wide dominion cf. Mic. 4¹⁻⁴ Mal. 1¹¹ Zech. 14⁶, all of which are post-exilic. Vv. 7a, 7c-11 are to be regarded as later insertions. 14. *Herd*s—i.e., of wild beasts, cf. all the beasts of the nations, for which read all the beasts of the field. For [their] voice shall sing in the windows; desolation shall be in the thresholds; for he hath laid bare the cedar work—read the owl will hoot in the window, the raven on the threshold. Cf. LXX. 15. Omit; cf. Isa. 222 237 3213 478, 10. This verse was possibly inserted to connect the preceding context more closely with 31¹, so that the latter might be referred to Nineveh instead of Jerusalem as 32^b, 5 make evident it should be.

The full significance of Judah's worship of foreign deities and aping of foreign ways reaches expression in this section, the original text of which has been much mutilated. Having lost the free, independent mind which inspires a nation to seek the creative realization of a unique destiny, Judah must now go down with that civilization which it has preferred to a truer way of life. The whole world order, from remotest Ethiopia to the farthest hinterlands of Assyria, is about to fall to pieces like a gay and pretentious but moth-eaten garment.

1-7. The passage opens with a satirical challenge to the nations to conspire together in futile resistance before the divine wrath overwhelms them. From satire the prophet passes to a general and tentative invitation to the meek of the earth (v. 3), simple, humble, unambitious folk, to seek Jehovah in the hope that they may escape the coming judgment. The motivation for this turning to Jehovah is the certain collapse of all existing powers which are dealt with in detail in the remainder of the chapter. Philistia occupies the attention in vv. 4-7. Her four chief remaining cities are mentioned. The driving out of the Ashdodites at noonday suggests that Zephaniah's expectation here was of a sudden, irresistible military onslaught. Doubtless he had the Scythians in mind as the perpetrators; but if so, they are to him no more than a passing element in the great confusion, just as are the portents in nature. Certainly, he does not contemplate their permanent possession of Philistine territory after the storm passes. Cf. vv. 6, 7b, and note on 113-18.

8-11. A post-exile prediction of disaster for Moab and Ammon. No previous prophet betrays a similar feeling against these peoples on the ground of their attitude to Judah. Cf. Amos 111-15. The conditions here assumed fit better the years of the latter's supreme discomfiture (586-582 B.C.) when such was the attitude of these trans-Jordanic nations that all later literature reflects the bitter enmity that was then engendered. It is, moreover, extremely difficult to reconcile the thoughtful care displayed here by Jehovah for his people with the unmitigated threats of his destroying wrath in ch. 1. In addition, the original passage itself has again been interpolated, for v. 10 is a prosaic enlargement of v. 8, while in v. 11 the attention passes from Moab and Ammon to a prediction of Jehovah's world-wide dominion. One has also but to compare the recrudescence of the spirit of international cupidity and ambition which is reflected in the words, my people shall spoil them, with the genuine hope of Zephaniah for the future, to conclude that this section was hardly written by him. Finally, the marked contrast between the heathen nations' acceptance of Jehovah and the destruction of them predicted in the surrounding context, shows also an entirely different outlook.

12. An oracle against the Ethiopians who, living to the south of Egypt proper, here stand for the southernmost limit of the prophet's known world. Up to a few years before Zephaniah an Ethiopian dynasty had, for nearly a century, ruled in Egypt. On the analogy of the space devoted to other peoples by Zephaniah this prophecy has been considerably abbreviated, which may be due to the fact that no serious calamity overtook Egypt until 525 B.C. when Cambyses annexed it to the Persian Empire.

13-15. Here disaster is predicted for Assyria, whose empire reached to the northernmost confines of the civilized world. In Zephaniah's day Assyria was still the dominant world-power. Again it becomes evident that the prophet contemplates, on the day of divine wrath, only the sweeping away of an effete civilization to the accompaniment of cosmical disturbances. Nineveh is to remain a heap of desolate ruins, from the gaping thresholds and windows of which owls hoot and ravens croak. The contrast between this and the future of Palestine is psychologically convincing. It would be natural for the prophet to locate his utopia in Palestine, equally natural for him to feel Assyria would remain in a state of perpetual desolation.

CHAPTER III

1-13. The Major Theme Again Applied to Judah: The Perfidy of Jerusalem and the Sure Righteousness of Jehovah. There has been much later addition to the text of this chapter. Many critics deny Zephaniah's authorship of any single verse in it. Others limit his authorship to vv. 1-5. As will be shown below, vv. 14-20 are a post-exilic addition. The view taken here is that vv. 1-5, 8, 11b, 12, 13 accord with the prophet's previous conceptions. The exposition takes account only of these verses.

4. The sanctuary—read that which is holy; the law—read instruction. 5. For bring his judgment to light, he faileth not read establish his justice; light fails not; omit but the unjust knoweth no shame. 6, 7. These two verses interrupt the natural sequence between vv. 5, 8. V. 6 may be a notation commemorating the accuracy of Zephaniah's forecast in some particulars at least, possibly written after the great political changes which resulted from the overthrow of the Assyrian power by the Babylonians and the Medes, 612 B.C. V. 7 is a defense of Jehovah's character, claiming that it was no part of his plan to inflict calamity upon Judah until forced to do so by its incorrigibility. It was possibly written during the Exile and is in accord with the ideas of Jeremiah, Ezekiel, and Isa. 40-55. For so her dwelling should not be cut off [according to] all that I have appointed concerning her read and there will not be cut off from her sight anything that I have laid upon her. The conception of a disappointed God is the interesting feature of this suggested translation (cf. Lk. 2013-15). 9-11a. This conception of a day of universal Jehovah worship is too advanced for Zephaniah, nor could he conceive a time when Jehovah's people would not be put to shame for their transgressions against him. Cf. also v. 7. 11b. For then will I take away—the antecedent of then cannot lie in vv. 9-11a, because the universal acknowledgment of Jehovah contemplated there would surely be conceived as the result rather than the cause of the social transformation suggested in 11b, 12.

For afflicted read humble; cf. Isa. 31⁵; poor—cf. Amos 4¹. 13. Remnant—cf. Amos 1⁸ Ezek. 25¹⁶ 36³, 4, 5 Isa. 44¹⁷. These and many other passages in exilic and early post-exilic literature make it permissible to allow both the use of this term and the conception behind it to Zephaniah.

1-4. The prophet once more returns to the arraignment of his native city. The key to these verses lies in the adjectives rebellious, polluted, oppressing, applied to Jerusalem in v. 1. She is rebellious against Jehovah in that she has refused to listen to the prophets or to receive correction from properly constituted authority. She is polluted in that she has not trusted in Jehovah her God but has yielded to the spirit of the age, becoming entangled in international politics, and contenting herself with merely mundane aspirations. Then follows an exposition of the term oppressing. Prey to the cruel, insatiable greed of a profligate aristocracy and a corrupt officary; confused and misled by a class of professional "prophets" who have become so impregnated with the materialistic spirit of the times that the spirit of God no longer functions through them (cf. Mic. 2¹¹ 35^{f.}, 11); exploited by conscienceless priests who have no innate respect for holy things and who manipulate the ancient social standards intrusted to them for their own gain (cf. Hos 4⁶⁻⁹ 5¹ 6⁹ Amos 7^{10f.} Mic. 3¹¹ Isa. 28⁷ Jer. 2⁸ 5³¹ 6¹³ 14¹⁸)—such is the condition into which Jerusalem has fallen.
